1667. SEVERAL goldſmiths and others having lent and advanced great ſums of money to the crown upon the credit of the Exchequer, and by encouragement of an act of parliament for aſſigning orders in the Exchequer without revocation, paſſed in the year 1667, (a) for which monies ſo lent, the goldſmiths were debtors to great numbers of his majeſty's ſubjects, and particularly ſir Robert Vyner, one of the goldſmiths, was debtor to the plaintiff for money really lent the ſum of 1000l.

1671. And there having been in January 1671 a ſtop put to the payments in the Exchequer, whereby the ſaid ſir Robert Vyner and the reſt of the goldſmiths were rendered unable to pay their creditors.

1676. His then majeſty king Charles the ſecond, (in juſtice and compaſſion to the goldſmiths and their creditors, and to remove the miſeries which attended the ſaid ſtop) was pleaſed to give directions in April 1676 to the then lord high treaſurer, to cauſe the accounts of the ſaid goldſmiths to be truly examined and exactly ſtated; which was accordingly done by the then chancellor of the Exchequer, auditor of the revenue, and other proper officers of the crown (moſt of them being then members of the houſe of commons), and a report thereof being made to the king in council in February 1676,

1677. Letters patents. His then majeſty in and about April 1677, by letters patents under the great ſeal of England, did grant unto each of the ſeveral goldſmiths, their heirs and aſſigns, and for the benefit of their creditors, in lieu and ſatisfaction of the monies due to them from his ſaid majeſty, a yearly rent or ſum for ever out of the hereditary revenue of exciſe, equal in value to the intereſt of their reſpective debts, after the rate of ſix pounds per cent. per ann. with a clauſe of redemption upon his majeſty's paying the principal money with the arrears of rent; the ſaid rents or annual ſums to be paid quarterly upon tallies to be ſtruck in the receipt upon the commiſſioners, &c. of the exciſe; and directs and commands the treaſurer, &c. barons and officers of the Exchequer of the king, his heirs and ſucceſſors, that they do from time to time perform all acts neceſſary for the conſtant payment of the money, and from time to time to levy and ſtrike tallies without any further warrant, ſo that the yearly ſums may be conſtantly paid, without any further or other warrant to be ſued for from the king, his heirs or ſucceſſors. And if the money ſhould happen to be paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, then that the high treaſurer, and commiſſioners of the Treaſury, under-treaſurer, chamberlains, and barons of the Exchequer for the time being, and all other officers and miniſters of the Exchequer, and of the receipt thereof, are authorized and required to pay out of ſuch monies as ſhall be ſo paid into the Exchequer or elſewhere, ſo much as ſhall be in arrear, without any further or other warrant; and the ſaid payments to be preferred before any other payment out of the ſame, by virtue or colour of any warrant, order, or directions whatſoever of any after-date, excepting for the management of the ſaid revenue, and about 36209l. 15s. 4½ a-year to the then queen conſort and the duke of York. Alſo his majeſty thereby granted, that the letters patent ſhould be expounded and taken moſt favourably and beneficially for the grantees, and covenanted to make further aſſurance if required; and on the 23d of May, 1677, ordered in council that the ſaid letters patent ſhould be printed and made public for the information and ſatisfaction of the creditors of the ſaid goldſmiths.

Alſo the right honourable the houſe of peers were pleaſed on the 10th of July 1678, to paſs a bill for the confirming the ſaid letters patents; but that ſeſſion ended before the ſaid bill was read in the houſe of commons.

Whereupon many of the creditors of the goldſmiths (amongſt others the plaintiff Mr. Williamſon) delivered up their ſecurities for their debts to the goldſmiths, and the plaintiff accepted of an aſſignment from Vyner in lieu of his 1000l. debt, purſuant to the ſaid letters patents of a proporable part of the annual ſums ſo granted, and which ſums were accordingly paid in the reigns of king Charles the ſecond, and the late king 1683. James the ſecond, to Lady-Day 1683. And in regard no tallies or monies could afterwards be obtained upon due and repeated application for that purpoſe:

1689. The plaintiff Mr. Williamſon in Hilary term 1689, did commence his ſuit in the Exchequer by way of monſtrance de droit, (as had formerly been very often practiſed) thereby ſetting forth his title as aſſignee under ſir Robert Vyner to the ſaid 60l. per ann. (being his proportionable part of the ſaid annual ſum ſo granted by the ſaid letters patents), and prayed that the arrears thereof might be paid unto him, and that the future growing ſums might alſo be paid according to the ſaid letters patents.

1690. Unto which ſuit the then attorney-general (now lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas) had ſeveral days and terms given him to plead or demur as he ſhould think beſt for the crown : and at laſt a demur being by him put in thereunto, 1691. The cauſe had a long agitation, and was argued for about two years by the then Mr. Attorney, Mr. Solicitor, and others of the king's council for the crown, and alſo by council for the plaintiff Mr. Williamſon. And the court after long deliberation and view of the precedents and book caſes produced and cited on both ſides in Hilary term 1691, gave judgment for the plaintiff, that the letters patents were good and bound the revenue; and that the plaintiff ought to be paid the arrears of the ſaid 60l. per ann. and the growing duty for the future.

Whereupon the then attorney-general on the behalf of his majeſty, brought a writ of error returnable before the then commiſſioners of the great ſeal, who thereupon ordered all the judges to be attended with copies of the proceedings, and that they ſhould give their aſſiſtance at the argument of the caſe: and after the cauſe had been long and many times argued by council at the bar, at laſt the judges aſſiſtants ſeverally and ſolemnly argued the ſame, and were all of opinion (except the lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas) that the letters patents were good in law, and that the plaintiff had a good title, and that the judgment given in the Exchequer was good and ought to be affirmed, and that the plaintiff Mr. Williamſon ought to be paid his arrears and the future duty according to the ſaid letters patents and judgment. But the lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas was of opinion, that although the grant or letters patents were good in law, yet that the plaintiff had not taken a proper remedy, and that the court of Exchequer had no juriſdiction in this cauſe. And the right honourable the then lord keeper, (now lord chancellor) having publicly argued the ſaid cauſe, and being of the ſame opinion as to the juriſdiction of the court, for that and ſeveral other reaſons offered by his lordſhip, was 1696. pleaſed to reverſe the judgment.

Upon which judgment of reviſal, the plaintiff Mr. Williamſon hath brought his writ of error in the houſe of lords, and humbly hopes their lordſhips will be pleaſed to reverſe the judgment given by the lord chancellor, and affirm the judgment given for the plaintiff in the court of Exchequer. Conſidering,

I. That the plaintiff is a purchaſer upon a full and valuable conſideration from ſir Robert Vyner the patentee, having delivered up the ſecurity he had for his debt, and accepted the 60l. per ann. in lieu thereof.

II. That the court of Exchequer (who are always exceeding careful of the revenue, and the king's intereſt, being more immediately bound thereunto by the oaths than the reſt of the judges are), upon mature and great deliberation and ſearch and view of many ancient precedents, did ſolemnly adjudge and declare the law to be, that the letters patents were good, and that the plaintiff had taken a proper remedy, and ought to be paid his annuity and the arrears thereof.

III. That all the judges called to the lord chancellor's aſſiſtance (except the lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas), upon ſeveral days ſolemn arguments and debate, gave their opinions for the plaintiff in affirmance of the judgment in the Exchequer; and that the ſaid letters patents were good, and ought to be complied with in paying the ſaid annuity, and that the plaintiff had taken a proper remedy to recover the ſame.

IV. Even the opinion of the lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas was (as is humbly conceived), that the grants and letters patents were good, and conveyed a legal right and title to the patentee; yet that this right was without a remedy; for that the court of Exchequer had no power over the king's money, when it was brought into the receipt, their power being over it as was alledged in tranſitu, before paid in, and only to enforce the payment thereof; whereas a right and title without a remedy (and no other legal remedy was pretended to be pointed out to the plaintiff) ſeems contrary to all laws, and to the rules of juſtice and reaſon : and indeed it would be a hard thing to ſay that the court of Exchequer can relieve the king againſt the ſubject, and not help and relieve the ſubject when he produces a legal title againſt the king. This hath not been the practice of that court for near the laſt 200 years.

V. The objections ſo much inſiſted upon, that the lord treaſurer is ſuperior to the barons, and therefore not to be commanded by them to pay monies; and that in caſe the barons can diſpoſe of the king's money, it may weaken and prevent the public ſecurity when the neceſſities of the ſtate require it to be otherwiſe employed, are thus anſwered. That although the lord treaſurer is a greater perſon, yet he and all the ſubjects are inferior to the king's courts. That the barons ſend this command, as they are a court of juſtice, and in the name of the king himſelf; ſo that it is the king by his writs, and not the barons that command the lord treaſurer in this caſe. The barons have no power to diſpoſe of the king's money, but where they have a warrant under the great or privy ſeal (as in this caſe by the grant and letters patents they have) for the doing thereof; ſo that the court of Exchequer in this caſe only takes care that the king's grant and letters patents be made effectual, and that the officers of the crown do their duties for that purpoſe, as by the ſaid letters patents they are enjoined to do.

VI. This cauſe in conſequence muſt affect all perſons claiming under the crown, or having any tallies or orders upon or payments out of the Exchequer; for all thoſe will be made much better or worſe by the judgment of the lords in this caſe.

Wherefore the plaintiff humbly prays that the judgment of the reverſal may be reverſed, and that the judgment of the court of Exchequer may be affirmed.

Extract from the Journal of the Lords, Ann. 1699---1700.

Die Martis, 4 Aprilis.

THIS day Mr. baron Hatſell, in the uſual manner, brought in a writ of error from his majeſty's court of Exchequer; (videlicet,) Robert Williamſon plaintiff, againſt the attorney general defendant.

Die Mercurii, 6 Decembris.

Upon reading the petition of Robert Williamſon merchant; ſhewing, "That, on the fourth of April, one thouſand ſix hundred ninety-nine, by a writ of error, the petitioner brought a record before this houſe, for the reverſal of a judgement given for the king, in the Exchequer-Chamber, by the lord keeper, now lord chancellor; and that the petitioner hath aſſigned errors on the ſaid judgement of reverſal; and praying a day may be appointed, for Mr. attorney general to reply or demur to the ſaid errors aſſigned:"

It is ORDERED, by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that Mr. attorney do reply or demur to the ſaid errors, on or before Wedneſday, the twentieth day of this inſtant December, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

Die Veneris, 19 Januarii.

After hearing counſel, this day, for Robert Williamſon, plaintiff in a writ of error depending in this houſe, whereunto his majeſty by his attorney general is defendant:

It is ORDERED, by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that this houſe will hear counſel for his majeſty thereupon, to-morrow, at eleven of the clock in the forenoon.

Die Sabbati, 20 Januarii.

After hearing this day counſel for his majeſty, upon the writ of error depending in this houſe, wherein Robert Williamſon is plaintiff; and his majeſty, by his attorney general, defendant:

It is ORDERED, by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that this houſe will hear the judges, to this matter, on Monday next, at eleven of the clock in the forenoon.

Die Lunæ, 22 Januarii.

After hearing the judges this day, (purſuant to the order of the twentieth inſtant,) to give their opinion upon the writ of error depending in this houſe, wherein Robert Williamſon is plaintiff; and his majeſty, by his attorney general, defendant:

It is ORDERED, by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that the debate of what hath been offered in this matter ſhall be reſumed to-morrow, at eleven of the clock; and all the judges to attend.

Die Martis, 23 Januarii.

After hearing counſel, at the bar, to argue the errors aſſigned upon the writ of error depending in this houſe, wherein Robert Williamſon is plaintiff; and his majeſty, by his attorney general, defendant; and debate thereupon:

This queſtion was put, "Whether the judgement of reverſal ſhall be reverſed?"

It was reſolved in the affirmative.

"Leave being aſked, and given, for any lord to diſſent; theſe lords, whoſe names are hereunto ſubſcribed, do diſſent, for the reaſons following; (videlicet,)

"For that we conceive it did not appear that ever any ſuch judgement was given by the Exchequer, before the annexing the court of Augmentations to the Exchequer.

"For that, ſince the diſſolving and annexing of the ſaid court of Augmentations, there hath no ſuch judgement been given, unleſs in ſuch caſes which were in the cognizance of the court of Augmentations before it was diſſolved.

"That the judgements, in the caſes of ſir Henry Nevil and ſir Thomas Wroth, and others of the like nature cited, ſeem to be by virtue of the powers of the court of Augmentations being annexed to the court of Exchequer.

"That thoſe courts were duly annexed, appears by the preamble of the ſtatute 1° Eliz. cap. 4. by the lord chief juſtice Bromley's caſe, and by the caſe of the earl of Devonſhire in Cook's Reports; and for that the court of Firſt Fruits and Tenths was diſſolved, and annexed in like manner to the Exchequer, as the court of Augmentations was; which powers, by that annexation, ſubſiſt in that court to this day."

Whereas, by virtue of his majeſty's writ of error, returnable into the houſe of peers in parliament aſſembled, a record of the court of Exchequer was brought into this houſe, the fourth day of April, one thouſand ſix hundred ninety-nine, wherein a judgement given by the barons of the ſaid court, in Hillary Terme, one thouſand ſix hundred ninety-one, for Robert Williamſon, againſt his majeſty's attorney general, for the payment of an annual ſum of ſixty pounds, and the arrears thereof, out of the hereditary revenue of exciſe, was, in Michaelmas Terme, one thouſand ſix hundred ninety-ſix, reverſed in the Exchequer chamber, by the lord keeper of the great ſeal of England, now lord chancellor:

After hearing counſel ſeveral days, to argue the errors aſſigned upon the ſaid writ of error; and due conſideration of what was offered on either ſide; it is this day ordered and adjudged, by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that the ſaid judgement of reverſal ſhall be, and is hereby, reverſed; and that the ſaid judgement, given by the barons of the Exchequer for the ſaid Robert Williamſon, ſhall be, and is hereby, affirmed.

The tenor of which judgement, to be affixed to the record to be remitted, followeth; (videlicet,)

MAY it pleaſe your lordſhip, and you gentlemen of the jury, this is an action for an aſſault and falſe impriſonment, brought by Anthony Fabrigas againſt John Moſtyn, eſq. The plaintiff ſtates in his declaration, that the defendant, on the firſt of September, 1771, with force and arms, made an aſſault upon him at Minorca, and then and there impriſoned him, and cauſed him to be carried from Minorca to Carthagena in Spain. There is a ſecond count in the declaration, for an aſſault and falſe impriſonment, in which the baniſhment is omitted. Theſe injuries he lays to his damage at 10,000 l. To this declaration the defendant has pleaded, not guilty; and for further plea, has admitted the charges in the declaration mentioned, but juſtifies what he has done, by alledging that the plaintiff endeavoured to create a mutiny among the inhabitants of Minorca, whereupon the defendant, as governor, was obliged to ſeize the plaintiff, to confine him ſix days in priſon, and then to baniſh him to Carthagena, as it was lawful for him to do. To this plea the plaintiff replies, and ſays, that the defendant did aſſault, impriſon, and baniſh him of his own wrong, and without any ſuch cauſe as he has above alledged, and thereupon iſſue is joined. This, gentlemen, is the nature of the pleadings. Mr. ſerjeant Glynn will open to you the facts on which our declaration is founded, and if we ſupport it by evidence, we ſhall be entitled to your verdict, with ſuch damages as the injury requires.

Mr. ſerjeant GLYNN.

MAY it pleaſe your lordſhip, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counſel in this cauſe for the plaintiff. Gentlemen, this is an action that Mr. Fabrigas, a native and inhabitant of the iſland of Minorca, has brought againſt the defendant, Mr. Moſtyn, his majeſty's governor in that iſland, for aſſaulting, falſe impriſoning, and baniſhing him to a foreign country, the dominions of the king of Spain. Mr. Moſtyn has, in the firſt place, pleaded that he is not guilty of thoſe injuries; in the next, he has offered this juſtification for himſelf, that the plaintiff, Mr. Fabrigas, was guilty of practices tending to ſedition, and that Mr. Moſtyn, for ſuch

(a) The title of the proceedings firſt publiſhed, being only the trial of the cauſe at niſi prius before Mr. juſtice Gould, who ſat as chief juſtice of the Common Pleas, was thus expreſſed.

The proceedings at large, in a cauſe on an action brought by Anthony Fabrigas, gent. againſt lieutenant-general John Moſtyn, governor of the iſland of Minorca, colonel of the firſt regiment of dragoon guards, and one of the grooms of his majeſty's bed-chamber; for falſe impriſonment and baniſhment from Minorca to Carthagena in Spain. Tried before Mr. juſtice Gould, in the court of Common-Pleas, in Guildhall, London, on the 13th of July, 1773. Containing the evidence verbatim as delivered by the witneſſes; with all the ſpeeches and arguments of the counſel and of the court.

Before the trial there was the following addreſs to the bookſeller.

'I am very glad to find you are going to publiſh the trial between Fabrigas and Moſtyn, as the knowledge of the particulars of this intereſting cauſe muſt be worthy the attention of the public.

'As I have paſſed a great part of my life in Minorca, and have ſome knowledge of the parties, I was induced from curioſity with many others to attend this trial at Guildhall, where I was greatly ſurprized to hear the account given by governor Moſtyn's witneſſes, Meſſ. Wright and Mackellar, of the conſtitution and form of government of that iſland.

'I did indeed expect that Mr. Fabrigas's counſel would have called witneſſes to contradict the very extraordinary account thoſe gentlemen had given, which they might eaſily have done by any perſon who had the leaſt knowledge of the matter. I ſuppoſe they did not, either from thinking the ſubject immaterial to their caſe, or perhaps to preſerve to Mr. ſerjeant Glynn the cloſure of the trial by that moſt eloquent and maſterly reply with which it was concluded.

'Whatever the motives of Mr. Fabrigas's counſel might be for leaving this account uncontradicted, I think it very material that the world ſhould not now be miſled, as they would be, ſhould they read the evidence of theſe gentlemen, and not be informed of their miſtakes; I call them miſtakes, for however extraordinary ſome parts of their depoſitions may appear to an obſervant reader, I am unwilling to charge them with any other crime than ignorance.

'I am therefore induced to trouble you with this letter, that (if not too late) you may publiſh it with the trial; my ſole object is, that the public may be apprized of the miſinformation given by theſe gentlemen. I do not expect that the bare contradiction of an anonymous perſon ſhould overſet the declarations upon oath of two gentlemen given in open court. All I mean is, to apprize the public of the truth, and to leave them to make ſuch farther inquiry as they ſhall think fit.

'The purport of that part of the evidence given by thoſe gentlemen, which I mean to diſpute, was, that a part of the iſland called the arraval of St. Phillip's is not under the juriſdiction of the magiſtrates, nor governed by the ſame laws which prevail in the reſt of the iſland, but is under the ſole authority of the governor, and has no law but his will and pleaſure.

'It ſhould ſeem that ſo very extraordinary a conſtitution as abſolute deſpotiſm for a conſiderable number of inhabitants, in a country governed by law, and which is part of the dominions of the crown of Great Britain, ſhould have had ſome very urgent and apparent cauſe to make neceſſary that ſlavery which Engliſhmen abhor, and if it exiſts, muſt have been eſtabliſhed by ſome particular proviſion. If it had been ſaid, that in the fort of St. Phillip's, in time of actual ſiege, an abſolute military government muſt prevail, the objects and the reaſons could eaſily be underſtood. But to ſay that in time of profound peace not only the inhabitants of fort St. Phillip's, but all thoſe of the arraval, which contains a large diſtrict of country, with many hundred inhabitants, living out of all reach of the garriſon, ſhould be ſubject not to military government, for that has its written laws and forms of trial, but to the abſolute will of the governor, without any law or trial, is in itſelf ſo abſurd, and ſo contradictory to every idea of reaſon, juſtice, and the ſpirit with which this country governs its foreign dominions, that, I truſt, my countrymen will not believe ſuch a monſter exiſts in any part of this empire, without better proof than the information of theſe gentlemen.

'I would not have the reader think that this ſtrange idea originated in the brain of Meſſ. Wright and Mackellar, for I know it is a favourite point, which the governor of Minorca has endeavoured to eſtabliſh; not ſo much, I believe, for the pleaſure of exerciſing abſolute authority, as on account of ſome good perquiſites which he enjoys, and which can be defended on no other ground.

'To eſtabliſh this, it has been endeavoured to alter the ancient diſtribution of the diſtricts or terminos of the iſland from four to five.

'The four terminos of Cieutadella, Alayor, Marcadal, and Mahon have their ſeparate magiſtrates and juriſdictions, and comprehend the whole iſland. The arraval of St. Phillip's was always a part of the termino of Mahon; in order therefore to eſtabliſh the governor's claim, it became neceſſary to ſet up the arraval of St. Phillip's as a ſeparate and diſtinct termino. If this could be done, it ceaſed to be within the juriſdiction of the magiſtrates of the iſland, who have power only in their four terminos, and accordingly Meſſ. Wright and Mackellar advance, that there are five terminos inſtead of four; but thoſe who are acquainted with the iſland well know, that this is a modern invention; that in the records of the country, there is not the leaſt foundation for ſuch an idea; on the contrary, that every proof of the reverſe exiſts. The inhabitants of the arraval are ſubject to the particular jurats of Mahon, they differ in no reſpect from the other inhabitants of that termino, and the judges poſſeſs and exerciſe the ſame juriſdiction and authority in the arraval, as they do in the other parts of the iſland, which could not be the caſe, if the claim ſet up by the governor really exiſted.

'No proof whatever has been or can be produced that this claim has any foundation; nor indeed did Meſſ. Wright and Mackellar attempt to give any but their own aſſertions. The only thing that had the leaſt ſimilitude to proof, was their ſaying, that in one inſtance the officer acting as coroner to examine a corpſe that had met with a violent death in the arraval, aſked the governor's leave before he proceeded.

'This fact I do not pretend to diſpute, it proves nothing; and was evidently only a mark of reſpect, which it is no wonder magiſtrates in that iſland pay to a governor who really has ſo much power. But to have made this amount to any thing like proof, ſuch miſbehaviour, by his ſole authority as governor, thought proper to inflict upon him as a puniſhment, what Mr. Fabrigas, in his declaration, complains of as a grievance. This Mr. Moſtyn takes upon him to inſiſt, in an Engliſh court of juſtice, is the juſtifiable exerciſe of an authority derived from the crown of England. And the facts which he undertakes thus to juſtify, are, in the firſt place, a length of ſevere impriſonment upon a native of the iſland of Minorca, a ſubject of Great Britain, living under the protection of the Engliſh laws; and, ſecondly, by his ſole authority, without the intervention of any judicature, the ſending him into exile into the dominions of a foreign prince. Gentlemen, ſome obſervations muſt ſtrike you upon the very ſtate of this plea; they muſt alarm you, and you muſt be anxious to know the particulars of that caſe, to which, in the ſenſe of any man who has received his education in this country, or ever converſed with Engliſhmen, it can be applied as a juſtification; that caſe, therefore, I will ſhortly ſtate to you:—Mr. Fabrigas is a gentleman of the iſland of Minorca, of as good a condition as any inhabitant of that iſland, of as fair and unblemiſhed a character too as that iſland produces. It is however enough, for this preſent purpoſe, to ſay that Mr. Fabrigas is a deſcendant of the antient inhabitants of Minorca: that he lived there under the capitulated rights: that, as ſuch, the national faith was pledged for his enjoyment of thoſe rights that his anceſtors capitulated for; but what is of more conſideration, being born in Minorca ſince its ſubjection to the crown of England, he was a free-born ſubject of England, and claimed, as his birth-right, the privileges due to that character, and the protection of the Engliſh laws. There was a particular ſtipulation upon the ſurrender of the iſland, that every occupier or poſſeſſor of land ſhould be intitled, under certain regulations and reſtrictions, to the produce of his lands, and to ſuch profit as by his induſtry he could make of them. Upon that ground a diſpute aroſe, to which alone can be imputed the diſpleaſure of Mr. Moſtyn towards the plaintiff, and the treatment he received from him, in the progreſs of it. Mr. Moſtyn, as governor, was appealed to, and his good-nature appeared to be ſo ſerviceable to the adverſary of Mr. Fabrigas, that early in the morning Mr. Fabrigas was ſuddenly taken from his houſe by a file of ſoldiers, and by them conducted to a dungeon, unaccuſed, untried, unconvicted. Thus, without any form of judicial proceedings, this gentleman, who then lived in eſteem in the iſland, finds himſelf all of a ſudden committed to a dungeon, a dungeon that was made uſe of only for the moſt dangerous malefactors, and that only when they were ready to receive the laſt of puniſhments. In this gloomy, damp, diſmal, and horrid dungeon, was this man detained without any previous accuſation, without any call upon him to make his defence, or being informed there was any crime or offence that was alledged againſt him, and without any notice either to him or his family. When he found himſelf in priſon, there was humanity enough in the breaſt of the keeper of that priſon to accommodate him with a bed; but it ſeems that accommodation was by the power of that iſland thought too much for him, and the bed was taken from him; a check was given to the lenity of the keeper. No notice having been given to his family that they might viſit or adminiſter comfort to him; he did, by humble requeſt, deſire that his wife might be permitted to viſit him: that conſolation too was denied him. In this manner was Mr. Fabrigas deprived of his liberty for a conſiderable time. It is unneceſſary for me to ſtate particularly the preciſe time that this impriſonment continued; that you will hear from the witneſſes. Nor does a caſe like this depend upon minutes, hours, or days, but this is the nature and kind of impriſonment that Mr. Fabrigas endured: ſo cloſely watched that no man could have acceſs to him, deprived of the conſolation of his family, ſevered from all communication with his friends, relations, or acquaintance, that could adminiſter the leaſt comfort to him. For ſeveral days did this man continue under this impriſonment, nor did his ſufferings determine with it; his removal from the dungeon was only a ſubſtitute of one ſpecies of cruelty in the place of another: for the inſtant he was taken from priſon, he was carried by the ſame arbitrary and deſpotic power on board a ſhip, without any previous notice, without any time allowed him to prepare for his departure, without the ordinary viſit or comfort of friends and acquaintance, from whom he was probably to be ſeparated for ever. Thus was this man taken from his native country, and the inſupportable hardſhips of a dungeon were followed by an entire expulſion from his country, and every thing that was dear to him: he was ſent inſtantly on board a ſhip by force, and carried to Carthagena, a foreign country, under the dominion of the crown of Spain. This is the nature of Mr. Fabrigas's caſe.—Now, gentlemen, for a moment, let me remind you of the pretence under which this impriſonment is inflicted. It is ſaid Mr. Fabrigas excited ſedition, or attempted to excite ſedition; that he acted or ſpoke in a turbulent and mutinous manner; and therefore that the governor, as his plea ſtates he was well authorized to do, committed him to priſon, and baniſhed him out of the iſland; or rather committed him to priſon for the purpoſe of baniſhing him out of the iſland, for I believe that is the true ſtate of his plea. Gentlemen, you would juſtly accuſe me of a great and wanton waſte of your time, if I ſhould ſay a great deal for the purpoſe of exculpating Mr. Fabrigas from the charge and imputation that is thrown upon him in this place, becauſe I am perſuaded that you, an Engliſh jury, if you were ſitting in judicature upon the caſe of confeſſedly the vileſt of offenders, you would not ſuffer the atrocity of the offence to mitigate that cenſure and animadverſion which is due to a behaviour like this of the governor's. In private juſtice to the character of Mr. Fabrigas, and not as the leaſt relating to any queſtion here to be tried, gentlemen, I will ſtate to you upon what grounds and pretence this mutiny is alledged againſt Mr. Fabrigas.—Mr. Fabrigas, as I have told you, claimed, among all the other inhabitants and poſſeſſors of lands in the iſland, a right of ſelling the produce of his lands, under certain reſtrictions. The produce of the lands is chiefly wine: Mr. Fabrigas had a conſiderable quantity. His majeſty, by his proclamation, had given free liberty to the inhabitants of that part of the iſland where Mr. Fabrigas lived, to ſell their wines, the price being firſt ſettled by the authority of the governor:—that price is called the afforation price. Notwithſtanding his majeſty's proclamation, by an act and order, not of governor Moſtyn, but of his lieutenant-governor, there was a prohibition that no wine ſhould be ſold without the immediate authority of the muſtaſtaph. An application therefore, by Mr. Fabrigas, was made to this officer, either to permit him to ſell his wines under the afforation price, which would be for the general relief and benefit of the iſlanders, and of the garriſon, or that he himſelf would buy it at a fixed price. This officer refuſed to comply with either: Mr. Fabrigas therefore was reduced to the neceſſity of making an humble application to governor Moſtyn, to permit him this alternative, either to ſell his wine under a certain afforation and regulated price, or that the government would buy his wine of him for their uſe, or the uſe of the garriſon. This petition was thought reaſonable at firſt, and had a kind anſwer; it was received, and it appears to have been taken into conſideration, but nothing was done in conſequence of it. Mr. Fabrigas therefore repeats his application, and he receives encouragement to expect that the reaſonableneſs of his petition would be taken into conſideration, and that he ſhould be at liberty to ſell the produce of his land. But, gentlemen, at laſt this anſwer was given to Mr. Fabrigas: that if it appeared to be the ſenſe of a conſiderable number of the inhabitants of the iſland, that it was for their benefit that ſuch permiſſion ſhould be given, his application ſhould be complied with. Mr. Fabrigas then prepares ſuch a petition; he gets it ſigned, and he preſents it to governor Moſtyn. Now, gentlemen, here it is impoſſible to ſtate what paſſed between the parties. If it can be pretended that there was any thing mutinous, menacing, or improper, in this laſt petition, I preſume that petition will be produced to you, and it will ſpeak for itſelf; but ſome indignation was conceived by governor Moſtyn againſt the plaintiff, Mr. Fabrigas, which produced that ſtrange, unaccountable, unwarrantable, and alarming conduct, which we now, by evidence, impute to Mr. Moſtyn. For gentlemen, inſtantly upon this, Mr. Fabrigas is conducted in the manner before-mentioned to that horrible dungeon, where he continues for a conſiderable time under ſuch orders as I have ſtated to you, till he was hurried on board a ſhip, and was conveyed to Carthagena in Spain. Here, for the firſt time, he receives intelligence of what was the provocation that he gave, what was the ground of ſuch treatment of him, what charge was imputed to him, by what authority he was ſo detained and ſo treated: for here appears a letter under the hand of governor Moſtyn, avowing this act, and telling him that he thought it neceſſary and expedient, for the puniſhment of his offence, to ſend him into exile, and to direct him to be conveyed to Carthagena in Spain. Here then you find the governor avowing the whole; and if he did not avow the whole, you could have no doubt under what authority theſe things were done; becauſe you will hear from all, that they cannot be done but under the authority of the governor. Then, gentlemen, the impriſonment, and the ſending this man into exile, are the acts of governor Moſtyn. The impriſonment under ſuch ſtrange aggravating circumſtances of horror and ignominy, and the ſending him without notice, without time for preparation, without giving him the opportunity of paying the leaſt attention to the concerns of his eſtate and family, into exile; theſe, gentlemen, we now preſume to treat as the acts of governor Moſtyn; and the governor ſays, he is juſtified in ſo doing, as governor of Minorca. I ſhould be glad to know upon what idea of juſtice the governor grounds that pretence. I conceive, that in this caſe, there cannot be the leaſt colour or pretence of any judicial examination, or the leaſt form of judicial proceedings. Governor Moſtyn, after having been guilty of this outrage to the plaintiff, would have acted much better, if he had not added this inſult to the laws of his country, by aſſuming an authority incompatible with the leaſt poſſible idea of juſtice that can be entertained in this or in any country whatſoever. Gentlemen, if governor Moſtyn complains that juſtice is not done to his defence by his plea, that he is fettered and embarraſſed by it, and could now juſtify his conduct upon better grounds, we will freely give him the opportunity of doing it; he ſhall do it in what character he thinks proper. If he has acted under the colour of any judicial proceedings in civil judicature, let thoſe proceedings be produced, let him deſert and abandon the ſhameful plea that he has preſented; he has even our liberty to do it. If the governor means to be juſtified in his military character, I need not tell you, gentlemen, that it is neceſſary in that character, that there proof, it ſhould have been ſhewn, that the like attention was not paid to the governor at Mahon, and in other parts of the iſland. The truth is, that the inhabitants are ſo dependant on the military, that I have known the ſame civility ſhewn in another part of the iſland to the officer who happened to command there, but certainly without any intention of ſurrendering to him their authority as magiſtrates.

'Meſſ. Wright and Mackellar alſo ſaid, that the Minorquins claimed to be governed ſometimes by the Engliſh, and ſometimes by the Spaniſh laws, as ſuited beſt for the moment; but inſinuated that the Spaniſh laws prevailed, and that by them the governor had a right by his ſole authority to baniſh.

'The fact moſt undoubtedly is, that Minorca, a conquered country, preſerves its ancient (the Spaniſh) laws, till the conqueror chuſes to give them others; and therefore as England has not given them others, it is true the Spaniſh laws do prevail in Minorca, both in civil and criminal matters, among themſelves: but it is equally true that they have the protection of the Engliſh laws againſt their governor, who cannot be amenable to their local laws, and that however deſpotically a Spaniſh governor may formerly have acted, it cannot be the law of Spain, or of any country (becauſe it is contrary to natural juſtice) that a man ſhould be condemned and puniſhed without either trial or hearing.

'It would have been eaſy for governor Moſtyn, if Mr. Fabrigas had committed a crime, to have followed the mode of proceeding eſtabliſhed there in criminal caſes, which is for the advocate fiſcal to proſecute in the court of royal government, where the chief juſtice criminal is the judge.

'If I was not afraid of ſwelling this letter to too great a length, I ſhould make more remarks on what paſſed at this trial, and point out many more inſtances of power unjuſtifiably aſſumed by the governors. But I hope that what appears from this publication will be ſufficient to induce adminiſtration to conſider the ſtate of this iſland, and give the inhabitants ſome better ſecurity for the ſafety of their perſons, and enjoyment of their property; for, excluſive of the meanneſs there is in ill uſing thoſe who cannot reſiſt, it is undoubtedly the beſt policy, for the honour and ſtability of our empire, to make all its dependencies happy.

ſhould be judicial proceedings likewiſe of a military court of juſtice. I will be bold to ſay, that the idea governor Moſtyn has adopted, that the lives, fortunes, and being of the inhabitants of the iſland of Minorca are at his mercy, and that by his ſole authority he can inflict bonds and impriſonment on any inhabitant of that iſland, is the ſingle idea of governor Moſtyn; and I ſay the governor does not, in this caſe, talk like a military man, for his ideas are as foreign to the notions of a ſoldier, as of a lawyer. Gentlemen, this is the nature of the caſe that we ſhall offer to you, and which we ſhall produce in proof to you againſt governor Moſtyn: an impriſonment, if it had been attended with all the circumſtances of comfort that could have been adminiſtered to a perſon in that ſituation, unjuſtifiable, and without colour or pretence of legal authority, ſufficient to entitle this gentleman to call for conſiderable damages from a verdict of a jury: a baniſhment into a foreign country of a ſubject of England, intitled to be protected, to whom the laws cannot be denied without breach of public faith, and a dangerous wound to the general ſyſtem of our conſtitutional liberties. Thus, by the ſole authority of governor Moſtyn, without pretence of judicial examination, was Mr. Fabrigas ſent into baniſhment. If all other circumſtances were away, the being ſent out of his native country by an arbitrary act of the governor of that iſland, is ſurely ground enough to call for the moſt conſiderable damages. But, gentlemen, you are to add to it every circumſtance of diſcomfort. He was, during the whole time of his impriſonment, kept in a gloomy dungeon; no circumſtance of ignominy that could affect the mind of a man of feeling was omitted: he was put into a place ſet apart and deſigned only for the reception of the worſt of malefactors, ſecluded from any converſation or communication with his friends or acquaintance, his neareſt relations, his wife or his family, deprived of the comfort of a bed, and obliged, for a conſiderable number of days, to ſubſiſt upon bread and water. This is a caſe of the moſt unparalleled cruelty; the moſt ingenious circumſtances of torture being added to the moſt unjuſtifiable and the moſt lawleſs exertion of authority, that I am perſuaded has ever appeared before any court. If governor Moſtyn can ſupport the powers of this claim, and vindicate himſelf, as governor, by the plenitude of his powers, and that the ſole judicature of the iſland reſides in his perſon; if it was for a moment poſſible for you to entertain the idea of the legality of ſuch a power being placed in any man, in conſequence of an authority derived from the crown of England: I ſay, if it was poſſible for you to conceive that ſuch a power could exiſt; try him even by that rule, try him by that rule, and he's without excuſe; for the moſt deſpotic, the moſt arbitrary and uncontroulable power that is ever exerciſed, profeſſeth at leaſt to act by calling upon the party accuſed to make his defence, and I believe in no part of the globe is it looked upon as juſt to condemn a man unheard. Let general Moſtyn travel into Aſia, or viſit his neighbours on the continent of Barbary, he will not find examples there to juſtify his conduct, in any of the powers aſſumed, or in the uſe he has made of them: for if their powers are not circumſcribed or reſtrained by any laws; if they act, as the general profeſſes he has a right to, by their ſole will and pleaſure; if that is the rule of their government, yet ſtill there is an idea of a principle of natural juſtice that ſhould govern their proceedings there; at leaſt an appearance of it they are anxious to produce. I never heard in my life that it was the avowed privilege of any country, that a man ſhould be charged with an offence, that he received the puniſhment for that offence, without the offence being explained and ſtated to him, and an opportunity given him of hearing the charge and the evidence by which it was produced; but this is the caſe of a tranſaction in the dark, a ſecret indignation conceived, that indignation immediately followed by the moſt horrid exertions of power upon the perſon of Mr. Fabrigas—committed to a dungeon, and unapprized of the charge againſt him till ſent out of his native country, and upon the voyage to the deſtined place of his baniſhment. The offer made to general Moſtyn not to tie him down merely to the juſtification ſpecified in his plea, but to give him leave to offer any juſtification that may be conſiſtent with the idea of civil or military juſtice, may be called inſidious, becauſe I muſt diſbelieve every thing ſuggeſted on any truſt, if I think the offer can be of no benefit to him if wanted; but it may be added to it, 'Governor, take your ideas of law from Barbary or Turkey, produce your precedent, India or negro law, you are ſtill unable to juſtify your conduct.' Gentlemen, theſe are the circumſtances we are to lay before you in evidence. The governor may, if he pleaſes, endeavour to charge this gentleman with mutiny. If he does, I preſume he will adduce his proof of it. But if it was poſſible to decide that Mr. Fabrigas was a mutinous man, though the reverſe of that character is but juſtice to him; nay, if you could decide that he was the worſt and moſt dangerous of offenders, governor Moſtyn's conduct is ſtill deſtitute of any colour of juſtice or law. His conduct is totally unwarrantable, and the pretence he has here ſet up, that he is a prince with a power unbounded and unlimited by any rule or law whatſoever, that he is authorized to act by his own will and pleaſure, muſt repreſent this caſe in ſo alarming a light to you, that I am perſuaded that you, who have taken your ideas of law and juſtice from converſation with Engliſhmen, and obſervation on the Engliſh conſtitution, will give all attention to the particular ſufferings of the man, as well as to what you owe to yourſelves, your country and poſterity; and we truſt, even in the very beſt conſtruction that is poſſible to put on governor Moſtyn's conduct, that you will think the damages laid in the declaration are not extravagant.

BASIL CUNNINGHAM. Examined by Mr. Lee.

Q. You are in ſome military capacity?——A. Yes.

Q. Was you in the year ſeventy-one in the iſland of Minorca?

A. Yes.

Q. In what character?

A. Acting ſerjeant major for the royal artillery.

Q. Do you remember Mr. Anthonia Fabrigas being at Minorca?

A. Yes.

Q. Was you ſerjeant major at the time he was ſeized and taken into cuſtody?—A. I was, when I ſaw him brought into priſon.

Q. Do you recollect any orders at that time coming in any body's name touching his confinement?

A. There was a general order given us, that three more men ſhould be added to the artillery guard.

Court. Have you that order?—A. No.

Q. Was it not your office as ſerjeant major to tranſcribe that order into your book?

A. I gave that order out in the company's order book.

Q. To whom does the cuſtody of that order book belong?

A. When the books are written out, they give them to the captain to whom they belong.

Q. They put three additional men ſentry upon that occaſion?

A. Yes.

Court. Why?

A. To do duty upon the priſoner Mr. Fabrigas.

Court. How long had Mr. Fabrigas been in cuſtody at that time when this order was given out? Was it immediately upon his coming into cuſtody, or after he had been put there?

A. To the beſt of my recollection, I believe about twenty-four hours after he had been in cuſtody, or the evening of the ſame day; I cannot be certain as to that.

Q. You can tell us what priſon it was that Mr. Fabrigas was committed to?—A. He was put into priſon No. 1.

Q. What is the general uſe of that priſon? to what is it applied?

A. All the priſoners that are guilty of capital offences, or for deſertion, we commonly put in there.

Q. Do you recollect any circumſtances attending Mr. Fabrigas's impriſonment?—Mention any that occur to you.—Do you recollect the manner in which he was brought or confined?

A. To the beſt of my recollection he was brought by a party of ſoldiers, whether of the 25th regiment or the 6th, I can't ſay; he was brought in handcuff'd, I think, but am not certain.

Q. How long was he confined there?

A. As near as I can recollect, about five or ſix days.

Q. In that priſon?—A. Yes.

Q. During his confinement there, can you tell the court or jury whether he was permitted to be viſited by his wife or family?

A. No: the ſentries had orders that he ſhould have no converſation with any body but the prevoſt marſhal.

Q. Do you know of any orders that he ſhould not be ſeen but by the prevoſt marſhal?

A. The ſentry informed me that was his orders; beſides, it was put into the general orders too.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. If you mean to affect the defendant with that, you ſhould produce the order.

Mr. Lee. Well then, we ſhall produce it.

Q. In fact, do you know whether any body was permitted to viſit him but this prevoſt marſhal?

A. I don't know of any; if they did, it was contrary to orders.

Q. Do you know if any body applied to ſee him?

A. His wife applied to ſee him, but was refuſed, as I was informed.

Q. What is this prevoſt marſhal?

A. One that has the charge of all priſoners that are confined for capital crimes; he has the keys of the priſon.

Q. Is this an executioner too, as well as a gaoler?—A. No.

Q. Can you tell us the cauſe for which this gentleman was committed—the occaſion of it?——A. I cannot.

Q. Do you know what Mr. Fabrigas is?

A. He is an inhabitant of the iſland of Minorca.

Q. A native?—A. Yes: a Minorquin.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Fabrigas is a man of any property, or was a grower of any vines upon that iſland? Do you know in what manner he lived?

A. He lived like a gentleman there.

Q. Was you acquainted with any diſputes touching his liberty to ſell his wine?

A. I know nothing at all of it.

Q. Do you know any thing of what happened to him after his confinement in this priſon? what became of him after?

A. He was ſent out of the iſland.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge?

A. I did not ſee him taken away.

Q. Do you know of any orders touching his being ſent?

A. I did not ſee any orders.

Q. You being at St. Phillip's at this time, when he was in priſon, you can tell us whether he was tried for any offence previous to his commitment there, or after?

A. No: he was not tried.

Croſs-examination by Mr. Serjeant Davy.

Q. How long had you known this Fabrigas before the time of his being brought to this priſon?

A. I had ſeen him different times, being in the iſland for between eight and nine years.

Q. I wiſh to know in the firſt place whether he was a quiet ſubject, or otherwiſe?

A. I never heard any thing to the contrary.

Q. What? but that he was a quiet, inoffenſive ſubject?

A. I never heard to the contrary.

Q. He was looked upon as a very good friend to the garriſon, I believe?

A. I really can't tell what he was; he was an inhabitant of the iſland. I don't know that ever I ſpoke to him in my life.

Q. What part of the iſland did he live in?

A. At St. Phillip's.

Q. There it was he was impriſoned, I preſume?

A. Yes: he was brought a priſoner to St. Phillip's caſtle.

Q. I think you ſay you have been in the iſland five years?

A. Almoſt nine years.

Q. Then you was there before Mr. Moſtyn was appointed governor?

A. Yes.

Q. You was there in governor Johnſton's time?—A. Yes.

Q. Was you there in governor Blakeney's time?—A. No.

JAMES TWEEDIE. Examined by Mr. Groſe.

Q. What was you in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-one?—A. A corporal in the royal artillery in the iſland of Minorca.

Q. Did you ſee the plaintiff brought to the caſtle?

A. No: I did not ſee him brought; I was a ſerjeant of the guards when he was delivered up to me, from the 61ſt regiment.

Court. Can you recollect the time?

A. No: it was ſome time about the middle of September, to the beſt of my knowledge, in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-one.

Q. In what way was he delivered?

A. He was delivered to me in the priſon No. 1.

Q. What were the particulars of that delivery to you? in what way was he delivered?

A. He was in but a very mean habit; for, by what I could learn, his clothes and every thing that he brought in with him had been taken from him.

Counſel for the defendant. That will not do. What condition was he in?

A. He was in the priſon; he had been in the priſon almoſt twenty-four hours, before he was delivered to the artillery.

Q. What orders did you receive concerning him?

A. That I was to ſuffer no perſon to approach the grate.

Q. What grate?—A. The priſon door.

Q. From whom did you receive theſe orders?

A. From the adjutant lieutenant Froſt; he was our acting adjutant; he read the orders.

Q. Not to let any one come to that grate?

A. Or converſe, or have any communication with him, upon any account.

Q. Whoſe orders does the adjutant lieutenant give out?

A. I imagined it was a general order.

Q. What do you mean by a general order?

A. Coming from the commander in chief.

Q. Do you mean from governor Moſtyn?

A. Yes: he was commander in chief then of the iſland.

Q. What order?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I will give you no trouble about theſe things. With regard to orders, you have given us notice to produce the orders. The fact is as you contend. We mean to conceal no circumſtances.

Court. I think the right way will be, as it is now admitted that this was done by the defendant's order, to proceed with your parole evidence, and read that at the concluſion.

Counſel for the plaintiff. If your lordſhip pleaſes, we will read the order of impriſonment, and the ſentence of baniſhment.

The ASSOCIATE.

The title is,

Orders given out to the troops in Minorca by lieutenant general Moſtyn, governor of the iſland, who arrived the 21ſt of January, 1771. September 15: In order to relieve the main guard at St. Phillip's, which now wants a ſentry extraordinary upon Antonio Fabrigas, confined in priſon No. 1, general Moſtyn orders, that three men be added to the artillery guard in the caſtle ſquare, as they are moſt contiguous; and that duty taken by them, the ſentry muſt be poſted night and day, and is to ſuffer no perſon whatever to approach the grate in the door of the ſaid priſon, either to look in, or have any communication with the priſoner, the prevoſt marſhal excepted, who is conſtantly to keep the key in his poſſeſſion.

To Anthony Fabrigas de Roche.

YOU Anthony Fabrigas, inhabitant of the arraval of St. Phillip's, are by me, chief governor of Minorca, baniſhed this iſland for twelve months from the date hereof, not to return hither until that time is expired at your peril, for your ſeditious, mutinous, and inſolent behaviour to me the governor, and for having dared moſt dangerouſly and ſeditiouſly to raiſe doubts and ſuſpicions amongſt the inhabitants of the arraval of St. Phillip's, and to excite them to diſpute my authority, and diſobey my orders; and for having further preſumed moſt dangerouſly to inſinuate, that his majeſty's troops under my command, without any authority from them for ſuch falſe and ſcandalous inſinuations, were impoſed upon.

Mahon, 17*th day of* Sept. 1771. J. MOSTYN, governor.

Q. You ſay you received this order to permit no perſon to approach the grate of the priſon, or have any communication with the plaintiff: did you obey this order?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you obey it ſtrictly?

A. Yes, as ſtrict as it was in my power.

Q. Did any perſon apply to ſee the plaintiff?

A. Yes, his wife and two children.

Q. Were they permitted to ſee him?—A. No.

Q. How near were they permitted to come to the priſon?

A. As nigh as I can gueſs, about thirty yards.

Q. They were not permitted to come nearer?

A. They were not permitted to come nearer.

Q. Do you know in what way the plaintiff laid?

A. He lay upon the boards.

Q. Were there no beds?—A. No beds.

Q. Was any bedding ſent to him?

A. I ſaw his wife with bedding, which was not permitted to be brought to him.

Q. In ſhort, tell the jury whether the guard would ſuffer any thing whatſoever to paſs them?

A. If they did, they were ſure to come to trouble, to puniſhment, by it; and I am certain they never did.

Q. Tell us what his ſubſiſtence was?

A. Bread and water.

Q. What ſort of ſubſiſtence has a deſerter if he is confined in this place?

A. It is a general rule in Minorca, that deſerters and priſoners, even for capital crimes, ſhould have proviſions ſent them.

Q. What proviſions?

A. Such as the iſland affords, bread and beef.

Court. Do you know whether any proviſions were brought him?

A. I never ſaw any; there was ſuch a ſtrict order, that nobody ever attempted it.

Q. I believe there was an air-hole at the top of the priſon?—A. Yes.

Q. Was any body placed over the air-hole?

A. No; but there was a ſentry upon a baſtion near to it, who had orders given him, that nobody ſhould approach this air-hole.

Q. Upon what account?

A. For fear any thing ſhould be dropped down to him.

Court. Was that particularly upon this occaſion, or generally when deſerters were there?

A. No; I never heard a circumſtance of the kind, but during the time Mr. Fabrigas was in priſon.

Q. Did you know the plaintiff?

A. Yes, I have been at his houſe ſeveral times; I was at the iſland almoſt nine years.

Q. What family had he?

A. A wife, when he was in priſon, and five children, to the beſt of my knowledge.

Q. Now, during the time you have known him, have you never heard him ſay any thing diſreſpectful of the governor?

A. No; he only complained of his hardſhips, of his own bodily ſufferings.

WILLIAM JOHNS. Examined by Mr. Peckham.

Q. Was you at Minorca in 71?—A. Yes.

Q. In what ſituation and capacity?

A. I was garriſon gunner.

Q. How long were you in the iſland?—A. Almoſt nine years.

Q. Did you know Mr. Fabrigas?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you know Mr. Fabrigas's ſituation in the iſland?

A. He lived very genteel in St. Phillip's.

Q. Did he live in the ſame ſtate as the principal inhabitants of St. Phillip's?

A. Yes, as much ſo as any man in St. Phillip's.

Q. Do you remember any thing of his being impriſoned?

A. I ſaw him brought to the priſon.

Q. In what manner was he brought?—A. By a file of men.

Q. Were his hands bound?—A. I cannot ſay.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I admit that he was with his hands bound, as the firſt witneſs ſaid, and that he was kept in priſon by order of the governor.

Mr. Peckham. Do you admit that he was hand-cuffed?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Yes, that he was hand-cuffed, and kept in the way deſcribed by the former witneſs.

Q. Was he kept hand-cuffed in priſon?—A. I believe not.

Q. What ſort of a place is this priſon?

A. It is ſet apart for capital puniſhments, for priſoners that are under ſentence of death.

Q. Is it a priſon dug out of a rock?

A. It is a ſubterraneous place in the body of the caſtle.

Q. Is it under ground?—A. No, under the top of the caſtle.

Q. Is it a ground floor?—A. A ground floor, I believe.

Q. This being the priſon, and you ſtanding there to guard him, do you remember any of his children coming to ſee him?

A. I ſaw his ſon the firſt day he was confined there, a boy about fifteen, come to ſee him.

Q. What did he come for?

A. He had ſome proviſions in a baſket.

Q. Did he apply to you, that thoſe proviſions might be given to his father?

A. He applied to the regiment then upon duty to give them to his father, but was denied.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I admit he was ſent hand-cuffed to the priſon, as deſcribed by the former witneſs: I meant to include the matters of belief as well as matters of knowledge.

Court. For my part, I like to hear the evidence in any caſe, to know the truth, and then we have no ſquabbles afterwards.

JOHN CRAIG. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Glynn.

Q. What are you?—A. A matroſs.

Q. Was you in the iſland of Minorca in 71?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know Mr. Fabrigas?—A. Yes.

Q. How long have you been in Minorca?

A. Pretty nigh nine years.

Q. What condition was Mr. Fabrigas in?

A. In very good circumſtances there; he is reckoned one of the beſt in circumſtances in the iſland.

Q. Do you remember the time when he was in the dungeon there?

A. Very well.

Q. You did not do any duty upon him, I ſuppoſe?—A. Yes, I did.

Q. Do you remember whether people were admitted to ſee him?

A. I am ſure there were none admitted to ſee him.

Q. Do you know whether any perſon came to ſee him that was refuſed?

A. I know his wife and children came, and they were refuſed.

Q. Do you know of his being taken out of the priſon?

A. I ſaw him put on board a ſhip in the harbour.

Q. How many days after his firſt impriſonment?

A. I am not certain of the days.

Q. About what number of days was he in confinement?

A. Five or ſix days, to the beſt of my knowledge.

Q. In what manner was he taken out of priſon, and put on board a ſhip?

A. I happened to be down at the quay, and ſaw him put on board a boat, to be taken to the veſſel.

Q. What time was this?

A. Early in the morning. I am not ſure to the time, but to the beſt of my knowledge I think between three and four in the morning.

Q. Had he any time allowed him on ſhore?

A. No, he was hurried on board; his wife and family were coming down to ſpeak to him, and the ſoldiers kept them off, and would not let them. I wanted to ſpeak to him myſelf, and the ſoldiers would not let me.

Q. You ſaw his wife and children come to him, do you remember whether they brought any thing for him?

A. I think they had ſome bedding, to ſee if they could get it on board the ſhip he was going to, and it was turned back again, they would not allow any thing to come to him; he was put on board a boat and taken into a ſhip which was laying in the harbour there, the ſhip was under ſail.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I admit he was baniſhed to Carthagena.

Counſel for the plaintiff. You admit he was baniſhed by governor Moſtyn for a year?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Yes, I do.

Colonel JOHN BIDDULPH. Examined by Mr. Lee.

Q. You are an officer in the regiment that was at Minorca?

A. I was not in Minorca at the time this matter paſſed.

Q. But you have been at Minorca?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you know Mr. Fabrigas?

A. Yes; I knew him from the time I arrived in the iſland 'till I left it.

Q. When did you arrive there?

A. I think in the year 63, about May or June, and ſtaid about eight years.

Q. When you knew Mr. Fabrigas, in what condition and circumſtances was he?

A. He ſeemed to me to be of the ſecond ſort of people in the iſland; he had ſome vineyards and ſome houſes, and ſome property, and was received not as of the firſt quality, but as a gentleman; he was eſteemed a man of property: I ſhould call him a gentleman farmer.

Q. While you knew him what character did he bear? or how did he behave himſelf, as far as you had an opportunity of obſerving?

A. As far as I could obſerve, he behaved very well, and had a very good character. I uſed to employ him in getting wine for me, and other things the iſland produced, becauſe I had a family; and often he was very uſeful to me in procuring things at a reaſonable price. When I was at Citadella, at the other end of the iſland, he came there, and was with ſome of the better kind of people; he was always with a don Vigo, or a don Sanchio, who were reckoned the principal people of the place; they are nobles in that iſland.

Q. While you knew him, I aſk you what was his behaviour? Did he behave like a peaceable ſubject, or like an unruly and factious one?

A. He always behaved with very great decency and decorum.

Croſs-examined by Mr. Serjeant Burland.

Q. Do you know whether he was a man of property in the iſland?

A. As far as I underſtand he was, but it is impoſſible for me to ſay poſitively; he was reported ſuch.

Q. He had a father living?

A. I believe he had, an old man.

Q. You do not know whether it was his own property or not?

A. It ſeemed to be his.

Q. He converſed with the two noblemen you mentioned?

A. Yes; he was at their houſes as a gentleman.

Q. Did you uſe to viſit at his houſe?

A. I have been there.

Q. Did you ever dine or ſup with him?

A. I think I dined with him once.

Court. The gentlemen ſuggeſt, but you don't mean to make a diſtinction between the claſſes there?

A. I do make a great diſtinction.

Q. What promotion has general Moſtyn in the army at this time?

A. He is a lieutenant general, and commander in chief of the iſland of Minorca.

Q. Has he any military promotion at home? has he any regiment?

A. Yes.

Q. What regiment is it?

A. I don't recollect the number; it is a regiment of dragoons.

Q. Do you know of any office that the general has about his majeſty's perſon, any place at court?

A. I don't recollect it; I believe he has.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. My lord, we have done for the plaintiff.

Mr. Serjeant Davy, for the defendant.

MAY it pleaſe your lordſhip, and you, gentlemen of the jury, I am of counſel in this cauſe for the defendant, general Moſtyn, who is charged with a miſbehaviour towards the plaintiff, in the defendant's capacity, as governor of this iſland. The plaintiff, Fabrigas, being a ſubject of the crown of England, a native of that iſland, a Minorquin by birth, and living in the town of St. Phillip's, there is a reaſon why his reſidence in the town of St. Phillip's is, in my apprehenſion, material, for ſome matters which I ſhall trouble you with before I ſit down. The defendant was appointed governor of the iſland of Minorca on the ſecond of March, 1768. His predeceſſor was governor Johnſton, whoſe predeceſſor was general Blakeney. So far I am able to trace back the governor of this iſland, whom the queſtions before you have any ſort of relation to; and any further is unneceſſary. I don't know whether it may be new to any of you, gentlemen, to inform you, moſt probably not, the hiſtory of your country will tell you, that this iſland of Minorca, whoſe ſituation is in the Mediterranean, and is of extreme uſe in the protection of the Mediterranean trade, was taken in queen Anne's wars from the crown of Spain, and was ceded by that crown to Great Britain, by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713: that upon the ceding of that iſland, the condition annexed was a requiſition on the part of Spain, which was acceded to on the part of Great Britain, that the inhabitants of this iſland of Minorca ſhould continue in the free exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion, which could be no farther than was conſonant to the laws of Great Britain. For whereas the laws of Great Britain will not allow the pope's bulls, excommunication from the court of Rome, the inquiſition, and ſome other matters of that ſort; therefore a free exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion was not with the exerciſe of any powers in the biſhop of Rome, but what were acknowledged by the laws of Great Britain. They had only the free exerciſe of their religion, as Roman catholics. All other rights which they had, and all laws by which they were to be governed, were to be given to them by the king of England. He was to eſtabliſh what code of laws he thought proper in that country. They were to be ſubject either to civil juriſdiction in particular ſorts, or military, or whatever ſort the king of England pleaſed. They were a conquered people, a conquered iſland, and no terms were annexed to that treaty of Utrecht, but only the exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion. The king was to appoint his governor of the iſland, to govern them by ſuch laws as he thought proper to direct; an arbitrary deſpotic government, or a qualified government, or whatever government, under whatever ſort of magiſtrates, or whatever order the crown of England ſhould think proper. There is a manifeſt and very wide diſtinction, to be ſure, between a Minorquin by birth (I don't ſpeak of an Engliſhman that goes over there, and the caſe of an Engliſhman): I juſt mention theſe things, which will be very proper for your conſideration throughout the progreſs of the ſeveral facts I ſhall mention in this cauſe. They are, in my humble apprehenſion, eſſentially neceſſary to your conſideration. Some time after theſe people (I don't know exactly the date of it) had become ſubject to the crown of England; after 1713 they petitioned for a confirmation of the uſages and cuſtoms of Spain, and to be governed by the laws of Spain, as they had been uſed to do before: and that was granted, ſo far as the wiſdom of the crown thought proper to grant; and there were certain regulations, which I will take notice of by-and-by. Many regulations were made from time to time occaſionally, by the crown of Great Britain, for the internal police of the iſland. Gentlemen, I ſhould inform you too, that the iſland of Minorca conſiſts of five ſeparate diviſions or diſtricts. In four of theſe they have magiſtrates annually elected. In the fifth, which is called the arraval of St. Phillip's, which is the fort of the iſland and its ſecurity, there the particular diſtrict which is juſt the ſuburbs which takes the town of St. Phillip's adjoining cloſe to the foot of the citadel, that diſtrict is under the immediate government of the governor of the iſland appointed by the crown. There are no jurats, which are the common name of the magiſtrates in the other diviſions, who are elected by the people; but the proper officer for the police of the arraval is appointed by the governor himſelf, and I think his title is muſtaſtaph: he is the officer appointed by the governor of the iſland. There is an extreme neceſſity, that more particular care ſhould be taken in the regulation of the police of that part of the iſland which is immediately contiguous to the fort of St. Phillip's, and where there is a perpetual garriſon, for the ſake of preſerving military diſcipline. A law of this iſland, amongſt others which is neceſſary to mention to you, becauſe the hiſtory of the tranſaction has immediate reſpect to it, is, that the jurats in the ſeveral parts of the iſland in the four other diſtricts of the iſland, and the muſtaſtaph in the arraval of St. Phillip's, which is the fifth dependent diſtrict under the immediate dependence and government of the governor himſelf, ſet a price, and value, and meaſure, upon the ſeveral commodities. I don't know whether it includes all commodities, but wine, and corn, and other things, which they call the afforation, that is the aſſize, or price to be paid, upon commodities to be ſold. Gentlemen, in the year 1752, the date here is material, there was a regulation appointed by the crown, made by the king in council. I extract that part of it that regards the preſent queſtion; that is, that the jurats of all the univerſities (now univerſities are the diſtricts, and you ſee there are no jurats of any univerſities, but theſe four: diſtricts and univerſities are ſynonymous terms) "that the jurats of all the univerſi-
" ties be left at full liberty, without the intervention of the command" ant, or any other of the royal officers, to make the afforations, and
" ſettle the aſſize and prices of all manner of corn, and all manner
" of proviſions, the produce of the iſland; and alſo the prices of corn im" ported into the iſland, and bought by the univerſities for the good of " the public; and that the natives and the inhabitants be at all times per" mitted to ſell the ſame at or under the afforation, without any inter" vention of the governor or ſecretaries, or any other perſon or per-
" ſons acting under his authority." You ſee, gentlemen, that this order of council imports, that theſe people are under the abſolute deſpotiſm, if I may ſo ſay, of the crown of Great Britain, becauſe this is a language that we in this country are not acquainted with. Whether to ſell or buy our goods, or not, does not ſuit an Engliſh genius, the genius of the Engliſh law. This is an order made by the king in council, in the year 1752. That order of council, and ſome other proviſions that were made by that order, occaſioned ſome uneaſineſs and miſapprehenſion; and therefore another order of council was made the following year, the 10th of Auguſt, 1753, which you will in the courſe of the evidence have read to you. There are ſome matters in it I will trouble you with. It was made upon the conſideration of ſeveral papers tranſmitted from Minorca by general Blakeney, who was governor at that time. Several things were adviſed by the privy council. Among the reſt, I ſhall juſt extract a few things. With reſpect of the firſt article in the civil branch, relating to the making the afforations, about which great complaints have been exhibited, that the governor be inſtructed to require the jurats of the ſeveral terminos in the iſland, at all proper times and ſeaſons, to make the ſame afforations: and in caſe the ſaid jurats ſhould refuſe or neglect to comply with his command therein, that then the ſaid governor be authoriſed to make the ſaid afforations himſelf: but due care is to be taken, that the ſaid afforations be made equal and general, as to all the things and perſons ſubject to the ſaid afforations, as well as at all proper ſeaſons. This word ſeaſons will have ſome meaning by-and-by. Then they go on with a great many regulations. Amongſt the reſt is, adviſing the king for the future, by his letters patent under the ſeal of Great Britain, to authoriſe the governor, or in his abſence the lieutenant-governor, or commander in chief for the time being, to exerciſe the power of civil government, as well as thoſe of the military, taking care to preſerve the one ſeparate and diſtinct from the other: and that they ſhould receive all this power, but that they ſhould be ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch inſtructions as ſhould be given by his majeſty. He is to govern according to theſe directions contained in the letters patent, as alſo to ſuch inſtructions as ſhall be given to him by the king. Then, among other things, here is a direction, and this is very material: you ſee, it mentions ſome confuſions that have ariſen in reſpect to the regulations made before in fifty-two: that it may be proper for the governor to endeavour to make the inhabitants ſenſible of the great happineſs they enjoy under the king's protection and government, and to ſhew them that they have not only at all times been treated with juſtice and equity, but with lenity: that the encreaſe of riches amongſt them is owing, amongſt other things, to the great ſums of money conſtantly circulated from the pay of the king's forces, and from the number of foreigners now ſettled among them on account of their trade: and alſo the extenſion of their trade, they being permitted to carry on commerce in like manner with the reſt of his majeſty's Britiſh ſubjects: and that it is therefore expected, that they ſhould, in return for ſo many great and real benefits, moſt heartily and effectually concur with his majeſty's governor in any thing he ſhall propoſe for his majeſty's ſervice, and the good of the iſland, and demean themſelves as become good ſubjects, &c. and it may not be improper for the ſaid governor therefore to inform them of all their privileges. Gentlemen, obſerve theſe are founded upon the 11th article of the treaty concluded at Utrecht, on the 13th of July, 1713; and that they can't be intitled to any other privileges than thoſe ſignified therein. And for the better information thereof, that they do lay the ſaid articles before them, a copy whereof was annexed thereunto; by which it appears, that they are allowed to enjoy their honours and eſtates, and have the free uſe of the Roman catholic religion, and that means ſhall be uſed to ſecure it to them ſo far as is agreeable to the laws of Great Britain, which they ſtill continue to enjoy without the leaſt interruption, and without any fear or dread of the court of inquiſition; and that at the ſame time may inform them, that, by the ancient laws of this country, the pope's bulls, &c. are not permitted to be executed in his majeſty's dominions, nor any penalty levied or puniſhment inflicted under ſuch decrees, without permiſſion of the crown of Great Britain: and then it goes on and gives farther directions with regard to the governor's authority, and the neceſſity of theſe perſons demeaning themſelves chearfully to the order of the governor; which is the government and conſtitution of that country. Now, gentlemen, you ſee that in 1753 ſome conſiderable regulations were made, to explain, and in ſome reſpects to alter, the regulations which had been made in the year 1752. And another thing is clearly obſerved; that the tenor of all the inſtruments I have read ſome parts of to you, theſe regulations neither in 52, much leſs by the explanation of them in the ſubſequent year, 53, with regard to the afforation, could not poſſibly extend to the arraval of St. Phillip's, for the jurats were the perſons who were to make the afforation in their ſeveral univerſities, or diſtricts, or terminos, as they are called. Now, in the arraval of St. Phillip's, there were no jurats at all; conſequently, that was to be made by the proper officer appointed by the governor himſelf, namely, the muſtaſtaph. In caſe of the failure of the jurats making the afforation, the governor was to make it himſelf: but in this diſtrict there are no jurats. There is another thing to be noticed; and that is, that if particular care was not taken as to the afforation and manner of ſelling wine in the arraval of St. Phillip's, that is, where the garriſon is; if great care was not taken of that, it might tend to the intoxication of the ſoldiers of the garriſon, and might be attended with moſt pernicious conſequences. For this reaſon general Blakeney, when he was governor of the iſland, ſoon after an explanation of the former regulation now made in fifty-three, that was continued afterwards by his ſucceſſor governor Johnſton, made a very proper regulation with regard to wine, particularly in this arraval of St. Phillip's. That was ſoon after the order of council in fifty-three; I believe it was in fifty-three, or moſt likely was the beginning of the year fifty-four, that general Blakeney made the regulation I am now going to mention to you. The muſtaſtaph was an officer there that did the office of jurat in the other diſtricts: he was appointed immediately by the governor. The jurats in the other diſtricts were choſen annually by the people, in order to avoid any partiality, and to take care that the muſtaſtaph ſhall do his duty regularly, that the inhabitants that have wine to ſell ſhall ſell their wine by turns; that all the people within the arraval of St. Phillip's ſhall ſell their wines by turns; for if they were at liberty all to ſell their wine as faſt as they could ſell it, that would, as I mentioned juſt now, tend to the intoxication of the ſoldiers, and to the ruin of the iſland. And the way that was appointed by general Blakeney in the year fifty-four was, that they ſhould ballot, or caſt lots, for turns; and then the ſeveral people that had the lots to ſell, ſhould ſell at an afforation ſettled by the muſtaſtaph, at ſuch a given time. Then the others ſhall come to their turn, as ballotted for; ſo that every one, in the courſe of his turn, taking the chance of the ballot, will ſell his wine at or under, if he pleaſed, the afforation price, during the time ſpecified. This was a regulation governor Blakeney made upon the order of council. The people of that diſtrict were all very well pleaſed, and things went on in very good order. The people were glad to be ſo regulated. This being approved of, and conſequently being found by experience to be a very good regulation, and to anſwer all the good ends of government, it was continued during all the remainder of the time that general Blakeney was governor of the iſland of Minorca. When governor Johnſton ſucceeded to the government of the iſland, he found this regulation, and the iſland in very good order and tranquillity. He found the regulation had anſwered all the good ends propoſed by it, and he continued the regulation during all the time that he was governor of the iſland. In this ſituation the iſland was found by general Moſtyn, the preſent defendant, when he ſucceeded Mr. Johnſton to the government, on the ſecond of March, 1768, now five years ago. The preſent governor found it juſt as governor Johnſton had found it before, and which certainly bore teſtimony to the wiſdom of general Blakeney, as well as of the government from whom he received his orders. It had been approved of in England, and was approved of by the inhabitants there, the Minorquins. It anſwered all the good ends propoſed by it. It produced peace, tranquillity, and harmony in the iſland; which had been torn by ſeditions and diſputes before, as the order in 53 recites. General Moſtyn continued it. And, gentlemen, the continuance and obſervance of that order is the very cauſe of the complaint now before you: and this made my friend ſo particular. There is nothing more nor leſs, as you will ſee by-and-by, than his continuation of the order of government, which had been preſcribed, you ſee, in 54, and continued all the time down, till the revolting ſpirit of the plaintiff thought proper to break through all order. Gentlemen, it will be time now for me to take notice, as I have ſo far gone into the general hiſtory, of another circumſtance, which is notorious to all the gentlemen who have been ſettled in that iſland, as well governors as the other military gentlemen that have been there, that the native inhabitants of Minorca are but ill affected to the Engliſh, and to the Engliſh government. It is not much to be wondered at. They are the deſcendants of Spaniards. They conſider Spain as the country to which they ought naturally to belong; and it is not at all to be wondered at that theſe people are not well diſpoſed to the Engliſh, who they conſider as their conquerors. A ſtrong inſtance of that happened at the time of the invaſion of Minorca by the French, when the French took it, which I believe was in the year 56, the beginning of laſt war: and it is very ſingular that hardly a Minorquin took arms in defence of the iſland againſt the French; the ſtrongeſt proof in the world that they were very well pleaſed at the country being wreſted from the hands of the Engliſh. The French did take it, as we all very well know; but, thank God, we have it again. Of all the Minorquins in that iſland, perhaps the plaintiff ſtands ſingularly and moſt eminently the moſt ſeditious, turbulent, and diſſatisfied ſubject to the crown of Great Britain, that is to be found in the iſland of Minorca. Gentlemen, he is, or chuſes to be, called for this purpoſe the Patriot of Minorca. Now patriotiſm is a very pretty thing among ourſelves, and we owe much to it; we owe our liberties to it: but we ſhould have but little to value, and perhaps we ſhould have but little of the liberty we now enjoy, were it not for our trade. And for the ſake of our trade it is not fit we ſhould encourage patriotiſm in Minorca; for it is there deſtructive of our trade, and there is an end to our trade in the Mediterranean if it goes there. But here it is very well; for the body of the people of this country they will have it: they have demanded it, and in conſequence of their demands they have enjoyed liberty, which they will continue to poſterity; and it is not in the power of this government to deprive them of it. But they will take care of all our conqueſts abroad. If that ſpirit prevailed in Minorca, the conſequence of it would be the loſs of that country, and of courſe our Mediterranean trade. We ſhould be ſorry to ſet all our ſlaves free in our plantations. Gentlemen, having now troubled you ſo far in general concerning the law, the ſituation, and government, of this iſland, and given you a hint too of the ſpirit of the plaintiff, which I don't wiſh to make the leaſt impreſſion upon you, unleſs the evidence of facts, which we ſhall produce, makes impreſſion upon you; give me leave to deſcend to the particular circumſtances which gave riſe to the matter now complained of. The plaintiff, Fabrigas, was a native of the town of St. Phillip's, and within the arraval of St. Phillip's, and conſequently under the immediate eye of the governor himſelf, as he was within that diſtrict which is regulated by the muſtaſtaph. In July 71 he thought proper to preſent a petition to governor Moſtyn, the defendant, in this form: "ſheweth, that your petitioner has now by him 12 caſks of wine of the produce of his own vineyards, without having purchaſed ſo much as a grape of any other perſon, of which he has not ſold a drop, when ſeveral other inhabitants of the town have ſold all theirs, as well from the produce of their own vineyards, as what they bought to make a profit by; and this with Mr. Allimundo the muſtaſtaph's permit. That the petitioner, on the 28th inſtant, (July) applied to Mr. Allimundo for meaſures to ſell wine by, of the rate of two doublers per quarter leſs than the afforation price, which would have raiſed a profit to the troops and the poor inhabitants of St. Phillip's: but notwithſtanding his demand was very reaſonable, and conformable to the expreſs diſpoſition (direction I ſuppoſe he meant) of the firſt article of his majeſty's regulations of 52, regulating this iſland, where it is expreſly mentioned that the inhabitants ſhall always be permitted to ſell at the price of the afforation, or under it; Mr. Allimundo refuſed his petition, telling him that he would not buy his wine: and that this is not only againſt the reaſon and juſtice of the public, and the garriſon of St. Phillip's, but alſo contrary to his majeſty's orders in the ſaid regulation:" and he mentions that the muſtaſtaph had made fifty caſks of wine, and ſold them. Now, gentlemen, two or three obſervations occur, before we go any further. In the firſt place, this gentleman, if I may call him ſo, this Fabrigas, goes upon the idea of the regulation of fifty-two being diſannulled. In the ſecond place, he goes upon the idea, that the order that was made of fifty-two, was univerſal over all the iſland, without diſtinction of this diſtrict in the arraval of St. Phillip's, in both which you ſee he was miſtaken. Another thing, which don't ſtrike ſo immediately from what I have read, and yet here give me leave to take notice of it: it is artfully thrown into this petition, as if the good of the garriſon was very much concerned in his having his petition granted. And, gentlemen, I do aſſert, and ſhall be juſtified in the aſſertion, I dare ſay, by your opinion, before I have done, or at leaſt before the evidence is gone through, that his deſign, from the beginning to the end of it, was to ſtir up ſedition and mutiny; and amongſt the reſt, particularly to point to the paſſions and inclinations of the ſoldiers of the garriſon to take his part againſt the governor. This petition being preſented to the governor, the governor called upon Mr. Allimundo to give an anſwer to this man: for you ſee he complained, that he, Fabrigas, had not the permiſſion to ſell his own wine, Allimundo having refuſed him the meaſure by which he ſhould ſell it; and in the next place, that Allimundo himſelf had ſold his wine. Allimundo did give an anſwer to this; for the governor, willing to ſerve every body, and to act with the moſt impartial juſtice, and being uneaſy himſelf, that any Minorquin ſhould be uneaſy; for the uneaſineſs of a Minorquin perhaps diffuſes itſelf further than a particular man, and is a fit matter to be attended to by government; he called upon Allimundo to explain this matter. Allimundo gave a full and clear anſwer to the matter; and ſtated in that anſwer, that Fabrigas's complaint was, becauſe his turn for ſelling wine had not come, according to the lots I mentioned juſt now, and that was the only reaſon why he had not yet ſold a drop; for no man could ſell a drop, till by ballotting his time was come: ſo that Fabrigas had nothing to complain of. But he inſiſts, that no man ought to be bound by the lots, but that every man had a right, by the regulation of fifty-two, not taking notice of the regulation ſince that, but that any man might ſell under the afforation price: therefore he, offering to ſell under the afforation price, ought to be permitted to ſell his wine without waiting for ballotting. He was miſtaken here: firſt, becauſe that order of fifty-two had been reſcinded, and was not the binding order: ſecond, that he lived in a diſtrict, where it was not to be regulated by jurats, but by order of the governor: thirdly, that the regulation which had been obtained in the former governor's time had been the way I have repreſented to you: in all which particular heads he was groſly miſtaken; and therefore he had no cauſe of complaint that he had not ſold any of his wine, his time for ſale being not yet arrived, according to the regulation of the lots. With regard to the other part of the complaint, that Allimundo ſold his wine; Allimundo freely inſiſted, that he had a right to do ſo. He claimed a right which had been enjoyed by all his predeceſſors, and which he could not, without an order from the governor, depart from, not only for his own ſake, but for the ſake of his ſucceſſors; that he had a right to ſell his own wine without reſorting to the lots, and that he had not bought any wine, but ſold his own wine. This anſwer being given by Allimundo to the governor, the governor upon that ſent word to the plaintiff, that he had enquired (for he had not taken Allimundo's word for it, but had enquired) into the matter, and found what Allimundo had done was right, and afforded no cauſe of complaint. This was ſome time in July. Upon the 11th of Auguſt, this Fabrigas thought proper to prefer another petition in theſe words: ‘I had the honour to preſent a memorial to your excellency, ſhewing, the tranſgreſſing and not obſerving in the ſaid town two regulations given upon the 28th of May fifty-two by his Britannic majeſty [ſtill adhering to the order of fifty-two, as if there had been no ſubſequent order] that the inhabitant ſhould be permitted to ſell his fruit at the fixed price, the afforation, or under: ſecondly, that no commander, judge, or officer, be allowed to have any traffic, bargain, or ſo forth: [It cites a great deal of this order, and then he takes notice] that Allimundo, who does the functions of muſtaſtaph, bought grapes and made wine. And then he offers to ſell to the inhabitants in the garriſon of St. Phillip's, twelve caſks of wine that he has got by him of his own vineyard's produce, at two doublers leſs than the ordinary afforation and fixed price. The petitioner has applied ſeveral times to your ſecretary's office for your excellency's decree [that is, for his anſwer]. Your ſecretary told your petitioner verbally, that your excellency was ſatisfied with the anſwer given by Allimundo; at which he is ſurpriſed, as he is ready to prove, in a judicial way, the truth thereof. [Then he prays the governor to give his decree at the foot of the memorial, and to have the ſatisfaction to juſtify himſelf, and to prove his charges againſt Allimundo.]’

Gentlemen, this ſecond petition being preſented to the governor upon the 16th of Auguſt, which was five days after the date of it, governor Moſtyn took the only poſſible ſtep for a man in his ſituation to take, conſiſtent with wiſdom and juſtice; and that is, to refer both the petitions, or memorials, as well the former as the ſecond, to the proper officers of juſtice, for their determination. Accordingly he did refer not only the two petitions, but alſo the anſwer or juſtification of Allimundo. He referred all theſe papers to the only proper officer there to refer this matter to, namely, the ſolicitor general of the iſland, and Dr. Markadal, the firſt law officer, in order that they might enquire into the matter of complaint, and impart their opinions. They made their report upon the 21ſt of Auguſt to the governor. Now you will ſee what were the opinions of the lawyers of the iſland at that very time, that the orders of his majeſty in council, of the year 52, relative to the ſale of wine, had never been executed in the ſuburbs of the caſtle of St. Phillip's. You ſee it is juſt what I told you at firſt; that is, the arraval of St. Phillip's, that order of 52 was never underſtood to extend to that particular diſtrict, which is under the immediate government of the governor himſelf, that is the place where this man dwelt. Then they ſay, ſecondly, that the cuſtom obſerved in the ſuburbs, upon the ſale of the wines of the inhabitants, has been, that the muſtaſtaph had the direction of diſtributing the meaſures among thoſe inhabitants, which was continued till ſome years paſt; when lieutenant general James Johnſton, lieutenant governor of the iſland, in order to avoid complaints, formed a regulation, dividing the ſaid ſuburbs into four quarters, and ordered that the wine ſhould be ſold by ſuch of the inhabitants unto whom it ſhould fall (I ſee I am miſtaken; it was introduced, I ſee, by governor Johnſton), which regulation at this time exiſts. The third is, that Antonio Allimundo was elected muſtaſtaph. Fourthly, that Allimundo, Joſeph Neto, Ralph Preter, and Joſeph Leſlie, who are the perſons that have executed the office of muſtaſtaph of the ſaid ſuburbs for ſeveral years paſt, have been accuſtomed to purchaſe grapes for making wines:—this is the defence of Allimundo. Then, fifthly, that the bailiffs, jurats, muſtaſtaphs, and other public officers, make, and have been accuſtomed to make wine from grapes bought by themſelves. And then, laſtly, that the making of wine from grapes bought had not been reckoned an illicit traffic, nor incompatible with the office of bailiff, jurat, muſtaſtaph, and ſo forth. Now ſee what method theſe officers took to be informed of this matter, in order to give the anſwer to the governor. “This, ſir, is what, in obedience to your excellency's order, we can inform you of, according to what appears to reſult from the declarations which we have received upon oath from the propereſt perſons, whoſe original depoſitions remain among the archives of the royal government.” Theſe two obſervations naturally occur. In the firſt place, that the governor took the only method he could, upon the complaint of this man, to refer it to the only proper officer of the iſland, upon whoſe report he might depend, with the power of examination by this officer, of all proper perſons upon oath, for their information. That, upon the reſult of the report of this officer, it appears that the complaint of Fabrigas was groundleſs. It was groundleſs both with reſpect to his claim of right to ſell out of the order, by caſting of lots; it was groundleſs, likewiſe, with regard to his complaint againſt Allimundo, for having ſold wine himſelf. For they ſay that the regulation made in 52, had never applied to the diſtrict of St. Phillip's, that is, the arraval of St. Phillip's. They ſay, ſecondly, that within that diſtrict they had always ſold their wine by lots. And they ſay, thirdly, that the muſtaſtaph, and the other officers that do fix the afforation, have always ſold wine the way that Allimundo has. This was the anſwer that was given, and this the report that was made to the governor, in conſequence of his having referred to them the two petitions of Fabrigas, as well as the anſwer of Allimundo to the petition. Gentlemen, they afterwards made another report; for this, I told you, was on the 31ſt of Auguſt: They made another report four days after upon the 4th of September: they gave an account, for the governor was very deſirous to know in what manner theſe gentlemen had proceeded. (You ſee there is a general alluſion at the foot of the report, to their having examined proper perſons upon oath.) The governor was exceedingly deſirous to know in what order theſe gentlemen had proceeded, to ſee whether all poſſible care had been taken to avoid complaint, and from an earneſt deſire he had, that all cauſes of complaint might ſubſide, that there might be one univerſal rule of good government preſerved among the Minorquins: and to be ſure, he muſt be anſwerable to the crown of Great Britain for any improper conduct. “We, upon the ſame day, the 16th, that is the day of reference, we wrote to the ſaid Allimundo and Fabrigas, citing them by our commiſſion, and ordering them to appear upon the 20th; and in obedience to which they having appeared, we again ordered them to appear on the 23d following with their proofs and documents. At their appearing on the 23d, we demanded of them their proofs and juſtification; when Fabrigas anſwered, he did not intend to enter into the ſame, till he had obtained the decree of the 3d memorial, that is, the anſwer of the governor in writing. On the 26th, Fabrigas was convoked in your excellency's office, where it was aſked, what action it was he intended by theſe memorials againſt Allimundo, whether civil or criminal? And having time given him to anſwer, he replied, a civil one; all which appears by the acts to which we refer. As the ſaid Fabrigas hath not this day repreſented before us any proof by way of juſtification of his ſaid two memorials, we therefore, for this reaſon, have the honour to ſubmit the ſame to the conſideration of your excellency's wiſdom, that you may not impute to us the leaſt omiſſion of the lively deſire we have to execute the orders of your excellency.” This is dated the 4th of September. Upon this order, this report that was then made upon the 4th of September, which gave a clear ſatisfaction that every thing had been done with proper care and caution to prevent any complaint, this Fabrigas preſented a third petition or memorial. I call them petitions, remonſtrances—I don't know what name to call them by, but ſtill they have the title of a petition—he called it the humble petition—and in this third, as in the ſecond, he had complained of Allimundo. Now here is a remonſtrance againſt the judges: That “whereas the judges delegated by your excellency”——

Court. What date is this?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I have no preciſe date to it. “The judges have denied him a communication of the anſwer given by Allimundo, who does the functions of muſtaſtaph of St. Phillip's: prays you will be pleaſed to order the judges to receive the witneſſes which are produced to juſtify the articles.” And then follows upon this, no leſs than twelve articles of impeachment, as it were; articles upon which the witneſſes were produced to prove ſome facts committed by Allimundo againſt his majeſty's orders, and to prove ſome injuſtice done by Allimundo againſt the Minorquins inhabiting the town of St. Phillip's, and againſt his majeſty's troops of that garriſon.—Then follows a ſtring of twelve articles, which I don't mean to read to you now: you will have them by-and-by in due order. Then he ſpeaks of the prices of meat, fiſh, and ſeveral other things, all which he complained are not well done: and there is a general complaint throughout the government of all the officers, that all the Minorquins are ill-uſed by the miſconduct, miſrule and miſmanagement, by the under-officers of the garriſon. Now, gentlemen, you would have ſuppoſed, if governor Moſtyn had been, what the world knows he is not, a raſh man, he might, perhaps, have very well juſtified ſome cenſure at leaſt, of what ſort is another queſtion, upon the conduct of Mr. Fabrigas, whoſe conduct points very ſtrongly to ſedition. For conſider where we are ſpeaking of. We are not talking of the city of London; we are not talking of a town in England; but are talking of the town of St. Phillip's, juſt at the foot of the glacis of the citadel: and this ſtirring up ſedition among the Minorquins, who were already too ill diſpoſed to government. But governor Moſtyn did act in this buſineſs with that candour and humanity, that deliberation and wiſdom, for which his character is ſo eminent. And therefore, after this third memorial and articles, the next ſtep he took was to take farther advice of all the ſuperior law officers and magiſtrates of the iſland, that is, on the 5th of September, 1771. And, gentlemen, he ordered his ſecretary to write a letter to doctor Markadal, (I ſhall not pronounce their names well) the ſolicitor general, and the other perſons; and, upon that, they gave this anſwer. He ſent the 5th for their opinion; on the 10th they give their anſwer.

“We received your excellency's letter of the 5th inſtant, with twelve articles exhibited by Anthonio Fabrigas annexed. In anſwer to the contents of the ſaid letter, it appears to us, that in ſundry of the ſaid articles he mentions and repreſents injuries or impoſitions upon the troops quartered in St. Phillip's, which, if divulged among them, might occaſion tumults and diſorders, and alſo raiſe murmurings againſt their proper ſuperiors, of whom they are ſuſpicious, and have not a due regard to their own advantage: from which it appears to us, pernicious conſequences may ariſe in military diſcipline. This our opinion we ſubmit to your excellency."

Upon the receipt of this letter, ſtill the governor was determined there ſhould be no perſon unaſked; therefore he, upon the receipt of this letter, ſent it with Fabrigas's anſwer to the aſſeſſeur criminal, who ſits as the aſſiſtant to the governor in trying of civil or criminal cauſes, the great judge of the iſland under the governor: he ſent to him for the ſanction of his opinion upon it. The anſwer is wrote to the ſecretary of the governor, and, 'having examined all the ſaid papers, it appears to me, 'that the opinion of the ſaid gentlemen is very learned and juſt.' So that you ſee he concurs entirely in opinion with thoſe other gentlemen that had made the report that I read to you juſt now. Gentlemen, when this was done, then, and not till then, the governor, the defendant, general Moſtyn, ſent an anſwer in form to Fabrigas; and I flatter myſelf that you, and every one who hears this, muſt be of opinion, that the governor acted with all poſſible caution in this buſineſs. He writes, therefore, this anſwer; for you ſee the other had preſſed for an anſwer in writing, and would have it in a great hurry; but, however, the governor would not give an anſwer till he had informed his underſtanding upon the ſubject, by all that could give him information and advice. "Underſtanding that Antonio Alexander Allimundo hath acted in obedience to the directions of his ſuperiors, as in the manner practiſed by his predeceſſors in the ſaid ſuburbs, by thoſe that held the office before him, as it appears to us (mentioning their names) upon a charge ſet forth in the repreſentations made by Fabrigas, and upon the other part by the ſaid petition of the people there to attend to the regulation made by governor Johnſton [I ſhould have told you, that all the Minorquins there prayed it might be continued] for which cauſe it is not regular to receive witneſſes to juſtify the different articles exhibited by Fabrigas, ſome of which ſeem to tend to diſturb the public tranquility, in prejudice of his majeſty's ſervice: [now, gentlemen, remark this] notwithſtanding which, if Antonio Fabrigas is ſufficiently entitled to pretend, that Antonio Allimundo hath committed any crime or miſdemeanor, he is to apply to the royal governor's court, and there make his complaint in the uſual form; where he will have juſtice done him according to law, that is, according to the law of the iſland." Now, any mortal would ſuppoſe that Fabrigas, if he was not poſſeſſed of a moſt malignant and turbulent ſpirit, would have acquieſced in this, and taken ſuch meaſures as, according to the law and conſtitution of the iſland, were open to him, and not have plagued and teazed the governor with reiterated remonſtrances and complaints in matters which were out of his own principal power to relieve, if there was any cauſe of complaint; though, by the way, the governor had the ſtrongeſt reaſon to ſuppoſe he had no cauſe of complaint. But it was the determination of this man to drive home every thing poſſible to the governor, and to ſet up an oppoſition of the Minorquins ſubject to his civil government, and the garriſon ſubject to his military government. The unavoidable conſequence of this would have been the total loſs of this iſland, and infinite bloodſhed, which muſt have enſued upon the revolt of this iſland. However, the man ſtill uſes a great many threats, which you will have a particular account of by-and-by. The governor thought proper on this, (ſince you find all which had been done, and which this Fabrigas complained of, was the purſuing the regulations which had been made by governor Johnſton—you will be amazed, perhaps, at my telling you—it is the ſtrongeſt proof of the lenity and moderation of the governor that, perhaps, can ever be imagined) in order to ſee whether that regulation was a right one, and ought ſtill to be continued, the governor ſummoned a meeting of the inhabitants, even Minorquins, the inhabitants of this diſtrict, in order to take their ſenſe of the governor's regulation, to ſell by lots, or whether that regulation ſhould be aboliſhed, and that he, or any perſon within the diſtrict, may be at liberty to ſell wine as faſt as they can under the afforation price. In order to have their full ſenſe of the matter, he took the utmoſt cautionary means. This doctor Markadal and doctor Oliver ſummoned all the inhabitants; and becauſe they might be at full leiſure from their vineyards, (for it was about the time of making wine) that they might be at full leiſure to attend and meet together, they appointed the meeting to be on a Sunday, as the moſt leiſure day, when they might be ſpared from their attendance upon their vineyards, and in order to have a full meeting. Mr. Fabrigas, in the mean time, uſes all pains, (as if an election was going forwards) he uſed all imaginary pains to get together as many people as he could muſter to think with him, and to have this regulation of the governor aboliſhed, and that the matter he complained of might be put an end to, and the matter he required enforced: but ſuch was the ſenſe of the inhabitants, that there was a majority, I am told, almoſt twenty to one, of all the Minorquins who attended upon that Sunday; all pleaſed with what had been done by governor Johnſton, and deſirous to continue that regulation. They found it moſt beneficial to themſelves; they found it attended with leaſt trouble; they found it moſt for their profit: they all were againſt their countryman Fabrigas, and all prayed that the eſtabliſhment made by governor Johnſton, and had continued to that time, might ſtill be uſed and continued without any alteration. Fabrigas was now very much diſſatisfied. Now I will tell you a new objection. All this is unlawful, becauſe it was on a Sunday, and the ſenſe of the people taken upon a Sunday is no ſenſe at all; a further inſtance of the turbulence of his diſpoſition! All was wrong; and, at the ſame time, a threat that he would now prefer a petition, and he would take care that there ſhould be two hundred men armed at his heels! Now let me aſk any man that hears me, what the governor was to do? The governor (whoſe ſpirit was not inferior to his other qualities that make up the character of a gentleman and a ſoldier) was not to be ſo frightened. He was a ſtranger to perſonal fear; and a Minorquin appearing at the head of two hundred people armed, though it is ſerious, and deſerves conſideration—however, the governor's ſpirit was ſuch, he did not convoke any force in order to repel this: but he took a very wiſe ſtep; and that was (for the next day was the time of this inſurrection he had cauſe to apprehend), he gave an invitation to the commanding officers of the different regiments, to meet him next morning; and if there had been any force at the heels of Mr. Fabrigas, the commanding officers being then in the houſe, it would not take up any time, perhaps, to ſummon their force to repel it: but he would not ſummons the force of the iſland any farther than I tell you. At the time this petition was to be preſented by Fabrigas with two hundred men at his heels—I miſtake; the petition was then preſented, and he would come for an anſwer the next morning with a force of 200 men at his heels—the governor thought proper to aſk the advice of the officers who attended there, what ought to be done with this man, and what was fit to be done? Every one of the officers who attended upon the occaſion concurred in the opinion—and it was a matter about which I think there could not be two opinions,—that nothing was ſafe to be done, but immediately laying hold of this man the firſt opportunity, and ſending him out of the iſland. And he did ſo. There is the complaint. Now, gentlemen, I have let you into the whole hiſtory why this was done that Fabrigas complains of; why Fabrigas was kept cloſe, as he complains of. A man that threatened an inſurrection in the iſland, it ſurely would be imprudent in the governor to ſuffer any of his friends in the iſland to have acceſs to him: general Moſtyn therefore ſent him off as ſoon as poſſible, which I believe was four or five days, into Spain, with a prohibition to return to the iſland again within the courſe of a year. But all this, ſay they, this is tyrannical, this is arbitrary; this is what Engliſh government, and Engliſh laws, and an Engliſh court of juſtice cannot bear. Say they, it is a very improper behaviour in governor Moſtyn, and ought to be the ſubject, the matter of a civil action: Mr. Fabrigas therefore does very right to take a voyage over to England, to come here to Guildhall, and take the ſenſe of an Engliſh jury upon governor Moſtyn's behaviour. Let me obſerve to you, this is not a novel proceeding; for though, very fortunately for governor Moſtyn, it is the firſt time that he has had an occaſion to behave in this way, and to proceed in this particular manner; yet former governors of this iſland, upon much leſs occaſions and emergencies than this, have done the very like thing. Do not be aſtoniſhed, gentlemen, nor let it fright you, when I tell you, that the governor has an abſolute right to do it, and is accountable to nobody but the privy-council. The government of that iſland is, in many reſpects, an arbitrary government, and as deſpotic, in many inſtances, as any of the governments in Aſia, particularly in the part now in queſtion; and yet governor Moſtyn would be ſorry, for his own character's ſake, if it was in his power, to take any legal advantages concerning the impropriety of bringing the action here in England. His character calls upon him, which is to him the firſt of all conſiderations, to explain his conduct in the fulleſt manner poſſible. A general acquittal of him upon the idea that the law won't puniſh him, would be but a poor ſatisfaction to governor Moſtyn, who is charged in this action with having exerciſed a tyrannical power. Gentlemen, the general tenor of the general's behaviour, from the time of his being firſt appointed to this government five years ago, to the moment he laſt left the iſland, has been to preſerve and to maintain order and good government, without a wiſh, or rather an abhorrence, to oppreſs any one man that is under his government there: leaſt of all could he ever wiſh to oppreſs or injure this man, too inconſiderable in his own particular private ſtation of life, too remote from a connexion or acquaintance with the governor, for him to have made him the object of vindictive—I won't call it juſtice, but of any vengeance or reſentment upon any occaſion whatſoever. When the man made a complaint, he wiſhed to enquire into the grounds of it; and when he found it was groundleſs, and the man reiterated the complaint, however he might be teazed by this reiterated complaint, (for it is grievous and troubleſome to a man to be teazed with new remonſtrances and petitions, when he ſees the impropriety and impoſſibility of granting what is requeſted) ſtill takes all poſſible occaſion to enquire into the grounds of the complaint, to anſwer the complaint. But when, after every means had been tried, the man threatens the diſſolution and deſtruction of government in the iſland, it became his duty then to treat this with ſome ſerioufneſs: and yet for the general good of the iſland he did it, never complaining of theſe two hundred men that were to be armed, only laying hold of the man himſelf, and, as ſoon as a ſhip could be got, to ſend him out of the iſland. And now governor Moſtyn is called upon in an action. The laws of a foreign country, gentlemen, are matters of fact here; and it is very well worthy conſideration—it is very well worthy conſideration indeed (I do not mean to trouble you with a diſcuſſion of that queſtion; but ſince his lordſhip has hinted about it, it is very well worthy of conſideration) whether ſuch conduct, upon ſuch occaſions, in ſuch a place, can be the ſubject of litigation in a court of juſtice in England; it is very well deſerving of conſideration. I know very well, upon a former occaſion, when an action was brought againſt the governor of the iſland of Barbadoes, by a man who ſucceeded in his abſence to the government, without any particular appointment ſo to do, and having been guilty, in the governor's abſence, of ſome male practice, (he was appointed by him, but had not took the oath) there was an action in that caſe brought againſt the governor for ſome proceedings againſt his deputy, as was the ſubject of an action, and there was judgment in that caſe given for the plaintiff; but a writ of error being brought, and that being removed afterwards to the houſe of lords, that judgment was reverſed. As well as I recollect it, one of the chief grounds inſiſted upon on the part of the defendant was, that being a matter abroad,—(for that it was upon demurrer to a plea)—that being upon a matter abroad, it was not cognizable by the courts of juſtice in England. In anſwer to that, it was inſiſted—

Court. Was it not the main queſtion in that trial, whether the council of ſtate, or the governor of Barbadoes, had a power to commit?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. That was a queſtion. I have Sir Bartholomew Shower's parliamentary caſes upon the table.

Court. I think the courts held they had no power to commit: the houſe of lords held they had a power.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Your lordſhip will find the particular reaſon of the reverſion of the judgment is not ſtated, but only that the judgment was reverſed. But one of the particular reaſons was, that the iſland might be governed by particular laws, and that he was not reſponſible here for what he did there. To this it was anſwered and inſiſted upon by the other ſide, that they were governed by Engliſh laws; that they were not a conquered country; that they were inhabited by the ſubjects of the crown of Great Britain, who came of Engliſh or Britannick ſubjects, going from Great Britain to that country to reſide and ſettle there, and were not like the caſe of a conquered country. The reaſon of it does not appear. Upon that report, the houſe of lords thought proper to reverſe the judgment. In the preſent caſe, ſee how ſtrong it is! for every objection made upon that caſe applies with double force here. Suppoſe it comes to that queſtion of law, will not that queſtion be of too great magnitude for me to ſay a ſingle ſyllable about it? This that I have now mentioned, and your lordſhip has gone before me in what I was going to ſay, is a very important queſtion of law indeed; a very great queſtion; a queſtion of the firſt magnitude, and which will therefore deſerve to be diſcuſſed and determined by the higheſt court of juſtice this kingdom is acquainted with. It is a queſtion of infinite difficulty and great importance, with regard to the reſponſibility of the governor in a conquered iſland, with reſpect to their being amenable to foreign ſubjects, with regard to being amenable for their conduct.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. They are the deſcendants of foreigners, all of them.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I mean thoſe that are born in Minorca, deſcend from the ancient inhabitants of the iſland. They are ſubject to be governed by whatever laws the king of Great Britain ſhall think proper to impoſe upon them. The king of Great Britain may, if he pleaſes, alter his government of that iſland, and give what laws he pleaſes under a general ratification; and they are all bound by it. I ſay, a diſcuſſion of that queſtion, as a queſtion of law, is of great magnitude. I do not mean to trouble you with it. To be ſure, it is too much for my graſp; it is too much perhaps for the graſp of any one man ſitting in judgment, much more for me ſtanding here as a counſel, who have no judgment at all, only a duty I owe my client; and perhaps, and moſt probably, it will be a queſtion to be referred to the determination of the court above. And you, at the ſame time, will certainly, if you think proper to find a ſpecial verdict in this cauſe, which I ſuppoſe you will, you will do well to conſider the ſubject with regard to the damages, which we call contingent damages: it was therefore exceeding fit to mention all thoſe circumſtances to you, not only with regard to the matter of fact, but alſo for your conſideration with regard to the damages. For ſuppoſe (it is upon that ground I now addreſs you) ſuppoſe the governor miſtook the law upon this occaſion; ſuppoſe he was wrong, and ought not to have proceeded in this way; ſuppoſe that notwithſtanding all the opinions he had took, as well from the civil officers in their different departments, the law officers, and the aſſeſſeur judges, and ſo forth, confirmed by all the military officers, whom he aſſembled together upon the threat of the inſurrection; ſuppoſe, notwithſtanding all theſe opinions, he ought, inſtead of doing what he did, rather to have kept this man a priſoner, and brought him before ſome tribunal to be tried: ſuppoſe that ought to be his conduct; that therefore he did wrong, inſtead of it, to impriſon the man immediately, and baniſh him, upon his own authority; now to be ſure the aſſeſſment of damages by you muſt go upon that ſuppoſition. I think I ſpeak fairly upon the occaſion: I mean in this and all other occaſions to act with character: I ſuppoſe that to be ſo: what mighty damages ought, on that occaſion, to be given againſt the governor? He in that inſtance miſtook the line of his duty; he acted as he thought for the beſt, for the ſafety of the iſland; but he acted precipitately. Why, let Mr. Fabrigas or his friends (for I do not know whether he is in England himſelf or no), let them put one queſtion to themſelves to decide it. If general Moſtyn had done the thing, the not doing of which they now complain of; if general Moſtyn had brought this man to a trial, what might have been his fate? The leaſt ſurely could have been that which he now complains of, baniſhment for a ſingle year; for with regard to the impriſonment, it is not an unuſual thing in any country. Upon great and emergent occaſions, it is not an unuſual thing to confine a man for a few days, and debar him the acceſs of his friends: that is not an extraordinary thing. But ſuppoſe in that he did wrong: I will ſuppoſe the whole to be wrong. Wherein is it wrong? It is wrong from a miſapprehenſion of judgment, from a miſtake: it is wrong merely in reſpect to miſtake. It is not wrong from malice, from wilful wickedneſs towards this man, from a tyrannical diſpoſition, from a deſire to oppreſs or hurt him. If this had been the caſe; if the governor, reſpectable as his character is, could for a moment be ſuſpected to be capable of acting in this manner, from tyrannical, cruel, or wicked motives, he would have done ill to call upon me to be his advocate; for though even in that caſe I would diſcharge my duty towards him, I could not have ſpoke with chearfulneſs for him. But here I conſider him, and the whole tenor of his conduct bids me ſo to do, as a gentleman willing to diſcharge his duty to the crown; to preſerve this iſland, as it is his duty, to the commonwealth of England; willing to do all that was good, right, and juſt, without any vindictive motive to this man, to whom he is a ſtranger. But upon this occaſion the governor will pardon me, if I take notice upon this occaſion, of what is too well known ever to be queſtioned, his general good character. And yet I have leſs need to aſk his particular pardon upon this occaſion, becauſe that gentleman from whom I received my inſtructions, the attorney in the cauſe, has filled my brief with, I think, not leſs than thirty of the firſt names in this kingdom, who, I am told, are all attending here, or within a moment's call from this hall, ſome of the moſt reſpectable characters in this kingdom, ſome of the higheſt rank, and gentlemen of the firſt character in this kingdom, to tell you that they have at different times ſerved under general Moſtyn, and that they do not know in all their acquaintance, a man of a more cool, diſpaſſionate temper, a man of greater character, humanity, and juſtice, than general Moſtyn; as celebrated for it as any man of any rank or of any degree of honour in the world: and yet general Moſtyn muſt be ſuppoſed, in order to juſtify vindictive or exemplary damages upon this occaſion, muſt be ſuppoſed to be actuated by motives which his heart abhors, and which motives never actuated his heart a moment in his life. I leave it upon this idea, that if he has acted improperly in every ſtep, yet, upon the idea of its being a miſtake in general Moſtyn, I apprehend the plaintiff has no right to expect exemplary damages.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. I ſuppoſe it is a fact admitted between us, that this is a conquered iſland, ceded by the treaty of Utrecht?

Mr. Lee. Minorca was ceded to this crown by the 11th article of the treaty of Utrecht.

JAMES WRIGHT, eſq. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Burland.

Q. You reſided ſome years in Minorca?

A. From about January 71, to the middle of 72.

Q. In what character?—A. As ſecretary to the governor.

Q. To Mr. Moſtyn?—A. Yes.

Q. You know the diviſion of the iſland, do you?—A. Yes.

Q. What are the diſtricts they are divided into?

A. I believe originally five; but two are blended together, that there now are but four.

Q. Do you mean to include in one of theſe diſtricts the ſuburbs of the fort of St. Phillip's?---A. They never do, when ſpeaking of them; that is, extrajudicial of the common officer of the iſland.

Q. Under whoſe particular juriſdiction is that?

A. I always underſtood it to be under the direction of the governor.

Q. What do you call that diſtrict?---A. The arraval of St. Phillip's.

Q. Are you ſure you underſtood it to be diſtinct and ſeparate from all the other diſtricts?

A. Yes; inſomuch that I was always led to believe, and told, that no magiſtrate of Mahon, which is the diſtrict next adjoining to it, ever did go there, or could go there, to exerciſe any ſort of function, without leave had of the governor; and whenever there was occaſion to ſend any of them down there, the fort-major received orders for their admiſſion.

Q. Are theſe laws varied at any time, and by what authority?

A. The iſland is governed by Spaniſh laws, ſubject to be varied by the governor, with regard to all interior matters. A proclamation of the governor is as binding there to try a man upon a treſpaſs as any laws whatſoever, ſubject to be varied by the order of the governor; not in reſpect to property, not with regard to meum and tuum, but with regard to the internal police.

Q. What do you mean by proclamation?

A. That if the governor iſſues a proclamation, and inflicts a penalty for the breach of it all over the iſland, and if any perſon is guilty of the breach of that proclamation, he is ſubject to the penalty of it, and for want of payment is impriſoned.

Q. I ſuppoſe you mean they enforce an obedience to that proclamation by impriſonment?

A. There is there the chief juſtice criminal, and the chief juſtice civil: both have their ſeparate courts. If the governor's proclamation is broke with any penalty annexed to it of impriſonment or fine, the man is ſeized and brought into that court: the proclamation is exhibited againſt him, and by that he is condemned to either fine or impriſonment, though that proclamation was made perhaps but the day before.

Q. According as that proclamation affects, whether a civil or criminal matter?---A. I do not recollect any of a civil matter.

Court. What are the nature of the proclamations you are ſpeaking of?

A. In all the memorials preſented to the governor, he iſſued an order, that no memorials or petitions, except for mercy, ſhould be preſented to him without being ſigned by an advocate admitted in the courts.

Q. You mean governor Moſtyn iſſued this?---A. Yes.

Q. Whether, tho' the Minorquins by the treaty of Utrecht are governed by the Spaniſh laws, yet whether our government here do in fact, or not, from time to time make alterations and regulations in thoſe laws?

A. The king in council, upon all occaſions of application to them, iſſue out ſuch orders as the caſe requires, and they are recorded in the royal court there, and are as binding as any laws whatſoever.

Q. They are regiſtered there, are they not?---A. Yes.

Q. What do you call the royal court?

A. The court of royal government is the criminal and the civil court.

Q. You know Mr. Fabrigas?---A. Perfectly well.

Q. What is he in the iſland?

A. I was directed by governor Moſtyn, who was very much teazed by his repeated applications, to enquire what ſort of a man he was.

Q. Firſt, as to his quality in the iſland; what ſtation is he?

A. His father holds ſome vineyards, very ſmall. He himſelf I believe actually, for his bread, labours and digs and prunes the vineyards, and talks and chatters about politics perhaps five days out of ſix. It has been repeatedly ſaid, Mr. Fabrigas is a man of property. I believe he had at that time no property upon the earth. General Moſtyn ordered me to make enquiry, and that was the reſult of it.

Q. We know what the ſtation of general Moſtyn is; that he was then and is now lieutenant-governor of Minorca; that he is commander of a regiment, and a man of family: what is his character as a man and as an officer? Is he a man of humanity?

A. I believe as much ſo as it is poſſible for a man to have; that is, in my opinion. I have ſeen much of him. I do not believe there exiſts in the world a man of tenderer feelings, for any ill effects that may be produced from him.

Q. Is that his general character?

A. I believe him to be much more ſo than common. I think that is his conduct that will be found upon every enquiry that can be made of him.

Q. And it has been ſo under your own knowledge?

A. I am ſure of it: I have had many opportunities of ſeeing the working of it in a very ſurpriſing manner.

Q. Will you let us know as much as you do know of this tranſaction between Mr. Fabrigas and the governor?

A. May I refer to ſome minutes I have here?

Counſel. Yes.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Did you take them at the time?

A. No; but all within three days. I hope I ſhall be excuſed if I ſhould make any miſtakes in reſpect to date. Mr. Fabrigas preſented a memorial, I believe to myſelf, to be delivered to governor Moſtyn—that was the 31ſt of July 71—complaining that Mr. Allimundo, the muſtaſtaph, the only officer in the arraval—I think that was the firſt petition, complaining of ſome abuſes in buying wine. The governor ſaid, what does the fellow want? He bid me order Allimundo to anſwer it, for he knew nothing about it. I ſent for Allimundo up to the head-quarters. The muſtaſtaph is the only civil officer of St. Phillip's, that is, in the arraval: he is put in by the governor, and turned out by him at pleaſure.

Q. Did you order Allimundo to give in an anſwer to it?

A. I ſent for him, and deſired him to come up to me. I gave him the memorial, and told him it was the governor's orders that he anſwered it. Upon Allimundo's anſwer coming up, it was read to the governor.

Counſel. That anſwer is dated the 8th of Auguſt 71?

A. I read it to the governor. The governor ordered me to tell Mr. Fabrigas and Allimundo, by an interpreter, that he was very well ſatisfied with the defence Allimundo had made to Fabrigas's charge. I told them both ſo. Fabrigas came again, and deſired to ſee the defence that Allimundo had made. I told him I was not authoriſed to ſhew it him, nor did I think it was a matter for him to demand. He came again the next day, or the day after, giving in another memorial, deſiring that that might be ſhewn to the governor.

Counſel. That was delivered the 13th of Auguſt?

A. Yes: in ſhort, deſiring to ſee the juſtification of Allimundo, and ſhifting the ground of his complaint, and, I think, adding another article.

Q. You ſhewed theſe two memorials to the governor?

A. I did. Governor Moſtyn ordered that Dr. Markadal, who then acted as chief juſtice civil, ſhould receive and hear any complaints that Fabrigas had to make againſt Allimundo; and he added to him the advocate fiſcal, the ſecond officer in the iſland that acts under the king's commiſſion: the chief juſtice civil is the firſt, the chief juſtice criminal is the ſecond, the advocate fiſcal is the third, next after the governor: he gave them authority to ſend for papers and perſons, and whatſoever might be uſeful in the inquiry in his name. By my memorandum, I think it was the 20th of Auguſt, that theſe two law gentlemen, as commiſſioners, met, and ordered Fabrigas and Allimundo, who were then preſent, to attend them the 23d following. It may be neceſſary to obſerve, that though theſe two gentlemen were then ſitting in their own civil courts, they acted as commiſſioners of inquiry, becauſe the man was one of the arraval of St. Phillip's. I won't charge my memory by oath, but I am very ſure they had a ſeparate commiſſion on purpoſe under the governor's own ſeal.

Q. Was the inquiry made?

A. On the 23d, Fabrigas declared he would proceed no further till he was allowed to ſee the defence that Allimundo had made, and given in to the governor.

Q. Where was that declaration made?

A. In the court before the commiſſioners. Mr. Fabrigas preſented a third memorial to governor Moſtyn, ſaying nothing more than what he had ſaid before the commiſſioners, that he could not proceed till he had ſeen Allimundo's anſwer to his petition.

Q. Before the third memorial that was preſented, had the commiſſioners made any report?——A. None.

Q. Do you recollect whether the third memorial was after or before the report?——A. I am pretty ſure before.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. That is the third memorial, containing the 12 articles he exhibits againſt Allimundo: there is no date to it.

Q. Can you fix the date to that?

A. I think it muſt be between the 23d and 26th of Auguſt. General Moſtyn referred him to the commiſſioners.

Q. What was done afterwards?

A. The commiſſioners reported to the governor, that Mr. Fabrigas, by the manner of his carrying on this accuſation againſt Allimundo-----

Q. When was their report?

A. The 24th or 25th of Auguſt, I imagine: here is their report.

Court. I dare ſay this report he is ſpeaking of now, don't contain the commiſſioners anſwer about the 12 articles?---A. There are two reports.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I took a great deal of pains to collect dates, and I did it from the contents: I believe they were right, as I opened it.

A. There were two reports, one the 31ſt of Auguſt, the other the 4th of September, that Fabrigas, by the manner of carrying on this charge, intended to ſow diſſention.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Mr. Wright, I find, confounds two reports together: it is the third report where they report that it is to breed ſedition.

Q. Then he preſented this third memorial containing the 12 articles?

Mr. Juſtice Gould. My brother Davy ſtated, that it was the 10th of September that they took notice of the articles.

Q. Was there another report about the 10th of September?

A. Yes, there is. On the 26th of Auguſt the governor ordered me to deſire the criminal chief juſtice, and the civil chief juſtice, the advocate fiſcal, and the ſecretary to the court of the royal government, to come to me next morning, that being the 26th. Fabrigas came there. I aſked him in the governor's name, by an interpreter, what he meant? whether a civil proſecution to recover damages againſt Allimundo, which he had ſuſtained? or whether he meant to make an example of him for any abuſe he had committed in his office? Theſe gentlemen were preſent.

Q. What anſwer did he make?

A. None; I could get no anſwer from him.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. That is, upon the articles.

Court. Is that ſubſequent to the delivery of the articles?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Yes.

Q. This queſtion aroſe upon his preſenting the 12 articles to the governor?---A. Upon the whole of his conduct.

Q. But that was after he preſented the articles?---A. Yes.

Q. What did he ſay to that?

A. He ſaid nothing. I deſired him to make ſome kind of anſwer, that I might tell the governor. His anſwer at laſt by extortion was, that if I would give him a quarter of an hour, he would go and come back with an anſwer.

Q. Being confounded at the queſtion at firſt, and giving no anſwer for ſome time, at length he ſaid that?

A. He did not know which he wanted, nor what he wanted. He gave no anſwer at laſt, but only aſked that he might have a quarter of an hour. I told him that he was not confined to a quarter of an hour; but it being then between 10 and 11 o'clock, I believed that they would be ſo attentive to him, that he might call again at 12 o'clock if he pleaſed. He came back again within the time, and gave notice that he meant a civil action.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. I would not interrupt this evidence, as it does not appear to be of great conſequence to us; but I ſubmit to your lordſhip, whether this is properly evidence, the anſwer being conveyed through an interpreter? and whether the interpreter ſhould not be produced, who knows what anſwers were given?

Mr. Lee. We are now to take the anſwer from a man that does not know what the queſtions were, in a language the witneſs does not underſtand, and conſequently cannot report if there were any, or what anſwers given; whereas there is a man living in the world who could report the anſwers that were given. I ſhould not object to it, if that gentleman could himſelf underſtand the anſwers that were given.

Mr. Juſtice Gould. I think it is very clearly ſufficient evidence.

Mr. Peckham. The interpreter was appointed by the governor, or by his order, therefore we cannot tell whether that interpreter gave the fair and true conſtructions of the converſation which paſſed between Mr. Fabrigas and Mr. Wright; but from the perſon appointing him, we have reaſon to apprehend the contrary.

Court. Firſt, it is very clear, from what Mr. Wright ſays, and I ſuppoſe nobody will doubt from the ſubſequent action, but what this interpreter very fairly and rightly interpreted that this man deſired to have a quarter of an hour to conſider of it: that is clear. He has two hours given him. He comes back again, and then the ſame interpreter officiates. The act proves that he had explained the firſt very clearly, becauſe he went away in conſequence of it.

A. The aſſeſſeur criminal talks as good Engliſh as any gentleman in court, and he, whenever there was the leaſt miſtake or confuſion of ſound or words, ſet it right inſtantly. He returned again, and ſaid he meant a civil action.

Q. How long time do you think he was abſent?

A. Within two hours, probably an hour, the aſſeſſeurs both of them walked out and came in again. The commiſſioners not finding Mr. Fabrigas would attend them, were deſired by the general to ſend him an anſwer in writing to ſix queſtions.

Q. When was this?

A. Subſequent to his ſaying he would proceed by civil action.

Q. I ſuppoſe then that meeting broke up?

A. Yes. The governor conſented that he might have a civil action againſt him. I reported it to the governor.

Q. Did you tell him of that?

A. I never ſaw him afterwards, but the judges preſent heard him ſay he meant a civil action. They told him they would admit it.

Mr. Peckham. Did you hear that?

A. Yes, I did. I was to ſignify to him that the governor aſſented to his having a civil action, if he choſe it.

Q. And was it ſignified to him?---A. Yes, it was.

Q. You ſay he did not proceed by a civil action, and therefore ſix queſtions were propoſed to him?

A. The aſſeſſeur civil came to the governor, and informed him this man did not proceed in a civil action: then the governor ſent ſix queſtions to him.

Q. How long after was it that they were ſent him?

A. I cannot recollect.

Q. Was it the ſame day?

A. No; it might be three or four days. The general ſent for his own information ſix queſtions, relative to the conduct complained of, of the muſtaſtaph, for the opinion of the chief juſtice civil, whether the muſtaſtaph had or not exceeded his commiſſion. The queſtions are in court, and the anſwers.

Q. Is there any date to theſe ſix queſtions?

A. The muſtaſtaph of St. Phillip's hearing this great confuſion, in which he was the great perſon complained of, ſpontaneouſly ſent up an atteſtation, or rather a deſire, of many of the inhabitants of the arraval of St. Phillip's, to requeſt the continuance of the old regulations, and that the alterations propoſed by Mr. Fabrigas might not be made. That was ſigned by a great number of them, and was as much the object of converſation there, as any thing ever was.

Q. Was any order made upon that, or what was done?

A. On Sunday the 8th of September, the governor having firſt aſked Dr. Oliver's leave, a very conſiderable merchant in the town, a doctor of laws, and the chief juſtice civil, he gave them a commiſſion to go the next morning, the Sunday, to the arraval of St. Phillip's, to a country-houſe the governor has there, that is called Stanhope's Tower, telling them he would give directions to all the people that dealt in wine, that they ſhould come before them ſeparately to be examined, and give their opinions, and whether they choſe the new reſolutions, or to adhere to the old rule.

Q. What do you mean by aſking Dr. Oliver's permiſſion ?

A. He was no officer. For them to ſay whether they choſe the new inſtitution of general Johnſton, or whether they choſe the general ſale of wine, as every body pleaſed. A great many of them did appear the next morning ; I ſuppoſe all : I underſtood at leaſt all that choſe to come.

Q. What was done ?

A. They reported to the governor, that 93 were for the then practice, (that is, general Johnſton's inſtitutions) 41 were for the old regulations, and 6 appeared to be indifferent, and 4 wanted ſome alterations of their own.

Q. Which were the old ones ?

A. They never were in practice in the arraval of St. Phillip's ; but, upon all the enquiry, they could find that the king's regulation ſubſiſted about ſix months, and made great confuſion, but that the regulation of 1752 never obtained at all in the arraval of St. Phillip's.

Q. When was this reported, and dated ?

A. The 8th of September ; that was on a Sunday.

Q. What followed ? Was this reported to the governor ?

A. Yes ; but the governor was well informed of what had paſſed on the Sunday. Mr. Fabrigas came on the Monday morning with a new memorial, complaining that it was Sunday ; and he proteſted againſt what was done, and that Dr. Oliver, and the chief juſtice civil, had uſed threats and menaces to the people.

Q. Then the next memorial I have in my hand is Dr. Markadal and Dr. Oliver's ?

A. The governor was ſo exceedingly cautious in every thing, whether of conſequence or not, upon this nonſenſical memorial, that he ſubmitted every tranſaction to the people of the iſland. He ſent this report to Dr. Markadal and to Dr. Oliver, for them to anſwer. They anſwered it on the 10th.

Q. What followed the next day after that ?

A. I think it was the ſame day Fabrigas came for an anſwer, the 10th, which was Tueſday. He came to me to deſire an anſwer to his memorial about the Sunday affair. I was not at home. He enquired then for the governor's aid-de-camp, and gave him the memorial.

Q. Here is another of the 10th of September, of Dr. Franciſco Segui, and Dr. Markadal's.

A. Franciſco Segui is the advocate.

Q. That was an opinion of their's, as the lawyers of the iſland ?

A. I fancy that accompanied the anſwer to the articles ; I cannot be poſitive to dates. Returning home, I met Mr. Antonio Fabrigas immediately after he had been with the governor's aid-de-camp ; I think the 10th. I rather avoided having any thing to ſay to him : I had had ſo much, I was quite ſatisfied. He came to me. I called Segui, a prieſt, and got John Vedall, who ſerved for an interpreter, and who happened to be in the ſtreet, almoſt under the governor's wall. I deſired Mr. Fabrigas in the moſt civil manner I could, having done ſo fifty times before, to ſay what he wiſhed or wanted. If he would only point out what he wiſhed, it ſhould be done : I would undertake to anſwer, the governor meant to do any thing that he wanted ; but that he had acted in ſuch a manner hitherto, that no body knew how to pleaſe him. Mr. Vedall, who knew this matter, as every body in the iſland did, joined with me in deſiring him to go home and mind his family affairs. All his anſwer to me was, complaining of the enquiry being on a Sunday. I told him that it could not be altered. John Vedall joined with me in deſiring him to go home, and not bring miſchief upon himſelf. John Vedall told me, he ſaid he would come again the next day with one hundred and fifty people. I think it was under his interpretation, though I had the prieſt there ſome part of the time.

Q. from the Jury. Was it armed men ?——A. No, no.

Q. What did he ſay ?

A. He would come with one hundred and fifty men to back the petition, or whatever the word was, with a petition and one hundred and fifty men, or with a petition backed by one hundred and fifty men.

Q. from the Jury. What do you apprehend he meant by that expreſſion ?

A. Upon my word I catched at the expreſſion, and deſired John Vedall to deſire him to deſiſt from ſuch an idea ; which John Vedall did, and treated it as laughing : but if I underſtood any thing by it, it was not to come with guns, for they had no ſuch thing, but to come as a mob.

Q. from the Jury. Did he ſpeak Spaniſh or Engliſh at the time ?

A. Minorquin.

Q. What was the other interpreter's name ?

A. Segui, a prieſt, one of the Spaniſh prieſts : he was there the firſt part of the time, and John Vedall the latter part.

Court. And then in conſequence of that, you thought he meant a mob ?

A. Yes ; or I ſhould not have got John Vedall to enter into a long converſation to deſire him to deſiſt.

Q. What did he ſay upon that ?

A. He went on, I believe, repeating the ſame again. I believe the converſation was cloſed upon that.

Q. from the Jury. Has Allimundo, by virtue of his office of muſtaſtaph, any particular limited quantity of wine to ſell ?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. When the papers are read, that will be particularly ſpoke to.

Q. You informed the governor of what was ſaid about 150 men ?

A. Yes.

Q. What paſſed after that ?

A. I think on Wedneſday, the governor ſent his compliments to moſt of the officers of the corps, deſiring they would come to him the next morning, to ſee the honour that was to be done to him.

Q. Did they meet there ?

A. There were moſt of them there. Every one, I believe, expected a full meeting of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's.

Q. What meeting was That that was expected ?

A. Thoſe people Fabrigas had ſpoke of. They waited ſome time, and at laſt four people came, (I think all four were ſhoe-makers) and they brought a memorial. I believe a gentleman is in court that received it from their hands. He took the memorial of them, read it, and I think colonel Mackellar, after reading it, told them that they were to go about their buſineſs, to go home peaceably, and behave themſelves as good ſubjects to his majeſty ought to do. I think there was a converſation preceding, to ſhew they did not know the contents of that memorial they were delivering, which I believe will, by-and-by, come out. The general aſked the opinion of the general officers, as well as I recollect, whether they all knew that this was founded by Fabrigas's proceeding ? and the next day he aſked them what they underſtood by it ? They ſaid they underſtood that the man was to be baniſhed the iſland.

Q. You was not there when they gave their opinions, I believe ?

A. I cannot tell.

Q. And ſo, in conſequence of it, he was baniſhed the iſland ?

A. The general ordered him, in conſequence of that, to be taken up that night. He could not be found. The general ſent to the chief juſtice civil, and the chief juſtice criminal, and the advocate fiſcal, to know what he ſhould do in that caſe ; that he thought him not ſafe to be left at large in the iſland. They told him.

Q. from Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Was you preſent, or do you ſpeak from information ?

A. I am ſpeaking of what they told me : I was ſent by the governor to aſk their opinion. This is their anſwer.

Q. What was you to aſk of them ?

A. The governor's power upon this occaſion. They ſaid, the governor's power extended over the man, and he might do with him what he pleaſed ; and if he choſe to baniſh him, they would anſwer for it with their ears.

Q. Theſe gentlemen are themſelves Minorquins ?

A. Yes ; and both talk very good Engliſh.

Court. This anſwer you carried back to the general ?

A. Yes ; and they told it him vivâ voce. The chief juſtice civil, upon my having many doubts about it myſelf, and ſaying that it was not quite the idea of Engliſhmen, and that we had not any ſuch law in England, ſaid it over and over again. He gave me a piece of paper with his own hand, which he called a quotation from the law of that land, a royal order in the year 1500 and ſomething elſe ; a poſitive order from the then king of Spain, wherein the king ſays, that the opinion of the aſſeſſeur criminal is conſultative only ; that the governor may be guided or not by it, as he pleaſed ; but not ſo in civil caſes. Although the governor is abſolute in regard to the politics and œconomical government of the iſland, it is not improper, but very prudent, to take the advice of the aſſeſſeur criminal, as has been recommended by the king of Spain to the governor ; although it muſt be obſerved, that in theſe caſes the aſſeſſeur only gives his advice, and conſequently it is in the governor whether he will follow it or not, and is not deciſive, as in civil caſes. This man being a Minorquin, the governor wanted to know how he ſhould apprehend him, no officer of his knowing him. The aſſeſſeur criminal ſaid, that the officer that attended him as tipſtaff was an old fellow. Says the other, 'You ſhall have mine, who is a young able man :' and he was apprehended by the tipſtaff who walks before the aſſeſſeur civil every day of his life when he goes in or out of court.

Q. How long was he kept in priſon ?

A. I do not know ; the books will ſhew it.

Q. Was he put in the common and uſual priſon ?

A. There is no other priſon in the arraval of St. Phillip's, but where he was put, I believe.

Q. Why do they call it No. 1 ?---A. I do not know.

Court. It has been particularly deſcribed to me and to the jury as the priſon where capital offenders are confined, and is called No. 1 : why is it called No. 1, if there is not ſome other priſon ?

A. There are gentlemen better informed of the caſtle of St. Phillip's than I am. I believe there is no other priſon. That may be No. 1. room in the priſon.

Croſs-examined by Mr. Serjeant Glynn.

Q. I think you told us your reſidence in Minorca was about a year and a half : who was governor during the time of your reſidence ?

A. Upon our arrival there, the lieutenant-governor commanded ; and upon our arrival the command devolved upon general Moſtyn.

Q. Then the command immediately devolved upon him ?

A. Within two days, or ſo.

Q. And the other two days Mr. Johnſton, as his lieutenant, commanded ?

A. I believe the general came there on Monday, and took the command on Thurſday. Reports under general Johnſton's ſignature that the governor was arrived made it neceſſary.

Q. Then your experience of the laws of Minorca have been collected in that reſidence ?

A. That is all I know of them in the world.

Q. Which has been during the government of governor Moſtyn or his lieutenant. Now you told us, that the proclamation of the governor, with regard to the criminal court, was the ſame as a law ; and you diſtinguiſh the court of Property, which regards meum and tuum, from it ?

A. Quite.

Q. Do you mean that, without any limitation whatſoever ? Suppoſe the governor intended to inflict a capital puniſhment upon any offender, muſt that law be obeyed by the judges ?

A. I ſhould imagine it would. It is only my imagination, obſerve.

Q. I think you was ſo kind before as to tell us, that though that proclamation came out but the morning before, it would be equally obligatory upon the courts of juſtice ?——A. I underſtand ſo.

Q. Now this muſtaſtaph, Allimundo, ſells wine, does he not ?

A. He makes wine of his own vineyards, and buys grapes of other people to make wine, and ſells it in the arraval. He does not ſell it retail.

Q. That was a regulation of governor Johnſton's?---A. I believe ſo.

Q. I would aſk you, whether Allimundo had not a lot himſelf to ſell his wine, and exclude every other perſon?

A. I think, as the papers are upon the table, they will ſpeak for themſelves. I think Allimundo for his own vindication urges——

Q. But I aſk you, of your own knowledge, whether the lot did not fall upon him?

A. I believe he did not draw any lot at all; it is not the cuſtom for the muſtaſtaph to draw lots.

Q. You think he did not draw lots?—A. No.

Q. You did not underſtand the Minorquin language?---A. No.

Q. It is a mixture of Italian and Spaniſh?

A. Yes, I believe ſo, and a kind of bad Spaniſh.

Q. You have told us of the two interpreters: I think you don't recollect exactly the words the laſt interpreter ſaid? You think father Segui was gone before Fabrigas ſaid, 'I will come with a petition with 150 men, or backed by 150 men?'

A. I cannot be ſure; I think it was Vedall; and the more ſo, from his joining with me in endeavouring to perſuade him from his intention.

Q. I think you communicated this matter to the governor?---A. Yes.

Q. Did you carry Vedall with you?---A. No.

Q. Did you make any enquiry after the 150 people?---A. No.

Q. You yourſelf was the perſon that reported the converſation to the governor?---A. Yes.

Q. What time did you write this paper?

A. I fancy the memorandums of that paper were wrote, I ſhould think, I could not ſwear to it ſo particularly, I ſhould think, within an hour of every one of theſe tranſactions happening.

Q. Then I take it for granted, that this is a faithful copy of a faithful collection, according to your memory, within an hour and half after ſuch tranſaction?

A. It was not put down for the public eye, but to refreſh my own mind.

Q. Then you did not put down any thing which you did not believe to be true?

A. No; I ſhould not dream of ſuch a thing.

Q. How long after did you communicate to the governor what Fabrigas had ſaid?

A. I never was longer between communicating to Fabrigas what the governor ſaid, and to the governor what Fabrigas ſaid, than going from this wall to that; unleſs the governor was not arrived in the morning, and I waited his return.

Q. Then you could make no miſtake of what Fabrigas had ſaid. You communicated to the governor what you put down: you are ſure you are under no miſtake on that head?

A. I know I might miſtake.

Q. But I do not aſk you about any miſpelling or miſdates, but the effect of the converſation?

A. Upon my ſoul, I believe ſo.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Then, ſir, I will read it.——The ſame day Mr. Fabrigas came for an anſwer to his petition, and told the governor's ſecretary he ſhould come the next day with a petition of people concerned in grapes and vines, which they will ſign and come with themſelves, to the number of 150.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. I deſire it may be read; but I won't aſk Mr. Wright any more queſtions.——(It is read by the aſſociate.)

Mr. Peckham. Pray read the next paragraph.

On Wedneſday the 11*th, the governor, having the field-officers in and near* Mahon with him, received a memorial from four men, ſigned by perſons of St. Phillip's, deſiring the old practice might be purſued: to which he anſwered, that the four men ſhould return home, and behave themſelves as good and peaceable ſubjects to his majeſty ought to do.

Mr. Lee. Your lordſhip will give me leave to aſk upon this paragraph a queſtion of Mr. Wright. Q. You ſay there were four men came with a memorial ſigned by perſons of St. Phillip's, deſiring the old practice might be purſued: did you ſee that memorial?

A. I did.

Q. Can you take upon you to affirm by what number it was ſigned?

A. I ſhall ſpeak merely from memory, for they were all ſcratches: I do not believe there were ten names legible to it.

Q. What number of ſignatures were there upon this paper?

A. I have already ſaid I really and upon my word do not know.

Q. Were there nearer 150 or 100?

A. It is merely a matter of memory; there were from 41 to 47, I believe.

Q. Now can you take upon you to affirm, that there were not more people ſigned this memorial than had ſigned the memorial for the new inſtitution?

Court. I underſtand it is in the report. There is a report of the aſſeſſeur civil and Dr. Oliver, that 93 were for governor Johnſton's inſtitution, and 41 for the old regulation; 6 appeared to be indifferent, and 4 wanted ſome alterations of their own.

Q. There were 90 odd for the new inſtitution?

A. My memorandum ſays ſo.

Q. Can you tell me whether there were or were not upon this memorial which was brought by the four men, the ſignatures or requeſts of more or leſs than that number for the old inſtitution?

A. I have already ſaid ten times, that I cannot take upon me to aſcertain the number of ſignatures upon this laſt memorial; but I do know Allimundo proved many of them to be falſe.

Q. You know that is not an anſwer to my queſtion. I did not aſk you what were the number of men that ſigned this memorial: I don't mean you ſhould anſwer with that preciſion, whether 46, 50, or 150: but my queſtion is, whether you can take upon you to affirm at this diſtance of time, that the memorial which was brought by four men was ſigned by more or leſs than 90?

A. I can ſay no more: if I knew, I would tell you. I looked at the memorial, it was full of croſſes; and what makes me think it was between 40 and 50 was, becauſe I counted it.

Q. Then you did count it?---A. I did begin to count it.

Q. Did you proceed to count them through?

A. What ſignifies anſwering that?

Q. Becauſe I expect an anſwer. What ſignifies counting numbers, and not going through it?

A. I wiſh your head was capable of retaining every little circumſtance of no conſequence.

Court. The gentleman means, whether you have now ſuch a certain recollection of the number of ſignatures upon that paper as to ſay, whether there were more or leſs than 90?

A. I don't recollect any thing but one---that is, that I began counting ---any other circumſtances that ſhall lead me to the number, whether I left off at 40 or what.

Q. We underſtand that a conſiderable majority ſigned this very memorial---we want to know that fact?

A. Every attention was employed, every argument uſed, and every poſſible means was taken, for finding out the true ſenſe of the inhabitants; and amidſt the various methods taken, there did not appear, when enquired into fairly and honeſtly, to be one in ten of all the names that were preſented to the general in ſupport of Fabrigas's complaint. Mr. Allimundo was ſuppoſed to be a man that would produce the truth.--- The fort-major was ſent to examine with him.

Mr. Lee. The Serjeant will tell you, that is no evidence at all. Let me aſk you, when this particular paper was copied that I have in my hand?

A. As ſoon as I was at leiſure to do it myſelf.

Q. When was this particular paper copied?

A. I have ſaid half a dozen times, as ſoon as I had time to put all the bits of paper together---inſtantly.

Q. Was this paper copied from a memorial in which this number is ſtated blank as it is here, or have you that original memorial by you? ---In whoſe poſſeſſion was that memorial?

A. Not in mine.

Q. To whom was it given?---A. I think to colonel Mackellar.

Q. He was an officer of the governor's?

A. Commander in chief of the corps of engineers.

Q. So he had the poſſeſſion of that memorial, the contents of which you have ſtated by blank perſons?

A. All I can recollect of that particular memorial that you ſpeak to is this, that four people brought it; it is a hard thing to be pinned down to ſuch a thing as that. The muſtaſtaph himſelf was preſent. I think col. Mackellar was talking of this memorial: I think I had it out of his hand, and was going to read it, and count it. I believe he or Allimundo took it; and I believe Allimundo took it home to confute many of the names, which he did afterwards.

Q. And that you conceive to be the reaſon why you did not get through them, why you did not proceed to tell the number?

A. I ſhould believe ſo, upon my word and honour.

Q. You do ſtill take upon you to affirm that there was nothing like the number in this, that there were for the other regulation?

A. I did not attempt to ſay ſuch a thing.

Q. Upon the inſpection you then had, you cannot take upon you to affirm that?

A. I have told you all I know of it: I fancy there was much leſs.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. You was aſked about the lieut. governor being general Moſtyn's lieut. governor; I believe the governor does not appoint his own lieut. governor?—A. No.

Q. I believe thoſe regulations made by general Johnſton were ſome years before general Moſtyn was governor?

A. The date will ſhew it.

Q. I ſuppoſe about 52?—A. O no; ſince that.

Q. I meant 62?—A. I believe prior to the execution of the office of muſtaſtaph by Mr. Allimundo.

Q. Prior to the time Mr. Moſtyn was made governor?—A. Yes.

Q. You was aſked a good deal about that memorial that had theſe croſſes upon it: you ſaid Allimundo took it away with him in order to confute—— ——

A. I know he had it; I don't know whether he took it away.

Q. Had the governor any reaſon to apprehend that thoſe names at the bottom of that memorial were not put there by the perſons?

A. Yes, he had reaſon to believe it.

Q. Did he enquire into it?—A. Yes.

Q. What was the reſult of his enquiry?

A. The report made to him was, that a certain number of their names were abſolutely forged; that the hands of others were obtained under a ſuppoſition that the memorial related to oil.

Court. You ſaid juſt now, that upon a ſtrict enquiry there did not appear above one in ten; did you yourſelf make enquiry of what was the general ſenſe of the inhabitants?

A. To every body, and with every body that could poſſibly give me information; and from the general converſation I had, it did not appear to me that there was, I might ſay one in twenty that ever wiſhed it; and it would be worth your lordſhip's attention to ſee what theſe regulations are.

Court. Then by the general's direction you made the ſtricteſt enquiry you poſſibly could, to ſee what the ſenſe of the people might be, and did not find above one in ten that wiſhed for this alteration that Fabrigas deſired?

A. I, according to my own opinion, give a great allowance when I ſay that.

Q. Did you inform the governor of this?

A. When I uſe the word report, I don't mean an idle ſtory picked up from one or other, but a military term, an anſwer to the enquiries made by the governor.

Q. Then the intelligence you conveyed to the general was, that the opinion of by far the greater majority was againſt this Fabrigas's deſire?

A. All almoſt: I ſave my oath by ſaying almoſt, but there was almoſt all.

JOHN PLEYDEL. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Walker.

Q. You was aid-de-camp to general Moſtyn, I believe?—A. Yes.

Q. Upon the 9th of September 71, give an account of what you know of this affair when Fabrigas came to the governor's?

A. He aſked me to ſee the governor in the morning. I told him he could not then ſee the governor, but I was aid-de-camp to the governor, and any favour or any thing he had for the governor I was ready to receive. After a little heſitation he gave me a paper, a memorial: he deſired at the ſame time I would inform the governor that he ſhould come the next day for an anſwer; he ſaid he ſhould come accompanied by 200 or 250 of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's.

Q. Two hundred or 250?

A. I don't exactly remember the words.

Q. Was that all the converſation you had with him?

A. Yes. I immediately acquainted the governor with this meſſage: I read the memorial to the governor immediately, and informed the governor of what he had ſaid to me. I think it was that day the governor ſent to the field-officers of the garriſon and to the commanding officers of the corps, to meet at his houſe the next day, in order that they might be witneſſes of the manner in which he ſhould receive this Fabrigas and the people he mentioned to come along with him. Only four men came the next day, and brought a memorial.

Q. Were any of the commanding officers there?

A. Yes; I think all the commanding officers were there when theſe men came.

Q. What were the ſenſe of the commanding officers?

A. I think the ſenſe of the commanding officers was, that, in ſhort, this man ſhould be taken up.

Q. Why would they take him up?

A. As a troubleſome, ſeditious, and dangerous perſon in the iſland. The governor mentioned to me, that he had conſulted the chief Minorquin judges of the iſland. I know he had conſulted them, which corroborated the opinion of the field-officers that were there attending.

Q. Who is this Mr. Fabrigas?

A. An inhabitant of the arraval of St. Phillip's.

Q. Of that diſtrict that does not belong to the four where there are jurats?—A. Yes, and is cloſe by the glacis of the fort.

Q. What, has he there any property?

A. His father is alive; he takes care of his father's vineyards, I believe. That is all the property he has.

Q. That is, the liberty of working in his father's vineyard?

A. I believe ſo.

Q. What ſort of a character does he bear there?

A. He is generally ſuppoſed to be a ſeditious, turbulent man; that is the general character of the man. General Moſtyn is very far from being a tyrannical, overbearing man. I had more opportunity of knowing him; I ſerved immediately under him the greateſt part of the laſt war.

Q. A man of temper and humanity?—A. Yes, very much ſo.

Croſs-examination, by Mr. Lee.

Q. You was aid-de-camp to general Moſtyn?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember Fabrigas declaring that next day he would come accompanied with 250 men?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know whether there had not been a diſpute amongſt the inhabitants, and upon which ſide there was a majority, whether for the new or old regulations?—A. I cannot tell.

Q. What were theſe 250 men to come for?

A. I imagined it was to give weight to the petition.

Q. Do you conceive that the object of Mr. Fabrigas was to bring 200 or 250 men that were of his opinion to give weight to his requeſt?

A. Yes.

Q. My learned friend thought he meant to attack the garriſon of St. Phillip's. You did not apprehend he meant to take the garriſon of St. Phillip's, that ſtood out againſt the whole force of France for a conſiderable time, and, by the bye, might have ſtood out a great while longer? You did not underſtand that he was to come at the head of theſe armed peaſants?—A. Not of armed peaſants.

Court. You apprehend he was to bring theſe people to ſhew there were ſo many people to back his petition?

A. No; I apprehend he meant a mob that would breed confuſion in the garriſon.

Q. Whether you underſtood that he meant to bring theſe 200 people to occaſion and raiſe a tumult, or whether he meant to bring ſo many people to ſhew they favoured his petition?

A. So many people together in a garriſon would breed confuſion.

Court. What did you underſtand?

A. I really thought he meant to give weight to his petition.

Q. Had you heard at the time that Fabrigas ſpoke of bringing 200 or 250 of his friends—had you heard of any diſpute, whether there were more of one opinion, or more of the other; or had it been aſſerted that the people in general of the arraval of St. Philip's were conſenting to the new regulations?

A. I think the people in general wiſhed to have the old regulation continued—I took it in that light.

Q. What do you mean by the old cuſtom? the cuſtom Fabrigas contended for, under the order of council in 52?—A. Yes.

Q. I dare ſay the Serjeant will not acknowledge that you mean that?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. No more he does.

Court. Do you mean by the old cuſtom, that which was ſettled by governor Johnſton?

A. I do; it was ſome years before general Moſtyn came to the iſland.

Court. Or do you mean a cuſtom that was before the order of 52?

A. I do not.

Mr. Lee. Then am I to underſtand you, that you think the majority of people were againſt the opinion of Mr. Fabrigas?

A. That is my opinion.

Q. Do you recollect that having been alledged to governor Moſtyn as the general opinion?---A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect that having been alledged to Fabrigas, that the popular opinion was againſt him?—A. I don't exactly recollect.

Q. Don't you recollect that the very end he had in view, and profeſſed to have in view, in bringing a number of his friends and a number of people concerned in vineyards to preſent this memorial, was for the purpoſe of convincing the general that a majority of people were with him, and not againſt him?

A. I ſuppoſe he muſt mean ſo.

Q. Did not you underſtand him ſo at that time, when he talked of bringing a memorial, and coming accompanied by 200 or 250 men? Did not you underſtand him to mean that ſuch a number of people that were concerned in the wine trade and in the produce of vineyards would come and ſignify that to be their intention?---A. Certainly he meant ſo.

Q. Was you preſent when the four men, not the 200 or 250, came with the memorial ſigned by others?—A. I was.

Q. Was that memorial ever in your hands?

A. I don't remember ever having it in my hands. I ſaw it in colonel Mackellar's hand, the chief engineer, when he queſtioned them about it; and theſe very people ſeemed ſhocked when he explained to them the tenor of the memorial. It was wrote in Engliſh, and they ſeemed not to underſtand the import of it.

Q. They were Minorquins?—A. Yes.

Q. Can you tell me what number of ſignatures were in that memorial?

A. I cannot gueſs at it: I ſhould think much about 50 or 60, but cannot gueſs.

Q. You did not count them at all?—A. No.

ROBERT HUDSON. Examined by Mr. Buller.

Q. You was, I believe, fort-adjutant at this time?---A. Yes.

Q. Was any application made to you by the civil magiſtrates?

A. Yes; the muſtaſtaph of St. Phillip's came to me on the 10th or 11th of September, and told me, upon reading ſome orders of general Moſtyn, that Fabrigas ſaid he would come with a mob, and ſaid they were null and void, and they would ſee better days to-morrow.

Mr. Peckham. You need not mention what the muſtaſtaph told you; that is not regular.

Counſel for Defendant. That is the regular method there.

Mr. Peckham. It may be regular there, but it is very irregular here, and cannot be admitted as evidence.

Mr. Juſtice Gould. I ſhould be glad to know how the governor can be apprized of any danger, unleſs it is by one or other of his officers informing him there is likely to be ſuch and ſuch a thing happen? I ſuppoſe he gives the governor an account of what he has heard, then the governor makes an enquiry into the matter.

Mr. Peckham. Hearſay is no evidence. Beſides, the muſtaſtaph is an intereſted and a prejudiced perſon; at leaſt he appears ſo throughout the different parts of this cauſe. Now can what he has ſaid in Minorca to this witneſs be admitted as evidence here? The muſtaſtaph is living; why don't they produce him? If they had brought him here, we ſhould have his evidence on oath, and could croſs-examine him to the facts.

Court. We do not take it for granted that it is really ſo; only that this gentleman, hearing of this, tells the governor.

Mr. Lee. It is no evidence of the fact: if you mean it only as a report, we do not object to it.

A. The muſtaſtaph told me, that upon giving out ſome orders to the inhabitants of St. Phillip's, ſome orders relative to the ſelling wine in St. Phillip's, he came with a mob, and ſaid, 'It is null and void, and we will ſee better things to-morrow.' He further ſaid, that if there were not ſome immediate meaſures taken with this Fabrigas, he was afraid of the conſequence, the riſing of the people.

Q. This was enough, I ſhould think, to give an alarm. Did you acquaint the governor of it?---A. Yes, I did.

Q. What was done after that? Did the governor call you together?

A. I was not privy to what the governor did in conſequence of this; my poſt was two miles off.

Court. Gentlemen of the jury, then all this comes to nothing; he proves no fact---

Mr. Serjeant Davy. No: this is to introduce the next evidence, of the governor ſummoning the officers together.

Q. You knew this Fabrigas; what was his behaviour in the iſland?

A. Extremely troubleſome, as was repreſented to me: there never was any objection to governor Johnſton's regulation till by this man. Governor Johnſton did this, becauſe the wine uſed to turn four, by every body being allowed to ſell wine at a time: they diſtreſſed one another by opening too many caſks at a time. The general made this regulation, in order that no more might be opened at a time than could be ſold before it was four.

Court. I choſe to hear the reaſon and foundation of the regulation.

Q. What is the conſequence of that among the ſoldiers?

A. Diſorders of different kinds, fluxes and the like.

Court. There being no cellars, I ſuppoſe they could only buy from hand to mouth.

A. In general they are open ſheds; they are hardly better than ſheds.

Q. Did that produce any diſagreements among the ſellers themſelves, that they underſold each other?

A. Some poor people, that had but little wine, were almoſt ſtarved: the ſeveral years after governor Johnſton made this regulation, there never was known to be a caſk ſour.

Court. I was rather apprehenſive that this might enhance the price.

A. The price was never raiſed upon that account.

Mr. Buller. There was an afforation price.

Mr. Lee. Yes; but this was a liberty of ſelling below it.

A. The town of St. Phillip's was divided into four diviſions, and four people uſed to ſell at a time.

Colonel PATRICK MACKELLAR. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Davy.

Q. Was you at the garriſon in Minorca in 71?---A. Yes.

Q. Did you know Mr. Fabrigas before the time of his being apprehended?

A. I have known him by character a great while; they called him Red Toney.

Q. You happened to ſay you knew him by character; what was the character he bore?

A. A very bad one ever ſince I have been in the iſland, and for ſome time before.

Q. Of what ſort?

A. He was ſeditious, troubleſome; a drinking, gambling fellow; ſat up of nights with low-life people; and he kept women.

Q. In ſhort, he is a man of an ordinary character?---A. Yes.

Q. But the character that I wanted chiefly to be informed about was, concerning his obedience to government, whether he is a turbulent man?

A. I have had many complaints of him from two muſtaſtaphs, when I have been commanding officer of the gariſon.

Q. How long have you been there?

A. I was one of the firſt that went there when the iſland was reſtored after the laſt war, and had been there a good many years before. I went firſt in 36, and left it in 50. I went in May 63, and remained there till May laſt.

Q. Then you muſt be pretty well acquainted with the laws, and government, and conſtitution of this country?

A. I have a good deal of knowledge of it, as much as a military man can have: we cannot ſtudy theſe things as lawyers do.

Q. Pray is there not a diſtrict they call by the name of the arraval of St. Phillip's?---A. Yes.

Q. How far is that?---A. It is incloſed by a line wall on one ſide, and ſurrounded by water on the other.

Q. Pretty near to the fort?---A. Within a muſket-ſhot.

Q. This diſtrict within this line is called the arraval of St. Phillip's?

A. Yes.

Q. What do you mean by the word royalty?

A. It is where the governor has a greater power than any where elſe; where the judges of the iſland cannot interpoſe their authority or power, but by his permiſſion; and people of the arraval have particular privileges upon that account. The judges cannot convene any perſon to appear before them, but by the governor's approbation, within the arraval.

Q. It is not ſo in the other parts of the iſland?---A. No.

Q. You have, I believe, in the other parts of the iſland, officers called jurats?---A. Yes.

Q. Is there any ſuch in the arraval?

A. No; the muſtaſtaph is the only magiſtrate there.

Q. Then there is an officer within this royalty, within this arraval, called a muſtaſtaph, who is the only magiſtrate there?---A. Yes.

Q. In other parts of the iſland there are other magiſtrates of different names, jurats and ſo forth?---A. Yes.

Q. Who is the muſtaſtaph of the arraval of St. Phillip's appointed by?

A. The governor, or commander in chief, when there is no governor.

Q. Does he diſplace him at his pleaſure?---A. Yes.

Q. What is the office of muſtaſtaph?

A. He takes care of the weights and meaſures of markets; takes an account of all the wine that is made, and of the expenditure of the wine; and ſettles any little diſputes among the inhabitants, in what they call the firſt inſtance.

Q. What, is that with regard to the afforation, or ſettling of the price of the wine?

A. That is done by the magiſtrates at Mahon. The magiſtrates of Mahon, as they do every where elſe, ſet a price upon the wine, which they call an afforation or market price, and the arraval of St. Phillip's is always ruled by the afforation at Mahon; the magiſtrates at Mahon do not put the price upon it, but it is always adopted.

Q. Who is the officer that in point of form ſettles the afforation price?

A. There are different prices in different terminos, but that is governed by the price that is fixed at Mahon. Mahon is the neareſt diſtrict to St. Phillip's?

Q. Who is the perſon that in point of form does ſo adopt it?

A. The muſtaſtaph is the officer that does, and he only ſignifies what the price is.

Q. He is the trumpet, the mouth by which they underſtand what is the afforation price, he being regulated and governed by the afforation at Mahon?

A. Yes; the price that is paid at Mahon is always paid at St. Phillip's.

Q. What is the general law? Are the Minorquins governed by the Engliſh or Spaniſh law, or what ſort?

A. They always plead the Spaniſh laws, as it was ſettled by the treaty of Utrecht; but when the Engliſh laws are convenient for them, they plead them.

Q. So that which is convenient they will plead, thoſe that are moſt ſuitable?——A. Yes.

Q. But which is the law that moſt prevails?

A. The Spaniſh law. When the iſland was given up, I believe nothing at all was ſettled with relation to them, and therefore we were ſuppoſed to receive them upon the ſame footing that the French had them; but ſince that time they made intereſt at home to reſtore to them the ſame laws and privileges that took place before the iſland was taken, that is, the Spaniſh laws.

Q. Was you there when the place was taken by the French?

A. No; I was in America.

Q. Pray what is the temper of the Minorquins in general? Are they well affected to the Engliſh government?

A. Some are very well, I believe; others are not ſo.

Q. Pray do you remember the occaſion?—was you one of thoſe that were invited to meet governor Moſtyn, with the other gentlemen, upon the occaſion of being conſulted about Mr. Fabrigas?

A. I was, once or twice.

Q. Had you been acquainted that it was a matter of public notoriety of what had happened with regard to Fabrigas?

A. I have been at the preſenting ſeveral memorials to the governor.

Q. Did you hear of the report of what had prevailed, the general talk of the place?—A. Yes.

Q. What was the univerſal opinion, if there was but one? or if there were various opinions, what was the opinion of you and the reſt of the gentlemen that were called in?

A. The opinion of the other gentlemen as well as my own was, that he was a very dangerous and troubleſome man. By his former hiſtory, and from ſome anecdotes of thoſe times, it was thought a very unſafe thing to let him be at liberty; that it would be a right thing to take him up, and bring him to puniſhment, leſt he, who was a man very likely to be practiſed upon, would take other meaſures productive of miſchief.

Q. What was agreed upon?

A. It was in looſe converſation thought beſt that he ſhould be baniſhed.

Q. According to the practice of former times, do you remember a practice of that kind having been done?

A. I have heard of ſeveral; when the Engliſh were in poſſeſſion of the iſland, as well as when the Spaniards were.

Mr. Lee. This is proving a preſcription.

A. I tell you what I have heard.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. It is impoſſible that it can be admitted: if he had known an inſtance, he might have mentioned it.

Court. It is one queſtion, whether, according to the exigence of the caſe, the general might inflict this baniſhment? and another thing, whether it is the ordained law eſtabliſhed in ſuch a caſe to be applied to ſuch behaviour? Now, if you go into a uſage of that kind, you muſt prove particular facts, not produce this gentleman to ſay he has heard ſuch things: it does not follow from hence that this might be the proper puniſhment.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. You have known general Moſtyn, I believe, a great while?

A. Only ſince he became governor of the iſland.

Q. I wiſh to know of you, what is his character and behaviour?

A. I always heard a character of him as a good officer, a polite, well-bred man, that carried his command in the genteeleſt manner.

Q. Is he a man of humanity, or rather ferocity?

A. I always underſtood him to be a man of great humanity.

Croſs-examined by Mr. Lee.

Q. You ſay the general opinion of the field-officers was aſked, of which you are one?

A. I do not believe the general opinion was aſked; I believe it was private converſation.

Q. Did general Moſtyn then call for your opinion, or the opinion of any other general officer, touching what he ſhould do to Fabrigas?

A. Afterwards we thought upon the ſubject.

Q. After the man was gone to Carthagena?

A. The ſame day, perhaps an hour.

Q. The ſame day you was aſſembled there?—A. Yes.

Q. The day that Fabrigas had ſpoken of aſſembling a number of his friends together, the general ſent to convene a body of you?—A. Yes.

Court. You was a field-officer?—A. Yes.

Court. Did you and the other field-officers meet together at the governor's?—A. We came there by his order, by his deſire.

Q. He propoſed to you then for your opinion, what ſhould be done with this man; and you, partly from the former hiſtory, and partly from modern anecdotes, thought he ſhould be baniſhed?

A. Yes, I did ſo.

Q. That was the ground of the accuſation; former hiſtory, and late anecdotes?---A. Yes.

Court. I ſhall certainly hear his evidence, if you aſk him the motives and grounds.

Mr. Lee. I only aſk whether I had taken it right.

Court. Did not you object to enquiring into former inſtances of baniſhment?

Mr. Lee. No; he has ſpoke of former inſtances of bad conduct in Fabrigas.

Q. Did any of you propoſe to the general, or did he propoſe himſelf, to have any trial of this gentleman before his baniſhment?

A. I believe he never did propoſe that; for the judges there gave it as their opinion, that that was lodged entirely in the governor's own breaſt; two of them particularly, that it was entirely in his own breaſt.

Q. And needs no trial at all?

A. I do not know that there was any form of trial there.

Q. You heard of no trial?

A. I heard no trial mentioned.

Q. You tell me the opinion of the field-officers was this?

A. Yes.

Q. As I don't know exactly who all the field-officers were, and as I wiſh to deliver as many of them as I could from the imputation of that opinion, pray did major Norton concur in that opinion?

A. I do not remember particularly whether he did or not.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. That is, whether he was there or not?

A. He was there, but I do not remember what his opinion was upon the occaſion.

Q. Then you cannot take upon you to ſay whether it was a majority of opinion, or unanimity of opinion?

A. A majority of opinion. I believe there might be a difference of opinion.

Q. Do you know a colonel or a major Rigby—I do not know what rank?——A. Major.

Q. Was he there?——A. Yes.

Q. Did he concur in that advice to the governor?

A. Both the gentlemen are here, and can tell. We were talking among one another; our opinion was in general.

Q. Thoſe that choſe to give an opinion in favour of baniſhment gave it, and thoſe of another opinion either might give it or were ſilent?

A. It was not talking of giving an opinion, but talking of the man's caſe, and what ought to be done.

Q. Then you cannot tell what number diſſented?---A. No.

Court. Were there any of the field-officers preſent that did diſſent to it?

A. I do not remember that any did indeed.

EDWARD BLAKENEY. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Burland.

Q. I believe you officiated as ſecretary to general Blakeney?

A. Yes; I was there about ſeven years.

Q. What ſort of power does the governor exerciſe in the arraval of St. Phillip's?

A. There is no writ; nothing can be executed there without his commiſſion.

Q. What authority does he execute there?

A. An abſolute authority; it is a royalty.

Q. Have you known any inſtance of people being ſent out of the arraval?

A. A few months after general Blakeney's arrival, he baniſhed two Franciſcan friars immediately by his own authority.

Q. Where did he ſend them to?

A. To the continent.

Court. Into Spain?

A. I cannot tell whether to Spain or Italy?

Q. from Jury. Was it in peace or war this happened?

A. In peace time. They found the way to Rome, and complained to the general of the Franciſcan order, who correſponded with the general upon the ſubject. Several letters paſſed; and general Blakeney wrote in one of his letters, if they did not behave better for the future, he ſaid he would baniſh all the Franciſcans out of the iſland, and make barracks of their convent. Interceſſion was made for them: they aſked pardon for the offence they had committed, and upon a promiſe of behaving well they were allowed to come back.

Q. Did you ever hear that the power of the governor upon that or a like occaſion was ever called in queſtion in the iſland?

A. No; I took it for granted it was handed down by the Spaniſh governor, and they were governed by Spaniſh laws.

Q. Are they governed by Spaniſh laws?---A. Yes.

Q. We are told the arraval is a diſtinct juriſdiction from the reſt of the iſland, and there is more authority exerciſed by the governor?

A. Yes; it is within gun-ſhot of the fort. The judges have applied to me to obtain leave for them to execute writs in the arraval.

Q. I don't know whether you remember any other inſtances of baniſhment but theſe two you have mentioned?

A. I remember an inſtance of a prieſt. I will tell you ſhortly: the caſe was this. Four regiments were ſent out by the late king, to relieve four regiments that had been a long time then in the garriſon. The governor received orders to ſend home every creature belonging to the four regiments then there: they had been many years in the iſland. A report had been made to him, that a daughter of one of the military people was miſſing. An enquiry was made: ſhe was proved to be laſt in the poſſeſſion of a prieſt. The prieſt was called upon; he denied knowing any thing about her, or of her. He was brought before the governor; he gave bail of two people; (this was a military affair entirely) and next day he was deſired to produce her. He did not. The governor embarked him directly, and ſent him on board, I believe, in the very tranſport that was to carry this young woman away. The fleet ſailed to Gibraltar; and application was made immediately to the governor by the magiſtrates of Mahon, and by the religious order, begging the governor to forgive him, and ſtay the ſhip, and, if the governor would give leave, to put the girl on board, and bring back the priſoner. They begged, and petitioned, and prayed the governor. Upon that the girl was delivered up, brought from the vicar-general, who lived at a remote end of the iſland. She was brought to me. The ſtory ſhe told me was, that the vicar-general had, out of charity and compaſſion, taken care of her. She was a very pretty girl. She was put on board the tranſport, and ſent after the fleet, and the prieſt was brought back, and there were great rejoicings upon his arrival.

Mr. Lee. You know how little material that is.

Q. In what office was you in this place?

A. Secretary to the governor and commander in chief by the king's commiſſion.

Q. When did you go firſt?—A. In the year 48.

Q. You was in Minorca, I fancy, when a poſitive order came from England, that if any friar of the Franciſcan order, not a native of the iſland, ſhould come into that iſland, he ſhould not be ſuffered to remain upon it?—Do you know of any ſuch order in the firſt place?

A. Be ſo good as to repeat the order.

Q. 'That in caſe any friar of the Franciſcan order, not being a native 'of Minorca, but an itinerant friar, ſhall come into the iſland, he ſhall 'not be permitted to take his reſidence there, &c.' You don't recollect any thing of this, or that it was in obedience to the order of council that this Franciſcan was ſent away? So you forget this, though it happens unfortunately when the governor obeys the order of his ſuperior, that is now to be quoted, as a precedent of his own regal authority?

Q. What was the prieſt?—A. A native of Minorca.

Q. And the friar?—A. I underſtood them to be Minorquins.

Q. Can you be poſitive about that?

A. I do believe that as a certainty and a fact: I am morally certain of it; I was not preſent at their birth or regiſtry.

Q. It ſeems that you have forgot even that ſuch an order exiſted, till I reminded you?

A. I am not clear that I remembered ſuch an order exiſted; I have been over a great deal of ground ſince.

Q. Was it the nature of your office to acquaint you with all the orders of the council of England?

A. It came through my hands, yet very likely and probably I forgot it.

Q. But you might not have forgot it at the time the friars were ordered away?

Mr. Lee. This was in 53.

A. That is long ſubſequent: the affair of the friar was in 48 or 49.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. Then you admit that the king has a right to make ſuch orders?

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. No; the council may make ſuch orders, but we do not admit them to be legal.

Court. The caſe of the prieſt was ſome years after the caſe of the two friars?

A. Not a great while; about a year I believe, ſome ſuch time: it is a great many years ago; I cannot be poſitive to a few months.

Captain JAMES SOLAIRE. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Walker.

Q. I think you are a native of Minorca?—A. I am.

Q. You know Mr. Fabrigas?

A. Not very particularly.

Q. I thought you had known him at fort St. Phillip's?

A. I know he is an inhabitant of that place.

Q. You have ſeen him there?—A. Several times.

Q. What ſort of a temper and diſpoſition has he?

A. I cannot anſwer very particularly.

Q. Do you know any thing of his general character?

A. No; I do not.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. I have a very long and reſpectable liſt of perſons here to ſpeak to the character of general Moſtyn, and his general behaviour: I ſuppoſe the gentlemen on the other ſide don't diſpute the general character which has been given of him.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. I ſhall not make the leaſt attempt to aſperſe general Moſtyn's character; I ſhall found myſelf upon the facts.

RAPHAEL PRATO. Examined by Mr. Buller.

(He not ſpeaking Engliſh, an interpreter was ſworn.)

Q. Do you know Mr. Fabrigas the plaintiff?—A. Yes.

Q. What character has he borne for ſome years paſt in the iſland of Minorca? Is he a peaceable man, or what?

A. A troubleſome man, that meddles too much with affairs.

Q. What affairs do you mean?—A. With the government.

Court. The queſtion is, whether upon the facts and circumſtances of the tranſaction itſelf, the general was juſtified in what he did; otherwiſe they may empty the iſland?

Mr. Lee. Yes, this iſland of all the people.

Q. to Mr. Wright. You delivered in theſe different memorials and papers: all that you delivered in, are they genuine papers or copies of papers that were preſented in Minorca?

A. All, except the laſt, which was delivered to the general's aid-de-camp, were delivered to me; that is endorſed on the back——Reads—

"To his excellency general Moſtyn, governor and commander in chief of the iſland of Minorca, &c. &c. the humble petition of Antonio Fabrigas, a native and inhabitant of St. Phillip's in the ſaid iſland, ſheweth, that your petitioner has now by him 12 caſks of wine, the produce of his own vineyard, without having purchaſed ſo much as a grape of any other perſon, of which he has not ſold a drop, when ſeveral other inhabitants of the ſaid town have ſold all theirs, as well of the produce of their own vineyards, as that proceeding from what they bought to make a profit by; and this with the permit of Mr. Allimundo, who does the function of muſtaſtaph. That the petitioner, on the 25th of July, applied to the ſaid Allimundo for meaſures to ſell wine by the rate of two doublers leſs than the current price, which would have raiſed a benefit to the troops and poor inhabitants of St. Phillip's; but notwithſtanding this demand was very reaſonable, and conformable to the expreſs condition of the firſt of his majeſty's regulation of the 17th of May 52, regarding this iſland, where it is expreſsly mentioned that the inhabitants of this iſland ſhall always be permitted to ſell at the price of the afforation or under it, Mr. Allimundo refuſed your petitioner, telling him he ſhould not ſell his ſaid wine. And as this is not only againſt the reaſon and juſtice of the public, and the garriſon of St. Phillip, but alſo contrary to his majeſty's order in the ſaid regulation, where it is mentioned that the inhabitants may ſell their wines whenever they pleaſe without any permit, under the afforation-price in the iſland; therefore he prays your excellency will be pleaſed to order Mr. Allimundo to be more regular in this (for he has made above fifty caſks of wine himſelf, of grapes he bought to make a profit by, of which he ſold more than the half, in prejudice of thoſe perſons who have old and new wine by them), and to give your petitioner the correct and juſt meaſures at the aforeſaid rate of two doublers.'

Court. There is no date to this petition, I obſerve?—A. No.

Mr. Lloyd. It is marked on the back, 'delivered the 31ſt July, 71.'

The next is incloſed in the anſwer of the muſtaſtaph's reply to Fabrigas the 7th of Auguſt, 71. 'To his excellency lieutenant-general Moſtyn, governor and commander in chief of the iſland of Minorca, the humble petition of the under-written inhabitants of the ſuburbs of St. Phillip's, ſhews, that during the government of his excellency lieutenant-governor Johnſton, on account of ſome complaints that were made concerning the direction, and ſelling wine, a regulation was made in the following manner: that the ſuburbs of St. Phillip's ſhall be divided into four wards; that the people ſhall draw lots; that they who ſhall come out ſhall have the liberty to ſell their own wine, the accidents of the caſks, and the preference of the poor helpleſs people being intirely under the direction of the muſtaſtaph. That regulation was accepted by the inhabitants of the ſuburbs, and they are glad of its continuance as it is obſerved to this day. They have heard that ſome of the inhabitants are intending to deſtroy the aforeſaid regulation, in order that every one might ſell their wine at the place they pleaſe, without dividing the wards. This will be not only the total ruin of the inhabitants, but it will alſo make them careleſs in the culture of their lands, and leſs careful in making their wines, and conſequently there will be very little wine of a good quality; therefore your petitioners humbly crave your excellency to be ſo good as to caſt an eye of pity upon them, in not permitting that ſuch a good regulation ſhould be ever altered: and as in duty bound ſhall ever pray.' Signed by 58.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Are they marks or names?

A. Moſt of them marks.

Directed to lieutenant-general Moſtyn.

'The humble petition of Antonio Allimundo, muſtaſtaph of St. Phillip's, ſheweth, that your excellency deſiring to be informed about a petition made by Anthony Fabrigas of St. Phillip's, relating to the ſelling of wine, ſays, that formerly the ſelling of the wine of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's was under the direction of the muſtaſtaph of that ſuburb; but as ſeveral diſputes and difficulties aroſe from this, his excellency lieutenant-governor Johnſton found it proper to make a regulation for the ſelling of the wine, which was accepted with an entire ſatisfaction by all the inhabitants of St. Phillip's, and by them practiſed to this day. At the time I had the honour to be made muſtaſtaph of that ſuburb, the aforeſaid regulation was in its full force and execution, and the ſaid lieutenant-governor charged me particularly to have it carefully obſerved. In conſequence of this, the ſaid Anthony Fabrigas having applied to me a few days ago for the meaſures to ſell his own wine two doublers cheaper than the common price, I thought it was impoſſible to grant it to him without forfeiting the duty of my employ, becauſe his demand was contrary to the ſaid regulation, by which the inhabitants of that ſuburb are permitted to ſell their wine only by turns, after they have drawn lots; for which reaſon your petitioner told the ſaid Fabrigas, that he could not ſell his wine; intending to ſay, by this, that he could not ſell it in the manner he had propoſed, that is to ſay, without drawing lots, it being inconſiſtent with the ſaid regulation; thinking it was his duty to have it obſerved till ſuch time as your excellency ordered him to the contrary. In the former petition he had the honour to preſent your excellency, he thinks to have the ſame privileges with other inhabitants of St. Phillip's, that is, to buy grapes, to make wine, and ſell it; and beſides, ſeeing that his predeceſſors ſold this wine when they pleaſed, notwithſtanding the ſaid regulation, he thought that the muſtaſtaph of St. Phillip's was not included in it; in which caſe your petitioner did not think it was proper to prejudice his rights, or thoſe of his ſucceſſors, unleſs your excellency ordered him to the contrary; but to comply with the inhabitants of that ſuburb, that they might be ſatisfied, your petitioner always impoſed a rule upon himſelf to ſell his wine at different times, and ſometimes by the groſs, inſomuch that moſt of the inhabitants of that ſuburb have ſold the half of their wine, whilſt your petitioner has not yet ſold a third part of his. If Anthony Fabrigas, or his father, ſays, that he will not ſell his wine under the common price, and that he has ſold none of it as yet, the former having none to ſell, the reaſon is only becauſe his turn did not come at the time when the lots were drawn, to which all the reſt of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's are agreed; but his wine will be ſold when his time ſhall come.'

'The humble petition of Anthony Fabrigas. On the 31ſt of July 71, the petitioner had the honour to preſent a memorial to your excellency, ſhewing the tranſgreſſion and non-obſervance in the ſaid town of two regulations given on the 8th of May 52, by his Britannic majeſty, &c. &c. viz. that any native or inhabitant of this iſland ſhall be permitted to ſell his fruits at the fixed price of the afforation, without any perſon's authority: ſecondly, that no commander, judge, nor officer, directly or indirectly, for himſelf nor through any other perſons, ſhall be allowed to have any concern in any traffic, bargain, or commerce whatſoever: your petitioner having likewiſe repreſented to your excellency that Antonio Allimundo, who does the function of muſtaſtaph in St. Phillip's, has bought grapes to make, as he really made afterwards, 50 caſks of wine, of which he ſold more than one half, in prejudice of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's, who have the old wine by them; and that your petitioner wanted to enjoy the liberties granted to him in the ſaid regulations, offering to ſell to the inhabitants and garriſon of St. Phillip's, 12 caſks of wine he has by him of his own produce, at two doublers leſs than the ordinary afforation or fixed price, &c.: yeſterday, the 12th of Auguſt, your excellency's ſecretary told your petitioner verbally, &c. at which your petitioner was greatly ſurprized; as he is ready to prove judicially, before any one of his majeſty's judges of this iſland that your excellency may think proper to appoint, all that he has ſaid in his laſt and this preſent propoſal; in which caſe, &c. being ſure from the juſtice he has in his favour, and from your excellency's good adminiſtration to adminiſter it, prays your excellency will be pleaſed to give his decree at the foot of this memorial to your petitioner. He hopes thereby to be at liberty to ſell his wines at two doublers leſs than the afforation ſet by the muſtaſtaph of St. Phillip's, &c. and that the muſtaſtaph has acted unbecoming the office he exerciſes of muſtaſtaph of St. Phillip's; which being evidently proved, will undoubtedly oblige your excellency to give the neceſſary orders for the relief and better advantage of the inhabitants and garriſon of St. Phillip's.'

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. May it pleaſe your lordſhip, and you gentlemen of the jury, to favour me in this cauſe by way of reply. Conſidering the length of time that has been ſpent already in this cauſe, I ſhould aſk your pardon and indulgence for adding more than I could wiſh to the time that you have already ſpent, in anſwer to thoſe arguments that have been uſed in behalf of the defendant, and in ſubmitting to you ſuch obſervations as occur to me. For, gentlemen, the cauſe, as I conceive, having already wandered very far from its true merits, and being perplexed with matters very foreign to the queſtion, it is incumbent upon me to make ſuch an attempt as my powers will enable me to do, to recal your attention to the real and true queſtion in this cauſe.

The queſtion, gentlemen, is ſhortly ſtated; the diſcuſſion of it, however, requires ſome time.----The queſtion is merely what ſatisfaction and reparation Mr. Fabrigas, a ſubject of Great Britain, as much as any man even born in the city of London, has a right to demand for the treatment he has received. He is a native of the iſland of Minorca, born in the Britannic dominions; and his lordſhip will tell you that every perſon that is ſo born is a free-born citizen of Great Britain, intitled to all its liberties and privileges.

The queſtion therefore is, how a man thus circumſtanced is intitled to have his caſe conſidered by an Engliſh jury, and what ſatisfaction you ſhall think due to him for ſuch kind of treatment as he has undergone; ſuch tortures of the moſt ſtudied, and the moſt perplexing and excruciating kind, (if you take into conſideration the feelings of a man's mind, as well as his corporal ſufferings) as have by the wantonneſs of power been inflicted upon him.

Gentlemen, in the diſcuſſion of this queſtion, I ſhall now barely mention to you one topic upon which a great deal of your time has been taken, and which I mention merely for the purpoſe of clearing the cauſe of it, and diſmiſſing it totally from your conſideration; and that is, what reſpects the character of Mr. Moſtyn the defendant. You are told of the high and reſpectable names of great men that have given their attendance here to countenance that character which you are told Mr. Moſtyn indiſputably poſſeſſes. My anſwer to it is, that if he had brought the privy-council, if he had come with teſtimonials in his hands from the two houſes of parliament, it would not have varied the conſideration of this cauſe. The queſtion here is wide of all conſideration of character: you muſt decide it upon the facts which appear before you in evidence, and from them you muſt judge of the merits of this cauſe. The motives of Mr. Moſtyn's conduct, and every circumſtance that is material or relative to that queſtion, you are to decide upon; and beyond that, gentlemen, it is neither my deſire nor my duty, it is far from my province, and far from my inclination, to attempt throwing any kind of calumny or aſperſion. Let Mr. Moſtyn, with all my heart, if he can, reconcile that conduct that has appeared before you to ſuch a character, to that verdict which I am confident you muſt pronounce upon this cauſe. Let Mr. Moſtyn enjoy the eſteem of his great and noble friends; I have no deſire to deprive him of it: I have however a zeal for the juſtice of this country, that goes ſomething beyond the mere line and duty of an advocate,---I owe it to humanity,---I think it is a queſtion of humanity, not depending upon the particular laws of any country: but it is a queſtion highly affecting the honour of the Britiſh nation, and a queſtion that will throw diſgrace upon our laws, our conſtitution, and the humanity of our judicature, if this man ſhould be ſent back into the iſland of Minorca with his wrongs unredreſſed, and an accumulation of expences upon him.

I own therefore, gentlemen, upon theſe grounds and theſe conſiderations I feel a warmth and a zeal in this cauſe, which I hope will juſtify me for the pains that I mean to take, if my ſtrength will ſupport me in it, in laying before you what I conceive neceſſary for your conſideration. I have ſaid, that I mean to deprive general Moſtyn of nothing that is not neceſſary to the reparation of the wrongs of this much-injured plaintiff; that he ſhall enjoy his good name and his character as far as my duty will permit him to enjoy them; I ſhall make no obſervations upon him but what ariſe from the cauſe now before you. I have ſome reaſon to wiſh, and to complain that the like conduct has not been obſerved on the other ſide. General Moſtyn is to be graced with the countenance of great men; and a plain Engliſh jury is to hear the titular teſtimonies of the character of a man inveſted with an high office, in high power, and poſſeſſed of great riches; yet the character of a poor, unhappy, helpleſs individual, an inhabitant of an iſland part of the territories belonging to the crown of Great Britain (confident too that he lived under the protection of the conſtitution of Great Britain), is to be treated as a ſubject of ridicule, becauſe he is not a man of high rank, though you are told he is a man of character and of fortune, ſuch as has intitled and recommended him to the company of men of rank in that iſland. Have we not ſome reaſon to complain, that ſuch matters are now introduced to rebutt his juſt and well-founded expectations to receive ſatisfaction from an Engliſh jury for the wrongs he has already ſuſtained?--Is it not enough that this man has endured an impriſonment of ſix days, under the moſt unparalleled hardſhips of rigour and cruelty that can be inflicted upon a human being? is it not enough that he has endured a baniſhment from his native country? but, to heap calumny and obloquy upon the head of a man that he has injured, ſhall he with impunity be permitted to digreſs wide from the facts in this cauſe, to tell you that he is a profligate idle man; that with a family he neglects all the duties of a huſband and the maſter of a family; that he is devoid of moral character? Is a poor helpleſs ſtranger in this kingdom thus to be repreſented, after having been driven out of his own by cruelty unparalleled in the Britiſh hiſtory? Nor can any hiſtory be produced, even of any other country, that did not receive a moſt ſignal diſcountenance from the power of that country. A man thus driven out, ſeeking refuge from the Engliſh laws, friendleſs in this country, ignorant of its language, is treated in this manner! A gentleman comes forth, and entertains you with the connexions, character, and acquaintance of the powerful defendant: he then enters into the private concerns and private character of the plaintiff, and dwells upon the ignominy of it, and endeavours to impreſs you with a prepoſſeſſion that it will not be in his power to remove it. I truſt this conduct has not eſcaped you. Not a word has fallen from us of the character of general Moſtyn; I mean on that head to be ſilent for ever; and if I had it in my power to aſperſe his character, unleſs it was ſomething relative to the cauſe, that made it my duty to produce it before you, I ſhould be very ſilent about it.

Having diſmiſſed, I hope, from the cauſe theſe conſiderations, let us now recur to the defence that is ſet up by general Moſtyn. And, gentlemen, the defence ſet up by the general is, that Mr. Fabrigas is a man dangerous, ſeditious, and turbulent; that he was in the act of perpetrating ſedition in the garriſon of Minorca; that there was danger even of the loſs of Minorca itſelf; that it affected the commercial intereſts of this country; and, as well-wiſhers to this country and the commerce of it, you are called upon to give a verdict for the defendant, or to reduce the conſideration of damages ſo as to pronounce ſomething worſe for the plaintiff, if poſſible, than even a verdict for the defendant.---Gentlemen, their ſtate of it is, that this man, Mr. Fabrigas, being a factious, turbulent, and unquiet man, was purſuing general Moſtyn with an improper importunity; that he was endeavouring to ſpread ſedition, to raiſe diſcontents in the garriſon itſelf that affected the very ſafety of the government, and the iſland was in danger; that he uttered a threat that would have made general Moſtyn reſponſible with his head, if he had not prevented ſuch a ſcheme from being carried into execution; that he ſaid, if his petition was again rejected, that he would come at the head of 150 men, a menace repreſented as if it imported a threat that he would come at the head of an armed force: ſuch was the conſtruction his counſel put upon it, that he would appear in ſuch a way, as to make it neceſſary for the general to comply with his demands; that there was an end of all government and all order in the iſland of Minorca, and a valuable part of the Britiſh dominions lay then at the mercy of our enemies. Gentlemen, this is a well-drawn picture, and was very powerfully urged to you. It was ſomething over-painted, as I conceive you will judge. And the neceſſity of doing it is an obſervation that will not eſcape you; for leſs than this, I do conceive (I reſt myſelf ſatisfied in the general humanity that prevails in the breaſts of Engliſhmen, and inhabitants of the city of London) leſs than this could never have ſerved as any colourable juſtification for ſuch conduct as has been proved upon general Moſtyn: this therefore was neceſſary to be ſtated to you, that it was extorted, (contrary to the feelings of humanity which are ſaid to ſway and influence that gentleman in all his conduct) that this was extorted from neceſſity; that there was no time for conſideration; that it was an emergency he was required to decide on; it ſuperſeded therefore all forms; it was abſolutely neceſſary, for his government would not have exiſted if he had been at all induced to poſtpone it; and that poſſeſſion of which he was the guardian, and for which he is ſaid to be reſponſible with his head, was in danger of being for ever loſt to Great Britain. I can conceive a caſe like that, adding more circumſtances than even the ingenuity of the counſel furniſhed, which would not juſtify, though it might extenuate indeed, the conduct of the commander. But was there any thing like it in this caſe? This, I ſubmit to you, gentlemen, is a caſe that the counſel thought neceſſary to open; and leſs than this furniſhes no pretence or colour of juſtification for general Moſtyn. Gentlemen, when this cauſe was opened to you, and when the general's defence was ſtated to you, that the general was obliged to act in an emergency; bound by the moſt religious of all duties, to look with circumſpection to the care of the garriſon in inſtant danger, it was neceſſary to act as he did; it was an act therefore not of inclination nor of deliberation, it was an act of abſolute cogent irreſiſtible neceſſity, and which he had been unjuſtifiable if he had either omitted or deferred for a day. That is the nature, and that is the colour of the general's juſtification: but did the general know how different the caſe that would appear upon evidence would be from that which he had inſtructed his counſel to repreſent to you? It was neceſſary that the defence ſhould be guarded; and then there is a prefatory defence made, which, in my opinion, very much deſerves your conſideration. General Moſtyn, with the prudence that from this hour I ſhall think makes part of his character, choſe to decline the juriſdiction of an Engliſh jury. I don't wonder that he did; and I am not amazed that you are told that this is a matter extraneous to the juriſdiction of the courts of judicature in this country; that you, as a jury, are incompetent for its deciſion: it is of all caſes in the world that caſe which, as a defendant, general Moſtyn muſt be inclined to wiſh might never appear before an Engliſh jury. It is a tribunal that he muſt dread; it is a tribunal that he muſt ſhrink from; and he acts upon the ſoundeſt motives of policy and prudence when he endeavours to evade it.---If that ſhould prove inſufficient to him, the next reſort is in the general law and doctrine reſpecting the power of the governor in the iſland of Minorca; and you are repeatedly cautioned not to conſider yourſelves as adminiſtering juſtice by the laws of England. You are told, that you are deciding a queſtion of the laws of another country, far different indeed and materially oppoſite to thoſe of the laws of England: you are called upon therefore to judge this cauſe by another rule, and by another ſtandard, than that which you are in the habit of. Conſidering and trying cauſes by ſomething more than this muſt be deſired of you, before the ends of the defendant can be compleatly anſwered. You are deſired to diveſt yourſelves too of the feelings of humanity; and they are endeavoured to be ſuppreſſed by repreſenting to you circumſtances of horror and danger to the general trade of this country, in caſe you ſhould ſuffer even principles of law, of juſtice and humanity, to prevail in this cauſe. Gentlemen, it was ſtated to you, that in this iſland of Minorca there is no law whatſoever; that the form of government is deſpotiſm; that what may be called the law, is the will and pleaſure of the perſon that governs; that the king is abſolutely deſpotic; that he may change and alter the laws of this iſland as he pleaſes; and not only he himſelf can do it, but that he has delegated that power to his ſubſtitute; that he is ſent over to govern, not by any fixed invariable plan of laws, but ſuch as he thinks proper to make, ſuch as he thinks proper to preſcribe to the inhabitants, at any time that in his wiſdom it ſhall appear juſt and expedient that it ſhould be ſo. This is the ſtate of an Engliſh government, and this is the conſtruction put upon an Engliſh patent that paſſes the great ſeal of Great Britain. I will be bold to ſay, that if that conſtruction is ever attempted to be put, it muſt be put repugnant to the words of that patent. I will be bold to ſay, that if a patent paſſes the great ſeal containing ſuch words, there is not ſo feeble a judicature in this kingdom that would not dare to pronounce it void, and every act done under it illegal. And I will venture to ſay too, it is impoſſible that the great man that ſhould dare to put the great ſeal, and proſtitute public authority to a patent of that kind, but he muſt anſwer to public juſtice with his head.--And yet this has been contended to be the true genuine conſtruction of an Engliſh patent, the authority under which this ſame general Moſtyn, this governor of the iſland of Minorca, has preſumed to act. Gentlemen, having ſtated how repugnant it is to every idea and principle of law and juſtice, it gives me concern to hear in what habits, poſſeſſed with what ideas, men return from the iſland of Minorca. It has been contended to be right, becauſe it has been done before. If it has been done before, I ſay it is alarming, and it is time to put an end to it. You have had gentlemen with military commiſſions appearing here in red coats, to give you legiſlative conſtructions; to tell you, as lawyers, what is the law of the iſland of Minorca. You have had a gentleman who ſerved as a ſecretary to governor Moſtyn, who comes home and tells you, that the governor, with reſpect to the adminiſtration of laws that regard only queſtions of civil property, is limited by the laws of the country; but with regard to criminal juriſdiction, his power is uncircumſcribed, and totally unlimited; that by his proclamation he can change laws whenever he pleaſes, and the law of to-night is not the law of to-morrow, if that man thinks proper to iſſue his proclamation to repeal it; that the courts of juſtice are under a tye to reſpect theſe proclamations as laws; that the individuals of the iſland are all to be bound by it, and if theſe laws are iſſued but an hour before, they are as binding as if of long ſtanding in the iſland.

Theſe are the ideas of law that theſe gentlemen bring from the iſland of Minorca, under the government either of this general Moſtyn, or his lieutenant-general; and upon the authority of theſe gentlemen that have furniſhed themſelves with ſuch ideas of law and juſtice, you are at once to be prevailed upon to determine that the laws, liberties, and privileges of this kingdom in no reſpect extend there. It is ſomething ſhocking to Engliſh ears; a deſpotic, an arbitrary, an unlimited power! (for even the words have not been ſpared); and you are here, as an Engliſh jury, to pronounce that the king of Great Britain, and perſons acting under him, are to exerciſe this unlimited power within a part under the juriſdiction of the judges of England. If this is offered in extenuation of the conduct of general Moſtyn, added to the ſtrong irreſiſtible calls of juſtice and humanity that muſt preſs your minds more than words can, there muſt be added to it the moſt powerful political conſiderations; for you have been told in the courſe of this argument, that the iſland of Minorca is an inſecure poſſeſſion to the crown of Great Britain; that its inhabitants are in a great meaſure diſaffected. If they are, has not the cauſe of the diſaffection been very explicitly ſet forth to you? Is not the cure as evident? Correct theſe gentlemen, who think that their hands are not bound by law and juſtice that go over to exerciſe power over theſe helpleſs men. Teach the poor Minorquins that the Engliſh law will protect them; that their governors are bound by law and juſtice to teach them the bleſſings of an Engliſh government; you'll remove diſaffection; you'll get a ſtronger guard than all the caution and wiſdom of governor Moſtyn, his ſecretary and friends, powerful and titled as they are, and this fatal ſyſtem of military deſpotiſm; you will have the iſland to ſerve you, you will have the affections of the inhabitants to aſſiſt you, you may command them whenever you will. Yet, gentlemen, it has been dwelt upon as a topic, that this iſland is diſaffected; that their inclinations are againſt the Engliſh government. And who can wonder at it, if what Mr. Blakeney ſays he is clear in his recollection of? I hope he is not; I don't mean to derogate from his veracity; that a power like this has been uſed of arbitrarily ſending a man, a native, an inhabitant, from the iſland, his friends living there, his poſſeſſion there, for no offence committed, but at the abſolute will and pleaſure of the governor. You have heard a great deal of Turkey, you have heard ſomething of the laws of Japan, you have heard of other deſpotic powers, whoſe names I truſt are ſufficiently odious in the ears of all Engliſh hearers; and yet you are told that the governor of this iſland is equally deſpotic with any of theſe powers; that he has no limits but his will, no bounds but his pleaſure, no law but his inclinations; that the lives and perſons, if not the properties, of all the inhabitants of this iſland lie proſtrate before him, and they muſt depend upon his natural good inclination and humanity in what degree they are permitted to enjoy them.

This is the ſtate of this iſland; and I will be bold to ſay, it would be ſpeaking injuriouſly of the government of Japan,---it would be ſpeaking injuriouſly of the government of Turkey,---it would be ſpeaking injuriouſly of the emperor of Morocco's government, to deſcribe that as the general ſtate of theſe ſubjects; it never was in the idea of even deſpotiſm itſelf till this very hour: it is violence and outrage, it is the law of robbery; it never obtained in any place where the idea and form of a civil government ever was allowed; becauſe, if the legiſlative power and the executive meet in one perſon, that diſtinguiſhes a deſpotic government from the happy ſtate that we enjoy in this kingdom. Our king can't preſcribe us laws, but he muſt adminiſter us juſtice by thoſe laws that our repreſentatives make for us. That is the ſtate of this country, happily diſtinguiſhed from the ſtate of deſpotic countries. But in no deſpotic country whatever did this idea ever obtain, that the prince, the deſpotic ſovereign, call him by what name you will, was to adminiſter juſtice by his incident pleaſure, will, and power. If he made laws, he made them, proclaimed and divulged them, and the ſubjects were governed by them, and their kings were ruled by thoſe laws. But here this gentleman, Mr. Blakeney, goes wide beyond his counſel, (his counſel would not ſtate any thing like this) but according to this gentleman, the inhabitants of this iſland, without the leaſt imputation of delinquency, without any mode or form of trial, were ſentenced, inſtantly tranſported, and removed from their friends and relations for ever, unleſs it is the good will and pleaſure of the governor ever to permit them to return. I ſay, it is the moſt ſhameful anecdote that ever was found of any government whatever; and a baſhaw of Egypt would merit the bow-ſtring for behaving in ſo illegal and ſo indecent a manner. The form, the appearance, the ſemblance of juſtice, are all of importance to be obſerved, and which the policy even of the lawleſs preſcribe; yet have our ears been tortured, and our patience and time been ſpent with doctrines of this ſort, by gentlemen who have enjoyed truſts in that iſland, and which have conſtantly been exerciſed by them. This is what general Moſtyn has ſet up in his defence.

His majeſty, it is ſaid, makes laws whenever he pleaſes; it is in his ſole will and power to impoſe what laws he pleaſes upon a conquered country. It is more than ever I heard. The prerogative goes further than any book, that ever I read, can juſtify me in allowing; becauſe, as I have underſtood it, if true, the ſtrongeſt authorities ſupport theſe prerogatives. One Chriſtian prince conquers a Chriſtian kingdom, that is governed by its own laws, unleſs it is the will of the conqueror to abrogate thoſe laws. The conqueſt of the iſland of Minorca was not made by queen Ann perſonally, but it was made by the ſubjects of Great Britain, and belongs to the ſupreme ſtate of Great Britain. But if you give the power to the ſovereign to make thoſe laws, allow them to be rightly exerciſed. Can you ſuppoſe that it belongs to the governor appointed, and that they are ſent out of this iſland not to be governed by any laws, any inſtructions that they ſhall receive, but to govern and adminiſter juſtice arbitrarily and incontroulably, according to their own will and pleaſure? For in order to furniſh the defendant with any colourable defence whatever, he is to be juſtified by precedents, which you muſt condemn as precedents of robbery and burglary, equal in point of violence to either of thoſe terms; or you muſt allow of ſuch a power which has hitherto been held not only incompatible with the law, the ſpirit, the genius, and the conſtitution of Great Britain, but with the idea of any law whatever that ever obtained in any ſtate or climate: both theſe you muſt ſubſcribe to before you can comply with the requeſt that is made you, and pronounce a verdict for general Moſtyn.---The gentlemen then having taken this broad and extenſive line of defence, which they thought would contain and embrace any defence that they thought proper to offer to you, they next proceed with their defence. And, gentlemen, you are told, that as it was the authority, ſo it was the duty of the general to proceed as he did; that he could have no perſonal malevolence to a man ſo remote from his ſituation, ſo unlikely to fall in with his connections; that the man was mutinous in the whole of his conduct; and that at laſt he committed that dangerous act of mutiny that made it an indiſpenſible act of juſtice in the governor to commit him, and to ſend him out of the iſland; that if he had not done it, and a conſequence had happened fatal to the iſland, the governor would have been reſponſible for it. Why, gentlemen, the ſtate of it ſo much exceeded the facts, it certainly was expected by the learned counſel who offered it to you that he ſhould prove ſomething leſs, and therefore ſomething that required bold and ſtrong poſitions to ſupport it; becauſe, if he could have proved this, though I ſhould conceive it would by no means have intitled the general to a verdict, yet ſuch conſiderations,---an act of abſolute neceſſity, the alternative of ſeeing ſuch a truſt as the iſland of Minorca loſt through his remiſſneſs, or the removing of this man out of the iſland--I ſhould have conceived might very well have furniſhed an excuſe for him in his conduct: I am ſure it would have taken off from any edge, any warmth, or keenneſs in which an action would have been ſupported that would have been brought againſt him. But, large as the ground was laid, it was to take in certainly another caſe than this. Nothing, as I conceive, and as I ſubmit to you, of this kind has been proved. Petitions, letters, meſſages, have been given in evidence before you, and comments are made upon the very petitions themſelves, as carrying with them ſtrong proofs of a mutinous inclination; and at laſt there is a broad fact aſſerted, that there was a downright threat of appearing in arms at the head of 150 men.

Now, gentlemen, give your attention to theſe letters, to theſe petitions that have been read. They are expreſſed, as I conceive, in decent and in reſpectful terms; and if it is an act of mutiny, I do conceive that it is impoſſible for any one man to complain that he has received wrong from another, either by word or letter, but he muſt be condemned as a mutineer in the iſland of Minorca; and the public faith, the national faith that is pledged for the protection and enjoyment of their property, is reduced to that ſtate---'You ſhall enjoy it, but if another preſumes to wrong you, you muſt not dare, upon the pain of tranſportation and long impriſonment, to utter a word of complaint; for it is judged dangerous, it is not conſiſtent with the wiſdom of government to permit it, and we are called upon to puniſh you moſt ſeverely.'---Gentlemen, the tranſaction appears to be this: that an officer in the iſland of Minorca, called a muſtaſtaph, was the man from whom the iſlanders were to receive what they call the afforation or the aſſize-price: this was the conception of Mr. Fabrigas the petitioner. Another notion prevailed, that the order of council received from the crown, which is conſiſtent with their capitulation and the rights ſtipulated to them, ought to be obſerved; by which order they were at liberty to ſell their wines after a certain price had by a public officer been once aſſized, which is called the afforation. But the muſtaſtaph of the iſland thought proper to ſay that the order of council was ſuperſeded by another order, which coming from the active perſon in the government, though not the principal at the time, muſt neceſſarily ſuperſede that order of council; and it was inſiſted upon that governor Johnſton's order, judging of the inexpedience and impropriety of the former, muſt take place; and that Mr. Fabrigas was wrong in his conception of what ſhould be underſtood to be the law of Minorca. Upon his preſenting his complaint to Mr. Moſtyn, he received for anſwer, that Mr. Moſtyn would immediately call upon the muſtaſtaph for his anſwer. The anſwer is given; and in conſequence of it Mr. Fabrigas is told that his petition was groundleſs, for that the muſtaſtaph had moſt perfectly ſatisfied the governor. Mr. Fabrigas then deſires to ſee, for confident as he was that he was well grounded in his complaint, yet he deſires to ſee the reaſons that the muſtaſtaph had aſſigned. The ſight of theſe reaſons is denied him. In conſequence of that, he preſents another petition; which is, I think, referred to ſome of the law officers of the iſland for their conſideration. They run it over, and they report themſelves ſatisfied; and they inſert the anſwer of the muſtaſtaph, which anſwer the plaintiff Mr. Fabrigas is very deſirous of ſeeing and anſwering. The buſineſs then proceeds, as it is ſaid, in repeated petitions; Mr. Fabrigas conceiving that the governor is miſled, not that he wilfully denies him juſtice, but is miſled through the influence and miſrepreſentation of this muſtaſtaph; and that produces at laſt a convention of ſome of the iſland, in order to take their ſenſe of the matter. Here it is not clear what was the ſenſe of the majority; but here the muſtaſtaph had weight and intereſt enough to get that repreſented as by the majority, which he wiſhed to have received. This being on a Sunday, when many of the inhabitants were in the country following their diverſions, and Mr. Fabrigas thinking that the ſenſe of the people had not been properly taken, comes again to the governor with another petition, not cenſuring the governor, not upbraiding the governor, not intimating the leaſt diſapprobation of the governor's conduct, or jealouſy of his inclination, couched in terms of the utmoſt decency. The conſequence of it was an anſwer, which produced from Mr. Fabrigas that very anſwer upon which the defence of Mr. Moſtyn has been in ſo great a meaſure built; to which the gentlemen have applied that evidence which was produced by Mr. Wright, Mr. Moſtyn's ſecretary. Mr. Wright ſays, that firſt of all the converſation was interpreted by a prieſt, and then by another interpreter; but he does not know who interpreted thoſe expreſſions which fell from Mr. Fabrigas, which he apprehended to be of a dangerous kind, and therefore diſcouraged, and adviſed him never to repeat again. He does not know, he ſays, whether the expreſſion was to this purpoſe, that he would come again if permitted, and that there ſhould be another petition backed with 150 men, or that he would come with 150 men to back his petition. I am ſorry for it. But here I can't forbear a comment; it would be betraying my cauſe and my own judgment if I did. This gentleman is very ſure that one or the other of theſe were the expreſſions. He profeſſed to refreſh his memory by a paper he had written down within an hour and a half of the tranſaction; and he thought proper to add, that it gave him an alarm, as if ſomething dangerous might follow.

Now, gentlemen, what are the words which he has written, from which he ſaid he made his communication to the governor, and which certainly contains the truth, as he recently wrote it down? Why, that Mr. Fabrigas ſaid he would come next day with a petition of the people concerned in grapes and wines, which they would ſign and come with to the number of 150! Theſe are the words wrote down by Mr. Wright himſelf. Why, gentlemen, I ſubmit it to you, whether in common ſenſe and plain honeſt interpretation there can be any miſtake about theſe words.

You hear, gentlemen, this was a conteſt between the muſtaſtaph and Mr. Fabrigas. The governor is appealed to as a judge expected to be, and who ought to be, impartial between them: he was appealed to with decency on one ſide, but leaned rather with friendſhip on the other; for the intereſt of the governor is not unconnected with the emoluments of the muſtaſtaph. On one ſide it is inſiſted that this was not the ſenſe of the majority of the inhabitants; on the other ſide, notwithſtanding what had appeared from the advantage taken upon a Sunday, when many could not appear, yet ſtill that the real ſenſe of the majority of the inhabitants was on the ſide of Fabrigas. Gentlemen, is not that the moſt natural key? does not that furniſh the moſt obvious interpretation to this? He would come with 150, in anſwer to what he had been told; for his petition had been rejected upon the ground that it was not conſonant to the wiſhes of the inhabitants, for they had been ſummoned, had declared and ſigned againſt it. He anſwers, that I will come the next day with a petition ſigned by 150 men. And who are theſe men to be? Why, he ſays, perſons concerned in grapes and wine. Can you conceive then that he threatened to bring an armed force, that he threatened danger to the garriſon? Was it not a natural anſwer in that diſpute that then ſubſiſted between him and the muſtaſtaph? Is it not clearly explained by the words, 'the perſons concerned in grapes and wines,' that he meant the miſtake ſhould be rectified the next day, and that it might appear from the number attending that petition, upon which ſide the majority of the iſlanders were? There was no man, that did not deſire to miſtake it, that could have miſtaken it: that is impoſſible. This I will be bold to ſay, that no man that wrote this paper would have given the evidence that Mr. Wright has given, and ſay he was in doubt only in the recollection of the particular words that were uſed, whether he would come with a petition backed with 150 men, or that he would come with 150 men to back his petition. I am perſuaded that no man who had wrote this, and which he tells you is the truth, could ever entertain that kind of doubt that Mr. Wright ſuggeſted to you. I am as confident that no man could have miſtaken this, that had not ſome purpoſes to anſwer by affecting to miſtake it. But what was Mr. Wright's, what was the governor's conduct upon this occaſion? Did either of them enquire after theſe 150 men? If this was a matter that would give ſuch an alarm to a governor of a garriſon, was it proper to acquieſce in the removal of one only? Was there any enquiry made after the others? If it ſtruck Mr. Wright as dangerous, would it not have occurred to him, to ſtop Mr. Fabrigas upon the inſtant? Would he not have demanded the names of theſe 150 men? But Mr. Moſtyn at once abandons all his character, for the purpoſe of the cauſe; he is now no longer that faithful officer, that good and truſty ſoldier, that diligent and circumſpect governor, that you were before told he was. Is it not impoſſible but it ſhould have occurred to both, that the proper conduct was, if this was a juſt interpretation of the words that were uttered, to take that man up? not to ſtop there, but to have interrogated him, to diſcover his abettors and accomplices, to purſue the enquiry, and preſerve the ſafety of the garriſon, which they conceive to be ſo much in danger? It is moſt clear from all the circumſtances, that neither of them apprehended any danger whatſoever to the garriſon; they ſlept in quiet as before. There muſt be ſome other reaſon for their proceeding in the manner they have done againſt Mr. Fabrigas, beſides that which ariſes from the neceſſity and emergency which was repreſented to you, of the interpoſition that the governor was called upon by indiſpenſible duty to make, for the ſake of preſerving the garriſon from being thrown into confuſion, from falling into the enemy's hands. There muſt be, I ſay, ſome other reaſon for acting in this manner againſt Mr. Fabrigas. Mr. Fabrigas is ſuſpected, as they would have it, of a dangerous deſign; that a dangerous deſign was on foot; yet he is the only man that for ſix days remains in the iſland in cloſe impriſonment, and there is not any inquiry made after the perſons preſumed to be concerned with him in the buſineſs. If the governor had conceived that impreſſion, and wiſhed to be ſet right in his opinion, the appearance of the petition the next day would have anſwered it. When four poor Minorquins, (which for ſome purpoſe or other are deſcribed to be of the loweſt claſs of men, and which you will therefore preſume to be the moſt inoffenſive) when theſe four men alone came with the petition, did governor Moſtyn then continue in the opinion that this man was the framer and contriver of dangerous deſigns, to be backed and ſupported by multitudes? Muſt not he change his opinion then? Did the impriſonment end then? Were the ſufferings of this man then put an end to?---No, gentlemen; the man continues in priſon for ſix days, and is afterwards by an order extra-judicial, by an order of this governor Moſtyn, ſent into exile; which if it is law, any thing he thinks proper to do will be law; and I muſt then agree with Mr. Wright's juridical opinion, that the power of the governor can have no bounds in criminal matters. If he can juſtify this, he might as well juſtify capital puniſhments; and if he had thought proper to have ordered him to immediate execution, he would have done an act full as juſtifiable, in my opinion ſomething more agreeable to humanity; for he ſends this man to rot in a dungeon, the place ordained for the vileſt and moſt deſperate malefactors, for capital offenders only, whether under ground or not is immaterial, but it was gloomy, damp, and uncomfortable; it has all the horrors of a dungeon belonging to it; and there this man is kept under a ſpecial extraordinary order, which our witneſſes, who were ſoldiers of the garriſon, who were attendants at the place, tell you, were unprecedented; no food ſuffered to be adminiſtered to him, his friends debarred from ſeeing him, his wife and children denied acceſs as often as they approached, and this in conſequence of orders which their humanity ſhuddered at, but which they dared not preſume to contradict. Singular and unexampled as was this cruelty even in the government of Minorca, which has the peculiar character of having a deſpotiſm belonging to it unknown in any other place upon the face of this globe; yet even there, though they may quote inſtances to juſtify ſome part of their behaviour, they never can pretend that a man ever was treated with the ſtudied circumſtances of rigour and cruelty contained in theſe orders: I mean, that no ſuch orders were ever iſſued out before. This, gentlemen, is the treatment Mr. Fabrigas has undergone, and this Mr. Moſtyn muſt juſtify. He muſt not only juſtify the removing this gentleman out of the way of doing miſchief, but he muſt ſay, that without hearing, without any proceeding, without the form of ſentence, without even ſo much as an intimation of the offence with which he is charged, that he has a right to inflict the greateſt of all puniſhments upon him. This Mr. Moſtyn muſt ſay: and you are to conclude, from the exceeding good character of Mr. Moſtyn, that all this proceeded from the pure benevolence of his heart, from the moſt upright and commendable of all motives. You are in your judgment to paſs an approbation of denying a man, untried and unconvicted, all food for ſix days but bread and water, of ſtripping him of all comfort, and of denying him even the accommodation of a bed. You muſt pronounce that there was nothing improper, nothing unlawful, nothing inhuman in ſeparating a man from his wife during this impriſonment, ſtripping him of the comfort of his infant children, and then tranſporting him into a foreign country, without giving him the opportunity of providing for his voyage, or receiving that ſmall aſſiſtance which you have been told his wife and ſon were ready on the ſpot to deliver to him. This you muſt pronounce to be legal and juſtifiable, and to be agreeable to humanity, to be neceſſarily incident to the office and duty of a governor of a garriſon. You are deſired, admitting for a moment that you can't juſtify the general in this conduct; admitting that ſome form of trial, that calling a man to anſwer, and ſignifying what he was charged with, were neceſſary forms to precede the infliction of any puniſhment whatever; (which admiſſion will be an affront to the judgment of the worthy gentleman his ſecretary, who inſiſts upon the general's will being the law) but laying that aſide for a moment, it is ſaid the governor's conduct ſtands ſo circumſtanced, that it is ſo mitigated, that you can never find it conſiſtent with your duty to give any conſiderable damages againſt him, at the complaint of this man. And to brand him with the moſt dangerous of all names, you are told that he is a patriot; that patriotiſm, however it may be introduced here, and may be ſerviceable in a commercial country, is of no uſe and benefit, but of the higheſt danger, in the iſland of Minorca; and the love of a man's country, which is called the firſt of virtues in other countries, becomes a mark, a dangerous offence in that country. At the inſtance therefore of ſuch a man as that, and againſt ſuch a man as Mr. Moſtyn, you are told, you can give no damages, for the great and the long impriſonment, for the cruel and afflicting injury done him, in ſending him into a foreign country from his wife and family. You cannot do it, becauſe it is ſaid Mr. Moſtyn has been in an error, and that the utmoſt extent of Mr. Moſtyn's crimes amounts only to that of error. To ſupport this, the opinion of the military was aſked, and the opinion of thoſe wretched men called lawyers, who have ſtudied law in a country where law is not permitted to reſide, and where the will of the governor is the only law. Upon ſuch authorities it is ſaid Mr. Moſtyn could not heſitate. Clear as his judgment is, he is miſtaken; he is miſled by the firſt of authorities: he certainly meant well. Gentlemen, if Mr. Moſtyn had offended againſt any particular poſitive law of this country, or even Minorca, though clear to common underſtandings, yet that defence might be open to him; but it is not open to him in this caſe: for he has offended againſt the law of humanity, impreſſed upon every good mind; (no man that feels it can ever be miſtaken) and he has offended againſt the firſt principles of juſtice. But it is ſaid, he only erred in ſending a man to a dungeon, that probably might kill him; out of error too, he iſſues out orders to reſtrict him to bread and water for his ſuſtenance; out of error too, he prohibited the acceſs of his wife and children; out of error, he baniſhed him into a foreign country, ſtript of his property, and all the comfort he could be ſuppoſed to have in his baniſhment, not ſuffered to take that ſmall proviſion which his family had made for him: all theſe errors are incident. To whom? To the governor of Minorca. I truſt by your verdict that you will never ſuffer a man who has acted this part, to call it humanity, and go back to Minorca juſtified by your verdict, in ſaying, 'I committed 'theſe miſtakes, but they were all miſtakes of the heart.' I am ſure you will not give him the ſanction and authority of your verdict. But if theſe arguments prevail, you muſt do it; you muſt give the plaintiff ſmall damages, merely becauſe the defendant is miſtaken. Governor Moſtyn, bred too in England, lately gone over to that country, does not recollect that it is neceſſary that a man, before he is puniſhed, muſt be tried: you are to call that an error too. I do conceive, the loweſt wretch that walks the ſtreets of London is incapable of falling into that error: it muſt be an error produced by the place; it muſt be that very intoxication and drunkenneſs of power which you ought, by your verdict, to correct. It is impoſſible that any Engliſhman, or any man bred in a civilized country, could fall into ſuch an error. And give me leave here to remark one part of the caſe. Gentlemen are brought to tell you of reports conveyed to the governor. If Mr. Wright reported faithful, what he was authorized to report, the governor had little to build upon. Another gentleman adds, that there was a report of ſomebody; and it is ſaid it may juſtify the governor as a report. Now did they conſider how the governor is to be juſtified by a report? Does a report juſtify a man in proceeding to the very extremity of puniſhment inſtantly, without trial or examination? Does not every obſervation that can poſſibly be made turn againſt general Moſtyn? If you pronounce a verdict for him, muſt not you give a ſanction to that horrible and dangerous doctrine here advanced in his ſupport? Are not you called upon then by every conſideration that is dear to you, to give great and exemplary damages in this cauſe? If ever example required it, it does in this. If ever the ſuffering of a man required it, it does in this; for never was any man more clearly and unjuſtifiably wronged and injured. If you ſend Mr. Fabrigas, if he has courage to return to the iſland, with a verdict of a few hundred pounds, to give triumph to a man whoſe revenue is ſeven or eight thouſand pounds a-year, who does not regard what ſuch a man as this recovers; then the deſpicable doctrine of arbitrary power that the governor was ſo fond of, and thought ſo well eſtabliſhed in this iſland, will never again be diſturbed. Is it not eſſential to the very ſafety of the iſland, that the inhabitants may be aſſured that they are protected from ſuch a power, that they ſhall never be told that in a court of juſtice ſuch a power was ever inſiſted upon, and that the jury gave only a few hundred pounds damages, as a mark that they did not bear in their minds any great diſapprobation of it?

On the other hand, it is of no great conſequence whether Mr. Moſtyn ever returns to that country again. It is my, and I am ſure it is your wiſh, that he may never be permitted to return. I wiſh he may never ſee the face of Mr. Fabrigas again. I wiſh he may never ſee the face of Mr. Fabrigas again in that iſland. But it is of the greateſt concern to the peace and happineſs of that iſland, that they are ſafely protected from ſuch outrages, from ſuch rampant violence and capricious exerciſe of tyranny and deſpotiſm; that they ſhall never be diſturbed again by ſuch exertion of authority, much leſs that it ſhall ever be acknowledged as the claim of the governor of the iſland; but that they may quietly enjoy thoſe rights that as natural-born ſubjects of Great Britain they are entitled to, and which the national faith is pledged to make good to them. This will be the advantage that will follow the giving ample, conſiderable, and exemplary damages to the plaintiff; damages that I muſt ſay in this cauſe are called for from the very nature of the cauſe itſelf: for if there was not any weightier conſideration in it than for the ſufferings of the man, the damages muſt ſwell high indeed; but, added to that, you will produce this happy effect, that Minorca, which is ſaid to be a precarious poſſeſſion, will for ever be a permanent and ſecure poſſeſſion to the crown of Great Britain. I much fear, if this language receives countenance, it will be inſecure indeed; and much as I love the trade and commerce of this kingdom, I proteſt as a man of feeling, great and valuable as they are, I would not conſent that they ſhould be purchaſed, I cannot conſent that they ſhould be preſerved, at the expence of the moſt ſolemn rights of ſociety.

Mr. Juſtice GOULD.

Gentlemen of the jury, Anthony Fabrigas is plaintiff, and John Moſtyn, eſq. is the defendant. This, gentlemen, is an action of treſpaſs and falſe impriſonment, which the plaintiff declares in two counts.

The firſt is, that the defendant upon ſuch a day made an aſſault upon and impriſoned the plaintiff, without any reaſonable or probable cauſe, againſt the laws of this kingdom, and compelled him to depart from Minorca, where he was there dwelling and reſident; and carried or cauſed him to be carried from thence to Carthagena, the dominions of the king of Spain, againſt the plaintiff's will, whereby he was put to great expence and trouble, his goods were waſted and loſt, his family brought to great want and diſtreſs, and he was deprived of their comfort. That is the firſt count. The ſecond is, the general charge of falſe impriſonment, without alledging theſe circumſtances. To this the defendant has pleaded two pleas.

In the firſt place, the general iſſue, that he is not guilty.

In the ſecond place, he ſays, he is governor of the iſland of Minorca, and that he was intruſted with all the powers, privileges, and authorities, civil and military, belonging and relating to the government of the ſaid iſland in parts beyond the ſeas. Then he ſtates, that the plaintiff was guilty of a riot and diſturbance of the peace, order, and government of the iſland, and was endeavouring to create and raiſe a mutiny and ſedition amongſt the inhabitants of the ſaid iſland, in breach of the peace, in violation of the laws, and in ſubverſion of all order and government; whereupon the defendant, in order to preſerve the peace and government of the iſland, was obliged, and did then and there order the plaintiff to be baniſhed the ſaid iſland, and to leave and quit the iſland. And in order to carry this into execution, and to ſend him from and out of the iſland, he did (then come the words of form) gently lay hands upon him for that purpoſe; and accordingly did cauſe him to be kept in priſon for a reaſonable ſpace of time, until he could ſend him out of the iſland; and then at length he did ſend him on board a veſſel from the ſaid iſland to Carthagena in Spain, as it was lawful for him to do. The plaintiff has ſaid in anſwer to this, that he did it of his own wrong, and without any ſuch cauſe as he has alledged in his juſtification. Now whether this juſtification is good in point of law or not, is a matter, gentlemen, that I ſhall not enter into upon this occaſion. For it ſeems to me, that if what has been laid down by the gentlemen upon the part of the defendant is well founded in law, they ought to have pleaded that matter to the juriſdiction of the court. But they have not ſo done, but have pleaded a juſtification, which is denied by the plaintiff; and that iſſue coming here by the king's commiſſion of niſi prius to be tried by you and before me, we muſt therefore ſee whether he has made out that juſtification or not. And you will pleaſe to recollect he ſays in it, that the plaintiff was guilty of a riot and diſorder, and did endeavour to excite and ſtir up mutiny and ſo forth in the iſland. Thus much I think one may ſay, that where a conqueſt is made of a Chriſtian country (there is ſome ſtrange doctrine relative to infidel countries, as if infidels had no laws to be governed by, that I meddle not with; but as far as relates to the conqueſt of a Chriſtian country,) certainly it is ſaid, that until the crown does promulge laws among them, they are to be governed by their ancient laws. Indeed, common ſenſe ſpeaks it, becauſe otherwiſe they would have no laws nor government among them. However, thus far may be ſaid, to be ſure, under ſuch a conſtitution in which we live, that at leaſt natural equity muſt be the rule, if there is a power that is not circumſcribed by clear, poſitive, and preciſe rules. Yet both natural juſtice and equity are the principles that ought to govern ſuch a truſt. If any one was to write or ſpeak upon it, it is impoſſible but they muſt lay down that propoſition. Then that will be a conſideration for you to try upon this occaſion; conſidering this diſtinction, that we are not trying a cauſe now that does happen within the compaſs of this iſland, but we are trying a fact and a proceeding that happened in a garriſon beyond the ſeas, a place poſſeſſed by the crown of Great-Britain for the general benefit of this country and of its commerce.

In order to make out the plaintiff's caſe, in the firſt place they have called Baſil Cunningham, who was ſerjeant-major in the royal artillery at Minorca in 1771. He ſays, that the plaintiff was there at that time (it is agreed upon all hands that he is a native of the iſland of Minorca). When the plaintiff was brought into priſon, an order was given out to put three additional men upon the guard to do duty over the priſoner Fabrigas: this was 24 hours after he had been in cuſtody. The priſon was called Number 1, and is a priſon where thoſe charged or guilty of capital crimes or for deſertion are generally put. He was brought there by a party of ſoldiers, and the witneſs thinks hand-cuffed. It was afterwards admitted that he was. He was confined there four or five days. The centinels informed the witneſs, that they had orders that he ſhould have no converſation with any but the prevoſt-marſhal, and that was put into the general orders: in fact, that no one did viſit him, as he knew of. The prevoſt-marſhal has the cuſtody of perſons accuſed of capital crimes, and keeps the key of the priſon. He ſays, that the plaintiff lived like a gentleman in the iſland. He ſays that he the witneſs was at St. Phillip's, and that the plaintiff was not tried for any crime. This witneſs is croſs-examined, and ſays he has ſeen the plaintiff at different times for eight or nine years: he never heard but that he was a quiet inoffenſive ſubject: the plaintiff lived in St. Phillip's, and was impriſoned in St. Phillip's caſtle. This witneſs was there before Mr. Moſtyn became the governor: Mr. Johnſton was the governor when the witneſs came firſt to that iſland.

James Tweedy.---He was a corporal in the royal artillery in 1771, and was ſerjeant of the guard; and in the middle of September the plaintiff was delivered a priſoner by the ſoldiers of the 61ſt regiment. He ſays he was in priſon in Number 1.; that there were orders from the adjutant-lieutenant not to let any one converſe with him; he heard the adjutant read it: the adjutant's duty is to deliver the orders of the commander in chief. To relieve us from any farther examination relative to that, it was admitted by my brother Davy that it was done by the defendant's order. Then a book is produced to you, and the title of it is, ' orders delivered to the ' troops in Minorca for the year 1771.' ' 15th Sept. 1771. In order to re- ' lieve the main guard at St. Phillip's, which now mounts a centinel extra- ' ordinary upon Anthony Fabrigas, confined in priſon Number 1, gene- ' ral Moſtyn orders, that three men be added to the artillery-guard in the ' Caſtle-Square, as they are moſt contiguous, and that duty taken by them. ' The centinel muſt be poſted night and day, and is to ſuffer no perſon what- ' ever to approach the grate in the door of the ſaid priſon, either to look in ' or have any communication with the priſoner, the prevoſt-marſhal ex- ' cepted, who is conſtantly to keep the key in his poſſeſſion.' Then the witneſs goes on, and ſays the plaintiff's wife and two children applied to ſee the plaintiff; that they were not permitted to come nearer than 30 yards of the priſon; that the plaintiff lay upon boards; he had no bed: his wife brought bedding, but was not permitted to carry it to him. He ſays the guard was ſure to be troubled if they had ſuffered any one to come to him, if they had been guilty of a breach of the order. He ſubſiſted upon bread and water: that when perſons are confined for capital offences, they have the proviſions of the iſland, bread and beef, brought them. He ſays that no one attempted to bring any to the plaintiff, becauſe the order was ſo ſtrict. There was an air-hole at the top of the priſon; a centinel was placed to keep any perſon from approaching it; and ſays that was not done in any inſtance before, even of deſerters. He ſays the plaintiff had a wife and five children. He never heard him ſpeak diſreſpectful of the governor, only he complained whilſt in priſon of his ſufferings.

William Johns was garriſon-gunner at Minorca in 71. He had been there nine years. He knew the plaintiff, who lived genteelly, as much ſo as any one in St. Phillip's. He ſays the plaintiff was brought to priſon by a file of men. Then he was going on about hand-cuffing, and ſo on, which the defendant's counſel admitted, as deſcribed by the laſt witneſs; but he was not kept hand-cuffed in priſon. He ſays the priſon is a ground-floor, and is ſet apart for capital offenders. The firſt day he was in priſon, his ſon, a lad of fifteen, came to ſee him, and had proviſions in a baſket. He deſired the men upon duty to let him carry them to his father, and they refuſed him. You ſee, gentlemen, it is owing to thoſe ſtrict orders, that no man was to have acceſs to him.

John Craig is a matroſs. He ſays he was at Minorca in 1771. He had been there nine years. He knew the plaintiff to be in very good circumſtances; that is, he was ſo reckoned by people in the iſland. This witneſs ſays, that he did duty upon him when he was in priſon, and none were admitted to ſee him: that his wife and child were refuſed. He ſays, that after five or ſix days confinement, the witneſs was at the quay, and ſaw him put on board a veſſel that was under ſail. He ſays, this was done between three and four in the morning. He ſays his wife and child came down then to ſpeak to him, but the centinel would not let them come near him, nor let the witneſs ſpeak to him, though he wanted ſo to do. Then it is admitted that he was baniſhed, by Mr. Moſtyn's order, to Spain for one year: he ordered him to be landed at Carthagena, and it was ſo done.

Colonel James Bidulph ſays, he has been at Minorca; that he knew the plaintiff in June 63. He ſtaid there, I think, till the year 71. He ſays the plaintiff appeared to him as one of the what he calls the ſecond ſort of people: he was reputed to have ſome houſes and vineyards: he had a father living. He ſays, that he was not received as one of the nobleſſe, but a sa gentleman. He ſays, ' I ſhould call him a kind of a gentleman farmer.' It was ſaid by the counſel, that the nobleſſe comprehends all the gentry; but upon my aſking the witneſs, he tells you, ' No: they make a very conſiderable diſtinction of the higher and inferior nobleſſe;' ſo that he is what you may call in England in the light of the middling claſs of men. He ſays, that as far as he obſerved, he behaved very well: and you ſee this gentleman ſpeaks from 63 to 71, that he behaved very well, and had a very good character. He ſays, that he often employed him to get wine and other things, and he diſpatched his commiſſion very well. He ſays he principally kept company at Citadella with a don Vigo and don Sanchio, who were two of the firſt rank there (that is I think, the capital of the iſland); that he always behaved with very great decency. And, gentlemen, you are told, that the defendant is a lieutenant-general, governor of the iſland of Minorca, and has a regiment of dragoons. This is the evidence in ſupport of this action by the plaintiff.

Why then, on behalf of the defendant, they tell you that they ſhall make out this juſtification; that they ſhall ſhew to you that this man behaved in a very turbulent and diſorderly ſort of way; that he behaved with ſuch earneſtneſs, and in ſuch a manner, under ſuch circumſtances, as tended to incite and to raiſe a ſedition. And certainly, gentlemen, if that is the caſe, it is a matter of very ſerious and momentous concern indeed. For the governor of a garriſon, without a poſſibility of calling in another armed force to ſuppreſs it, to quiet them if an inſurrection ſhould be ſtirred up and begin amongſt them, it is to be ſure of very great moment and importance. For a perſon intruſted in ſo high and important a ſtation, and of ſuch a delicate and ticklish ſort, as the government of the iſland, the governor ſhould be extremely vigilant to ſuppreſs the firſt ſeeds of mutiny and ſedition. This they ſay they ſhall be able to ſhew you. But, ſay they, if we ſhall not be able to make out this juſtification ſtrictly and duly, according to the way in which it is pleaded; yet, ſay they, we ſhall lay ſuch circumſtances before you, ſhewing that the general behaviour of the plaintiff was of that kind, and of that complexion, that it will weigh with you by no means to give large damages. This is what I think was pretty much the ſubſtance of what the gentlemen have inſiſted upon by way of opening the defendant's caſe.

Why then, in the firſt place, though it was read at the concluſion of the parole evidence, I may remind you of the ſeveral matters in writing that have been read; and I think it would be but miſpending your time for me to read them at large over again to you. For when I have ſo done, I am ſure I ſhall not be able to do it with more diſtinctneſs than the ingenious officer under me has done: and when I have finiſhed, they would juſt as much be out of your memory as they are now. But you will remember perfectly the nature of the proceedings. I purpoſe to collect them as well as I can into a focus; to bring the pith of them as well as I can to you. The true ground of the diſpute was this: This Fabrigas the plaintiff wanted, as you underſtand, the advantage of an order of his late majeſty in council, in the year 1752, by which, keeping under the afforation, not exceeding it, but keeping under it, every one was to have a right of ſelling wines, ſo as he did not exceed the afforation. Really, gentlemen, an exceeding good plan this is; and that is, a regulation of prices to keep people from impoſing in the moſt immoderate manner on the inhabitants. Very likely, a ſyſtem of ſomething of the like ſort would not be improper, but be of very conſiderable uſe even in this metropolis, for what I know. But then it ſeems that this order laſted only from the year 52, during the government of general Blakeney. When general Johnſton ſucceeded general Blakeney as governor of this iſland, he thought proper to make an alteration in that order; and the ſubſtance of the alteration which he made was, that for the future it ſhould not be in the ſuburbs of St. Phillip's (you underſtand, gentlemen, this iſland is divided into, I think, four or five departments—four beſides this arraval, as it is called, of St. Phillip's); and that for the future it ſhall not be ſold promiſcuouſly by every one when the afforation was made, but that for the future the four wards of the arraval of St. Phillip's ſhould draw lots, and ſo take it in ſucceſſion: I ſuppoſe, ſell one after another till the wine is diſpoſed of. And it does ſeem to me by the evidence which has been given by one of the witneſſes, which you will hear more fully ſtated by and by, it ſeems better than when ſold helter ſkelter and promiſcuouſly. And this regulation was purſued with ſome advantage. Then you ſee the plaintiff wanted to go back to the firſt order of 52, which is the order of the king in council. From thence you ſee all this buſineſs ſprung, and from Allimundo's ſelling wine. That is one grievance that was complained of, and which ſeemed to be pretty material, I confeſs, as it ſtrikes me; becauſe I recollect, that by one of the orders it is expreſsly forbid that the officers or judges, or any of them, ſhould have any intermeddling with trade or traffic. Now the complaint of the plaintiff againſt this Allimundo is, that he who had the check upon all the reſt, this muſtaſtaph, buys great quantities of grapes, and makes a vaſt quantity of wine himſelf. So while he kept the others under check, he ſells his own wine. Therefore that is another thing to be conſidered of. Therefore you ſee there are repeated petitions upon this occaſion. And I will only ſay this: that to be ſure it turns out at length to have been a miſtake in Mr. Wright's evidence, that that number of 150 perſons that were mentioned by the defendant's counſel as people by him to be produced to back his petition, or people with which his petition ſhould be backed, that he conſidered as a mob, becauſe he takes it down in writing himſelf: and when it comes to be read, it does appear that the expreſſion of the plaintiff was, that he would bring 150 people with him, dealers in wine and grapes, in order to ſhew that his petition was exceedingly reaſonable, and would be agreeable to them. Now that you ſee is the ſubſtance of this writing, together with the ſeveral particulars, orders, and proceedings, which I dare ſay you have in your memory. I muſt obſerve this, to be ſure, theſe gentlemen are not bred in the train of the law, and in a courſe of legal proceedings; but general Moſtyn ſeems to me to be as inquiſitive as he poſſibly can to find out the bottom of this thing. It does not appear from the witneſſes that the general had the leaſt ſelf-intereſt to ſerve in this buſineſs of his own, no profit or advantage to himſelf; there is no evidence whatever, not a ſpark of that ſort that appears. He ſends to Dr. Oliver and Dr. Markadal to make enquiry into this matter. He ſends to them, and deſires to know their opinion. He convokes together a council of the field-officers: and then they are of opinion upon the whole of this buſineſs, whether right or wrong is not to the preſent queſtion: but it ſtrikes me upon this evidence, that this general Moſtyn does ſeem to me to be extremely ſolicitous and deſirous to inform himſelf as well as he can, what is to be done upon the occaſion: and at length it ends in a general anſwer, ſuch as it was, that it would be very right to baniſh this man. Now they proceed to call ſeveral witneſſes.

James Wright ſays, he reſided in Minorca from January 71 to the middle of the year 72, as ſecretary to the defendant Mr. Moſtyn the governor. He tells you that this iſland is divided into four diſtricts, excluſive of the arraval of St. Phillip's, which the witneſs always underſtood to be ſeparate and diſtinct from the others, and under the immediate order of the governor (you will obſerve, that it is in that diſtrict that the fortification ſtands): ſo, ſays he, that no magiſtrate of Mahon could go there to exerciſe any function, without leave firſt obtained from the governor. The whole iſland, he ſays, is governed by the Spaniſh laws, ſubject to be varied by the governor; but not ſubject to that variation in reſpect to meum and tuum of property, but as to the internal police of the iſland. And he tells you, that his proclamation, with a penalty annexed, is of ſuch force, that where the penalty is annexed, if it is broken, the party is ſubject to it, and is liable to be impriſoned for non-payment. He ſays that the party is ſeized and brought into the court of the chief juſtice criminal.—I would aſk a queſtion of Mr. Wright. Has this juſtice criminal a commiſſion to try offences?

Mr. Wright. He has the king's commiſſion to try and to hear all cauſes when they come before him. He brings them to the governor, who ſigns them; and till the governor has ſigned them, they are not valid.

Q. But when the governor has once ſigned them, has this gentleman the juriſdiction to try offenders?

A. The aſſeſſeur criminal, and the officer fiſcal, who ſits as judge with him, bring their opinion to the governor, who hears and approves of their opinion, and ſigns it.

Q. Do you make any diſtinction between one part of the iſland and another?

A. The arraval of St. Phillip's is ſo exempt from all kind of juriſdiction, (at leaſt was, when I was there) that it is a rule in the iſland, that if any body dies, comes by their death by any accident, drowned and fiſhed up, that the criminal aſſeſſeur, with I believe the fiſcal and his officers, goes to the dead body. They take the thumb, and ſay, Who killed you? This is a form they go through by way of bringing about a kind of inquiſition taken by a coroner. Whenever they have occaſion to go there, they aſk the governor leave, if within the arraval; and there is a particular inſtance of a ſoldier's wife being killed by her huſband.

Q. Suppoſe a perſon is guilty of a murder within the arraval, who is he tried by?

A. The aſſeſſeur criminal goes and takes inquiſition. That he does not do till he has the governor's leave.

Q. Suppoſe a perſon is murdered, and the murder is found out, to be ſure you don't let the murderer eſcape with impunity?—A. Yes.

Q. Now let me aſk you, within the arraval by whom is he tried?

A. The governor appoints, but he generally appoints the aſſeſſeur.

Q. Then the governor does not try him himſelf?

A. He never tries any thing of the ſort.

Q. Then he deputes ſomebody to try him?—A. Yes.

Q. Suppoſe in leſſer offences, of theft or riot, does he not appoint other people?

A. In ſmall offences, the muſtaſtaph.

Mr. Juſtice Gould. Gentlemen, there was, in conſequence of this affair, a proclamation, that no memorial, unleſs for mercy, could be preſented, unleſs it was firſt ſigned by an advocate, admitted in their courts. He ſays that the king in council iſſues, upon application, alterations, which are regiſtered in the court of royal government; which includes, as I underſtand him, both the civil and the criminal juriſdiction. He ſays that the defendant being much teazed by the plaintiff, by repeated applications, directed Mr. Wright to inquire what ſort of a man he was. He tells you, that the plaintiff's father has ſome ſmall vineyards; that the plaintiff is a lover of politics; that he ſpends five days in ſeven in talking of politics; that at that time he believes the plaintiff had no property at all. Then he ſpeaks as to the character of Mr. Moſtyn. It ſeems not to be diſputed at leaſt but he is an officer, and a man of as great humanity as poſſible: no one exiſting has tenderer feelings, and his conduct in general is in that manner. Then this gentleman goes through the whole detail of theſe ſeveral writings which have been read to you, which, as I ſaid before, I ſhall not take up your time, for the reaſons I have already given you, in repeating over again, for you have heard them all read. He tells you, amongſt other things, that the inhabitants of the arraval ſent a petition to Mr. Moſtyn that the regulation might continue, and not be altered, as the plaintiff deſired. He tells you that the plaintiff having been with the general's aid-de-camp, this witneſs met him, and civilly deſired him to point out what he wiſhed: that it ſhould be done. He ſays there was one Mr. Vedall that acted as an interpreter, and a prieſt, one Seguy, that joined with Mr. Wright to preſs the plaintiff to go home and mind his affairs, and not to bring himſelf into trouble. Then this gentleman ſwears, that Mr. Vedall ſaid from the plaintiff as interpreter, that he would come with 150 men to back his petition, or with a petition backed with 150 men. This gentleman ſays, he underſtood by that a mob. I ſhall preſently ſtate to you, as I have already hinted to you, the miſtake in that reſpect. He ſays there was a long converſation by Vedall with the plaintiff, as his interpreter, to deſire him to deſiſt: he ſtill repeated the ſame. Then he ſays that he informed the governor, that there were people that he underſtood that were to accompany this man as a mob the next day. That the general ſent for the officers to meet him the next morning. They accordingly came. A large number of people were expected, but only four people of the inferior order brought a petition. They were diſmiſſed to go home peaceably. That the reſult of the whole was, that the plaintiff was baniſhed from the iſland. He ſays, that the defendant ſent him the witneſs to the chief juſtice civil and criminal, who are both Minorquins, to aſk what was the governor's power in this caſe? They ſent word back, that his power extended over the man in any ſhape he pleaſed; and if he choſe to baniſh him, he might; they would anſwer it with their ears. He carried the anſwer to the defendant; but however, doubting himſelf of the law, the aſſeſſeur civil delivered him an order in writing, which was dated in 1590; and that imported, that though it was very fit for the governor to aſk the advice of the aſſeſſeurs civil, yet that the governor was not by any means bound to follow it; that it was not deciſive, as in matters of property. He ſays, that the aſſeſſeur civil, upon this occaſion, lent his officer, which he called his tipſtaff, to the governor, to apprehend the plaintiff, who accordingly was taken, was kept in priſon about five days, and then baniſhed.

Then he tells you, upon his croſs-examination, that Allimundo makes wine and ſells it in groſs, but not, as he believes, in retail. He ſays that the Minorquin language is very bad Spaniſh. Then he is deſired to look at the paper; for he had a paper, with which, in giving his evidence, he refreſhed his memory; but upon looking to the words in that paper relative to the 150 men, the words that he has ſet down are,

'The ſame day Mr. Fabrigas came for an anſwer to his petition, he 'told the governor's ſecretary, that he ſhould come the next day with a 'petition of people concerned in grapes and wine, which they would 'ſign and come with themſelves, to the number of 150.'

So that you ſee this gentleman ſays, as I apprehend him, (I don't know whether this paper that he has now produced is the original paper that he ſet down the minutes on for recollection and for remembrance at the time: I don't know whether that is ſo or not—however, it may be a copy of it) he ſaid he ſet it down upon looſe pieces of paper at firſt. If that be the caſe, the ſtrong probability is, that this entry that I have read to you muſt have been ſet down recently after the converſation. You ſee the words are, that it was to be 150 people concerned in grapes and wines. Then he tells you, that upon the 11th the governor and the field-officers met, and, as you heard upon his original examination, received a memorial by four men ſigned by blank perſons — you ſee the number is left blank. This gentleman ſays he cannot recollect the number. He ſays he was counting them, but he believes there were more than 40, between 41 and 47, he can't be exact; but the number of perſons by whom it is ſigned is in this copy blank. The purport of this memorial is to deſire that the old practice may be purſued. To which he anſwered by the officers, that they ſhould return home, and behave as good and peaceable ſubjects to his majeſty ought to do. I have anticipated it. I ſee he ſays, according to his memory, there were from 41 to 47 ſignatures. There were a great many marks, you underſtand, to this petition delivered by the four men. He can't ſay he counted it through, and can't affirm what the number was. He was further examined: and he ſays, that upon ſtrict enquiry it did not appear that above one in ten ſupported the plaintiff's deſire;

he is ſure he allows a greater proportion than the truth was: and he ſays he informed the defendant Mr. Moſtyn of that. He made the enquiry at the defendant's requeſt, in order to diſcover the ſenſe of the inhabitants.

John Pleydell, aid-de-camp to the governor, ſays, that on the 9th of September 71, the plaintiff aſked him to ſee the governor. He told him if he had any thing for the governor, he would deliver it. After a little heſitation the plaintiff delivered a memorial, and deſired him to tell the governor he ſhould come the next day accompanied by 200 or 250 inhabitants of St. Phillip's. He ſays he carried the memorial to the governor, and told him what the plaintiff had ſaid; upon which he ſays, that the governor that day ſent to the commanding officers of the corps to meet at the governor's the next morning, to ſee how he ſhould receive the plaintiff, and the people that were to come with him. Now here you ſee in the evidence given by this Mr. Pleydell, there is not that explanation of the nature of the end and deſign of theſe 200 or 250 people being to come with him, as there is in that memorandum that Mr. Wright produced: for this is in general ſaid 200 or 250 people. And I can't help remarking to you, that it ſeemed to make an impreſſion on the governor, and to alarm him: for it was upon his delivering this meſſage to him that Pleydell ſays he did deſire the field and commanding officers of the corps to aſſemble the next morning, to ſee how he ſhould receive the plaintiff and the people that were to accompany him. But he ſays, inſtead of the plaintiff and ſuch a number of people, four men came the next day and brought a memorial. He believes all the commanding officers were there. He was told by the governor that the ſenſe of all the officers was, that the plaintiff ſhould be taken up as a dangerous and ſeditious perſon: he ſays he had conſulted the Minorquin judges, and their opinion was the ſame with the military officers. He ſays this gentleman is an inhabitant of the arraval, juſt by the glacis of the fort; and ſays that he kept his father's vineyard: and that the defendant, far from being a tyrannical over-bearing man, is one of much temper and humanity, and the witneſs ſerved under him the laſt war.

Upon his croſs-examination, he underſtood that by the plaintiff's ſaying he ſhould bring 200 or 250 men, that it was to enforce or give weight to his petition, to certify that that was their opinion; that is, that they concurred in the plaintiff's opinion: but, ſays he, ſo many people coming together is an act in itſelf of a tumultuous kind. He ſays the people in general wiſhed to have Mr. Johnſton's regulation continued. As to the memorial that was brought by the four men, he did not read it, and had it not in his hand; but by juſt the ſuperficial glance he had of it, he thinks there might be 50 or 60 names to it.

Robert Hudſon, fort-adjutant, ſays, that upon the 10th or 11th of September, the muſtaſtaph of St. Phillip's told him, that upon delivering out a proclamation (though I ought not to ſum that up, for what this Allimundo ſaid is no ſort of evidence)—but he ſays that having received this intelligence (ſo far it is material) he did give the governor an information of it: the governor was then in Mahon. He ſays, that before the plaintiff made this objection, he never heard any objections to Mr. Johnſton's regulation; that it was to prevent the wine from turning ſour, by being ſold in that hurrying ſort of way; that great quantities of it produce fluxes and other diſeaſes among the garriſon, for there are few cellars it ſeems in the garriſon. He ſays after this regulation, in ſeveral years experience, none of the wine did turn ſour. Then there was a queſtion that occurred to me to aſk, whether the ſerving it out in this ſparing manner did not influence the price. They ſaid, no, becauſe the afforation fixed the price that it could not exceed it.

Colonel Patrick Mackellar ſays he knows the plaintiff; he was called Red Toney: I ſuppoſe he has red hair. He ſays he bore a very bad character; that he was a ſeditious, troubleſome, drunken, ſhuffling fellow; that he had many complaints againſt him from two muſtaſtaphs. He was in the iſland from 36 to 50, and again from May 60 to laſt May. He tells you the arraval of St. Phillip's is ſurrounded by a lime-wall on one ſide, and the other ſide a ditch; that the arraval is a royalty, where the governor has a greater power than any where elſe; that the judges can't interfere but by the governor's conſent.—That correſponds exactly with the explanation that Mr. Wright gives.—He ſays, in other parts of the iſland there are jurats, but in the royalty there is only this muſtaſtaph, who is appointed by the governor or commander in chief, and is at pleaſure diſplaced by him. He takes care of weights, meaſures, and markets, and of all wine and the expenditure of it, and ſettles little diſputes between the inhabitants in the firſt inſtance. That the magiſtrates at Mahon put the afforation within their juriſdictions. This muſtaſtaph does not make any afforation himſelf, but acquieſces under that of Mahon: he only ſignifies the afforation that has been made at Mahon. The Minorquins are in general governed by the Spaniſh laws. When it ſerves their purpoſe, they plead the Engliſh laws. Some are well affected to our country; ſome are not. He attended the governor once or twice on account of the plaintiff; and he ſays that the general opinion of all the officers was, that the plaintiff was a dangerous perſon, and that it was proper to take him up and bring him to puniſhment; and were of opinion to baniſh him. He ſays the defendant is a good officer, a polite well-bred man, that he carried his command in the genteeleſt manner, and is a perſon of great humanity.

On his croſs-examination he ſays, that he and the other field-officers met by the defendant's deſire, to know what was their opinion upon this buſineſs. Two of the judges of the iſland thought it intirely in the governor's breaſt to do as he pleaſed; but there was no trial. He does not recollect whether major Norton was of that opinion: it was the opinion of the majority. He was aſked whether major Rigby was of that opinion or not? He ſays he can't ſay how that was, but does not remember that any one officer diſſented from that opinion.

Then Edward Blakeney, ſecretary to the governor of that name, is examined. He ſays that nothing can be executed in the arraval of St. Phillip's but by the governor's permiſſion: it is a royalty; he has the abſolute government there. He ſays that gen. Blakeney a few months after his arrival in the year 48, baniſhed two Franciſcan friars into Spain or Italy: that was in time of peace. He ſays there was afterwards by a great deal of interpoſition leave given to thoſe people to return. He ſays that the power itſelf was never diſputed, and he took it to be handed down from the Spaniards, by whoſe laws, as you obſerve, the Minorquins are governed, and at their own requeſt. He ſays the judges have applied to the witneſs for the governor's leave to execute proceſſes in the arraval. He ſays the late king ſent four regiments to relieve the troops ſtationed there, (an order of humanity, like his majeſty) and to have all the wives and children brought home: however, a prieſt took a liking to one of the young women, and would not deliver her up. The prieſt was baniſhed; the conſequence of which was, the girl was delivered up, and the prieſt was brought back again. He gives theſe as three inſtances where people were baniſhed from the iſland. He ſays that theſe friars, two Franciſcans, were as he believes natives, Minorquins. This is the parole evidence that is given on the part of the defendant. I have already ſtated to you the ſubſtance of all that written evidence: you have heard it, and you are fully maſters of all the circumſtances attending this cauſe.

Now, gentlemen, it is for your conſideration, whether the defendant, general Moſtyn, has made out his juſtification; whether he has proved that the defendant was guilty of a riot, and of a diſturbance, and that he endeavoured to excite and to ſtir up a mutiny and a ſedition in the garriſon. If that is the caſe, I ſhould imagine, gentlemen, the plaintiff will appear to you as a perſon of a very dangerous diſpoſition; and that ſome very ſtrict methods muſt be neceſſary to be taken in ſuch a ſituation, in order to preſerve the garriſon, and to prevent an inſurrection. If it is inſinuated to the ſoldiers that they are abuſed by the officers under the governor, by the governor's connivance, or by his remiſſneſs; we will ſay, though he has no kind of intereſt in it, but by his groſs encouragement, they are oppreſſed and impoſed upon;—ſuppoſe ſuch a perſuaſion ſhould be infuſed into the people compoſing the garriſon, I think it is very clear, and I need not argue to you, to ſhew what dangerous conſequences may reſult from that. Then you will conſider how this caſe ſtands in that reſpect. You ſee that this perſon, after ſeveral years (a new regulation having been made by governor Johnſton) is for ſetting up again and reviving an old regulation made in 52; and that he could not prevail ſo to do.---Then the ſenſe of the iſland was to be taken. It is in the governor's power to reſcind this, as I apprehend, becauſe it is not diſputed but that by his commiſſion, according to his plea, he is intruſted with the whole civil and military government of the iſland: and I preſume, however, if he was to have made ſuch an alteration, he had authority to do it: the governor himſelf, in ſhort, is intruſted with it. Then this perſon wants to ſet that old buſineſs on foot again; and he does produce, (for ſo I muſt take it from the writing that that gentleman has produced) he does mean to ſhew to the governor, that there are a vaſt number of people of his ſenſe in the affair. The misfortune of it is, however, that this is not expreſly conveyed to the governor; becauſe, according to the whole belief of the agent, though he underſtood that it was meant to give weight to the petition, not to proceed to direct violence; for what I can find, that was not directly explained to general Moſtyn. Now you will conſider upon this evidence, whether you are ſatisfied that this was ſuch a behaviour in the plaintiff, as to afford a juſt concluſion, that he was a man that was about to ſtir up a ſedition and a mutiny in the garriſon; or whether he meant no more than earneſtly to preſs his ſuit, and to endeavour to obtain redreſs from what ſeemed to him to be a grievance. If you ſhall ſee it in that latter light, to be ſure there is no queſtion at all that he will be intitled to recover in this action. As for the damages, I ſhall not ſay a word upon that matter, becauſe it is your province to conſider on it upon all the circumſtances. Then there is another conſideration, which will be a legal conſideration: that ſuppoſing you ſhould be of opinion that this was really a ſeditious behaviour in this plaintiff, which you will conſider of, and alſo whether he acted in ſuch a manner as to ſtir up ſedition, you will be pleaſed to ſay That when you bring in your verdict. The next thing is, that ſuppoſing you ſee the plaintiff's conduct in that light as a mutinous purpoſe, whether the defendant could be warranted to proceed in that manner. That is, to be ſure, a matter of very great conſequence. It is not like perſons in this country, in England, where no freeman ſhall be baniſhed his country; which is carried to ſuch an extent, that lord Coke tells us, that it is not in the power of the king to ſend a man againſt his will even to be the lord-lieutenant of Ireland (I don't believe there are many gentlemen that would recoil at that): but it could not be done, becauſe it would be an exile: you drive a man againſt his will out of his native country. But however, this is a caſe you ſee in a conquered iſland, in a ceded iſland. And certainly I ſhould conceive myſelf, that if in a garriſon where it is abſolutely neceſſary to keep down all theſe mutinous ſpirits, from the apparent reaſon of danger, that it muſt certainly be lawful for the governor at leaſt to lay a man up in priſon that is turbulent. But I ſhould doubt a great deal myſelf; it will be a matter that you, gentlemen, will have an opportunity to conſider, if you pleaſe, if you ſhall be of opinion that the plaintiff's behaviour was ſeditious; and that is the reaſon that I deſire you to attend to that, and tell me when you give in your verdict. It would be carrying matters to a very great length indeed, in my apprehenſion, to ſay, that you ſhould exile and baniſh a man from his native country. I cannot, ſitting here and as at preſent adviſed, think that even in ſuch a ſituation that could be warranted. I cannot think but that a perſon might be ſecured and confined, in order to be brought to trial, and properly puniſhed for it. I leave it to you under theſe obſervations, and you will conſider upon the whole of it, what damages you ſhould pleaſe to give to the plaintiff. As to the defendant, you hear the character he bears from all the witneſſes: a man of great humanity, who has been guilty of an inordinate uſe of his power, but not with a malevolent, bad, and wicked deſign. To be ſure, you will not deal out the damages with the ſame view as you would againſt a man that acted clearly and demonſtrably with malice. It is your province, gentlemen, to conſider all the circumſtances, and to give in your verdict accordingly.

The jury withdrew, and in about an hour returned, and gave in their verdict for the plaintiff, with three thouſand pounds damages, and all coſts of ſuit.—And at the ſame time ſaid, that, in their opinion, the plaintiff was not guilty of mutiny or ſedition, or acted in any way tending thereto.

Further proceedings in this cauſe.

THE counſel for the defendant, while the jury withdrew to conſider their verdict, tendered to the judge minutes of a bill of exceptions; and on the fourth day of Michaelmas-Term, the court of Common-Pleas was moved for a new trial.

The defendant's counſel made his motion on two grounds.

Firſt, for exceſs of damages; alledging that the jury had proceeded on a miſtake, for they had found that the plaintiff was not guilty of mutiny or ſedition; whereas he inſiſted it was moſt plain from the written evidence, that the plaintiff had endeavoured to make the garriſon believe that he was their friend.

Secondly, that a new trial ought to be granted, becauſe this action could not be maintained, as the court had no juriſdiction.

The rule to ſhew cauſe was, of courſe, granted.

On the 25th of November, Mr. juſtice Gould reported the evidence, which agreed with the printed trial. On the 26th, it was ſolemnly argued on the firſt objection of exceſs of damages, the court not permitting the defendant's counſel to argue the ſecond objection, as they ſaid it would be introducing a new mode of practice, which might eventually be prejudicial to ſuitors; and as the bill of exceptions went with the record to the court of King's Bench, that was the proper court to determine on it.

I HAVE always conſidered this mode of application for a new trial, as very ſalutary to the ſuitors, who may be injured by miſtakes; and likewiſe to the jury, as it reforms their errors, if they commit any, and is a happy ſubſtitute for the much more grievous proceeding that the common law had directed. With regard to the interpoſition of the courts of juſtice on the quantum of damages, where the ſubject of the ſuit is contract, the court has an eaſy rule to go by in rectifying the miſtakes of the jury, becauſe there is a certain teſt and ſtandard. As for inſtance, if a man ſhould bring an action on a note for a hundred pounds, and the jury ſhould give for damages a thouſand pounds under the idea of intereſt, they would go upon a miſtaken principle, as it is certain the party could not have ſuſtained an injury adequate to that compenſation: the damages would be exceſſive, and the court would correct it. But in perſonal wrongs, it is much more difficult to draw a line. I do not go ſo far as to ſay, that in perſonal wrongs the court will never interpoſe, even upon the article of exceſſive damages, if they are outrageous, and appear ſo to the court; that is, as my brother Gould expreſſed it, if it appears, in giving the damages, that the jury did not act with deliberation, but with paſſion, partiality, or corruption. As for inſtance, if two ordinary men ſhould quarrel at an alehouſe, and one ſhould give the other a fillip upon the noſe, and a thouſand pounds ſhould be given for damages, which is ten times more than both the parties are worth, ſuch damages would be evidence that the jury had not acted with the deliberation that the adminiſtration of juſtice requires. It is a perſonal tort, but the damages are exceſſive. There are other circumſtances, where the court, even upon exceſſive damages, might interpoſe: and I think the counſel for governor Moſtyn have very wiſely endeavoured to ground themſelves upon ſuch a principle in this cauſe; which is, that the jury, in aſſeſſing the compenſation for the injury, have proceeded on a miſtake. It is poſſible that in many inſtances that miſtake may ariſe from the direction of the court; for the court may perhaps direct the jury to attend to a circumſtance, that in point of law is not proved, or is not the ſubject-matter for their conſideration: or it is poſſible that the jury may ſo miſtake the evidence, as to believe the fact to be true, when it is not ſo: then it comes to be a proper motion for a new trial, becauſe the verdict is contrary to evidence. Or the jury may give credit to ſuch circumſtances, which either have not been proved, or are not true, and they may aggravate the damages upon that account: they then act under a miſtake, which moſt certainly ought to be rectified. That is the ground upon which the preſent application is made. But if you conſider it in your own mind, it will neceſſarily reſult to this propoſition, that the jury have found a fact contrary to evidence. As my brother Davy was aware that there might be ſome difficulty in maintaining that propoſition, he put it into another ſhape, and ſaid it was a circumſtance that was proper for the jury to conſider as a ground for mitigating the damages; inſtead of which, they had from that circumſtance aggravated the damages. So that, upon the whole, it will ſtill recur to the ſame propoſition, that they have acted upon a miſtake, in giving aggravated damages upon a fact, which they have found contrary to evidence. For they were unanimouſly of opinion, that what the plaintiff did, was not done with any ſeditious view, or tending thereto, but was an earneſt preſſing of a ſuit to be relieved from a grievance ſuppoſed. That was the inquiry they were particularly ordered by my brother Gould to make; and that was the anſwer that they gave. Now, if in point of fact they were ſo miſtaken, as that they ought not to have been of opinion that the plaintiff did not act with a ſeditious view, but was only preſſing importunately a ſuit for relief from a ſuppoſed grievance, then they have given damages upon a falſe ſuppoſition; they have given ſuch as are not proportionate to the injury received. The argument then ſeems to me to come to this, that they have believed a fact which they ought not to have believed, becauſe the proof was againſt it. We are therefore to conſider, whether the damages ought to have been raiſed ſo high or not. And there are two caſes inſiſted upon. One is the behaviour of Mr. Fabrigas, as tending to raiſe diſorder and ſedition in the government. The other is the conduct of governor Moſtyn, in extenuation of damages, as acting under a miſtake, and having taken the beſt advice the nature of his ſituation would admit. In order to underſtand this, we muſt ſee for a moment the ſituation the government ſtood in.

This iſland was conquered in 1708. The conquerors (no matter in what mode) had a right to impoſe what laws they pleaſed. Upon the ceſſion of the iſland, by the eleventh article of the treaty of Utrecht; part of the right of the conqueror was given up; for it is ſtipulated, that the inhabitants ſhall enjoy their honours, eſtates, and religion. So far therefore the right of the conqueror is reſtrained; but with regard to their laws, there was no ſtipulation, nor was it ever underſtood ſo by ſober people. It is well known that the earl of Stanhope and the duke of Argyle, as plenipotentiaries upon this ſubject, and afterwards my lord Bolingbroke, did aſſure the inhabitants, that they ſhould enjoy their own rights and privileges, ſtill ſubject to the ſupreme dominion of the conqueror. Thoſe rights and privileges which they were to enjoy, were the eſtabliſhed municipal laws of the iſland, under ſuch regulations as the legiſlature of this country ſhould impoſe upon them. This aſſurance, made at that time, has been attended to by government ever ſince; for they have had the enjoyment of their privileges ſo aſſured to them, and have had ſuch regulations, as the government and the nature of affairs have from time to time required.

The king in council, in the year 1752, (upon ſeveral complaints having been made againſt general Anſtruther, who had been the governor) made the regulation, as it is called, of 1752; by which the king in council intended to provide againſt that oppreſſive power of the governor, which the inhabitants had complained of, and that the people of the iſland ſhould be at liberty to ſell their wines at the price fixed by the jurats of the different terminos.——Theſe powers were ſoon found, or thought, to be abuſed; which occaſioned a repreſentation to be made by the then governor to the king in council, which produced the new regulation of 1753, which leaned on the other ſide, as the natives ſaid: for as the former was ſuppoſed to give too much power to the magiſtrates of the iſland, making them independent of the governor; ſo this threw too much power into the hands of the governor, and laid them too much at his mercy.

There is one thing mentioned in my brother Gould's report, which I think proper to take notice of, becauſe it ſhould not be ſo miſtaken. (a) one of the witneſſes in the cauſe repreſented to the jury, that in ſome particular caſes, eſpecially in criminal matters, the governor reſident upon the iſland does exerciſe a legiſlative power. It was groſs ignorance in that perſon to imagine ſuch a thing. I may ſay, it was impoſſible, that a man who lived upon the iſland, in the ſtation he had done, ſhould not know better, than to think that the governor had a civil and criminal power veſted in him. In the iſland, the governor is the king's ſervant: his commiſſion is from the king, and he is to execute the power he is inveſted with under that commiſſion, which is to execute the laws of Minorca under ſuch regulations as the king ſhall make in council. How does it ſtand after the conqueſt of this iſland in 1757, by the French, and the relinquiſhment of it upon the peace? When general Johnſton was ſent as deputy-governor, he thought fit to make a new regulation. Now, I conceive, it was a vain imagination in the witneſſes at the trial, (for we don't want to go to Minorca to underſtand the conſtitution of that iſland) it therefore was a vain imagination in the witneſſes to ſay, that there were five terminos in the iſland of Minorca. I have at various times ſeen a multitude of authentic documents and papers relative to that iſland, and I do not believe, in any one of them, that the idea of the arraval of St. Phillip's being a diſtinct juriſdiction was ever ſtarted. Mahon is one of the four terminos: St. Philip's, and all the diſtrict about it, is comprehended within the termino of Mahon. But, however, as it happens to lie near the glacis of the fortification, and the governor's power (I don't mean his legal authority) being there greater than it may be in more diſtant parts of the iſland, there has been a reſpect ſhewn him, a decency perhaps to the governor, which has prevented the magiſtrates interfering without his knowledge. But to ſuppoſe that there is a diſtinct juriſdiction, ſeparate from the government of the iſland, is ridiculous and abſurd: it is what I never did hear of, till it was mentioned in my brother Gould's report. General Johnſton made an alteration in the arraval of St. Phillip's, which is a diſtrict of a mile or two in circumference, with ſome few hundred inhabitants. He divided this into a ſubdiviſion of four other diſtricts, and annulled by his own authority the regulation of 1752, reſpecting the mode by which the wines were to be ſold. As far as appears in this cauſe, he did that without authority. If he had the ſanction of government, his inſtructions ſhould have appeared, if the defendant intended to avail himſelf of them. I only mean to be underſtood, that general Johnſton had no authority to ſuperſede the order of council by his own power; but at the ſame time it ſeems to be a very ſalutary proviſion; and if he had repreſented it to the king in council, no doubt but it would have been approved of. I may ſay that the inhabitants approved of it, becauſe from that time there never has been any complaint of it. A few years ago there were a multitude of complaints brought againſt the arbitrary acts, as they were called, and the oppreſſive conduct of this very general Johnſton. They were heard in a full council with a great deal of ſolemnity for a great number of days, and the council came into a reſolution upon them. This alteration of the order in 1752 was not one of their charges againſt him; therefore it is clear, that the inhabitants of the arraval did not at that time think it an oppreſſion.

We come now to the point of time, when Mr. Fabrigas complained of it. I will not condemn him for referring to the order of council. He had a right to know whether this alteration of governor Johnſton was made by authority, and whether it had the effect of the power of the king in council; therefore I do not condemn the thing itſelf. Mr. Fabrigas not having met with that ſucceſs which he expected, (though governor Moſtyn, I think, till the time of the arreſt and commitment, acted with a great deal of caution, judgment, and prudence, I can almoſt ſay impartiality) and not being ſatisfied with the opinion of the governor upon the repreſentation and defence of Allimundo, which he had never ſeen, deſires to ſee it. His petition is rejected. This produces a peeviſh application again and again to the governor, and from one complaint another ariſes. New grievances are ſuppoſed to be received, not only by Mr. Fabrigas, but by the inhabitants of the arraval at large: and I cannot ſay that I approve of the manner in which he did proſecute his claim: the effect of it is another thing. He certainly did not obſerve that decency and reſpect to the governor which he ought to have done. If the governor did not attend to his complaints, the king in council was open to him. We all know, that the way to the king in council has been purſued very often, where the governor has not attended to the complaints of the Minorquins. His expreſſions indeed have the appearance of humility and reſpect; but yet there is a petulance in the continuing his petitions, which might diſturb the governor. Thus the matter goes on; this man ſtill complaining, and earneſtly preſſing of his ſuit upon a grievance ſuppoſed, till the ſecretary informed the governor, that the plaintiff would come next day with his petition backed with 150 of the dealers in grapes and wine. This it is that is ſuppoſed to alarm the governor. Now I will not reflect ſo much upon the honour of any governor of the garriſon of fort St. Phillip's, as to ſuppoſe, that he really thought his garriſon was in any more danger than this court is at the preſent moment; nor will I ſuppoſe, that if he did think his garriſon was in danger, that he would have taken ſuch feeble means to defend it. The governor was diſconcerted by the petulance of the man, and was off his guard; and though he took the advice of thoſe who were the proper perſons to adviſe him there, yet he muſt have too much ſenſe to imagine, that the advice they gave him was ſuch as he could either in law or reaſon follow. I am not ſpeaking now of the law of this iſland; but it is totally contrary to all principles, and to every idea of juſtice in any country. But the next day, this petition is preſented by four men only. Then there is an end of all danger to the garriſon and the government; and you plainly ſee no diſturbance was meant; nor is there any evidence of his ſoliciting the people, of his breeding cabals among them, or exciting any tumult or diſorder. The plaintiff had, to ſay the worſt, only behaved himſelf ill in the mode of his importunity; and when he was open to the laws of that country (for ſuch laws I preſume there muſt be) if he had offended, he might have been proſecuted in the courts of criminal juriſdiction. Whether he acted improperly, from not having ſucceeded in prevailing upon the majority of the people to think he was right in deſiring to inforce the order of 1752, is not the queſtion: the people ſeemed to be content with the variation, or deviation, made by general Johnſton. Now when all theſe matters are over, this man is committed to priſon; and there is the firſt complaint: and I muſt take it upon this motion, that it was a falſe impriſonment. If the governor had ſecured him, nay, if he had barely committed him, that he might have been amenable to juſtice; and if he had immediately ordered a proſecution upon any part of his conduct; it would have been another queſtion, and might have received a different conſideration. But he commits him to the worſt priſon in the iſland; and in a way which I cannot conceive came from general Moſtyn. What could induce him to uſe a man with ſuch hardſhip and inhumanity? Was not putting him into priſon ſufficient? Why was he to be deprived of the ſociety of his wife and children, without being allowed any thing for his ſuſtenance but bread and water, and to lie upon the floor? In this condition he remains for ſix days: then comes a ſecond impriſonment; for I take the whole year to be a continuation of the falſe impriſonment. He is then confined on board a ſhip, under the idea of a baniſhment to Carthagena. I do believe Mr. Moſtyn was led into this, under the old practice of the iſland of Minorca, by which it was uſual to baniſh: I ſuppoſe the old Minorquins thought fit to adviſe him to this meaſure. But the governor knew that he could no more impriſon him for a twelvemonth, than that he could inflict the torture; yet the torture, as well as baniſhment, was the old law of Minorca, which fell of courſe when it came into our poſſeſſion. Every Engliſh governor knew he could not inflict the torture; the conſtitution of this country put an end to that idea. This man is then dragged on board a ſhip, with ſuch circumſtances of inhumanity and hardſhip, as I cannot believe of general Moſtyn; and he is carried into a foreign country, and of all countries the worſt; for I believe there are directions given, that no perſons ſhould go to Spain, or be permitted to quit the port of Carthagena. All his continuance in Spain, I look upon as a continuance of the falſe impriſonment; becauſe every conſtraint upon perſonal liberty, without legal authority, is a falſe impriſonment: and if a captain leaves a ſailor upon a deſert iſland, though he is left at liberty there, yet the keeping him from that place to which he had a right by law to come, is an impriſonment.

(a) Vide Mr. Wright's evidence, page 170.

If upon proper cauſe the courts of juſtice there had in a judicial way exerciſed any power which their laws would have ſupported; and which the laws of this country might not; what the effect of that would have been has nothing to do with this cauſe; for now we take it upon the general iſſue, not guilty. In this caſe, the man has been impriſoned under circumſtances of great hardſhip for twelve months, and kept from the communication of his family and his own concerns. In this ſituation he brings his action; and the jury have thought fit to give three thouſand pounds damages. To be ſure, three thouſand pounds is an immenſe ſum for a Minorquin to recover: my brother Davy thought proper to uſe the expreſſion of its being an outrageous ſum. To ſay what is the value of the liberty of a man's perſon, ſecluded from his family, under circumſtances of hardſhip, for twelve months, is a difficult matter. Men's minds will vary much about it: I ſhould think one thing, another would think another. In this caſe of perſonal wrongs, what has the law ſaid? The law has ſaid, that a jury of twelve men ſhall be the judges to determine and aſſeſs the compenſation for that perſonal wrong. We cannot but recollect what paſſed in thoſe unfortunate affairs that happened about the ſecretary of ſtate and a printer's boy. A ſervant is taken up under a miſtake, and carried to a better houſe than his own, is fed with better proviſions than he had of his own, and is treated better than he would have been treated when at home; yet he brings an action of falſe impriſonment, and has 300*l.* damages. It was more than he could earn for years. The court was applied to for a new trial, upon exceſſive damages. What did the court ſay? (and I never heard their judgment in that matter arraigned) ' We are not the judicature to determine upon the deliberative judgment ' of a jury, upon ſuch a ſubject as this. Have the jury exerciſed their ' judgment? or, is there any imputation upon their conduct except the ' idea of the compenſation not being proportioned? Not at all.' How can a court of juſtice, that is to determine upon law, ſet a value upon this, and ſay, it is wrong? What would be the conſequence of it? If we ſay this is wrong, we muſt ſay what is right. Then we are to tell the jury, 'You are not to find 3000*l.*' 'May we find 2000*l.* 1000*l.* 500*l.* or 100*l.*? Tell us where you think we ſhould be right?' 'We muſt not tell you; we have no authority to do that; but you muſt not give outrageous damages.' For tho' I may know in my own mind whereabouts I ſhould compenſate the injury, without ſaying whether it would be more or leſs than this, yet I cannot preſcribe to the jury what I think the value of perſonal liberty. But it is ſaid, that the governor did what he could in his ſituation; but was miſtaken. If he was miſtaken, it is a matter of mitigation before the jury, and it comes exactly to the ſame point. I preſume it was preſſed before the jury, and they paid ſuch attention to it as they thought proper; and therefore it would be totally evoking the cauſe from its proper determination to ſay, that the jury ought to give ſome other damages than they have. As to the ground on which the defendant's counſel have made this motion, it ariſes from an accident, and I think an accident which was very properly provided for: for had it not been, that the learned judge who tried the cauſe had particularly in terms recommended the conſideration of this point to the jury, and taken their anſwer, the defendant could not have had any ground to apply for a new trial. In my opinion, the learned judge did very right, and acted with great prudence and juſtice to the parties, and to the future queſtions that may ariſe in this cauſe; for it looks as if the parties from the beginning intended to apply either here or elſewhere. Now it is a very different queſtion, whether the governor of Minorca, finding a ſubject mutinous and ſeditious, and diſturbing his government, can arreſt and impriſon him? or, whether he can juſtify what he has done, the jury having found that he was neither mutinous nor ſeditious? Had they found the contrary, that fact might have been taken into conſideration in a court of juſtice; but as they have exerciſed that juriſdiction the conſtitution has given them, I think there ought not to be a new trial.

Mr. Juſtice Gould ſaid, that the court was not warranted in determining that the damages were exceſſive, without breaking in upon the fundamental principles of the conſtitution.

Mr. Juſtice Blackſtone obſerved, that theſe damages could not be called angry or vindictive damages, as the injury was as outrageous as the damages could be exceſſive.

Mr. Juſtice Nares declared, that Mr. Fabrigas had been impriſoned and treated in ſuch a manner that he did not care to repeat.

The whole bench were unanimous in refuſing a new trial, and the rule was conſequently diſcharged.

Farther Proceedings in the Cauſe of Fabrigas and Moſtyn.

THE court of Common-Pleas having refuſed governor Moſtyn a new trial, he reſorted to a writ of error, which was allowed on the 14th of December 1773.

On the 16th of December he was obliged to put in bail.

A rule was given to tranſcribe the record in Hilary-Term, 1774.

The firſt ſcire facias iſſued in Eaſter-Term.

The ſecond ſcire facias iſſued in the ſame term, on the 16th of May, returnable in Trinity-Term.

Mr. Fabrigas, the defendant in error, was ſerved with a ſummons on the 7th of June, that the plaintiff might have time to aſſign errors till judge Gould had put his ſeal to the bill of exceptions.

On the 8th of June, judge Gould came into the court of King's Bench, and acknowledged his ſeal.

The errors were aſſigned on the 16th of June.

The defendant pleaded in nullo eſt erratum on the 20th.

A concilium was moved for on the 21ſt of June.

It was ſet down for argument for the firſt Friday in Michaelmas-Term.

It was argued on Tueſday the 15th of November 1774; and the record is as follows.

The record of the proceedings in Fabrigas and Moſtyn.

The writ of error.

As yet of Trinity-Term, in the fourteenth year of the reign of king George the third.

Our lord the king ſent to his truſty and well-beloved ſir William de Grey, knight, his chief juſtice of the Bench, his cloſe writ, in theſe words; that is to ſay: George the third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. To our truſty and well-beloved ſir William de Grey, knight, our chief juſtice of the Bench, greeting. Foraſmuch as in the record and proceſs, as alſo in giving of judgment in a plaint which was in our court before you and your aſſociates, our juſtices of the Bench, by our writ between Anthony Fabrigas and John Moſtyn, eſq. of a plea of treſpaſs, aſſault, and falſe impriſonment, as it is ſaid, manifeſt error hath intervened, to the great damage of the ſaid John, as by his complaint we are informed: we, willing that the ſaid error (if any be) be duly amended, and full and ſpeedy juſtice done to the ſaid parties in this behalf, do command you, that if judgment be given thereupon, then you ſend to us diſtinctly and plainly, under your ſeal, the record and proceſs of the ſaid plaint, and all things touching the ſame and this writ; ſo that we may have them in fifteen days of St. Hilary, whereſoever we ſhall then be in England; that inſpecting the record and proceſs aforeſaid, we may cauſe further to be done thereupon for amending the ſaid error, as of right, and according to the law and cuſtom of England, ſhall be meet to be done. Witneſs ourſelf at Weſtminſter, the ſixth day of December, in the fourteenth year of our reign, Hil. A. L.

The return to the writ.

The anſwer of ſir William de Grey, knight, chief juſtice within-named.—The record and proceſs of the plaint within mentioned, with all things touching the ſame, I ſend before our lord the king, whereſoever, &c. at a day within contained, in a certain record to the writ annexed, as I am within commanded, &c. William de Grey.

Pleas. Inrolled at Weſtminſter before ſir William de Grey, knight, and his brethren, juſtices of his majeſty's court of Common Bench, of Eaſter-Term, in the thirteenth year of the reign of our ſovereign lord George the third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, and ſo forth. Rolls 616 and 617.

The declaration.

In the Common-Pleas.
LONDON to wit. } JOHN MOSTYN, late of Weſtminſter, in the county of Middleſex, eſquire, was attached to anſwer Anthony Fabrigas of a plea, wherefore he with force and arms made an aſſault upon the ſaid Anthony, at Minorca, (to wit) at London aforeſaid, in the pariſh of Saint Mary le Bow, in the ward of Cheap, and beat, wounded, and ill-treated him, and there impriſoned him, and kept and detained him in priſon there for a long time without any reaſonable or probable cauſe, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, againſt the will of the ſaid Anthony, and compelled the ſaid Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforeſaid, where the ſaid Anthony was dwelling and reſident, and carried and cauſed to be carried the ſaid Anthony from Minorca aforeſaid, to Carthagena in the dominions of the king of Spain, againſt the will of the ſaid Anthony; whereby the ſaid Anthony was put to great expence and trouble, and the goods and effects of the ſaid Anthony there were diminiſhed, loſt, ſpoiled, and conſumed, and the family of the ſaid Anthony were brought to great want and diſtreſs, and the ſaid Anthony, during all the ſaid time, was thereby deprived of the comfort of his ſaid family: and alſo wherefore the ſaid John with force and arms made another aſſault upon the ſaid Anthony at Minorca, (to wit) at London aforeſaid, in the pariſh and ward aforeſaid, and beat, wounded, and ill-treated him, and there impriſoned him, and kept and detained him there in priſon for a long time, without any reaſonable or probable cauſe, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, againſt the will of the ſaid Anthony; and did other wrongs to him, to the great damage of the ſaid Anthony, and againſt the peace of our lord the now king: and thereupon the ſaid Anthony, by Richard Gregory, his attorney, complains, that the ſaid John, on the firſt day of September, in the year of our Lord 1771, with force and arms, (to wit) with ſwords, ſtaves, ſticks, and fiſts, made an aſſault upon the ſaid Anthony, at Minorca, (to wit) at London aforeſaid, in the pariſh of St. Mary le Bow, in the ward of Cheap, and beat, wounded, and ill-treated him, and then and there impriſoned him, and kept and detained him in priſon there for a long time, (to wit) for the ſpace of ten months, without any reaſonable or probable cauſe, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, againſt the will of the ſaid Anthony, and compelled the ſaid Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforeſaid, where the ſaid Anthony was then dwelling and reſident, and carried and cauſed to be carried the ſaid Anthony from Minorca aforeſaid to Carthagena, in the dominions of the king of Spain, againſt the will of the ſaid Anthony; whereby the ſaid Anthony was then and there put to great expence and trouble, and the goods and effects of the ſaid Anthony there were diminiſhed, loſt, ſpoiled and conſumed, and the family of the ſaid Anthony were thereby brought to great want and diſtreſs, and the ſaid Anthony during all the ſaid time was deprived of the comfort of his ſaid family: and alſo, for that the ſaid John on the ſaid firſt day of September, in the year of our Lord 1771 aforeſaid, with force and arms, (to wit) with ſwords, ſtaves, ſticks, and fiſts, made another aſſault upon the ſaid Anthony, at Minorca, (to wit) at London aforeſaid, in the pariſh and ward aforeſaid, and then and there beat, wounded, and ill-treated him, and then and there impriſoned him, and kept and detained him there in priſon for a long time, (to wit) for the ſpace of other ten months, without any reaſonable or probable cauſe, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, againſt the will of the ſaid Anthony; and then and there did other wrongs to him the ſaid Anthony, to the great damage of the ſaid Anthony, and againſt the peace of our ſaid lord the king: and thereupon the ſaid Anthony ſaith, that he is injured and hath ſuſtained damage to the value of 10,000*l.* And thereof he bringeth ſuit, &c.

The plea.

And the ſaid John, by James Dagge his attorney, comes and defends the force and injury, and ſays he is not guilty of the premiſes above laid to his charge in manner and form as the ſaid Anthony hath above complained thereof againſt him; and of this he puts himſelf upon the country, &c. and the ſaid Anthony doth ſo likewiſe. And for further plea in this behalf as to the making the ſaid aſſault upon the ſaid Anthony in the firſt count in the ſaid declaration mentioned, and beating and ill-treating him, and impriſoning him, and keeping and detaining him in priſon for the ſaid ſpace of time in the ſaid declaration mentioned, and compelling the ſaid Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforeſaid, and carrying and cauſing to be carried the ſaid Anthony from Minorca aforeſaid to Carthagena, in the dominions of the king of Spain, by the ſaid John above ſuppoſed to have been done; he the ſaid John, by leave of the court here for this purpoſe firſt had and obtained, according to the form of the ſtatute in that caſe made and provided, ſays, that the ſaid Anthony ought not to have or maintain his ſaid action thereof againſt him the ſaid John, becauſe he ſays that he the ſaid John, at the ſaid time, &c. and long before, was governor of the ſaid iſland of Minorca, and during all that time was inveſted with and did hold and exerciſe all the powers, privileges, and authorities, civil and military, belonging and relating to the government of the ſaid iſland of Minorca, in parts beyond the ſeas; and the ſaid Anthony before the ſaid time when, &c. (to wit) on the ſaid firſt day of September, in the year aforeſaid, at the ſaid iſland of Minorca aforeſaid, was guilty of a riot and diſturbance of the peace, order, and government of the ſaid iſland, and was endeavouring to create and raiſe a mutiny and ſedition among the inhabitants of the ſaid iſland, in breach of the peace, violation of the laws, and in ſubverſion of all order and government; whereupon the ſaid John, ſo being governor of the ſaid iſland of Minorca as aforeſaid, at the ſaid time when, &c. in order to preſerve the peace and government of the ſaid iſland, was obliged, and did then and there order the ſaid Anthony to be baniſhed from the ſaid iſland of Minorca, and to leave and quit the ſaid iſland. And in order to baniſh and ſend the ſaid Anthony from and out of the ſaid iſland, did then and there for that purpoſe gently lay hands upon the ſaid Anthony, and did then and there ſeize and arreſt him, and did keep and detain the ſaid Anthony, before he could be baniſhed and ſent from out of the ſaid iſland, for a ſhort ſpace of time, (to wit) for the ſpace of ſix days then next following; and afterwards, to wit, on the ſeventh day of September, in the year aforeſaid, at Minorca aforeſaid, did carry and cauſe to be carried the ſaid Anthony, on board a certain veſſel, from the iſland of Minorca aforeſaid to Carthagena aforeſaid, as it was lawful for him to do for the cauſe aforeſaid, which are the ſame, making the ſaid aſſault upon the ſaid Anthony in the firſt count of the ſaid declaration mentioned, and beating and ill-treating him, and impriſoning him, and keeping and detaining him in priſon for the ſaid ſpace of time in the ſaid firſt count of the ſaid declaration mentioned, and compelling the ſaid Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforeſaid, and carrying and cauſing to be carried the ſaid Anthony from Minorca to Carthagena, in the dominions of the king of Spain, whereof the ſaid Anthony hath above complained againſt him: and this he is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the ſaid Anthony ought to have or maintain his ſaid action thereof againſt him, &c. without this that the ſaid John was guilty of the ſaid treſpaſs, aſſault, and impriſonment, at the pariſh of St. Mary le Bow, in the ward of Cheap, or elſewhere out of the ſaid iſland of Minorca aforeſaid.

Thomas Walker.

The replication.

And the ſaid Anthony, as to the ſaid plea of him the ſaid John, by him ſecondly above pleaded in bar, as to the ſaid aſſaulting the ſaid Anthony in the ſaid firſt count of the ſaid declaration mentioned, and beating and ill-treating him, and impriſoning him, and keeping and detaining him in priſon for the ſaid ſpace of time in the ſaid declaration mentioned; and compelling the ſaid Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforeſaid, and carrying and cauſing to be carried the ſaid Anthony from Minorca aforeſaid to Carthagena, in the dominions of the king of Spain, by the ſaid John above done, proteſting that the ſaid plea, and the matters therein contained are inſufficient in law to bar the ſaid Anthony from maintaining his ſaid action againſt the ſaid John. For replication in this behalf, he ſaith, that the ſaid Anthony ought not, by reaſon of any thing by the ſaid John above in pleading alledged, to be barred from having his ſaid action thereof maintained againſt him; becauſe, he ſaith, that the ſaid John, of his own wrong, and without ſuch cauſe as the ſaid John hath above in his ſaid plea alledged, on the ſame day and year aforeſaid, at London aforeſaid; in the pariſh and ward aforeſaid, aſſaulted the ſaid Anthony, and beat and ill-treated him, and impriſoned him; and kept and detained him in priſon for the ſaid ſpace of time in the ſaid declaration mentioned, and compelled the ſaid Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforeſaid, and carried and cauſed to be carried the ſaid Anthony from Minorca aforeſaid to Carthagena; in the dominions of the king of Spain aforeſaid; in manner and form as the ſaid Anthony hath above complained againſt him; and this he prays may be enquired of by the country. And the ſaid John doth ſo likewiſe.

John Glynn.

Award of the venire.

Therefore, as well to try this iſſue as the ſaid other iſſue between the ſaid parties above joined, it is commanded to the ſheriffs, that they cauſe to come here, in three weeks of the Holy Trinity, twelve, &c. by whom, &c. and who neither, &c. to recognize, &c. becauſe as well, &c.

At which day the jury between the ſaid parties of the plea aforeſaid, was reſpited here until on the morrow of All Souls then next following, unleſs ſir Henry Gould, knight, one of the king's juſtices of the Bench here aſſigned by form of the ſtatute, &c. ſhould firſt come, on Friday the ſecond of July laſt paſt, at the Guildhall of the city of London. And now here at this day cometh the ſaid Anthony, by his ſaid attorney, and the ſaid juſtice, before whom, &c. hath ſent here his record in theſe words.

The poſtea.

That is to ſay, afterwards, on the day and in the year, and at the place within-mentioned, come as well the within-mentioned Anthony Fabrigas as the within-named John Moſtyn, by their attornies within-named, before ſir Henry Gould, knight, one of the juſtices of the Bench within-named, and certain of the jurors, whereof mention is within made, ſummoned to be upon that jury, (that is to ſay) Thomas Zachary, Thomas Aſhby, David Powell, and Walter Ewer, being required, come, and on that jury are ſworn; and becauſe the reſt of the jurors of the ſame jury do not appear, therefore eight other perſons of the by-ſtanders, being by the ſheriffs within-written hereunto elected, at the requeſt of the ſaid Anthony, and by the command of the ſaid ſir Henry Gould, are now newly ſet down, whoſe names are affiled in the within-written pannel, according to the form of the ſtatute, &c. which ſaid jurors ſo newly ſet down, (that is to ſay) William Tomkyn, Gilbert Howard, Thomas Boulby, and John Newball, John King, James Smith, William Hurley, and James Selby, being alſo required, come likewiſe, and, together with the ſaid other jurors before impannelled, are tried and ſworn to ſpeak the truth of the matters within contained; who upon their oath ſay, that as to the firſt iſſue within-joined, the ſaid John Moſtyn is guilty of the premiſes within laid to his charge, in manner and form as the ſaid Anthony hath within complained againſt him: and as to the other iſſue within joined, the ſaid jurors on their ſaid oath further ſay, that the ſaid John Moſtyn, of his own wrong, and without ſuch cauſe as he hath in pleading within alledged, on the day and in the year within mentioned, at London, in the pariſh and ward within mentioned, aſſaulted the ſaid Anthony, and beat and ill-treated him, and impriſoned him, and kept and detained him in priſon for the ſpace of time in the within declaration mentioned, and compelled him the ſaid Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca within-mentioned, and carried and cauſed to be carried the ſaid Anthony from Minorca aforeſaid to Carthagena, in the dominions of the king of Spain within mentioned, in manner and form as he the ſaid Anthony hath by his replication within alledged; and they aſſeſs the damages of the ſaid Anthony, by reaſon of the premiſes within ſpecified, beſides his coſts and charges by him laid out and expended about his ſuit in this behalf, to 3000*l.* and for his ſaid coſts and charges, to forty ſhillings. Therefore it is conſidered, that the ſaid Anthony recover againſt the ſaid John his damages aforeſaid, to three thouſand pounds, and two pounds by the jury aforeſaid, in form aforeſaid aſſeſſed, and 88*l.* to the ſaid Anthony, at his requeſt, for the coſts and charges aforeſaid, by the court here for increaſe adjudged; which ſaid damages in the whole amount to three thouſand and ninety pounds, &c. Afterwards (that is to ſay) before our lord the king at Weſtminſter, comes the ſaid John Moſtyn, in his proper perſon, and ſays, that at the trial of the ſaid cauſe before the ſaid ſir Henry Gould, knight, the counſel of him the ſaid John Moſtyn propoſed certain exceptions to the opinion of the ſaid ſir Henry Gould, which exceptions were written in a bill, and ſealed by the ſaid judge; which bill of exceptions the ſaid John Moſtyn now brings into this court, and prays a writ of our lord the king to the ſaid ſir Henry Gould, to confeſs or deny his ſeal ſo put to the ſaid bill of exceptions, according to the form of the ſtatute in ſuch caſes made and provided, which writ is granted to him returnable in fifteen days from the day of the Holy Trinity; at which day, before our lord the king at Weſtminſter, comes the ſaid John Moſtyn in his proper perſon; and the ſaid ſir Henry Gould, knight, likewiſe in his proper perſon, comes and acknowledges his ſeal put to the ſaid bill of exceptions, which bill of exceptions follows in theſe words.

The bill of exceptions.

That is to ſay, on the morrow of the Holy Trinity, 13 Geo. III. Be it remembered, that in the term of Eaſter, in the thirteenth year of the reign of our ſovereign lord George the third, now king of Great Britain, and ſo forth, came Anthony Fabrigas, by Richard Gregory his attorney, into the court of our ſaid lord the king of the Bench at Weſtminſter, and impleaded John Moſtyn, late of Weſtminſter, in the county of Middleſex, eſq. in a certain plea of treſpaſs on which the ſaid Anthony declared againſt him.

[The declaration, plea, and replication, are here ſet out verbatim, which, to avoid repetition, are now omitted. After thoſe pleadings the bill of exceptions proceeds in theſe words.]

And afterwards (to wit) at the ſittings of niſi prius, holden at the Guildhall of the city of London aforeſaid, in and for the ſaid city, before the hon. ſir Henry Gould, knight, one of the juſtices of our ſaid lord the king of the Bench, Thomas Lloyd, eſq. being aſſociated to him according to the form of the ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided, on Monday the 12th day of July, in the 13th year of the reign of our ſaid lord the now king, the aforeſaid iſſues ſo joined between the ſaid parties as aforeſaid, came on to be tried by a jury of the city of London aforeſaid, for that purpoſe duly impannelled; at which day came there as well the ſaid Anthony Fabrigas as the ſaid John Moſtyn, by their attornies aforeſaid. And the jurors of the jury aforeſaid, impannelled to try the ſaid iſſues, being called over, ſome of them, namely, Thomas Zachary, Thomas Aſhby, David Powell, and Walter Ewer, came and were then and there in due manner choſen and ſworn to try the ſame iſſues; and becauſe the reſt of the jurors of the ſame jury did not appear, therefore others of the by-ſtanders being choſen by the ſheriffs, at the requeſt of the ſaid Anthony, and by command of the ſaid juſtice, were appointed anew, whoſe names were affixed to the pannel of the ſaid jury, according to the form of the ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided; which ſaid jurors ſo appointed anew, (to wit) William Tomkyn, Gilbert Howard, Thomas Boulby, John Newball, John King, James Smith, William Hurley, and James Selby, being likewiſe called, came, and were then and there in due manner tried and ſworn to try the ſame iſſues. And upon the trial of the ſaid iſſues, the counſel learned in the law for the ſaid Anthony Fabrigas, to maintain and prove his ſaid declaration, on his part gave in evidence, that the ſaid John, at the iſland of Minorca, on the 17th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1771, ſeized and took the ſaid Anthony, and without any trial impriſoned him for the ſpace of ſix days, againſt his will, and baniſhed him for the ſpace of twelve months from the ſaid iſland of Minorca, and cauſed him to be put by ſoldiers on board a ſhip, and to be tranſported from the ſaid iſland of Minorca to Carthagena in Spain, for the ſaid ſpace of twelve months: whereupon the counſel for the ſaid John Moſtyn did then and there, on the part of the ſaid John Moſtyn, give in evidence, that the ſaid Anthony was a native of Minorca, and at the time of taking, ſeizing, and impriſoning him, and baniſhing him as aforeſaid, was reſiding in and an inhabitant of the arraval of St. Phillip's in the ſaid iſland. And it was further given in evidence on the part of the ſaid defendant, that the ſaid iſland of Minorca was ceded to the crown of Great-Britain by the king of Spain, by the treaty of Utrecht, in the year of our Lord 1713; and that the article in the ſaid treaty, relative to the ſaid iſland, is as follows: rex porro Catholicus, pro ſe, hæredibus et ſucceſſoribus ſuis, cedit pariter coronæ Magnæ Britanniæ totam inſulam Minorcæ, ad eamque transfert in perpetuum jus omne dominiumque pleniſſimum ſupradictam inſulam ſpeciatim, vero ſuper urbem arcem portum munitiones et ſinum Minoriſenſis, vulgo Port Mahon, unà cum aliis portubus locis oppidiſque in præfatâ inſulâ ſitis; proviſum tamen eſt ut in articulo ſupraſcripto quod nullum perfugium, neque receptaculum patebit Maurorum navibus bellicis quibuſcunque in Portu Mahonis, aut in alio quovis portu dictæ inſulæ Minorcæ, quo oræ Hiſpaniæ ipſorum excurſionibus infeſtæ reddantur. Quinimo commorandi ſolummodo cauſâ ſecundum pacta conventa Mauris eorumque navigiis introitus in inſulam præfatam permittetur. Promittat etiam ex ſuâ parte regina Magnæ Britanniæ, quod ſi quando inſulam Minorcæ et portus oppida locaque in eâdem ſita a coronâ regnorum ſuorum quovis modo alienari in poſterum contigerit, dabitur coronæ Hiſpaniæ ante nationem aliam quamcunque prima optio poſſeſſionem et proprietatem præmemoratæ inſulæ redimendi. Spondet inſuper regia ſua majeſtas Magnæ Britanniæ, ſe facturam ut incolæ omnes inſulæ præfatæ tam eccleſiaſtici quam ſeculares bonis ſuis univerſis, et honoribus tutò pacatèque fruantur. Atque religionis Romanæ Catholicæ liber uſus iis permittetur utque etiam ejuſmodi rationes meantur, ad tuendam religionem prædictam in eâdem inſulâ, quæ a gubernatione civili atque a legibus Magnæ Britanniæ, penitus abhorrere non videantur. Poterunt etiam ſuis honoribus et bonis frui, qui nunc ſuæ Catholicæ majeſtatis ſervitio addicti ſunt, etiamſi in eodem permanſerint; et liceat cuicunque, qui præfatam inſulam relinquere voluerit, bona ſua vendere et libere in Hiſpaniam tranſvehere. And it was further given in evidence on the part of the ſaid defendant, that the Minorquins are in general governed by the Spaniſh laws, but, when it ſerves their purpoſe, plead the Engliſh laws. And it was further given in evidence on the behalf of the ſaid defendant, that there are certain magiſtrates, called the chief juſtice criminal, and the chief juſtice civil, in the ſaid iſland. And it was further given in evidence by James Wright, the ſecretary to the defendant, that the ſaid iſland is divided into four diſtricts, excluſive of the arraval of St. Phillip's, which the witneſs always underſtood to be ſeparate and diſtinct from the others, and under the immediate order of the governor; ſo that no magiſtrate of Mahon could go there to exerciſe any function without leave firſt had from the governor. And it was further given in evidence on the part of the ſaid defendant, by colonel Patrick Mackellar, that the arraval of St. Phillip's is ſurrounded by a line-wall on one ſide, and on the other by the ſea, and is called the royalty, where the governor has greater power than any where elſe in the iſland, and where the judges cannot interfere but by the governor's conſent. And it was further given in evidence by Edward Blakeney, who had been ſecretary to governor Blakeney, that nothing can be executed in the arraval but by the governor's leave; and the judges have applied to him the witneſs for the governor's leave to execute proceſs there. And it was further given in evidence by the ſaid James Wright, that for the trial of murder and other great offences committed within the ſaid arraval, upon application to the governor, he generally appoints the aſſeſſeur criminal of Mahon, and for leſſer offences the muſtaſtaph; and that the ſaid John Moſtyn, at the time of the ſeizing, taking, impriſoning, and baniſhing the ſaid Anthony, was the governor of the ſaid iſland of Minorca, under and by virtue of certain letters patent of his preſent majeſty, under the great ſeal of Great-Britain, bearing date the 2d day of March, in the eighth year of his reign, whereby his majeſty conſtituted and appointed the ſaid defendant to be captain-general and governor in chief in and over the ſaid iſland of Minorca, and the town and garriſon of Port Mahon, and the caſtles, forts, and other works and fortifications thereunto belonging, and all other towns and places within the ſaid iſland; and his majeſty did thereby give and grant unto the ſaid defendant John Moſtyn, or in his abſence to the lieutenant-governor, or commander in chief for the time being, all powers, privileges, and authorities, civil and military, unto the ſaid office belonging, to have, hold, and exerciſe the ſaid office, powers, privileges, and authorities, during his majeſty's will and pleaſure; and the ſaid defendant John Moſtyn, or in his abſence the lieutenant-governor, or commander in chief for the time being, are to obſerve and obey all the orders and inſtructions therewith given to him, and all ſuch further and other orders and inſtructions as ſhall be from time to time given to him under his majeſty's royal ſign manual or ſignet, or by his majeſty's order in privy-council; and his ſaid majeſty did thereby ſtrictly charge and command all his officers, miniſters, magiſtrates, civil and military, whatſoever, and ſoldiers, and all others his loving ſubjects, inhabiting or being in the ſaid iſland, to obey him the ſaid John Moſtyn, as captain-general and chief governor thereof; and that the defendant, being ſo governor of the ſaid iſland, cauſed the ſaid Anthony to be ſeized, taken, impriſoned, and baniſhed as aforeſaid, without any reaſonable or probable cauſe, or any other matter alledged in the defendant's plea, or any act tending thereto. But nevertheleſs the ſaid counſel for the ſaid John Moſtyn did then and there inſiſt before the ſaid juſtice, on the behalf of the ſaid John Moſtyn, that the ſaid ſeveral matters ſo produced and given in evidence on the part of the ſaid John Moſtyn as aforeſaid, were ſufficient and ought to be admitted and allowed as deciſive evidence to entitle the ſaid John Moſtyn to a verdict, and to bar the ſaid Anthony of his aforeſaid action; and the ſaid counſel for the ſaid John Moſtyn did then and there pray the ſaid juſtice to admit and allow the ſaid matters ſo produced and given in evidence for the ſaid John Moſtyn, to be concluſive evidence in favour of the ſaid John Moſtyn, to entitle him to a verdict in this cauſe, and to bar the ſaid Anthony of his action aforeſaid. But to this the counſel learned in the law of the ſaid Anthony, did then and there inſiſt before the ſaid juſtice, that the ſame were not ſufficient nor ought to be admitted or allowed to entitle the ſaid John Moſtyn to a verdict, or to bar the ſaid Anthony of his action aforeſaid. And the ſaid juſtice did then and there declare and deliver his opinion to the jury aforeſaid, that the ſaid ſeveral matters ſo produced and given in evidence on the part of the ſaid John Moſtyn, were not ſufficient to bar the ſaid Anthony of his action aforeſaid, and with that direction left the ſame to the ſaid jury; and the jury aforeſaid then and there gave their verdict for the ſaid Anthony, and 3000*l.* damages. Whereupon the ſaid counſel for the ſaid John Moſtyn did then and there, on the behalf of the ſaid John Moſtyn, except to the aforeſaid opinion of the ſaid juſtice, and inſiſted on the ſaid ſeveral matters as an abſolute bar to the ſaid action. And inaſmuch as the ſaid ſeveral matters ſo produced and given in evidence on the part of the ſaid John Moſtyn, and by his counſel aforeſaid objected and inſiſted on as a bar to the action aforeſaid, do not appear by the record of the verdict aforeſaid, the ſaid counſel for the ſaid John Moſtyn did then and there propoſe their aforeſaid exceptions to the opinion of the ſaid juſtice, and requeſted the ſaid juſtice to put his ſeal to this bill of exception, containing the ſaid ſeveral matters ſo produced and given in evidence on the part of the ſaid John Moſtyn as aforeſaid, according to the form of the ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided. And thereupon the ſaid juſtice, at the requeſt of the ſaid counſel for the ſaid John Moſtyn, did put his ſeal to this bill of exceptions, purſuant to the aforeſaid ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided, on the ſaid 12th day of July, in the 13th year of the reign of his preſent majeſty.

Aſſignment of errors.

And hereupon the ſaid John Moſtyn ſays, that in the record and proceedings aforeſaid, and alſo in the matters recited contained in the ſaid bill of exceptions, and alſo in giving the verdict upon the ſaid iſſues between the parties aforeſaid joined, and alſo in giving the judgment aforeſaid, there is a manifeſt error in this, that the juſtice before whom, &c. had no power, authority, or juriſdiction to try the ſaid iſſues, or either of them, at the time when the ſame was tried, as in the record mentioned; nor had the ſaid juſtice any power or authority to take or ſwear the ſaid jury thereon. There is alſo error in this, that the ſaid juſtice before whom, &c. at and upon the trial of the ſaid iſſues between the parties aforeſaid joined, did declare and deliver his opinion to the jury aforeſaid, that the ſaid ſeveral matters mentioned in the ſaid bill of exceptions, and ſo as aforeſaid produced and proved on the part of the ſaid John Moſtyn, were not upon the whole of the caſe ſufficient to bar the ſaid Anthony Fabrigas of his ſaid action againſt him, and with that opinion left the ſame to the jury; whereas the ſame were ſufficient to bar the ſaid Anthony of his ſaid action. There is alſo error in this, that by the record aforeſaid it appears, that the verdict aforeſaid was given upon the ſaid iſſues between the ſaid parties joined, for the ſaid Anthony Fabrigas; whereas by the law of the land, the verdict on the ſaid iſſues ought to have been given for the ſaid John Moſtyn, againſt the ſaid Anthony Fabrigas. There is alſo error in this, that it appears by the record aforeſaid, that judgment, in form aforeſaid given, was given for the ſaid Anthony Fabrigas againſt him the ſaid John Moſtyn; whereas by the law of the land, judgment ought to have been given for the ſaid John Moſtyn againſt the ſaid Anthony Fabrigas. And the ſaid John Moſtyn prays, that the judgment aforeſaid, for the errors aforeſaid, and others in the record and proceedings aforeſaid, may be reverſed, annulled, and altogether had for nothing; and that he the ſaid John Moſtyn may be reſtored to all which he has loſt by occaſion of the judgment aforeſaid, &c.

In nullo eſt erratum.

And the ſaid Anthony hereupon voluntarily comes in his own proper perſon into court here, and ſays, that neither in the record or proceedings aforeſaid, nor in the matter recited and contained in the ſaid bill of exceptions, nor in giving the verdict upon the ſaid iſſues between the parties aforeſaid joined, nor in the giving the judgment aforeſaid, is there any error; and that the ſaid Anthony prays, that the court of our lord the king now here will proceed to the examination, as well of the record and proceedings aforeſaid, as of the matters recited and contained in the ſaid bill of exceptions and of the matters aforeſaid above-aſſigned for error, and that the ſaid judgment may be in all things affirmed. But becauſe the court of our lord the king now here is not yet adviſed to give their judgment of and concerning the premiſes, a day is therefore given to the parties aforeſaid, to be before our lord the king, until on the morrow of All Souls now next enſuing, whereſoever, &c. to hear judgment of and upon the premiſes; for that the court of our ſaid lord the king now here, is not yet adviſed thereof, &c.

Mr. BULLER.

My lord, there are ſome ſtrange blunders upon this record, which though I might make objections to, I will not miſpend the time of the court in ſtating them, becauſe I can eaſily conceive myſelf that they will admit of a very ſhort anſwer; and therefore, waving all objections to the formal part of the record, the general queſtion upon this record will be, whether an action can be maintained in this country againſt a governor of Minorca, for an impriſonment committed by him there in his character and office of governor, upon the perſon of a Minorquin, even though the governor ſhould have erred in his judgment, and have been miſtaken in the neceſſity which he conceived demanded an immediate and reſolute exerciſe of the powers of his office? My lord, though this be the general queſtion, I ſhall beg leave in the argument to divide it into two: firſt, whether in any caſe an action can be maintained in the courts at Weſtminſter, for an impriſonment committed at Minorca upon a native of that place: and ſecondly, if it ſhould be admitted that an action will lie againſt any other perſon, yet whether ſuch action can be maintained againſt a governor, acting as ſuch within the peculiar diſtrict of the arraval of St. Phillip's? My lord, in the conſideration of both theſe queſtions, it may be material to attend a little particularly to the ſituation and conſtitution of the iſland of Minorca, and arraval of St. Phillip's, within which this tranſaction aroſe. As to that, the court will be much relieved by the contents of this record; for it is there ſtated, that this iſland, till the year 1713, was a part of the dominions of the kingdom of Spain, and then it was ceded to the crown of Great-Britain, reſerving to the inhabitants their property, their religion, and the laws neceſſary for the preſervation of their religion. It is further ſtated in the record, that the iſland is not governed by the laws of England, but by the laws of Spain; and that the arraval of St. Phillip's is ſubject only to the controul and government of the governor himſelf, for in that there is no regular law-officer; there is no power to which the ſubject can apply for juſtice but to the governor himſelf; he is therefore the ſole and abſolute judge within the arraval; his will is the law there, and that diſtrict at leaſt is a deſpotic government. Whatever may be the caſe in colonies and new-diſcovered countries, I fancy it will not now be denied, that, even in countries obtained by conqueſt, the old laws of the place continue in force till they are changed or altered by the conquerors; much leſs can it be contended, that in a country ceded as this was, the laws of the place receive any alteration till a change is declared by the new ſovereign. In the preſent caſe, there has been no new code of laws eſtabliſhed in this iſland; and therefore, independent of the particular facts which are ſtated as proved in this cauſe, I think I may ſafely aſſert it as an undeniable propoſition, that this iſland is now governed by the ſame laws as it was before the year 1713.

It is ſtated in the record, that the diſtrict where the preſent cauſe of action aroſe is ſubject only to the immediate order of the governor; and ſo much ſo, that no judge of the iſland can exerciſe any function there, without the particular leave of the governor for that purpoſe. If the laws of the country where the offence is committed are different from the laws of this kingdom, it ſeems to me to make no difference with reſpect to the propriety of an action, whether ſuch country is ſubject to the crown of Great-Britain, or to any other ſtate; for whether the fact be an offence or not, muſt be decided by the particular laws of the place where it was committed, and not by the laws of this country. This is a caſe where the law of the place is different from the law of this country; and therefore the queſtion might have been taken much larger than I have done it: namely, whether the ſubject of a foreign power, who rules by laws different from ours, can, for an act done in his own country, ſeek redreſs in the courts of England. I believe there are no authorities in ſupport of ſuch a poſition; and whatever may be the caſe, where the laws of different countries agree, and where the tranſaction has been between Britiſh ſubjects, with a view to the laws of England, (which was the caſe of Robinſon and Bland), that can be of no avail in the preſent inſtance: for I take it in this caſe, if the action can be maintained at all, it muſt be governed by the laws of Minorca, and not by the laws of England. It is ſaid in the caſe of Robinſon and Bland, that the laws of the place where the thing happened does not always prevail; and there an inſtance is put by Mr. Juſtice Wilmot, that in many countries an action may be maintained by a courteſan for the price of her proſtitution, but that no ſuch action can be allowed in this country. That is undoubtedly true; for wherever the foreign law is contrary to the law of God, to the law of nature, or contra bonos mores, this court will recognize it; but neither of theſe are the preſent caſe. My lord, beſides, there is a great difference between entertaining a ſuit, and giving a remedy upon an immoral tranſaction, and puniſhing a man for an act, which, if done here, would be deemed a crime, but, in the country where it is committed, is eſteemed none. In ſuch a caſe as that, the law of this country can never be the rule by which this court will govern themſelves, nor could they with propriety give a judgment contrary to the known law of this land; and therefore, I ſhould apprehend, that in ſuch caſe they would refuſe to hold plea at all. That ſeems to have been the opinion of lord chief juſtice Pratt, in a caſe that came before him in the year 1765: that was the caſe of Pons againſt Johnſon, and a like caſe of Balliſter againſt Johnſon. Thoſe were two actions tried at the ſittings after Trinity-Term 1765; an action of treſpaſs and falſe impriſonment, brought by the plaintiff, a native of Minorca, againſt the defendant, who was governor. The facts were, that in Minorca there is a court called Tribunal of Royal Government: the governor is preſident, the aſſeſſor is judge: the fiſcal is in nature of attorney-general, during the pendency of a cauſe, but, when ſentence is to be paſſed, he has a voice as well as the aſſeſſor. If they agree, the governor is bound to confirm: if they diſagree, the governor has the caſting voice. It was proved, that this is the only court of criminal juriſdiction, and that ſlanders are conſidered as criminal ſuits; that the defendant wrote a letter to the aſſeſſor and fiſcal, complaining that the plaintiff had ſpread reports injurious to him, and deſiring them to enquire into it, and act as they thought juſt and fit. Upon this letter, the fiſcal directed an enquiry, and the aſſeſſor ordered plaintiff to be impriſoned: that he applied to defendant Johnſon to be bailed, who refuſed to bail him; but it appeared that the aſſeſſor was the perſon whoſe buſineſs it was to bail, though orders, as well for impriſoning as bailing, often paſſed in the name of the court. Upon this evidence it was objected, firſt, that by the treaty of Utrecht, the inhabitants have their own laws preſerved to them, and are not to be ſued here, and therefore have no right to ſue here: ſecondly, admitting them to have a right to ſue here, the action is miſconceived, &c. Lord chief juſtice Pratt ſaid, ‘ I think it very improper ſuch action ſhould be brought here, where foreign law is to be brought into queſtion: the inconvenience appears here, where all the evidence we have had is the teſtimony of one witneſs; and I ſhould think if I were under the neceſſity of pronouncing upon the point, that parole evidence ought not to be ſufficient, but a commiſſion ſhould go, and the law be certified.’ As to the queſtion of juriſdiction, his lordſhip ſaid, ‘ It is certain there are many caſes of tranſitory actions between ſubject and ſubject, where, though the cauſe ariſes in a foreign country, the action may be brought here; ſuch as contract, treſpaſs, or even falſe impriſonment of ſome kinds: and the rule that ſhould govern ſeems to be, where the ſubject matter is of that kind, that the law of nature ſhould govern all over the world. And I think, that a perſon who is an alien ſhould have a right to ſue here in caſes of that kind: but I think this is not to be extended to tranſitory actions of every kind, where the lex loci is ſo intermixed with the caſe as to alter the caſe, and vary the legality of the tranſaction.’ His lordſhip then expreſſed ſome doubts on the form of the plea; and finally nonſuited the plaintiffs on another point. My lord, I cite this caſe for the ſake of the reaſoning contained in it; and there was the opinion of a very learned judge, that an action in this country was improper, where it was ſo intermixed and blended with the law of another country, as to vary or change the legality of the tranſaction. My lord, another thing which appears by that caſe is, that though lord Camden ſeems to think an action may in ſome caſes lie on a foreign tranſaction, yet he confines it to caſes where the tranſaction happened between ſubject and ſubject. This is not a tranſaction which happened between ſubject and ſubject, (ſpeaking as of the realm of England) nor is it a caſe where the ſame law governs all over the world; but it is that particular caſe pointed out by lord Camden, ſo mixed with the lex loci, that it alters the caſe, and varies the legality of the tranſaction. In criminal caſes I take it to be clear, that an offence committed in foreign parts cannot, unleſs under particular ſtatutes, be tried in this country; and of that opinion was the court of Exchequer in a caſe reported in 1ſt Vezey, 246. The Eaſt-India company againſt Campbell, 7th of June, 1749: an information was brought in the name of the attorney-general, that the defendant might diſcover how he came by the poſſeſſion of certain goods, whether it was not by fraud, violence, contrivance, or other means; and whether they were not the property of the Indians, from whom they were ſo taken by the defendant and others. The court there ſay the rule is, that this court ſhall not oblige one to diſcover that, which, if he anſwers in the affirmative, will ſubject him to the puniſhment of a crime; for it is not material, that if he anſwers in the negative, it will be no harm: and that he is puniſhable, appears from the caſe of Omichund v. Barker, as a juriſdiction is erected in Calcutta for criminal facts, where he may be ſent by government and tried, though not puniſhable here: like the caſe of one who was concerned in a rape in Ireland, and ſent over there by the government to be tried, although the court of B. R. here refuſed to do it. My lord, here is a poſitive opinion, that in criminal caſes ariſing abroad there is no juriſdiction in the common law courts in England. The only thing to be done is to ſend the party to the country where the offence was committed; but it ſhall not be tried here. If a man were to marry two wives in a country where bigamy is allowed, it can never be contended in ſuch a caſe, if the man came into England he ſhould be liable to be hanged here, becauſe it is an offence in this country, though none where it was committed. If a crime committed abroad cannot be tried here, upon what ground ſhall a civil perſonal injury, done out of the kingdom, be tried here? There are many reaſons why a crime committed abroad might be tried here, and a civil injury not; but no reaſon occurs to me why a civil injury ſhould, and a crime not. Civil injuries depend much upon the police and conſtitution of the country where they occur, and the ſame conduct may be actionable in one country which is juſtifiable in another: but in crimes, as murder, perjury, and many other offences, the laws of moſt countries take for their baſis the law of God and the law of nature; and therefore, though the trial be in a different country from that in which the offence was committed, there is a greater probability of diſtributing equal juſtice in ſuch caſes, than in civil actions. The caſe mentioned in Keilwey, 402, and confirmed in the 4th Inſtitute, 283 and 4, is alſo an authority in my favour. It firſt of all gives a hiſtory of Sir John Stanley's family, and there five points were reſolved: firſt, that the iſle of Man was an ancient kingdom of itſelf, and no part of the kingdom of England; ſecondly, they affirmed the caſe reported by Keilwey, anno the 14th Henry the VIIIth, to be law; namely, Michaelmas the 14th, Henry VIIIth, an office was found, that Thomas earl of Derby, at the time of his death, was ſeiſed of the iſle of Man in fee; whereupon the counteſs his wife, by her counſel, moved to have her dower in the Chancery; but it was reſolved by Brudnell, Brook, and Fitzherbert, juſtices, and all the king's counſel, that the office was merely void, becauſe the iſle of Man was no part of the realm of England, nor was governed by the laws of this land; but was like to Tournay in Normandy, or Gaſcoign in France, when they were in the king of England's hands, which were merely out of the power of the Chancery, which was the place to endow the widow of the king, &c. Then it goes on, and ſays, it was reſolved by them, that neither the ſtatute of William the IId, de donis conditionalibus, nor of the 27th of Henry the VIIIth, of wills, nor any other general act of parliament, did extend to the iſle of Man, for the cauſe aforeſaid. So there it is held, that for a right in the iſle of Man, though it was part of the territorial dominions of the crown of England, yet that no ſuit would lie in the court of Chancery; and that this ſuit inſtituted by the widow for her dower there was improper, and they could not entertain it. The caſes where the courts of Weſtminſter have taken cognizance of tranſactions ariſing abroad, and entertained actions founded on them, ſeem to be wholly on contracts, where the laws of the foreign country have agreed with the laws of England, and between Engliſh ſubjects: and even there it is done by a quaint legal fiction; namely, by ſuppoſing, under the ſanction of a videlicet, that the cauſe of action did ariſe within this country, and that the place abroad lay either in London or in Iſlington. But where the contrary has appeared, namely, that the place where the tranſaction did ariſe was not in London or Iſlington, there the courts have ſaid ſuch matters were not triable here. There is a pretty ſtrong caſe ariſing upon a demurrer in Lutwyche, 946, Davis againſt Yale. That was an action for falſe impriſonment of the plaintiff in Fort St. George, in the Eaſt-Indies, in parts beyond the ſeas, videlicet, in London, in the pariſh of St. Mary-le-Bow, in the ward of Cheap. It was reſolved by the whole court, that the declaration was ill, becauſe the treſpaſs is ſuppoſed to be committed at Fort St. George, in parts beyond the ſeas, videlicet, in London, which is repugnant and abſurd: and it was ſaid by the chief juſtice, that if a bond bore date at Paris, in the kingdom of France, it is not triable here; ſo that judgment was given upon the ground, that it appearing upon the face of the record to be in foreign parts, the ſuppoſition that it was in England was abſurd and repugnant.

In Ward's caſe, in Latch 4. in debt, the plaintiff declares upon a bill, bearing date in the pariſh of St. Mary-le-Bow, London; and upon oyer of the deed, it bore date at Hamburgh, and the writ was in detinet only. Serjeant Bridgman objected, that although it was uſual to lay ſuch actions in any place, to wit, in Kent, London, &c. yet, as this caſe is, that cannot be; becauſe when any place is named, it ſhall be underſtood primâ facie, that the place named is a town, and not a particular place, as a houſe, as appears by 3 Ed. III. 68, et breve. 638: from whence it followed, that Hamburgh here ſhould be underſtood to be a town, which cannot be in London; and therefore the declaration was faulty, for not laying Hamburgh within London. But it was argued on the other ſide by Barners, who took this difference in pleading: ‘ I confeſs that a place named ſhall be underſtood to be a city or town, as the ſerjeant has ſaid, but nevertheleſs the date of the deed ſhall be underſtood to be a particular place or a houſe; and therefore, if an obligation bears date at Antwerp, or Callis-Sands, it ſhall be underſtood to be of thoſe taverns in London, and not of thoſe places beyond the ſeas,’ 21 Ed. IV. 26. And in the caſe of one Highans and Flowers, 3 Jac. B. R. the date of an obligation was at Athlone in Ireland, and therefore the action could not be laid here, inaſmuch as Ireland cannot be in England: but if it had been in Athlone only, then it was agreed that it could be ſued here, becauſe Athlone might be alledged to be in England. So here in our caſe, if the date had been at Hamburgh, in partibus tranſmarinis, it could not be ſued here, inaſmuch as it could not be in London; but bearing date at Hamburgh only, it may be underſtood to be in England. Whitlock agreed with him: Brook ſuits, 9. and ſo have been all deeds by experience. 10 Jac. an obligation dated at Elvin was ſued in this court, and the action laid in Kent and allowed; and yet Elvin is in Poland. Dodderidge ſaid, ‘ I agree alſo, if the deed bears date in Little Britain or in Scotland, it ſhall be underſtood to be dated at thoſe places; ſo here being named in London, we, as judges, ought to maintain the juriſdiction of our court, if the caſe is not plainly and evidently out of our juriſdiction: and for this reaſon we ought to underſtand Hamburgh to be in London, to maintain the action, becauſe otherwiſe it would be out of our juriſdiction. And if in truth we ſhould know the date to be at Hamburgh ouſter le mere, yet, as judges, we ſhould not take notice that it is ouſter le mere.’ In this caſe it does appear upon the record, that the offence complained of was committed in parts beyond the ſeas, and not in England. My lord, the plea ſtates, that it was committed in the iſland of Minorca, in parts beyond the ſeas; theſe are the words of the plea; and the defendant has concluded his plea with a traverſe, that he was not guilty in London, in the pariſh of St. Mary-le-Bow, or elſewhere, out of the iſland of Minorca. Now, my lord, this ſtands admitted by the plaintiff, becauſe if he had thought fit to have denied the place mentioned in the plea, and which was abſolutely eſſential for the defendant to mention, becauſe his juſtification was a local one, (and tho' the cauſe of action be tranſitory in its nature, yet, if the defence be local, the defendant has a right to ſtate it ſo in his plea, and by that means make that local which before was tranſitory) he ſhould have made a new aſſignment, or have taken iſſue on the place.

It was incumbent upon the defendant to aver, that what he had done was within the arraval, becauſe his authority was confined to that particular place; and therefore, however unjuſtifiable he might be elſewhere, he was juſtified there. That part of his allegation ſtands admitted by the plaintiff; therefore it does appear from the record, that the cauſe of action did ariſe out of the kingdom, and conſequently, as Dodderidge ſays in Latch, it does ariſe out of the juriſdiction of this court: and where it ſo appears, the judges cannot help taking notice of it; for, as Lutwyche ſays, as I mentioned before, it is not triable here. Even in caſes the moſt tranſitory, before the ſtatute of Jeofails, if an action was brought in London, and there was a local juſtification at Oxford, the cauſe could not have been tried in London. That was the caſe in 1ſt Saunders, 247, an action for words laid in London, charging him with having ſtolen plate out of Wadham-College, viz. in London. The defendant juſtifies ſpeaking the words, becauſe the plaintiff ſtole plate out of Wadham-College in Oxford. It was admitted in that caſe, that it would have been a fatal error, had it not been for the ſtatute of Jeofails. Now the ſtatute of Jeofails does not extend to Minorca; therefore this caſe will ſtand entirely upon the common law; and by that the trial is bad, and the verdict void: for ſuppoſing that this or any court at Weſtminſter could hold cognizance of any cauſe that ariſes abroad, yet it ſhould not have been tried in London, but ſhould have been tried in the next Engliſh county to Minorca. If the law in criminal caſes be as I conceive it is, that for a murder committed by a foreigner in another country the criminal could not be puniſhed here, I am at a loſs for a reaſon why he ſhould be puniſhed here for a treſpaſs committed under like circumſtances. In order to ſupport that doctrine, this abſurdity muſt be contended for: if Mr. Moſtyn, who ſtood there in the capacity of a governor, and had the ſole direction and government of this place, had thought Fabrigas guilty of an offence which forfeited his life, and had puniſhed him accordingly, he could not have been puniſhed; but becauſe he has proceeded in a milder way, and has impriſoned and baniſhed him, therefore he ſhall be puniſhed. The inconveniences of entertaining ſuch an action in this country are many, and ſome of them would certainly be intolerable; but the inconveniences that would enſue from rejecting the action would be very ſlight, if any: and the argument ab inconvenienti, lord Coke ſays, has been ever allowed to be very forcible in our law. Now if the action be maintained here, it muſt be determined by the law of this country, or by the law of the place where the offence was committed. If it be determined by our law, that would be unjuſt indeed; for then a man, who is compelled to regulate his conduct by one law, would be condemned by another, which is totally oppoſite. And yet the law of this country is the law the plaintiff has thought fit to put this cauſe upon; and I doubt not but he hopes, under the idea of Engliſh liberty, totally to deſtroy the Minorquin conſtitution. His declaration is founded on the law of England. The impriſonment is laid in the declaration to be contrary to the law and cuſtoms of this realm; ſo that the law of England is the law to which he appeals, and by which he deſires his caſe may be determined. If an impriſonment is committed there agreeable to the laws of that place, but not conſonant to the laws of this realm, is that a ground for puniſhment in this country? If it is not, the plaintiff cannot ſupport his caſe upon the law of England in the manner he now attempts to do. If the cauſe is to be tried here by the law of Minorca, how is that law to be proved? There is no legal mode of certifying the law, and till the trial it may not be known what points of law it may be requiſite to inquire into: witneſſes cannot be compelled to attend, nor can this court by any means oblige them to anſwer here; ſo the defendant would ſtand in the ſituation of being called upon to make his defence, without the power of proving either the law or the facts of his caſe. If this action ſucceeds, every Frenchman that is confined in the Baſtile, and has the good fortune afterwards to eſcape to this country, would be bringing actions againſt the officers that confined him; every ſoldier, who in time of war thinks himſelf ill uſed by his commander, when he returns home will harraſs the commander with a law-ſuit for any confinement or correction that he may have ſuffered abroad; and in the end it would be nothing leſs than that a German army would be governed by an Engliſh jury. It would be neceſſary for every general officer to have a lawyer always at his elbow; and even that, as Mr. Moſtyn has found by fatal experience, would not be ſufficient to ſecure him from cenſure and puniſhment: for in this cauſe it was proved, that Mr. Moſtyn had conſulted all the lawyers, and all the military gentlemen in the iſland, on the expediency and neceſſity of the meaſure he took, before he did what is now complained of, and that they were all unanimous in their ideas of the abſolute neceſſity of the buſineſs. Some of them openly profeſſed their opinions, and the reſt acquieſced by their ſilence. The lawyers went further, and undertook to anſwer for the legality of the meaſure, even at the peril of their heads. In the ſecond place, ſuppoſing an action could be maintained here at all for a thing done in Minorca, I ſhall beg leave to ſubmit to your lordſhip, that whatever might be the caſe of other perſons, though they might be liable to an action here for things done in foreign parts; yet that the governor or general officer, who has the immediate command and abſolute direction of the place, ſhall not be called upon in an action here to anſwer for his conduct in that character. Minorca is an abſolute government. The governor for the time being is the immediate repreſentative of the king there; and he, at leaſt within the arraval of St. Phillip's, whatever may be the caſe in the reſt of the iſland, as all abſolute ſovereigns do, governs as he thinks convenient, without being tied up to any fixed rules, which it is not lawful for him to deviate from.

There is no government wherein the power over the lives, as well as the liberties and properties of the ſubject, is not veſted in the ſupreme power; and whether that power be lodged in a ſingle perſon, as a monarch, or many, as a parliament or an ariſtocracy, whatever that ſupreme power does, it is accountable for to none but God; and the deputy of that power is anſwerable only to God and his principal. That a judge cannot be puniſhed for any thing he does in his capacity as a judge will not, I believe, be diſputed; if it be, there are the ſtrongeſt authorities upon that point. The ſtrongeſt perhaps in Salkeld, 396, and 2 Mod. 218; in the latter of which caſes, the judge had been guilty of the moſt unconſtitutional conduct. My lord, that in Salkeld is Groenvelt againſt Burwell and others. The caſe was this: the cenſors of the College of Phyſicians in London are empowered to inſpect, govern, and cenſure all practiſers of phyſic in the city of London, and ſeven miles round, ſo as to puniſh by fine, amerciament, and impriſonment. They convicted Dr. Groenvelt of adminiſtering inſalubres pillulas & noxia medicamenta, and fined him 20*l.* and twelve months impriſonment. Accordingly, the doctor was taken in execution upon this ſentence, and brought treſpaſs againſt the officers and the cenſors. And it was holden by Holt, chief juſtice, firſt, that the cenſors had a judicial power; for a power to examine, convict, and puniſh, is judicial, and they are judges of record, becauſe they can fine and impriſon: ſecondly, that being judges of the matter, what they have adjudged is not traverſable; and the plaintiff cannot be admitted to gainſay what the cenſors have ſaid by their judgment, which is, that they were inſalubres pillulas & noxia medicamenta, 43*d Eliz.* 3, 17, 9*th E.* 4, 3, 12 Co. 24, 25: thirdly, that tho' the pills and medicines were really wholeſome pills and good medicines, that yet no action lies againſt the cenſors, becauſe it is a wrong judgment in a matter within the limits of their juriſdiction; and a judge is not anſwerable either to the king or the party for the miſtakes or errors of his judgment, in a matter of which he has juriſdiction. It would expoſe the juſtice of the nation, and no man would execute the office, at the peril of being arraigned by action or indictment for every judgment he pronounces. The other caſe, which is in 2d Modern, 218. is as ſtrong a caſe, if an action could be maintained againſt a judge at all, as any that can exiſt; that is, an action for falſe impriſonment. The defendant pleaded ſpecially, that there was a commiſſion of oyer and terminer directed to him amongſt others, &c. and that before him and the other commiſſioners, Mr. Penn and Mr. Mead, two preachers, were indicted for being at a conventicle, to which indictment they pleaded not guilty; and this was to be tried by a jury whereof the plaintiff was one; and that after the witneſſes were ſworn and examined in the cauſe, he and his fellows found the priſoners, Penn and Mead, not guilty, whereby they were acquitted; and quia the plaintiff male ſe geſſerit in acquitting them both againſt the direction of the court in matter of law, and againſt plain evidence, the defendant and the other commiſſioners then upon the bench fined the jury forty marks a-piece, and for non-payment committed them to Newgate. This was a caſe where a judge had taken upon himſelf to fine a juryman, becauſe he did not find agreeable to his direction, and had committed him to Newgate. Serjeant Goodfellow, who argued for the defendant, ſaid, he would not offer to ſpeak to that point, whether a judge can fine a jury for giving a verdict contrary to evidence, ſince the caſe was ſo lately and ſolemnly reſolved by all the judges of England in Buſhell's caſe, that he could not fine a jury for ſo doing. But, ſays he, admit a judge cannot fine a jury, yet, if he doth, no action will lie againſt him for ſo doing, becauſe it is done as a judge: but the court told him he need not labour that point, but deſired to hear the argument on the other ſide. In this manner the court would not ſuffer the queſtion to be argued, whether an action would lie or not againſt a judge for that which was done by him in that character. On the other ſide it was urged, that what was done was not warranted by the commiſſion: but at laſt the whole court ſay, that the bringing this action was a greater offence than fining of the plaintiff, and committing him for non-payment; and that it was a bold attempt both againſt the government and juſtice in general. Lord Coke in his 12th Report, 25, ſays, that the reaſon and cauſe why a judge, for any thing done by him as a judge, by the authority which the king has committed to him, and as ſitting in the ſeat of the king, concerning his juſtice, ſhall not be drawn in queſtion before any other judge for any ſurmiſe of corruption, except before the king himſelf, is for this: the king himſelf is de jure to deliver juſtice to all his ſubjects; and for this, that he himſelf cannot do it to all perſons, he delegates his power to his judges, who have the cuſtody and guard of the king's oath. And foraſmuch as this concerns the honour and conſcience of the king, there is great reaſon that the king himſelf ſhall take account of it, and no other. My lord, within the arraval of St. Phillip's, general Moſtyn was quatenus judge; there was no magiſtrate within the place but himſelf; he might appoint another, or might preſide himſelf, to decide upon offences committed within that diſtrict. It was ſo ſtated in the record, that it was ſubject to the immediate order of the governor, and no judge could interfere there unleſs particularly deputed by him; ſo that the abſolute government of that part at leaſt of the iſland reſted ſolely in his hands. He acted there under an authority committed to him by the king, and there (which is the reaſon in the 12th Report why an action will not lie againſt a judge) he had the cuſtody and guard of the king's oath; and therefore, as lord Coke ſays, if he acts improperly in the diſcharge of the functions of his office, he is accountable to the king only, and no other. My lord, there is another caſe in the law-books, upon which I ſhall beg leave to lay great ſtreſs; and at preſent I am not aware how that caſe will be diſtinguiſhed, ſo as to make it inapplicable to the preſent: but I can find many circumſtances even in that, which are much ſtronger againſt the determination there, than any that exiſt in this caſe againſt any determination on the part of the defendant. The caſe I allude to is that of Dutton againſt Howell, in Shower's parliament caſes, 24; that is a writ of error upon a judgment given in the King's Bench. The caſe from the record is this: the plaintiff declared againſt Dutton, for that he with ſeveral others aſſaulted, beat, wounded, and impriſoned him, and took and ſeized his goods, and impriſoned the plaintiff for three months. There is a plea as to part not guilty, and as to the reſt there is a juſtification, that the defendant at this time was governor of Barbadoes, and ſets out the patent conſtituting him governor; that after the making this patent, and before the time of the aſſault, the defendant arrived at Barbadoes, and did take upon him and exerciſe the government of that and the other iſlands in the patents mentioned, till the firſt of May, when he had licence to return to England; that before his departure he conſtituted the plaintiff to be his deputy-governor, and that the firſt of Auguſt following the defendant arrived at London, in England; that the 4th of May, after defendant's departure, the plaintiff took upon himſelf the adminiſtration of the government of the iſland of Barbadoes, and did unlawfully and arbitrarily execute that government and office, to the oppreſſion of the king's ſubjects; that after the return of the defendant, the plaintiff at a council was charged with miſbehaviour in the adminiſtration of his office, in not taking the oath of office, not obſerving the act of navigation, aſſuming the title of lieutenant-governor, and altering decrees in Chancery; that it was then ordered by the defendant and council, that the plaintiff ſhould be committed. To this there is a demurrer. In this court judgment was given for the plaintiff; on which a writ of error was brought in the houſe of lords; and tho' the particular reaſons of the judgment in the houſe of lords do not appear further than can be collected from the argument, yet there are ſeveral things in the argument from whence it may be collected upon what grounds the judgment of the houſe of lords went. It was argued upon the part of the plaintiff in error, that this action did not lie againſt him, becauſe it was brought againſt him for that which he did as a judge; that the rule ſeems to be the ſame for one ſort of a judge as another, and that this perſon was lawfully made a governor, and ſo had all the powers of a governor. As to the plea, it was admitted there were ſeveral informalities in that. It was ſaid it might be much ſhorter than it was; but that it ſufficiently ſhewed what the plaintiff in error's authority was. That this action cannot lie, becauſe the fact is not triable here; the laws there may be different from ours. Beſides, no action lies, unleſs it were a malicious commitment as well as cauſeleſs; and that no man will pretend that an action can lie againſt the chief governor or lieutenant of Ireland or Scotland; and by the ſame reaſon it ought not in this caſe. He had a power to make judges, and therefore was more than a judge. Other reaſons alledged againſt the action lying here are, firſt, that all the records and evidence are there: ſecondly, the laws there differ from what they are here; and governments would be very weak, and the perſons intruſted with them very uneaſy, if they are ſubject to be charged with actions here for what they do in thoſe countries. In the argument on the part of the defendant in error, much pains are taken to ſhew, and it is inſiſted, that the law of Barbadoes is the ſame as the law of England. Another thing that is there relied on is, that this was an action between two Engliſhmen, for an injury done by one Engliſhman againſt another. Theſe grounds are ſtrongly relied upon on the part of the then defendant in error; and they ſhew at leaſt that his counſel thought theſe diſtinctions very neceſſary and material in order to ſupport the action at all: for though it is denied on one part that the laws of Barbadoes were the ſame as in England, yet on the other ſide it is inſiſted they were, and that this action aroſe between Engliſhman and Engliſhman, and that therefore the action ought to be maintained in this court. The houſe of lords finally determined that the action could not lie here, and the judgment was given for the plaintiff in error. As to the form of the plea, it was impoſſible for any one to ſay a word in vindication of that, or to ſay that the judgment could go upon any other ground than that of the defendant's being governor, and the offence complained of committed by him in that character. That was the ſubſtance of the caſe, and upon that the judgment of the houſe of lords was founded; for as to the plea, it is admitted by the counſel for the defendant, that in other reſpects it was bad upon the face of it. In that caſe, one argument relied on is, that it was an injury committed by one Engliſhman againſt another. Now that is not the caſe here; for the plaintiff himſelf was a Minorquin; he was ſo by birth, and had always lived in that country. My lord, in this caſe the argument cannot hold, that the action ſhall lie becauſe Minorca is governed by the ſame laws as England; for it is otherwiſe, and it is ſtated to be governed by the law of Spain. The acts upon which the commitment was founded, in the caſe of Dutton and Howell, were done by the plaintiff in the character of governor of the place, which is an objection againſt that caſe that will not hold in the preſent; for that is not this caſe. Mr. Fabrigas never ſtood in the character that the plaintiff in that action did, for there the acts complained of were done by him in the character of governor; and that was urged as one ground why it ſhould not be canvaſſed here. But neither of theſe diſtinctions will hold in the preſent caſe; but all the inconveniences pointed out againſt the action in that caſe will hold very ſtrongly in the preſent. This is an action brought againſt the defendant for what he did as judge; he had a power in that caſe to make judges there, and therefore he was ſomething more than a judge; all the records and evidence which relate to the tranſaction are there, and cannot be brought here; the laws there are different from what they are in this country; and, as it is ſaid in the concluſion of that argument, government muſt be very weak indeed, and the perſons intruſted with them very uneaſy, if they are ſubject to be charged with actions here for what they do in that character in thoſe countries. My lord, unleſs that caſe can be materially diſtinguiſhed from the preſent, it will be an authority, and the higheſt authority that can be adduced, to ſhew that this action cannot be maintained, and will be a ſufficient authority to entitle the plaintiff in error in this cauſe to your lordſhip's judgment. What anſwer may be given to that caſe, or diſtinctions made between that caſe and the caſe now before the court, I cannot at preſent foreſee; but if any are attempted, when I hear them, I ſhall be at liberty to give ſuch anſwers to thoſe arguments as may occur to me by way of reply.

Mr. PECKHAM.

My lord, as the moderation and mildneſs of governor Moſtyn's proceedings have been inſiſted on by Mr. Buller, I truſt it will not be thought irrelative to the preſent queſtion, if I ſhortly ſtate to your lordſhips the nature of thoſe injuries which gave birth to the action.

It appeared in evidence on the trial, that Mr. Fabrigas was a natural-born ſubject, being born in Minorca ſubſequent to the ceſſion by the Spaniards at the treaty of Utrecht, and prior to the capture by the French in the year 1758; that he was a man of irreproachable character and good property; not of the firſt claſs of nobility, but, to borrow an expreſſion from colonel Bidulph, 'what we ſhould call in England a gentleman farmer;' that he lived in friendſhip with the firſt nobleſſe in the iſland; and that he had a father living, and a wife and five children.

Thus circumſtanced and thus ſituated, he was at the expreſs command of the governor taken from his houſe by a party of ſoldiers, and dragged at noon-day through the ſtreets of Mahon as a criminal, and thrown into a dungeon appropriated ſolely to capital offenders.

It appeared likewiſe in evidence, that he was confined ſix days in this dungeon, with nothing but the boards to lie on, and with no other ſuſtenance than bread and water, though felons under ſentence of death were allowed the common food of the iſland; that he was refuſed the conſolation of his friends, and denied all intercourſe with his family; that on the ſeventh morning he was hurried aboard a ſhip, without being permitted to take leave of his children, to ſee his wife, or to be accommodated with money or other neceſſaries for his ſubſiſtence; that during this whole time he had heard of no charge againſt him, he had been confronted with no accuſer, he had not even ſeen his judge: yet he was to be baniſhed to Carthagena in Spain for the ſpace of twelve months. The ſentence was faithfully executed; and Mr. Fabrigas, having experienced that diſtreſs which a moneyleſs ſtranger muſt neceſſarily be reduced to in a country whoſe language he did not underſtand, as fortunately for himſelf as unexpectedly to governor Moſtyn, eſcaped from the Spaniards: I ſay unexpectedly, my lord, becauſe he little thought that Mr. Fabrigas would live to tell an Engliſh jury of his ſufferings and the governor's oppreſſion.

I thought it neceſſary to ſtate theſe facts to your lordſhips, that you might judge of the mildneſs of that treatment which Mr. Buller deemed it prudent to expatiate on.

It now becomes requiſite for me to ſtate the conduct of the governor through the ſubſequent ſtages of his very extraordinary defence; and that I muſt do with ſome preciſion, as I mean to contend, that the plaintiff in error by that defence is eſtopped from agitating the queſtion of juriſdiction.

The declaration was delivered in Hilary-Term, 1773; a rule to plead was given, and a plea demanded. Had the governor then pleaded to the juriſdiction, the queſtion would have come before the court on a demurrer; and if that had been determined in our favour, a writ of inquiry would have been executed, and Mr. Fabrigas would in a ſhort ſpace of time, at a little expence, have received a ſatisfaction adequate to the injury, and would have been enabled to return to his friends and to his family. But that would not have anſwered the purpoſe of the governor, as Mr. Fabrigas would not then have been delayed in England, nor have been harraſſed with this expenſive litigation.

Had the governor at the expiration of the four days pleaded in chief, he might then have had the appearance of an argument in his application to your lordſhips; for it then would have been competent for him to have ſaid, 'I was hurried into this plea before I had time to adviſe with my counſel, and conſult upon the propriety of admitting the juriſdiction.' But he has debarred himſelf even of this ſhadow of an argument; for inſtead of pleading at the uſual time, he applied to the court of Common-Pleas for ſix weeks time to plead. Here then was an admiſſion of the juriſdiction; for he could not apply for time to plead, unleſs the court had cognizance of the matter.

I ſhall preſently ſtate to your lordſhips ſome caſes, whoſe authority cannot be ſhaken, to prove, that even after imparlance the queſtion of juriſdiction cannot be gone into.

But this was not the only ſubmiſſion to the juriſdiction of the court; for he then applied to put off the trial till after Eaſter-Term. It would have been nugatory, it would have been abſurd, to have prayed the court to put off that trial, which they had no power to try at all. When Eaſter-Term arrived, the governor made a ſecond attempt to poſtpone the trial; but the court ſaw through his deſign, and, ſatisfied that he did it only for the purpoſe of delay, they tied him down by the rule to try it peremptorily in Trinity-Term, and that he ſhould not bring a writ of error for delay.

When he ſaw the court of Common-Pleas would not lend him their power for ſo baſe a purpoſe, he next made application to the court of Exchequer for an injunction to ſtay proceedings, and a bill was filed in Trinity-Term to effectuate that intention; but the bill was diſmiſſed on argument, and the governor was at length driven in the ſubſequent ſittings to trial. When the cauſe came on, the defendant's counſel did not object to the juriſdiction, they did not requeſt the learned judge to nonſuit the plaintiff; but they ſuffered us to go into our caſe, they croſs-examined our witneſſes, and finding that we had made good our declaration by evidence irrefragable, they then went into their juſtification, and called many witneſſes in ſupport of it. But a verdict being found for the plaintiff, they tendered a bill of exceptions; and in laſt Michaelmas-Term, they applied to the court of Common-Pleas for a new trial; firſt, for exceſs of damages; ſecondly, becauſe the court had no juriſdiction—the moſt extraordinary reaſon perhaps that ever was given; to deſire a ſecond trial, becauſe the court had no juriſdiction to try it at all.

Governor Moſtyn having in ſo many inſtances admitted the juriſdiction of the court, I muſt beg leave to ſtate ſome authorities to your lordſhip, which prove that he is now too late to take any advantage of a defect of juriſdiction.

The firſt caſe I ſhall mention to your lordſhips is to be found in the Year-Books, in the 22d H. 6. fo. 7. where there was a ſpecial imparlance, ſalvis omnibus allegationibus & exceptionibus, tam ad breve quam ad narratio- nem; and the court would not allow the defendant's privilege, becauſe, ſays the caſe, ‘ by imparling he has admitted the juriſdiction of the court.’ This doctrine is confirmed by lord Coke, in his comment on the 195th ſection of Littleton, where ſpeaking of a perſonal action he ſays, three parts are to be conſidered; firſt, when the defendant defends the wrong and force, he maketh himſelf a party to the matter; ſecondly, by the defence of the damages he affirmeth, that the plaintiff is able to ſue and to recover damages upon juſt cauſe; and by the laſt part, viz. ‘ all that which he ought to defend when and where he ought,’ he affirmeth the juriſdiction of the court.

The caſe of Barrington and Venables, 13 C. 2. reported in ſir Thomas Raymond, 34, is very clear on this head. The defendant after imparlance pleaded to the juriſdiction; the plaintiff demurred: the judgment was, that he ſhould anſwer over, for ſuch plea cannot be pleaded after imparlance.

The next caſe in order of time is reported in 1 Modern, 81, Cox and St. Alban's, 22 C. 2. A prohibition was prayed for the city of London, becauſe the defendant had offered a plea to the juriſdiction which had been refuſed. Lord chief juſtice Hale ſaid, ‘ in tranſitory actions, if they will plead a matter that ariſeth out of the juriſdiction, and ſwear it before imparlance, and it be refuſed, a prohibition will go.’ There was a caſe, ſaid his lordſhip, in which it was adjudged that the juriſdiction muſt be pleaded and the plea ſworn, and it muſt come in before imparlance. It was alſo agreed in that caſe, ‘ that the party ſhould never be received to aſſign for error, that it was out of the juriſdiction, but it muſt be pleaded.’ I have in vain endeavoured to find this caſe; but it is ſufficient for my purpoſe to obſerve, that lord chief juſtice Hale would not have cited it unleſs it had been law. If therefore the opinion of that great man, ſolemnly given in the court of King's Bench, is authority, I am bold to ſay, that governor Moſtyn, not having pleaded to the juriſdiction, cannot now aſſign it for error.

In a few years after, lord chief juſtice Hale was again called upon to conſider this queſtion in the caſe of Mandyke and Stint, 2 Modern, 273, 22 C. 2. There was a prohibition to the ſheriff's court of London: the ſuggeſtion was, that the contract was made in Middleſex, therefore the cauſe of action did not ariſe within their juriſdiction. The chief juſtice and juſtice Wyndham were of opinion, ‘ that after the defendant had admitted the juriſdiction by pleading to the action, eſpecially if verdict and judgment paſs, the court will not examine whether the cauſe of action did ariſe out of the juriſdiction or not;’ on which a prohibition was denied, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. I cannot diſtinguiſh this from the preſent caſe; for as the court will not examine whether the cauſe of action did ariſe out of the juriſdiction, there can be no difference whether it was in Middleſex or in Minorca; and that queſtion cannot now be aſked, becauſe verdict and judgment have paſſed.

Lord chief juſtice Holt, in the caſe of Andrews and Holt, 2 Lord Raymond, 884, ſaid, that he was counſel in the caſe of Denning and Norris (reported in 2 Levintz, 243) and that the court held there, ‘ that ſince the defendant had admitted the judge to be a judge by a plea to the action, he was eſtopped to ſay, that he was not a judge afterwards.’ If then a defendant, by having ſubmitted the deciſion of his cauſe to a judge, precluded himſelf from objecting to him afterwards, how much ſtronger is the preſent caſe, where the defendant has ſubmitted his cauſe to the determination of a court which has cognizance over all tranſitory actions. It is again laid down by lord chief juſtice Holt, ‘ that there ought to be no plea to the juriſdiction after imparlance, and that a ſpecial imparlance admits the juriſdiction.’ Holt's Reports, Eaſt. T. 5 W. and M."

I muſt trouble your lordſhips with the caſe of Trelawny and Williams, to ſhew, that there has been but one opinion on both ſides of the Hall reſpecting a plea to the juriſdiction; and that equity and common law have united in ſaying, that if the juriſdiction is not pleaded to, it muſt be afterwards admitted. This caſe is reported in 2 Vernon 483, Hil. T. 1704. The plaintiff prayed an account relative to a tin-ſet: the defendant inſiſted that he ought to have been ſued in the Stannary-Court. The lord-keeper decreed an account; and as to the objection that the plaintiff ought to have ſued in the Stannary-Court, he ſaid, ‘ to ouſt this court of its juriſdiction, the defendant muſt plead to the juriſdiction, and not object to it at the hearing.’

There are a great variety of caſes tending to eſtabliſh this poſition, that when a defendant has once ſubmitted to the juriſdiction, he has for ever precluded himſelf from objecting to it. To ſtate them all, after the great authorities I have mentioned, would be to multiply the witneſſes without ſtrengthening the teſtimony: I ſhall therefore only cite a few paſſages from lord chief baron Gilbert's Hiſtory of the Common-Pleas, which are deciſive upon this part of the argument. In page 40, ſpeaking of the order of pleading, he ſays, ‘ the defendant firſt pleads to the juriſdiction of the court; ſecondly, to the perſon of the plaintiff; and thirdly, to the count or declaration. By this order of pleading each ſubſequent plea admits the former. As, when he pleads to the perſon of the plaintiff, he admits the juriſdiction of the court; for it would be nugatory to plead any thing in that court which has no juriſdiction in the caſe. When he pleads to the count or declaration, he allows that the plaintiff is able to come into that court to implead him, and he may be there properly impleaded.’ He lays it down in a ſubſequent part of his treatiſe (p. 148.) as a poſitive rule of law, that ‘ if a defendant pleads to the juriſdiction of the court, he muſt do it inſtanter on his appearance; for if he imparls, he owns the juriſdiction of the court, by craving leave of the court for time to plead in, and the court ſhall never be ouſted of its juriſdiction after imparlance.’ When I find this doctrine in our old law-books, when I ſee it ratified in modern times, and ſtamped with the authorities of Coke, Hale, Holt, and Gilbert, I am warranted in ſaying, that governor Moſtyn cannot now agitate the queſtion of juriſdiction; and if he cannot, the judgment muſt be affirmed.

Notwithſtanding which, I have no objection to follow Mr. Buller through the grounds of argument that he has adopted; and I ſhall endeavour to prove,

That an action of treſpaſs can be brought in England for an injury done abroad:

That Mr. Fabrigas is capable of bringing ſuch action:

And, that governor Moſtyn may be the ſubject of it.

It cannot be contended, but that an action of treſpaſs is a tranſitory action, and may be brought any where: ‘ all perſonal actions, ſays lord Coke, may be brought in any county, and laid any where.’ C. L. 282.

In the earl of Derby's caſe, 12 Coke, the chancellor, the chief juſtice, the maſter of the rolls, and juſtices Dodderidge and Winch, reſolved, ‘ that for things tranſitory, altho' that in truth they be within the county palatine, the plaintiff may by law alledge them to be done in any place within England; and the defendant may not plead to the juriſdiction of the court, that they were done within the county palatine.’ This doctrine is not confined to counties palatine; for lord Coke, in his comment on Littleton, 261, ſays, ‘ that an obligation made beyond the ſeas at Bourdeaux, in France, may be ſued here in England in what place the plaintiff will.’ Captain Parker brought an action of treſpaſs and falſe impriſonment againſt lord Clive, for injuries received in India, and it was never doubted but that the action did lie. Even at this moment there is an action depending between Gregory Cojimaul, an Armenian merchant, and governor Verelſt, in which the cauſe of action aroſe in Bengal. A bill was filed by the governor in the Exchequer for an injunction, which was granted; but on appeal to the houſe of lords, the injunction was diſſolved. The ſupreme court of judicature, by diſſolving the injunction, acknowledged that an action of treſpaſs could be maintained in England, though the cauſe of action aroſe in India.

The next point to be conſidered is, whether there is any diſability attending the perſon of Mr. Fabrigas, that incapacitates him from bringing this action. But it will be requiſite for me firſt to ſtate, that governor Moſtyn pleaded not guilty, and then juſtified what he had done by alledging, that the plaintiff had endeavoured to create mutiny among the troops; therefore he, as governor, had a right to impriſon and baniſh him. Your lordſhip obſerves, that, according to his own plea, he does not pretend to juſtify what he has done as governor merely from the plenitude of his power, but from the neceſſity of the act, becauſe the plaintiff had endeavoured to create mutiny and ſedition. The learned judge who tried the cauſe, foreſeeing the importance of this juſtification, requeſted the jury, at the ſame time they brought in their verdict, to find whether the governor's juſtification had been proved. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 3000*l.* damages, and, that the plaintiff had not endeavoured to create mutiny or deſertion, or had acted in any way tending thereto.

In conſequence of that deciſion, the queſtion now is, whether Mr. Fabrigas, a man perfectly innocent, can bring an action againſt governor Moſtyn for this wanton and unparalleled injury?

As the law grants redreſs for all injuries, ſo it is open to all perſons, and none are excluded from bringing an action, except on account of their crimes or their country. Littleton ſays, there are ſix manner of perſons who cannot bring actions: Mr. Fabrigas is not included in either of thoſe deſcriptions. The only perſon that can bear the leaſt reſemblance to him is an alien, who, Littleton ſays, to be incapacitated from bringing an action, muſt be born out of the ligeance of the king. Lord Coke, in his comment on that paſſage, obſerves, that ‘ Littleton ſaith not, out of the realm, but out of the ligeance; for he may be born, ſays Coke, out of the realm of England, yet within the ligeance, and ſhall be called the king's liege-man, for ligeus is ever taken for a natural-born ſubject.’ C. L. 129.

Mr. Fabrigas was born in Minorca ſubſequent to the ceſſion of Spain, conſequently he is a natural-born ſubject; every natural-born ſubject, according to lord Coke, owes allegiance to the king; allegiance implies protection, the one is a neceſſary conſequence of the other; the king of England can protect only by his laws; by the laws of England there is no injury without a remedy; the remedy for falſe impriſonment and baniſhment is an action of treſpaſs, which is a tranſitory action, and may be brought any where, therefore rightly brought in the city of London, where this action was actually tried, and Mr. Fabrigas recovered 3000*l.* damages. I hope your lordſhips will juſtify me in ſaying, that this is a fair deduction from eſtabliſhed principles.

Lord Coke (C. L. 130.) mentions three things whereby every ſubject is protected, rex, lex, et reſcripta regis; and he adds, ‘ that he that is out of the protection of the king, cannot be aided or protected by the king's law, or by the king's writ.’ The natural inference to be drawn from thence is, that he who is under the king's protection may be aided by the king's law. Mr. Fabrigas is under the king's protection, becauſe he owes him allegiance, therefore he may be aided by the king's laws; conſequently is warranted in bringing this action, the only aid the laws of England can afford him for that injury.

Mr. Buller has mentioned the caſe of Pons and Johnſon, lieutenant-governor of Minorca, and ſeems to rely on what was ſaid by lord Camden on that occaſion. If my memory does not miſlead me, the plaintiff could not make good his caſe, being unable to prove Mr. Johnſon's hand-writing to the order for the fiſcal to commit him, and the queſtion of juriſdiction was not agitated; but if it had, however reſpectable lord Camden's opinion ever will be, yet it was only the opinion of a judge at niſi prius. And according to Mr. Buller's own ſtate of the caſe, he makes lord Camden confeſs, that an action might lie in a tranſaction between ſubject and ſubject. That conceſſion is ſufficient for me; for I have your lordſhip's own words to prove, that Mr. Fabrigas, being born in a conquered country, is a ſubject.

In the king and Cowle, 2 Burrows, 858, your lordſhip, ſpeaking of Calvin's caſe, ſaid, ‘ the queſtion was, whether the plaintiff Calvin, born in Scotland after the deſcent of the crown of England to king James the firſt, was an alien born, and conſequently diſabled to bring any real or perſonal action for any lands within the realm of England;’ and your lordſhip added, ‘ but it never was a doubt whether a perſon born in the conquered dominions of a country is ſubject to the king of the con‘ quering country.’ From this two points are gained: firſt, that Calvin, though born in Scotland, was not an alien, and might bring a real action; and that there never was a doubt, but that a perſon born in a conquered country was ſubject to the conqueror. As therefore the twelve judges determined that Calvin could bring a real action, becauſe he was not an alien; certainly Fabrigas may bring a tranſitory action, as he is a ſubject, being born in a country that was conquered by the ſtate of Great-Britain.

There is an anonymous caſe in 1 Salkeld, 404, 4 Ann. A bill was brought in Chancery to forecloſe a mortgage of the iſland of Sarke: the defendants pleaded to the juriſdiction of the court, viz. that the iſland of Sarke was governed by the laws of Normandy; and it was objected, that the party ought to ſue in the courts of the iſland, and appeal. On the other ſide, it was ſaid, that if the perſon be here, he may be ſued in Chancery, though the lands lie in a county palatine, or in another kingdom, as Ireland, or Barbadoes. Lord-keeper Wright over-ruled the plea, ſaying, ‘ that ‘ the court acted againſt the perſon of the party and his conſcience, and ‘ there might be a failure of juſtice if the Chancery would not hold plea ‘ in ſuch a caſe, the party being here.’ How much ſtronger then is the preſent caſe? for this is a tranſitory action that may be brought any where; Mr. Fabrigas on the ſpot to bring it, and governor Moſtyn in England to defend it.

The caſe Mr. Buller has cited, of the Eaſt-India Company and Campbell, admits of a ſhort anſwer; for had the defendant confeſſed the matter charged, he would have confeſſed himſelf to be guilty of a felony; and the humanity of the laws of England will not oblige a man to accuſe himſelf: but this is not a public crime, but a civil injury. As Mr. Buller has gone to the Eaſt-Indies for a caſe, I ſhall be excuſed mentioning the caſe of Ramkiſſenſeat and Barker, 1 Atkyns 51, where the plaintiff filed a bill againſt the repreſentatives of the governor of Patna, for money due to him as his banyan. The defendants pleaded, that the plaintiff was an alien born, and an alien infidel, and therefore could have no ſuit here: but lord Hardwicke ſaid, as the plaintiff's was a mere perſonal demand, it was extremely clear that he might bring a bill in this court; and he over-ruled the defendant's plea without hearing one counſel of either ſide. As therefore lord Hardwicke was of opinion, that by the laws of England an alien infidel, a Gentoo merchant, the ſubject of the great mogul, could claim the benefit of the Engliſh laws againſt an Engliſh governor for a tranſaction in a foreign country; I truſt that your lordſhips will determine, that Mr. Fabrigas, who is neither an infidel nor an alien, but a ſubject of Great-Britain, may bring his action here for an injury received in Minorca.

The caſe of the counteſs of Derby does not affect the preſent queſtion; for that was a claim of dower, which is a local action, and cannot, as a tranſitory action, be tried any where. The other caſes, mentioned by Mr. Buller, from Latch and Lutwich, were either local actions, or queſtions upon demurrer, therefore not applicable to the caſe before the court; for a party may avail himſelf of many things upon a demurrer, which he cannot by a writ of error.

Mr. Buller's endeavouring to confound tranſitory with local actions, muſt be my apology for mentioning another caſe in ſupport of the diſtinction. The caſe I allude to is Mr. Skinner's, which was preferred to the twelve judges from the council-board. In the year 1657, when trade was open to the Eaſt-Indies, he poſſeſſed himſelf of a houſe and warehouſe, which he filled with goods at Jamby; and he purchaſed of the king of Great Jamby the iſlands of Baretha. The agents of the Eaſt-India Company aſſaulted his perſon, ſeized his warehouſe, carried away his goods, and took and poſſeſſed themſelves of the iſlands of Baretha. Upon this caſe, it was propounded to the judges, by an order from the king in council, dated the 12th April 1665, whether Mr. Skinner could have a full relief in any ordinary court of law? Their opinion was, ‘ that his ma‘ jeſty's ordinary courts of juſtice at Weſtminſter can give relief for taking ‘ away and ſpoiling his ſhip, goods, and papers, and aſſaulting and ‘ wounding his perſon, notwithſtanding the ſame was done beyond the ſeas: ‘ but that as to the detaining and poſſeſſing of the houſe and iſlands, in the ‘ caſe mentioned, he is not relievable in any ordinary court of juſtice.’

Your lordſhips will collect from this caſe, that the twelve judges held that an action might be maintained here for ſpoiling his goods, and ſeizing his perſon, becauſe an action of treſpaſs is a tranſitory action; but an action could not be maintained for poſſeſſing the houſe and land, becauſe it is a local action.

I truſt I have proved that an action of treſpaſs may be brought here for an injury received in Minorca; and that Mr. Fabrigas, a natural-born ſubject, is capable of bringing ſuch action. The only remaining queſtion is, whether Mr. Moſtyn, as governor, can tyrannize over the innocent inhabitants within his government, in violation of law, juſtice, and humanity, and not be reſponſible in our courts to repair by a ſatisfaction in damages the injury he has done? Mr. Buller has contended, that general Moſtyn governs as all abſolute ſovereigns do, and that ſtet pro ratione voluntas is the only rule of his conduct. I did not expect to hear ſuch an aſſertion advanced in this court. From whom does the governor derive this deſpotiſm? Can the king delegate abſolute power to another, which he has not in himſelf? Can ſuch a monſter exiſt in the Britiſh dominions as tyranny uncontrouled by law? Mr. Buller aſſerts, that the governor is accountable to God alone; but this court I hope will teach him, that he is accountable to his country here, as he muſt be to his God hereafter, for this wanton outrage on an unoffending ſubject. Many caſes have been cited, and much argument adduced, to prove that a man is not reſponſible in an action for what he has done as a judge. I neither deny the doctrine, nor ſhall endeavour to impeach the caſes; but I muſt obſerve, that they do not affect the preſent queſtion. Did governor Moſtyn ſit in judgment? Did he hear any accuſation? Did he examine a witneſs? Did he even ſee the priſoner? Did he follow any rule of law in any country? Stet pro ratione voluntas was his law, and his mercy was twelve months baniſhment, to an innocent individual.

As Mr. Buller has dwelt ſo much upon the caſe of Dutton and Howell, it will be expected that I take ſome notice of it. I need not go over the caſe again, as it has been already very accurately ſtated; but I muſt beg leave to read the reaſons which were given with the printed caſe to the lords, before it came on to be argued in the houſe of peers. It is ſtated, that ſir Richard Dutton ought to have the judgment that was obtained againſt him below, reverſed; for 1ſt, That what he did, he did as chief governor, and in a council of ſtate, for which he ought not to be charged with an action. If he ſhall, it may be not only the caſe of ſir Richard Dutton, but of any other chief governor or privy-counſellor in Scotland, Ireland, or elſewhere.

2. What was done, was in order to bring a delinquent to juſtice, who was tried in Barbadoes and found guilty; and if for this he ſhall be charged with an action, it would be a diſcouragement to juſtice.

3. What was done, was done in court; for ſo is a council of ſtate, to receive complaints againſt ſtate delinquents, and direct their trials in proper courts. What a judge acts in court, as ſir Richard Dutton did, no action lies againſt him for it.

4. There never was ſuch an action as this maintained againſt a governor for what he did in council; and if this be made a precedent, it will render all governments unſafe.

5. If a governor of a plantation beyond the ſeas ſhall be charged with actions here, for what he did there, it will be impoſſible for him to defend himſelf: firſt, for that all records and evidences are there: ſecondly, the laws there differ in many things from what they are here.

Though the firſt part of this reaſon ſeems to operate in favour of governor Moſtyn, yet it goes no farther than this; that if an action is brought here, it will be impoſſible for him to defend himſelf. The latter part ſhews the meaning of the whole; that is, if an action is brought here againſt the governor for any thing done by him in his judicial capacity, then he will not be able to defend himſelf, becauſe all the records and evidences are there. This clearly proves, that it refers to what he did as judge, otherwiſe there could have been no occaſion to have mentioned the records being there.

Theſe reaſons muſt have been the ground of the counſel's argument, and the whole is bottomed in ſir Richard Dutton's having acted with his council in a judicial capacity. I take no notice of the arguments of counſel, as reported by Shower, becauſe it can be no authority for this court. I ſhall only obſerve, that in reſpect to the juriſdiction, which was but ſlightly touched on, that the aſſertion of the counſel for the defendant in error, affirming the juriſdiction, is as good authority for me, as the denial of it by ſir Richard Dutton's counſel is for Mr. Buller. The report is ſilent as to the grounds of the judgment: it only ſays, ‘ that the action ‘ was reverſed;’ but not one word that the action could not be maintained. But I venture to affirm, that this caſe has not the leaſt reſemblance to the preſent. My duty calls on me to draw the invidious parallel.

Governor Dutton ſat with his council, to hear and enquire in the ſupreme court of judicature in Barbadoes:

Governor Moſtyn ſat neither as a military nor a civil judge.

Mr. Fabrigas was not brought before him, neither was he accuſed by any man:

Sir John Witham was publicly accuſed before the governor and council of ſtate.

Mr. Fabrigas was thrown into a dungeon, and treated with the moſt unheard-of ſeverity:

Sir John Witham was only confined for the purpoſe of ſecuring his perſon.

Fabrigas was baniſhed for twelve months to the Spaniſh dominions:

Sir John was kept in cuſtody for fourteen days, till he could be brought to his trial.

Mr. Fabrigas, on the governor's juſtification, was found to be innocent:

Sir John Witham, when brought before the court of general ſeſſions, was found guilty, and recommitted.

The governor of Barbadoes followed the laws of Barbadoes:

The governor of Minorca acted in diametrical oppoſition to all laws, and in violation of the natural dictates of humanity.

Sir Richard Dutton let the law take its courſe againſt a criminal:

But governor Moſtyn went out of his way to perſecute the innocent.

Having ſhewn the difference between the two caſes, permit me to mention an obſervation of lord chief juſtice de Grey, in his opinion on the motion for a new trial. ‘ If the governor had ſecured him, ſaid his lord‘ ſhip, nay, if he had barely committed him, that he might have been ‘ amenable to juſtice, and if he had immediately ordered a proſecution upon ‘ any part of his conduct, it would have been another queſtion: but the ‘ governor knew he could no more impriſon him for a twelvemonth, (and ‘ the baniſhment for a year is a continuation of the original impriſonment) ‘ than that he could inflict the torture.’

Lord chief juſtice de Grey then undoubtedly thought that governor Moſtyn had acted illegally: if ſo, I hope I ſhall be able to ſhew, that he is amenable to the courts of law in England.

Lord Bellamont's caſe, in 2 Salkeld 625, 12 W. 3. B. R. Eaſt. T. evinces, that a governor abroad is reſponſible here. ‘ The attorney-general ‘ moved for a trial at bar the laſt paper-day in the term, in an action againſt ‘ the governor of New-York, for matter done by him as governor, and ‘ granted, becauſe the king defended it.’ I collect from this caſe, that the attorney-general knew the court had juriſdiction, or he would not have made the motion; and the court would not have granted it, if they had not been legally impowered to try it. The legiſlature, in the ſame year (12 W. 3. cap. 12.) enacted, that governors beyond the ſea ſhould be tried in the King's Bench, or in ſuch county as ſhall be aſſigned by his majeſty, by good and lawful men, for offences committed in their governments abroad againſt the king's ſubjects there; as, by the common law, an indictment could be preferred only in that county where the offence was committed. Governors abroad were not criminally amenable till this act had paſſed. When the legiſlature ſo carefully provided to bring governors to juſtice for the offences they might commit in their governments, they would indiſputably, by the ſame law, have protected the ſubjects from civil injuries, had they not known that ſuch proviſion was unneceſſary, and that, by the common law, all perſonal actions might be brought in England; of which lord Bellamont's caſe was a recent inſtance.

In Michaelmas-Term, 11 Geo. II. 1737, Stephen Conner brought an action againſt Joſeph Sabine, governor of Gibraltar: and he ſtated in his declaration, that he was a maſter carpenter of the office of ordnance at Gibraltar; that governor Sabine tried him by a court-martial; to which he was not ſubject; and that he underwent the ſentence of receiving 500 laſhes, and that he was compelled to depart from Gibraltar, which he laid to his damage of 10,000 l. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and juſtified by trying him by a court-martial. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, with 700 l. damages. A writ of error was brought, and the judgment affirmed. No diſtinction can be made between the governor of Gibraltar and the governor of Minorca; except only, that the one tried Conner by a court-martial, and puniſhed him by military law; while the other, without any trial, baniſhed Mr. Fabrigas, contrary to all ideas of juſtice and of law.

I muſt now beg leave to advert to the bill of exceptions; in which it is alledged, that 'Minorca is divided into four diſtricts, excluſive of the 'arraval, which the witneſſes always underſtood to be diſtinct from the 'others, and under the immediate order of the governor.'

I am well aware, that I am not at liberty to go out of the record; if I was, the fact warrants me in ſaying, that the evidence is moſt untrue.

It is notorious that Minorca is divided into four terminos only; Cieutadella, Alayor, Marcadel, and Mahon, which latter includes the arraval of St. Phillip's. This is known to every man who has been at Minorca, and to every man who has read Armſtrong's hiſtory of that iſland. That the governor has a legiſlative authority within the arraval, is too abſurd to dwell on. By what law, by what proviſion, does he claim that power? When proceſs is executed within St. Phillip's, or its environs, the civil magiſtrate uſually pays the governor the compliment of acquainting him with it; but the ſame compliment is paid to the commanding officer at Cieutadella, where an excluſive juriſdiction is not even pretended. In fact, it is a matter of civility merely, but never was a claim of right.

Lord chief juſtice de Grey, in the ſolemn opinion which he gave upon the motion for a new trial, has been explicit on theſe two heads. 'One 'of the witneſſes in the cauſe (ſaid his lordſhip) repreſented to the jury, 'that in ſome particular caſes, eſpecially in criminal matters, the governor 'reſident upon the iſland does exerciſe a legiſlative power. It was groſs ig'norance in that perſon to imagine ſuch a thing: I may ſay, it was impoſ'ſible, that a man who lived upon the iſland, in the ſtation he had done, 'ſhould not know better, than to think that the governor had a civil and 'criminal power in him. The governor is the king's ſervant; his commiſſion 'is from him, and he is to execute the power he is inveſted with under that 'commiſſion, which is to execute the laws of Minorca, under ſuch regula'tions as the king ſhall make in council. It was a vain imagination in the 'witneſſes to ſay, that there were five terminos in the iſland of Minorca. I 'have at various times ſeen a multitude of authentic documents and papers 'relative to that iſland; and I do not believe, that, in any one of them, the idea 'of the arraval of St. Phillip's being a diſtinct juriſdiction was ever ſtarted. 'Mahon is one of the four terminos, and St. Phillip's, and all the diſtrict 'about it, is comprehended within that termino: but to ſuppoſe, that there 'is a diſtinct juriſdiction, ſeparate from the government of the iſland, is 'ridiculous and abſurd.'

Theſe were the words of lord chief juſtice de Grey; to which, I am confident, this court will pay a proper attention.

The bill of exceptions then ſtates, that general Moſtyn was appointed governor by the king's commiſſion, which gives him all the powers belonging to the ſaid office. I wiſh to aſk Mr. Buller, whether to perſecute the innocent, and to baniſh thoſe ſubjects committed to his care, is a power incident to or ſpringing out of the office of governor? If it is not, the governor cannot juſtify himſelf under his commiſſion.

It is then ſtated, that the king ordered 'all his loving ſubjects in the 'ſaid iſland to obey him, the ſaid John Moſtyn;' but nothing in particular is mentioned of the arraval. Had it been a peculiar diſtrict, under the deſpotic will of the governor, there muſt have been ſome notice taken of it, either in the commiſſion, or in his majeſty's orders. The governor then confeſſes in his bill of exceptions, 'that he baniſhed Mr. 'Fabrigas without any reaſonable or probable cauſe, or any other mat'ter alledged in his plea, or any act tending thereto.' Notwithſtanding which admiſſion, in the very next ſentence, he inſiſts that the plaintiff ought to be barred his ſaid action, although it is ſtated in the bill of exceptions, that 'the Minorquins plead ſometimes the Engliſh laws.'

Were the bill of exceptions leſs abſurd than it is, yet I ſhould contend, that the governor, by pleading in chief, and ſubmitting his cauſe to the deciſion of an Engliſh jury, has precluded this court from enquiring into the original juriſdiction. Were it poſſible that this ground ſhould fail me, when ſupported by ſo many great authorities, yet I ſhould be very eaſy about the event; for, as an action of treſpaſs can be brought in England for injuries abroad, and as every ſubject can bring that action, and as governor Moſtyn (being a ſubject) muſt anſwer to it, I have no doubt but the judgment will be affirmed. Should it be reverſed, I fear the publick, with too much truth, will apply the lines of the Roman ſatyriſt on the drunken Marius to the preſent occaſion; and they will ſay of governor Moſtyn, as was formerly ſaid of him, and to the Minorquins, if Mr. Fabrigas ſhould be deprived of that ſatiſfaction in damages which the jury gave him,

Hic eſt damnatus inani judicio;

At tu victrix provincia ploras.

Mr. BULLER's reply.

Mr. Buller. I beg leave to trouble the court with a few words by way of reply: and though Mr. Peckham has thought fit to declaim ſo much upon the particular facts of this cauſe, yet I was confident at firſt, and do not now find I was deceived in thinking, I ſhould not be contradicted in what I ſaid about the propriety of governor Moſtyn's conduct; that he had taken every precaution that a man in his ſituation could do, had conſulted many perſons there, civil and military, and that they were all unanimous in adviſing the governor to do what was done.

The firſt objection made by Mr. Peckham has been, that Mr. Moſtyn ſhould be precluded from contending, that this court hath not a juriſdiction, becauſe he has ſubmitted to the juriſdiction of the court in ſo many inſtances during the whole of theſe proceedings. He has ſtated the whole proceedings during the ſtages of this cauſe, by which he ſuppoſes Mr. Moſtyn hath done ſuch acts as ſhall be conſtrued into a ſubmiſſion to the juriſdiction of the court, and is therefore now precluded from entering into the queſtion. Further, Mr. Peckham has inſiſted upon it, that at the trial we did wrong in making a defence; becauſe, if we meant to go into the queſtion, whether the court has juriſdiction or not, we ſhould have then inſiſted upon a non-ſuit, and not gone into the merits of the cauſe. I do not apprehend any of the caſes he has cited will come up to the preſent: and as to the different periods of the cauſe, where he ſuppoſes we have ſubmitted to the juriſdiction of the court, if this court hath no juriſdiction at all, I do not know how it can then be ſaid we have ſubmitted to it. Saying, that at the trial we ſhould have inſiſted upon a non-ſuit, is ſaying we ſhould have inſiſted upon what we could not demand; for it is at all times at the option of the plaintiff, whether he will ſubmit to a non-ſuit or not. If the defendant can avail himſelf of the objection at all, it muſt be by intitling himſelf by that means to a verdict; for it is in the power of the plaintiff to get up and ſay, I will not be non-ſuited. It was impoſſible for us to inſiſt upon the objection in any other way than it is now done: the objection ariſes out of the facts of the caſe, and what was proved at the trial. It was there proved, that Mr. Moſtyn was the governor; that what he did was in that character; and therefore, ſays he, theſe facts being proved, I inſiſt I am not anſwerable in a court of juſtice in England, for what I have done in this character: therefore the objection would have been improper, if it had come at any other time; it could only come when theſe facts appeared in evidence upon which his objection was founded. As to the many caſes that have been cited, I believe I may ſafely give this general anſwer to them all: they are caſes where an action has been brought in a court in England, for a tranſaction ariſing in England, but, on account of a charter or ſtatute, the juriſdiction of the ſuperior court has been excluded. Where that is ſo, and this court has a general ſuperintendent juriſdiction, but it is taken away by a particular law, in ſuch caſe it is neceſſary to plead to the juriſdiction: but when the queſtion ariſes upon a tranſaction happening in foreign parts, and where the courts of England cannot have any controul whatſoever, (ſuppoſe, for inſtance, in France, where the king or parliament of England can make no laws to bind the inhabitants) it is juſt the ſame as a court of inferior record in England, where it holds plea of a thing done out of their juriſdiction. In that caſe, if it appears upon the proceedings, that the cauſe of action aroſe out of the juriſdictions, the whole proceedings are void; they are coram non judice; and an action will lie againſt the party, the officers, and the judges, for what is done under them.

In this caſe, as I ſubmit to your lordſhip, the queſtion is the ſame; becauſe it is not on a tranſaction happening within the limits, or within the country where this court reſides or has a juriſdiction, but on a tranſaction ariſing in foreign dominions. I beg leave to mention too, that if theſe caſes were ſo very general as Mr. Peckham wiſhes to have them underſtood, it is not poſſible that the caſe in Latch, or the caſe in Lutwyche, ever could have exiſted; becauſe, if it was to hold as a general rule, that where the cauſe of action ariſes out of the kingdom you muſt plead to the juriſdiction, it would have been a ſufficient anſwer in thoſe caſes to ſay, it was not ſo pleaded. In the caſe in Lutwyche, there was a plea in bar, and demurrer to that plea; but it appearing, that the cauſe of action did not ariſe in this kingdom, but in foreign parts, the court agreed, that the ſuppoſition and quaint legal fiction, which otherwiſe would avail, that it was in London or England, was abſurd, and the plaintiff could not ſupport his action. It was the ſame in the caſe in Latch; for that was not on a plea to the juriſdiction, but the objection aroſe long after, and in a ſubſequent period of the cauſe: the judges there agreed, that if it appeared on the record, that the caſe was plainly and evidently out of their juriſdiction, they were bound to take notice of it.

Mr. Peckham has divided his argument into three heads: firſt, whether a tranſitory action is capable of being brought in England, if the cauſe of that action ariſe beyond the ſeas: ſecondly, whether the plaintiff is capable of bringing ſuch action: and, in the third place, whether the defendant is a proper object of it. On the firſt of theſe queſtions it has been inſiſted, that an action of falſe impriſonment is a tranſitory action; and ſome caſes cited, where tranſitory actions, ariſing abroad, are holden to be maintainable here. An action of falſe impriſonment certainly is a tranſitory action: but, my lord, the caſes cited from 12th Co. and Co. Lit. were not caſes of action for falſe impriſonment, but debt upon bond. Theſe caſes were where the law, in the different countries, was the ſame; and they therefore come within the diſtinction laid down in the caſe before lord Camden. For, where the law of the different countries is the ſame, this court may hold plea; it may do as much juſtice as the foreign courts, and can be involved in no difficulty with reſpect to the rules by which they are to decide. But in the caſe of tranſactions ariſing in foreign dominions, where the law of the foreign country is different from the law of this kingdom, this court has no way of informing themſelves what the foreign law is, nor can they know what rules to decide by; and therefore every inconvenience ariſes againſt their entertaining ſuch a ſuit. Mr. Peckham then cited the caſe of Parker againſt lord Clive, in this court, and obſerved, that there never was any objection taken there, that the action would not lie. That caſe is different from the preſent. That was a caſe between Engliſh ſubjects, and a caſe that was to be determined, not by the law of the Eaſt-Indies, (for that was not ſet up as a defence, or at all intermixed with the caſe) but by the law of England; and therefore is ſtill within the diſtinction I have laid down, and endeavoured to ſupport. Then the ſecond queſtion Mr. Peckham has made is, whether the plaintiff can maintain this action? The plaintiff, he ſays, is not an alien, but a natural-born ſubject, and as ſuch he owes allegiance, and is intitled to protection; and that the king of England can protect only by the laws of England, and therefore this man has a right to bring his action here. The propoſition will itſelf ſhew how enormous it would be, if it were to hold in this caſe. How is the king to rule by the laws of England? Is it meant that this caſe is to be determined by the laws of England? If ſo, that would be injuſtice in the moſt glaring light; becauſe it would be condemning the defendant by one law, when he was bound to regulate his conduct by a different. But it is not true that the king of England can protect by the laws of England only; for, in other places, a tranſaction muſt be tried by the laws of that place where it ariſes; and the king can, in other places, govern by other laws than thoſe of England: and I contend, this queſtion muſt be determined by ſuch laws, and not by the laws of this country. Mr. Peckham has then inſiſted, that this is a caſe between ſubject and ſubject. If he means it is between ſubject and ſubject, ſpeaking of the king of England, it is true; but Fabrigas is not a ſubject of this realm, nor ſubject to be governed by the laws of this country, and therefore ſhall not avail himſelf of the laws of this country. The caſe in Salkeld, 404, was then cited, where the court of Chancery proceeded againſt a foreigner; and the reaſon there given for ſo doing is, becauſe that court acts in perſonam. But, my lord, that caſe does not appear to be at all blended with foreign law; nor is any thing there ſtated, which called on the court to determine that caſe by any other law than the known laws of this country, and the rules of their own court. The caſe in the 4th Inſtitute was then endeavoured to be diſtinguiſhed from the preſent, by inſiſting, that the ſubject-matter of that caſe was local: but that anſwer cannot hold. If it had been an action in a court of law, the anſwer would have been a good one; becauſe an action of dower is local, and can only be tried in the county where the land lies: but that was a ſuit in Chancery, and not an action; and, as is ſaid in the caſe cited from Salkeld, the court of Chancery don't proceed againſt the thing, but againſt the perſon.

Then the laſt queſtion that has been made is, whether the defendant in this caſe is the proper ſubject of an action? My lord, Mr. Peckham has obſerved, I ſaid the governor was abſolute; but that he inſiſts is impoſſible, becauſe there is no perſon who could delegate ſuch an authority to him; that if he derived ſuch authority from any one, it muſt be from the king; but the king, not being abſolute himſelf, could not grant ſuch authority to Mr. Moſtyn. If it be meant only, that the king is not abſolute in this country, I moſt readily accede to the propoſition; but what the conſtitution of this country is, can be no argument to prove what is the ſtate or conſtitution of Minorca. That Minorca is of a different conſtitution, and is governed by different laws from what prevail in this country, is ſtated in the record; which record is deciſive upon that point, for the court cannot depart from it. It is there ſtated, that the arraval of St. Phillip's is ſubject to the immediate order of the governor, and to his order and direction only; for no judge, either criminal or civil, can interfere, or has any juriſdiction there, unleſs under his expreſs leave: therefore the argument, as to the authority or power of the king here, is totally foreign to the ſituation of the governor of Minorca, or the power or juriſdiction he has there. Then it is ſaid, it does not appear on the record, that the defendant did act as judge. This alſo muſt be decided by the record; and it is there ſtated, that the defendant was governor, and ſo being governor he cauſed the plaintiff to be taken, impriſoned, &c. The caſe of Dutton v. Howell has been much obſerved upon, and the printed reaſons given in that caſe particularly ſtated; but I do not perceive that caſe has been diſtinguiſhed from the preſent. Some of the reaſons alledged for the defendant there, are equally ſtrong in favour of the preſent defendant. It is ſaid, there never was ſuch an action maintained before; and if a governor beyond ſea be charged here, he cannot defend himſelf, becauſe all the records and evidence are there. Mr. Peckham has not been able to produce one caſe, in which ſuch an action as this has been maintained before. But then another diſtinction he endeavoured to avail himſelf of is, that, in the caſe of Dutton and Howell, the action was for an act done in council, and therefore varied from this caſe, becauſe here there was no council at all. I cannot ſee how that difference will at all avail Mr. Peckham's client. In the firſt place, in Barbadoes, there was a council, and the governor had no power without the council: but is that the caſe here? In Minorca, there is no council at all; and therefore, in this caſe, the governor ſtands in the ſame ſituation as the governor and council of Barbadoes. As to the neceſſity of pleading in abatement to the juriſdiction, it is very obſervable, that in the caſe of Dutton v. Howell, the counſel who argued in that caſe do not venture to rely upon that objection. But they inſiſt further, that the juriſdiction cannot be examined in the Exchequer-Chamber, becauſe both the ſtatute and writ of error expreſsly provide againſt it; and therefore, ſay they, it is queſtionable, whether it can be inſiſted upon in the houſe of lords: and it is admitted by them, that a queſtion might have been made on the trial of an iſſue, if one had been joined. However, that queſtion was gone into in the houſe of lords, and the final deciſion of the cauſe appears from the book; namely, that the judgment in that caſe was for the defendant, and that the action could not be maintained. Then the words of lord chief juſtice de Grey, in this preſent cauſe, upon a motion for a new trial, have been much relied upon; and his lordſhip is made to ſay, that if the governor had ſecured the preſent plaintiff, merely for the ſake of a trial, it would be a different affair. In this caſe, I apprehend it would be quite ſufficient for me, if the governor had a power of committing at all; for if he had, that is ſufficient to prevent the defendant's being a treſpaſſer by ſuch commitment: and the reaſonableneſs of the time for which he was committed, would be a very different queſtion; for, if the governor had a power of committing, he has purſued that power, and then this action cannot be maintained. The next caſe that has been cited, is lord Bellamont's caſe in 2d Salkeld, which was an action againſt a governor for what he did in that character: but that is ſimply a motion for a trial at bar. The merits of the caſe, or the propriety of the action, were not before the court, or at all entered into; nor was any objection made to the juriſdiction of the court; and where a thing is not objected to, the caſe can never be an authority on the point: there is not one ſyllable ſaid about it; and therefore that caſe cannot have the leaſt weight whatſoever reſpecting this queſtion. Then Mr. Peckham cited the ſtatute of the 12th of William the third: but that was admitted by him to extend only to criminal proſecutions at the king's ſuit, and therefore can have nothing to do with the preſent queſtion. The caſe of Conner againſt Sabine is as different from this caſe, as any one caſe can be from another. There the defence was put upon the ground, that the plaintiff was amenable to a court-martial. The fact turned out otherwiſe: they ſtated a limited juriſdiction, and it appeared the plaintiff was not the object of that juriſdiction. Then it is ſaid, that Minorca is not a military camp, but that there are judges both criminal and civil. Here again I muſt have recourſe to the record itſelf; for there it is ſtated, that within the arraval of St. Phillip's, where this tranſaction occurred, there is no judge either criminal or civil; there is no power but that of the governor. Mr. Peckham obſerved, that it is ſtated in the record, that the inhabitants ſometimes claim protection from the law of England, as well as the law of Spain. It is ſo ſtated; but what is ſaid further? Not that they ever have it allowed to them, or that they are governed by it; but it is expreſsly ſtated, that they are in general governed by the law of Spain: therefore the record does not prove, that the people in Minorca are governed by the ſame laws as the people here; but it does prove, that they are governed by laws which are totally different, and that within the arraval of St. Phillip's, the will of the governor is the law. Mr. Peckham then attacks the veracity of the record with reſpect to the different diſtricts which there are within the iſland; and has inſiſted, that though in the execution of proceſs, &c. the law-officers may conſult the governor, or inform him what they are going to do, yet that they are not bound by law to do ſo. My lord, the record muſt, in theſe reſpects, alſo decide for us. It is there ſtated what the diſtricts are; that the arraval of St. Phillip's is diſtinct from the others; and that no magiſtrates can come there, nor can any proceſs be executed there, without the governor's particular leave. Mr. Peckham aſks, where is the authority that enables a governor to baniſh an innocent man? In the firſt place, as to his being an innocent man, it is not competent to this court to enquire whether he was innocent or not, or whether the governor was ſtrictly juſtifiable or not; but it is ſufficient to prove, that the governor had an authority to impriſon. That authority appears upon the face of the record; for it is there ſtated that he was governor, and had every power, civil and military, and that all he did was in the character of a governor. Theſe facts being proved, I ſubmit are a ſufficient bar to this action, and the court cannot go into the queſtion, whether the plaintiff was innocent or guilty. The laſt argument that has been relied upon by Mr. Peckham is, ſome other expreſſions of lord chief juſtice de Grey, in the courſe of this cauſe; in which his lordſhip ſaid, that the witneſſes muſt have been miſtaken in the account they gave of the conſtitution and law of the iſland. Here it is impoſſible for the court to go out of the record: but theſe obſervations of lord chief juſtice de Grey go certainly a great way towards proving the impropriety of maintaining ſuch an action here as the preſent. If the account given by lord chief juſtice de Grey of the iſland be true, and I make no doubt it is, the conſequence is this: that even tho' all the evidence was obtained in this cauſe that could be had; though perſons were called as witneſſes, who, from their ſituation, and the departments they had officiated in, were moſt likely to be converſant with the law and conſtitution of the iſland; yet that all the accounts that have been given are imperfect, erroneous, and unworthy of credit. That is the ſtrongeſt evidence of the impropriety of maintaining ſuch an action as this in England. For if, as lord chief juſtice de Grey ſays, the evidence that has been given of the foreign law in this caſe is not to be relied upon, but is all a miſtake; it may happen, and it muſt naturally be expected, that in every caſe which is brought here from foreign dominions, where the cauſe of action ariſes abroad, all the evidence is abroad, and the court can get no other evidence of the law of the place than the looſe opinions of thoſe who have occaſionally been there; and the courts here having no eſtabliſhed legal mode of obtaining certificates from ſuch country, properly authenticated, to ſay what the law there is, the ſame miſtakes and inconvenience will ariſe.

Therefore, on the whole, I truſt the court will be of opinion, that this action is improper, and ought not to be maintained here.

Lord MANSFIELD.

Let it ſtand for another argument. It has been extremely well argued on both ſides.

On Friday the 27th January, 1775, it was very ably argued by Mr. Serjeant Glynn, on the part of Mr. Fabrigas, and by Mr. Serjeant Walker, on behalf of governor Moſtyn: but as no new caſes were cited, we ſhall proceed to give the judgment of the court of King's Bench, which was in ſubſtance as follows.

Lord MANSFIELD.

This was an action for an aſſault and falſe impriſonment by the defendant upon the plaintiff. And part of the complaint being for baniſhing him from the iſland of Minorca to Carthagena, in Spain, it was neceſſary for the plaintiff to take notice in the declaration of the real place where the cauſe of complaint aroſe; which he has ſtated to be at Minorca, with a videlicet in London, at St. Mary-le-Bow. Had it not been for that particularity, he might have ſtated it to have been in the county of Middleſex; but part of the complaint making the locality, where the cauſe of action aroſe, neceſſary to be ſtated, being a baniſhment from Minorca to Carthagena, he ſtates it with this videlicet. To this declaration the defendant put in two pleas; firſt, not guilty; and then he pleads, that he was governor of Minorca, by letters patent from the crown, and that the defendant was raiſing ſedition and mutiny; in conſequence of which he did impriſon him and ſend him out of the iſland, which he alledges he had an authority to do, for that ſedition and mutiny that he then was raiſing. To this plea the plaintiff does not demur, nor does he deny that it would be a juſtification, in caſe it was true; but he denies the truth of the fact, and puts in iſſue whether the fact of the plea was true. The plea avers, that the aſſault for which the action was brought aroſe in the iſland of Minorca, out of the realm of England, and no where elſe. To this the plaintiff has made no new aſſignment, and therefore by his replication he admits the locality of the cauſe of action. Thus then it ſtood upon the pleadings. When the trial came on, the plaintiff went into the evidence of his caſe, and the defendant went likewiſe into his evidence. But, upon the part of the defendant, evidence different from any fact alledged in his plea of juſtification was given; and witneſſes were called to prove that the diſtrict in Minorca called the arraval, where the injury complained of was done, was not within either of the four precincts, but that it is in the nature of a peculiar liberty, more immediately under the power of the governor, and that no judge of the iſland can exerciſe juriſdiction there without an appointment from him. That is the ſubſtance of their evidence.

The judge left it to the jury upon the facts of the caſe; and they found for the plaintiff. The defendant then tendered a bill of exceptions, upon which bill of exceptions it comes before us. And the great difficulty I have had upon both theſe arguments is, to be able clearly to comprehend what queſtion it is that is meant ſeriouſly to be brought before the court for their judgment. If I underſtand the counſel for governor Moſtyn right, what they ſay is this: the plea of not guilty is totally immaterial, and the plea of juſtification is totally immaterial, for it appears on the plaintiff's own ſhewing that this matter aroſe in Minorca; and the replication to the plea admits it: and it likewiſe appears that the defendant was governor of Minorca; and as the impriſonment aroſe in Minorca by the authority of the defendant, the judge ought to have ſtopped all evidence whatſoever, and have directed the jury immediately to have found for the defendant. Why? There are three reaſons given. One of them inſiſted upon in the firſt argument (but abandoned to-day) is, that the plaintiff is a Minorquin, born in the iſland of Minorca. To diſpoſe of that objection at once, I ſhall only ſay that it is wiſely abandoned to-day. A Minorquin; what then? Has not a ſubject of the king, born at Minorca, as good a right to apply to the king's courts of juſtice, as a perſon born within the ſound of Bow-bell, in Cheapſide? If there is no other objection to him, would that make any? To be ſure not. But it is abandoned, ſo I ſhall lay it out of the caſe.

The other two grounds which are enforced to-day are, if I take them right—but I am under ſome difficulties, becauſe they are ſuch propoſitions that you may argue as well whether there is ſuch a court exiſting as this which I am now ſitting in—the firſt is, that he was governor of Minorca, and therefore for no injury whatſoever that is done by him, right or wrong, can any evidence be heard, and that no action can lie againſt him; the next is, that the injury was done out of the realm: I think theſe are the whole amount of the queſtions that have been laid before the court. Now as to the firſt, there is nothing ſo clear as that in an action of this kind, which is for an aſſault and falſe impriſonment, the defendant, if he has any juſtification, muſt plead it; and there is nothing more clear than that, if the court has not a general juriſdiction of the matter, he muſt plead to that juriſdiction, and he cannot take advantage of it upon the general iſſue: I therefore, upon that ground, at once lay out of the caſe every thing relative to the arraval; for if he acted as a judge, it is ſynonimous to a court of record: and tho' it ariſes in a foreign country, where the technical diſtinction of a court of record does not exiſt, yet if he ſat in a court of juſtice, and ſubject to a ſuperior review, it is within the reaſon of the law of England, which ſays, that ſhall be a juſtification; and he would, if he had acted according to the law of the land, be entitled to a juſtification in the fact that is complained of; but that muſt be pleaded. If an action is brought againſt a perſon who is a judge of record, he muſt lay it before the court, by way of plea and juſtification, that he was a judge. I don't lay a ſtreſs upon the word record, but there is no colour upon the evidence that he acted as a judge of a court of juſtice; therefore every thing ſtated relative to the arraval, which is ſtated in the bill of exceptions, is nothing at all to the purpoſe. The firſt point that I ſhall begin with is the ſacredneſs of the perſon of the governor. Why, if that was true, and if the law was ſo, he muſt plead it. This is an action of falſe impriſonment: primâ facie, the court has juriſdiction. If he was guilty of the fact, he muſt ſhew a ſpecial matter that he did this by a proper authority. What is his proper authority? The king's commiſſion to make him governor. Why then, he certainly muſt plead it: but, however, I will not reſt the anſwer upon that. It has been ſingled out, that in a colony that is beyond the ſeas, but part of the dominions of the crown of England, though actions would lie for injuries committed by other perſons, yet it ſhall not lie againſt the governor. Now I ſay, for many reaſons, if it did not lie againſt any other man, it ſhall moſt emphatically lie againſt the governor. In every plea to the juriſdiction, you muſt ſtate a juriſdiction; for if there is no other method of trial, that alone will give the king's courts juriſdiction. If an action is brought here for a matter ariſing in Wales, you muſt ſhew the juriſdiction of the court in Wales: and in every caſe to repel the juriſdiction of the king's courts, you muſt ſhew a better and a more proper juriſdiction. Now in this caſe no other juriſdiction is ſhewn, even by way of argument; and it is moſt certain, that if the king's courts cannot hold plea in ſuch a caſe, there is no other court upon earth that can do it: for it is truly ſaid, that a governor is in the nature of a viceroy, and, of neceſſity, part of the privileges of the king are communicated to him during the time of his government. No criminal proſecution lies againſt him, and no civil action will lie againſt him; becauſe, what would the conſequence be? Why, if a civil action lies againſt him, and a judgment obtained for damages, he might be taken up and put in priſon on a capias; and therefore, locally, during the time of his government, the courts in the iſland cannot hold plea againſt him. But in this peculiar caſe, it is ſaid to have happened in the arraval. Why, it is ſtated in the evidence, that no judge can ſit there at all without his leave. If he is out of the government, he leaves it; he comes and lives in England, and he has no effects there to be attached: then there is no remedy whatſoever, if it is not in the king's courts. But there is another very ſtrong reaſon alluded to by Mr. Serjeant Glynn, which would alone be deciſive. This is a charge againſt him, which, though a civil injury, has a mixture of criminality in it: it is an aſſault; which is criminal by the laws of England, and is an abuſe of that authority given him by the king's letters patent under the great ſeal. Now, if every thing within a dominion is triable by the courts within that dominion, yet the conſequence of the king's letters patent, which gives the power, muſt be tried here; for nothing concerning the ſeigniory can be tried in the place where it is. In the proprietary governments in America, they cannot try any queſtion concerning the ſeigniory in their own courts; and therefore, though queſtions concerning lands in the iſle of Man are triable in the courts of the iſle of Man, yet wherever there is a queſtion concerning the ſeigniory, it muſt be tried in ſome courts in England. It was ſo held by the chief juſtice and many of the judges in the reign of queen Elizabeth, upon a queſtion ariſing concerning the ſeigniory of the iſle of Man. Or whenever there is a queſtion between two provinces in America, it muſt be tried in England, by analogy to what was done with reſpect to the ſeigniories in Wales being tried in Engliſh counties: ſo that emphatically the governor muſt be tried in England, to ſee whether he has exerciſed legally and properly that authority given him by the king's letters patent, or whether he has abuſed that authority, contrary to the law of England, which governs the letters patent by which he is appointed. It does not follow from this, that, according to the nature of the caſe, let the cauſe of action ariſe where it may, that a man is not entitled to give every juſtification that ought to be a defence to him. If by the authority of that capacity in which he ſtood he has done right, he is to lay that before the court by a proper plea, and the court will exerciſe their judgment whether that is not a ſufficient juſtification. In this caſe, if the juſtification had been proved, perhaps the court would have been of an opinion that it was a ſufficient anſwer, and he might have moved in arreſt of judgment afterwards, and taken the opinion of the court; but the court muſt be of opinion that it is a ſufficient anſwer, and that the raiſing a mutiny in a garriſon, though in time of peace, was a reaſon for that ſummary proceeding, in taking him up and ſending him out of the iſland. I could conceive caſes in time of war, in which a governor would be juſtified, though he acted very arbitrarily, in which he could not be juſtified in time of peace. Suppoſe in a ſiege, or when the French were going to invade Minorca, ſuppoſe that the governor ſhould think proper to ſend a hundred of the inhabitants out of the iſland, and that he did this really acting for the beſt: or ſuppoſe, upon a general ſuſpicion, he ſhould take people up as ſpies: why, upon proper circumſtances laid before the court for their judgment and opinion, it would be very fit to ſee whether he had acted as the governor of the garriſon ought, according to the law of England and the juſtice of the caſe. But it is ſaid, if there is a law in the garriſon, or if he acts as the Spaniſh governor might have done before, how is that to be known here?—How? Why, there are ways of knowing foreign laws as well as our own, but in a different manner: it muſt be proved as a fact, and in that ſhape the court muſt aſſiſt the jury in finding out what the law really is. Suppoſe there is a French ſettlement (there is a caſe in point of the ſort I am ſtating) which depends upon the cuſtom of Paris; why, we muſt receive witneſſes with regard to it, to ſhew what the cuſtom is, juſt as you receive evidence of a cuſtom with reſpect to trade.

The judges in the courts of England do determine all caſes that ariſe in the plantations, all caſes that ariſe in Gibraltar or Minorca, in Jerſey or Guernſey, and they muſt inform themſelves by having the law ſtated to them. As to ſuggeſtions with regard to witneſſes, the plaintiff muſt prove his caſe, and the court muſt take care that the defendant is not ſurpriſed, and that he has a fair opportunity of bringing his evidence, if it is a caſe proper in other reſpects for the juriſdiction of the court. There may be ſome caſes ariſing abroad, which may not be fit to be tried here; but that cannot be the caſe of a governor injuring a man, contrary to the duty of his office, and in violation of the truſt repoſed in him by the king's commiſſion. If he wants to ſend for witneſſes to prove his juſtification, and applies to the court, they will do what this court did in a caſe of a criminal proſecution which aroſe in Scotland. This court forced the proſecutor (and would have put off the trial from day to day if he had not ſubmitted to it) to ſuffer the witneſſes to be examined by a commiſſion where the cauſe aroſe, who could not be compelled to come here. The court obliged them to come into theſe terms; or, if they did not, it is a matter of courſe, in aid of a trial at law, to apply upon a real ground, and not upon a fictitious pretence of delay, to a court of equity to have a commiſſion and injunction in the mean time; and the court will certainly take care that juſtice ſhall be done to the defendant as well as to the plaintiff, who muſt come with witneſſes to prove his caſe: and therefore, in every light in which I ſee this matter, it holds emphatically in the caſe of a governor, if it did not hold in reſpect of any other man within the colony, province, or garriſon. But to make queſtions upon matters of ſettled law, where there have been a number of actions determined, which it never entered into a man's head to diſpute—to lay down in an Engliſh court of juſtice ſuch monſtrous propoſitions as that a governor, acting by virtue of letters patent under the great ſeal, can do what he pleaſes; that he is accountable only to God and his own conſcience—and to maintain here that every governor in every place can act abſolutely; that he may ſpoil, plunder, affect their bodies and their liberty, and is accountable to nobody—is a doctrine not to be maintained; for if he is not accountable in this court, he is accountable no-where. The king in council has no juriſdiction of this matter; they cannot do it in any ſhape; they cannot give damages, they cannot give reparation, they cannot puniſh, they cannot hold plea in any way. Wherever complaints have been before the king in council, it has been with a view to remove the governor; it has been with a view to take the commiſſion from him which he held at the pleaſure of the crown. But ſuppoſe he holds nothing of the crown, ſuppoſe his government is at an end, and that he is in England, they have no juriſdiction to make reparation to the party injured; they have no juriſdiction to puniſh in any ſhape the man that has committed the injury: how can the arguments be ſupported, that, in an empire ſo extended as this, every governor in every colony and every province belonging to the crown of Great-Britain, ſhall be abſolutely deſpotic, and can no more be called in queſtion than the king of France? and this after there have been multitudes of actions in all our memories againſt governors, and nobody has been ingenious enough to whiſper them, that they were not amenable.

In a caſe in Salkeld, cited by Mr. Peckham, there was a motion for a trial at bar in an action of falſe impriſonment againſt the governor of New-York; and it was deſired to be a trial at bar, becauſe the attorney-general was to defend it on the part of the king, who had taken up the defence of the governor. That caſe plainly ſhews that ſuch an action exiſted; the attorney-general had no idea of a governor's being above the law. Juſtice Powell ſays, in the caſe of Way and Yally, in 6 Modern, that an action of falſe impriſonment had been brought here againſt the governor of Jamaica for an impriſonment there; and the laws of the country were given in evidence. The governor of Jamaica in that caſe never thought that he was not amenable. He defended himſelf. He ſhewed, I ſuppoſe, by the laws of the country, an act of the aſſembly which juſtified that impriſonment; and the court received it, to be ſure, as they ought to do. Whatever is a juſtification in the place where the thing is done, ought to be a juſtification where the caſe is tried. I remember (it was early in my time; I was counſel in it) an action againſt governor Sabine, and he was very ably defended. Nobody thought the action did not lie againſt him. He was governor of Gibraltar, and he barely confirmed the ſentence of a court-martial, which tried one of the train of artillery by martial law. Governor Sabine affirmed the ſentence. This plaintiff was a carpenter in the train. It was proved at the trial, that the tradeſmen that followed the train were not liable to martial law; the court were of that opinion; and therefore the defendant was guilty of a treſpaſs in having a ſhare in that ſentence which puniſhed him by whipping. There is another caſe or two, but they don't occur to me at preſent.

Let us ſee now what the next objection is, with regard to the matter ariſing abroad; and that is a general objection, that as the matter aroſe abroad, it cannot be tried here in England. There is a formal diſtinction that prevails in our courts, and likewiſe a ſubſtantial one as to the locality of trials. The ſubſtantial diſtinction is, where the proceeding is in rem, and where the effect of the judgment cannot be had if it is laid in a wrong place. That is the caſe of all ejectments where poſſeſſion is to be delivered by the ſheriff of the county: and as trials here are in particular counties, the officers are county officers; therefore the judgment could not have effect if it was not laid in the proper place and in the proper county. But there likewiſe is a formal diſtinction, where, perhaps, compleat juſtice could be done, let it be laid in what county it might; that is mere matter of form as to caſes that ariſe within the realm: but even with regard to matters that ariſe out of the realm, to be ſure there is a diſtinction of locality too; for there are ſome caſes that ariſe out of the realm, that ought not to be tried any where but in the country where they ariſe, as the caſe alluded to by ſerjeant Walker. If there is a ſort of fighting in France between two Frenchmen, and they happen both caſually to be here, and an action of aſſault is brought by the one againſt the other, which charge a criminality too, that it is done againſt the king's peace, and the laws and cuſtoms of England; in that caſe it may be a very material queſtion whether that could be maintained here: for though it is not a criminal proſecution, yet it has that ſort of criminality that, perhaps, without giving an opinion, it ought to be tried by the laws of that country where both parties are ſubjects; it may be a ſubſtantial objection of locality. So likewiſe, if it is concerning an eſtate in a foreign country, where it is a matter of title and not of damages, it may be a ſubſtantial diſtinction. There is likewiſe a queſtion of form, and that ariſes upon the trial; for trials in England being by a jury, and the kingdom being divided into counties, and every county, in reſpect of trial, conſidered almoſt as if a ſeparate kingdom or principality, it is abſolutely neceſſary that there ſhould be ſome county where the action is particularly brought, that there may be a proceſs to the ſheriff of that county, to bring a jury from thence to try it; and that is matter of form, which goes to all caſes that ariſe abroad. But the law makes a diſtinction between tranſitory actions and local actions. If the matter which is the cauſe of a tranſitory action ariſes within the realm, it may be laid in any county; the place is not material: and if an impriſonment in Middleſex, it may be laid in Surrey; and though proved to be done in Middleſex, the place not being material, it does not at all prevent the plaintiff recovering damages: for the place of tranſitory actions is never material. But where, by particular acts of parliament, it is made ſo, as in the caſe of churchwardens and conſtables, and other caſes that require the action to be brought in the county; there, by the force of the act of parliament, the objection is fatal: but otherwiſe it may be laid in any county in England, let it be done where it will: the parties have an opportunity of applying to the court in time to change the venue. But if they go to trial without it, that is no objection; and all actions of a tranſitory nature that ariſe abroad may be laid as happening in an Engliſh county. But there are occaſions which make it abſolutely neceſſary to ſtate in the declaration, that it really happened abroad; as in the caſe of ſpecialties, where the date muſt be ſet forth. When an action is brought upon a ſpecialty which bears a date, if that ſpecialty is ſet out, or if oyer is prayed of it, by which the place where it was made muſt appear; if the declaration ſtates it to have been made at Weſtminſter, in Middleſex, and upon producing the deed it bears date at Bengal, there is a variance between the deed and the declaration, which makes it appear to be a different inſtrument. I don't put the caſe, though there are ſome in the books that ſeem to me to have confounded the ſtatute of the 6th of Richard the ſecond, therefore I don't put the objection upon the 6th of Richard the ſecond; but it goes ſingly upon this: if you don't ſtate the true date or true deſcription of the bond, it is a variance. What does the law in that caſe? (and it has done it for hundreds of years) Why, the law invented a fiction, and has ſaid, 'You ſhall ſet out the deſcription truly, and then give a venue only for form for the trial; videlicet, in the county of Middleſex, or any other county you pleaſe.' Did any judge ever think that when the declaration ſaid, in fort St. George in Cheapſide, that the plaintiff meant that it was in Cheapſide? No; it is a fiction in form: every country has its forms: it is for the furtherance of juſtice that theſe fictions were invented; to get rid of formalities; to further and advance juſtice. This is a certain rule: You never ſhall contradict the fiction ſo as to defeat the end for which it was invented, but you may contradict it for every other purpoſe. Now this fiction is invented barely for the mode of trial; to every other purpoſe you ſhall contradict it, but not for the purpoſe of ſaying, You ſhall not try it. It is juſt like that queſtion that was long agitated and finally determined ſome years ago, upon a fiction of the teſte of writs taken out in the vacation, which bore date as of the laſt day of the term. That is a fiction of the court. You never ſhall contradict that fiction, and go into the truth of the caſe, to deſtroy the writ, and ſhew it a bad writ. Why? Becauſe the court invented the fiction to make the writ good, for the furtherance of juſtice, that it may appear right in the form; but for every other purpoſe in the world you may contradict it. I am ſorry to obſerve there are ſome ſayings which have been alluded to, inaccurately taken down. Perhaps there were ſhort-hand writers in thoſe days, as there are at preſent, who miſtake every word they hear, and, being unable to correct it, have printed it improperly: but to ſay, that as men they have one way of thinking, and as judges they have another, is an abſurdity. No; they meant to ſupport the fiction. I will mention a caſe or two to ſhew that is the meaning of it. There is a caſe in 6 Modern 208, of Roberts and Harnage. The plaintiff declares, that the defendant became bound to him at fort St. David's in the Eaſt-Indies at London, in ſuch a bond. Upon demurrer the objection was, that the bond appeared to have been ſealed and delivered at fort St. David's in the Eaſt-Indies, and therefore the date made it local; and, by conſequence, the declaration ought to have been of a bond made at fort St. David's in the Eaſt-Indies, viz. at Iſlington in the county of Middleſex, or in ſuch a ward or pariſh in London; and of that opinion was the whole court. You ſee how this caſe is ſtated. But I will ſtate it from another book, where it is reported more truly; I mean in lord Raymond, 1042. There it is ſtated thus. It appeared by the declaration, that the bond was made at London, in the ward of Cheap. Upon oyer, the bond was ſet out, and it appeared on the face of it to be dated at fort St. George in the Eaſt-Indies. The defendant pleaded the variance in abatement, and the plaintiff demurred, and it was held bad; but the court ſaid, that it would have been good, if laid at fort St. George in the Eaſt-Indies, to wit, at London, in the ward of Cheap. What was the objection there? Why, they had laid it falſely. They had laid the bond as made at London. The bond is produced, and appears to be made at another place: that is a variance. You muſt take the bond as it is. Then how do you get to trial? Why, introduce a fiction, and the formality gives you the trial in that county by the videlicet, and the bond is truly deſcribed. A caſe was quoted from Latch, and a caſe from Lutwyche, on the former argument; but I will mention a caſe poſterior in point of time, where the court took it up upon the true ground, where both theſe caſes were cited, and no regard at all was paid to them; and that is the caſe of Parker and Crook, 10 Modern 255. This was an action of covenant upon a deed indented. It was objected to the declaration, that the defendant is ſaid in the declaration to continue at fort St. George in the Eaſt-Indies; and upon the oyer of the deed it bears date at fort St. George; and therefore the court, as was pretended, had no juriſdiction. Latch, fol. 4. Lutwyche, 56. Lord chief juſtice Parker ſaid, that an action will lie in England upon a deed dated in foreign parts, or elſe the party can have no remedy; but then, in the declaration, a place in England muſt be alledged, pro forma. Generally ſpeaking, the deed, upon the oyer of it, muſt be conſiſtent with the declaration; but in theſe caſes propter neceſſitatem, if the inconſiſtency be as little as poſſible, not to be regarded: as here, the contract, being of a voyage which was to be performed from fort St. George to Great-Britain, does import, that fort St. George is different from Great-Britain: and after taking time to conſider of it, in Hilary-Term the plaintiff had his judgment, notwithſtanding the objection. Why then, it all amounts to this: that where the action is ſubſtantially ſuch a one as the court can hold plea of, as the mode of trial is by jury, and as they muſt be called together by proceſs directed to the ſheriff of the county, matter of form is added to the fiction, to ſay it is in that county; and then the whole of the inquiry is, whether it is an action that ought to be maintained. But can it be doubted, that actions may be maintained here, not only upon contracts, which follow the perſons, but for injuries done by ſubject to ſubject; eſpecially for injuries where the whole that is prayed is a reparation in damages, or ſatisfaction to be made by proceſs againſt the perſon or his effects within the juriſdiction of the court? We know it is within every day's experience. I was embarraſſed a great while to find out whether it was really meant to make a queſtion of it. It is ſo in ſea-batteries; but is it to be ſuppoſed that the judge thought it happened in Cheapſide, when the party proves where the place was? In ſea-batteries, the plaintiff often lays the injury to have been done in Middleſex, and then proves it to be done a thouſand leagues diſtant, on the other ſide of the Atlantic. There are caſes of offences on the high-ſeas, where it is of neceſſity to lay in the declaration, that it was done upon the high-ſeas; as the taking of a ſhip as a prize. There is a caſe of that ſort occurs to my memory:—the reaſon I remember it is, becauſe there was a queſtion about the juriſdiction. There likewiſe was an action of that kind before lord chief juſtice Lee, and another before me, in which I quoted that determination, to ſhew that when the lords commiſſioners of prizes have given judgment, that is concluſive in the action; and likewiſe, when they have given judgment, it is concluſive as to the coſts, whether they have given coſts or not. But how is that action laid? It is neceſſary to be laid, that his ſhip was taken or ſeized on the high-ſeas, videlicet, in Cheapſide. Now is it ſeriouſly contended, that the judge and jury, and counſel, who tried the cauſe, fancied that ſhip was ſailing in Cheapſide? No; it is plain ſenſe; the ſhip was taken upon the high-ſeas, for which an action lies in England; and you ſay in Cheapſide, which is ſaying no more than that, I pray this action may be tried in London; it is plainly underſtood: but if you offer reaſons of fact contrary to the truth of the caſe, there is no end of the embarraſſment. At the laſt ſittings, there were two actions brought by the Armenian merchants for aſſaults and treſpaſs in the Eaſt-Indies, and they are very ſtrong authorities. Serjeant Glynn ſaid, that the defendant, Mr. Verelſt, was ably aſſiſted. So he was, and by men who would have taken the objection, if they thought it had been maintainable: and that was after this caſe had been argued once; yet the counſel did not think it could be ſupported. Mr. Verelſt would have been glad to have made the objection: he would not have left it to a jury, if he could have ſtopped them ſhort, and ſaid, 'You ſhall not try it at all.' I have had ſome actions before me, rather going further than theſe tranſitory actions; that is, going to caſes which in England would be local actions: and I remember one, I think it was an action brought againſt captain Gambier, who by order of admiral Boſcawen had pulled down the houſes of ſome ſuttlers who ſupplied the navy and ſailors with ſpirituous liquors; and whether the act was right or wrong, it was certainly done with a good intention on the part of the admiral, for the ſailors' health were affected by it. They were pulled down. The captain was inattentive enough to bring the gentleman over in his own ſhip, who would never have got to England otherwiſe; and as ſoon as he came here, he was adviſed that he ſhould bring an action againſt him. He brought his action, and one of the counts in the declaration was for pulling down the houſes. The objection was taken to the count for pulling down the houſes; and the caſe of Skinner and the Eaſt-India Company was cited in ſupport of the objection. On the other ſide, they produced, from a manuſcript note, a caſe before lord chief juſtice Eyre, where he over-ruled the objection; and I over-ruled the objection upon this principle, that the reparation here was perſonal, and for damages; that there would be a failure of juſtice, for it was upon the coaſt of Nova-Scotia, where there were no regular courts of juſtice, but if there had been, captain Gambier might never go there again; and that the reaſon of locality in ſuch an action in England did not hold in this caſe. I quoted a caſe of an injury of that ſort in the Eaſt-Indies, where even in a court of equity lord Hardwicke had directed ſatisfaction to be made in damages. That caſe was not fully argued; but this was argued, and there were large damages given againſt Gambier. I do not quote it for the opinion I was of there, becauſe that opinion is very likely to be erroneous; but I quote it for this reaſon, that there were large damages given againſt captain Gambier: and though he was not at the expence, for he acted by the orders of admiral Boſcawen, yet the admiral's repreſentatives paid the expence, therefore their inclination was to have got rid of that verdict if they could; but there never was any motion for a new trial. I recollect another cauſe that came on before me: that was the caſe of admiral Palliſer; there the very gift of the action was local. It was for deſtroying fiſhing-huts upon the Labrador-coaſt. It was a nice queſtion; when the Canadians ſettled, and when they had a right to it. It was a diſpute between them and the fiſhermen in England. The cauſe went on a great way; the defendant would have turned it ſhort at once, if he could have made that objection; but that objection was not made. There are no local courts among the Eſquimaux Indians upon that part of the Labrador-coaſt. Whatever injury had been done there by any of the king's officers would have been altogether without redreſs, if that objection of locality would have held: and the conſequence of that circumſtance ſhews, that where the reaſon fails, even in actions which in England would be local actions, yet that does not hold to places beyond the ſeas within the king's dominions. That of admiral Palliſer's went off upon a propoſal of a reference, and ended by an award. But as to tranſitory actions, there is not a colour of doubt but that every action that is tranſitory may be laid in any county in England, though the matter ariſes beyond the ſeas: and when it is abſolutely neceſſary to lay the truth of the caſe in the declaration, there is a fiction of law to aſſiſt you, and you ſhall not make uſe of the truth of the caſe againſt that fiction, but you may make uſe of it to every other purpoſe. I am clearly of opinion not only againſt the objections made, but that there does not appear a queſtion upon which the objections could ariſe.

The other judges declared themſelves of the ſame opinion, and the court ordered, 'that the judgment ſhould be affirmed.'

In conſequence of the above judgment, on Saturday the 4th day of February 1775, the gentlemen who were bail for governor Moſtyn, to prevent his being taken in execution and carried to priſon, were obliged to pay to Mr. Fabrigas the ſum of 3000 l. for his damages, and 159 l. which the court amerced the governor in coſts.

XXX. The Trial of ELIZABETH Ducheſs-Dowager of Kingſton, for Bigamy, before the Right Hon. the Houſe of Peers, in Weſtminſter-Hall, in full Parliament aſſembled, 15*th*, 16*th*, 19*th*, 20*th*, and 22*d Days of* April, 1776.

[This trial was printed under an order of the houſe of lords.]

Monday, April the 15*th*, 1776.

In the court erected in Weſtminſter-Hall, for the trial of Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, for bigamy.

ABOUT ten of the clock the lords came from their own houſe into the court erected in Weſtminſter-Hall, for the trial of Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, in the manner following:

The lord high ſteward's gentlemen attendants, two and two.

The clerks aſſiſtant to the houſe of lords, and the clerk of the parliament.

Clerk of the crown in Chancery, bearing the king's commiſſion to the lord high ſteward, and the clerk of the crown in the King's Bench.

The maſters in Chancery, two and two.

The judges, two and two.

The peers eldeſt ſons, two and two.

Peers minors, two and two.

Cheſter and Somerſet heralds.

Four ſerjeants at arms with their maces, two and two.

The yeoman-uſher of the houſe.

The barons, two and two, beginning with the youngeſt baron.

The biſhops, two and two.

The viſcounts and other peers, two and two.

The lord privy ſeal and lord preſident.

The archbiſhop of York and the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Four ſerjeants at arms with their maces, two and two.

The ſerjeant at arms attending the great ſeal, and purſe-bearer.

Then Garter king at arms, and the gentleman-uſher of the black rod carrying the white ſtaff before the lord high ſteward.

Henry earl Bathurſt, chancellor of Great-Britain, lord high ſteward, alone, his train borne.

His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, his train borne.

The lords being placed in their proper ſeats, and the lord high ſteward upon the woolpack, the houſe was reſumed.

The clerk of the crown in Chancery, having his majeſty's commiſſion to the lord high ſteward in his hand, and the clerk of the crown in the King's Bench, ſtanding before the clerk's table with their faces towards the ſtate, made three reverences; the firſt at the table, the ſecond in the midway, and the third near the woolpack; then kneeled down; and the clerk of the crown in Chancery, on his knee, preſented the commiſſion to the lord high ſteward, who delivered the ſame to the clerk of the crown in the King's Bench to read: then riſing, they made three reverences, and returned to the table. And then proclamation was made for ſilence, in this manner:

Serjeant at arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! Our ſovereign lord the king ſtrictly charges and commands all manner of perſons to keep ſilence, upon pain of impriſonment.

Then the lord high ſteward ſtood up, and ſpoke to the peers.

Lord High Steward. His majeſty's commiſſion is about to be read: your lordſhips are deſired to attend to it in the uſual manner; and all others are likewiſe to ſtand up uncovered while the commiſſion is reading.

All the peers uncovered themſelves; and they, and all others, ſtood up uncovered, while the commiſſion was read.

GEORGE R.

GEORGE the third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and ſo forth. To our right truſty and right well-beloved couſin and counſellor Henry earl Bathurſt, our chancellor of Great-Britain, greeting. Know ye, that whereas Elizabeth the wife of Auguſtus John Hervey, late of the pariſh of St. George, Hanover-Square, in our county of Middleſex, eſquire, before our juſtices of oyer and terminer, at Hicks's-Hall, in St. John-Street, in and for our county of Middleſex, upon the oath of twelve jurors, good and lawful men of the ſaid county of Middleſex, then and there ſworn and charged to enquire for us for the body of the ſaid county, ſtands indicted of polygamy and feloniouſly marrying Evelyn Pierrepont late duke of Kingſton, ſhe being then married, and the wife of the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey: we, conſidering that juſtice is an excellent virtue, and pleaſing to the Moſt High, and being willing that the ſaid Elizabeth, of and for the felony whereof ſhe is indicted as aforeſaid, before us, in our preſent parliament, according to the law and cuſtom of our kingdom of Great-Britain, may be heard, examined, ſentenced, and adjudged; and that all other things which are neceſſary in this behalf may be duly exerciſed and executed; and for that the office of high ſteward of Great-Britain (whoſe preſence in this behalf is required) is now vacant (as we are informed) we, very much confiding in your fidelity, prudence, provident circumſpection, and induſtry, have for this cauſe ordained and conſtituted you ſteward of Great-Britain, to hear, execute, and exerciſe for this time the ſaid office, with all things due and belonging to the ſame office in this behalf: and therefore we command you, that you diligently ſet about the premiſes, and for this time do exerciſe and execute with effect all thoſe things which belong to the office of ſteward of Great-Britain, and which are required in this behalf. In witneſs whereof we have cauſed theſe our letters to be made patent. Witneſs ourſelf at Weſtminſter, the fifteenth day of April, in the ſixteenth year of our reign.

By the KING himſelf, ſigned with his own hand.

Yorke.

Serjeant at arms. God ſave the king!

Then Garter, and the gentleman-uſher of the black rod, after three reverences, kneeling, jointly preſented the white ſtaff to his grace the lord high ſteward: and then his grace, attended by Garter, black rod, and the purſe-bearer (making his proper reverences towards the throne) removed from the woolpack to an armed chair, which was placed on the uppermoſt ſtep but one of the throne, as it was prepared for that purpoſe; and then ſeated himſelf in the chair, and delivered the ſtaff to the gentleman-uſher of the black rod on his right hand, the purſe-bearer holding the purſe on his left.

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant at Arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! Our ſovereign lord the king ſtrictly charges and commands all manner of perſons to keep ſilence, upon pain of impriſonment.

Then the clerk of the crown, by direction of the lord high ſteward, read the certiorari, and the return thereof, together with the caption of the indictment, and the indictment certified thereupon, againſt Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton; in hæc verba:

GEORGE the third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and ſo forth. Sworn in court.

Lord High Steward. Is it your lordſhips' pleaſure, that the judges have leave to be covered?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation for the gentleman-uſher of the black rod to bring his priſoner to the bar.

Serjeant at Arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, come forth and ſave you and your bail, or elſe you forfeit your recognizance.

[After her ſurrender ſhe was, during the trial, called to the bar by the following proclamation.]

Gentleman-uſher of the black rod, bring your priſoner Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton to the bar, purſuant to the order of the houſe of lords.

Then Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton was brought to the bar by the deputy-gentleman-uſher of the black rod. The priſoner, when ſhe approached the bar, made three reverences, and then fell upon her knees at the bar.

Lord High Steward. Madam, you may riſe.

The priſoner then roſe up, and curtſied to his grace the lord high ſteward, and to the houſe of peers; which compliment was returned her by his grace, and the lords.

Then, proclamation having been made again for ſilence, the lord high ſteward ſpake to the priſoner, as follows.

Lord High Steward.

Madam,

YOU ſtand indicted for having married a ſecond huſband, your firſt huſband being living.

A crime ſo deſtructive of the peace and happineſs of private families, and ſo injurious in its conſequences to the welfare and good order of ſociety, that by the ſtatute-law of this kingdom it was for many years (in your ſex) puniſhable with death: the lenity, however, of later times has ſubſtituted a milder puniſhment in its ſtead.

This conſideration muſt neceſſarily tend to leſſen the perturbation of your ſpirits upon this awful occaſion.

But that, madam, which, next to the inward feelings of your own conſcience, will afford you moſt comfort is, reflecting upon the honour, the wiſdom, and the candour of this high court of criminal juriſdiction.

It is, madam, by your particular deſire that you now ſtand at that bar: you were not brought there by any proſecutor.

In your petition to the lords, praying for a ſpeedy trial, you aſſumed the title of ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, and it was by that title that the court of King's Bench admitted you to bail; in your petition you likewiſe averred, that Auguſtus John Hervey, whoſe wife the indictment charges you with being, is at this time earl of Briſtol: upon examining the records, the lords were ſatisfied of the truth of that averment, and have accordingly allowed you the privilege you petitioned for, of being tried by your peers in full parliament; and from them you will be ſure to meet with nothing but juſtice tempered with humanity.

Before I conclude, I am commanded by the houſe to acquaint you, madam, and all other perſons having occaſion to ſpeak to the court during the trial, that they are to addreſs themſelves to the lords in general, and not to any lord in particular.

Ducheſs of Kingſton. My lords, I, the unfortunate widow of your late brother, the moſt noble Evelyn Pierrepont duke of Kingſton, am brought to the bar of this right honourable houſe without a ſhadow of fear, but infinitely awed by the reſpect that is due to you, my moſt honourable judges.

My lords, after having, at the hazard of my life, returned from Rome in a dangerous ſickneſs to ſubmit myſelf to the laws of my country, I plead ſome little merit in my willing obedience; and I intreat your lordſhips indulgence, if I ſhould be deficient in any ceremonial part of my conduct towards you, my moſt honoured and reſpectable judges; for the infirmities of my body and the oppreſſion of ſpirits under which I labour, leave your unhappy priſoner ſometimes without recollection: but it muſt be only with the loſs of life, that I can be deprived of the knowledge of the reſpect that is due to this high and awful tribunal.

Lord High Steward. Madam, your ladyſhip will do well to give attention, while you are arraigned on your indictment.

Then proclamation was made for ſilence.

After which, Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton was arraigned, in the form of the ſaid indictment againſt her, by the clerk of the crown in the King's Bench.

ELIZABETH ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, you ſtand indicted by the name of Elizabeth the wife of Auguſtus John Hervey, late of the pariſh of St. George, Hanover-Square, eſquire (now become a peer of this realm) for that you, on the eighth day of March, in the ninth year of the reign of his preſent majeſty our ſovereign lord king George the third, being then married, and then the wife of the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, with force and arms, at the ſaid pariſh of St. George, Hanover-Square, in the ſaid county of Middleſex, feloniouſly did marry and take to huſband Evelyn Pierrepont duke of Kingſton, the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, your former huſband, being then alive; againſt the form of the ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided, and againſt the peace of our ſaid lord the king, his crown and dignity.

The indictment further charges, that you the ſaid Elizabeth, heretofore (to wit) on the fourth day of Auguſt, in the eighteenth year of our late ſovereign lord George the ſecond, late king of Great-Britain, and ſo forth, at the pariſh of Lainſton, in the county of Southampton, by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, did marry the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, and him the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey then and there had for your huſband; and that you the ſaid Elizabeth, being married, and the wife of the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, afterwards (to wit) on the eighth day of March, in the ninth year of the reign of our ſaid ſovereign lord George the third, now king of Great-Britain, and ſo forth, with force and arms, at the ſaid pariſh of St. George, Hanover-Square, feloniouſly did marry and take to huſband the ſaid Evelyn Pierrepont duke of Kingſton, the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, your former huſband, being then alive.

How ſay you? are you guilty of the felony whereof you ſtand indicted, or not guilty?

Ducheſs of Kingſton. I Elizabeth Pierrepont, ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, indicted by the name of Elizabeth the wife of Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, ſay, that I am not guilty.

Clerk of the Crown. Cul': prit—How will you be tried?

Ducheſs of Kingſton. By God and my peers.

Clerk of the Crown. God ſend your grace a good deliverance.

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant at Arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! All manner of perſons that will give evidence, on behalf of our ſovereign lord the king, againſt Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, the priſoner at the bar, let them come forth, and they ſhall be heard; for now ſhe ſtands at the bar upon her deliverance.

Lord High Steward. My lords, the diſtance of this place from the bar is ſo great, that I muſt deſire your lordſhips leave to go down to the table for the convenience of hearing.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then his grace removed to the table.

Ducheſs of Kingſton. My lords, the ſuppoſed marriage in the indictment with Mr. Hervey, which is the ground of the charge againſt me, was inſiſted upon by him in a ſuit inſtituted by me in the Conſiſtory Court of the right reverend lord biſhop of London; by the ſentence of which court, ſtill in force, it was pronounced, decreed, and declared, that I was free from all matrimonial contracts or eſpouſals with the ſaid Mr. Hervey: and, my lords, I am adviſed that this ſentence, which I now deſire leave to offer to your lordſhips (remaining unreverſed and unimpeached) is concluſive, and that no other evidence ought to be received or ſtated to your lordſhips reſpecting ſuch pretended marriage.

Lord High Steward. Do the counſel for the proſecutor object to the reading of the ſentence?

Mr. Attorney-general. My lords, obſerving that the priſoner was about to make ſome application to your lordſhips, I was not ſolicitous to riſe in the order and place wherein I ought to have addreſſed myſelf to the houſe; becauſe I would not interrupt, or prevent, any thing which ſhe might think material for her to lay before your lordſhips.

I attended much to the form of the application. If I comprehend the aim of it, ſhe means to object to your lordſhips hearing any evidence, either given or ſtated, in ſupport of the preſent indictment; the ground of her objection being a ſentence, ſaid to have paſſed in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, againſt the firſt marriage ſuppoſed in the indictment. Upon this, your lordſhips have demanded, whether I object to the reading of the ſentence?

If the proceeding referred to had been tendered to your lordſhips in the only place which can be thought the proper or regular one, for receiving the defendant's evidence, to be ſure, many queſtions would naturally have ariſen upon it. Firſt, whether that proceeding, explained as it will be, has the force of a ſentence, or amounts to more than a circumſtance and proof of the fraud complained of? Secondly, whether a ſerious ſentence of that ſort, pronounced between party and party, ought to be admitted in a criminal proſecution, and againſt the king, who was no party to it, nor could have become ſo by any means? Thirdly, whether it creates an eſtoppel, or concluſive evidence againſt the crown? Fourthly, whether it does ſo in this peculiar ſpecies of proſecution?

But in the way this thing is urged, it ſeems perfectly impoſſible, or at leaſt altogether premature, to diſcuſs the force and effect of it, as evidence. That ſuppoſes a caſe already made for the proſecutor, which requires the aid of evidence, on the part of the priſoner, to diſprove or explain it. But, if I catch the idea perfectly, the preſent inſiſting is, that the ſentence now offered to the conſideration of your lordſhips carries ſome legal force—what, I do not pretend to define or explain; for I proteſt I have no gueſs what is meant; but--ſome legal force with it, which enables the priſoner to demand, in this ſtage of the buſineſs, that the trial ſhall not proceed, nor any evidence be heard to maintain the indictment, but that the whole matter ſhall be wound up, and conclude with ſome reſolution of your lordſhips,—not to acquit (for in order to that you muſt try) but to diſmiſs the priſoner without trial, after putting herſelf upon her peers for trial.

I have, notwithſtanding, ſhortly intimated the nature of the objections which may be made to it, as an article of evidence for the priſoner; partly to point out, how untenable the propoſition is of ſtopping the trial, by interpoſing a thing whoſe reality, competence, and effect will be ſo much diſputed in matter of fact and of law; but chiefly, to lay in my claim, that this paper (if your lordſhips ſhould think it worth hearing) may be read at this time, and for the purpoſe of the motion now made by the priſoner only, without prejudice to any objection which I may think fit to make to it, if it ſhould be offered as evidence in the courſe of the trial.

If it be read under the reſerve I have mentioned, not as a part of the trial, but to make this application of the priſoner to your lordſhips, previouſly to her trial, intelligible; and for the ſake of raiſing the argument upon it, in caſe your lordſhips ſhould ſuffer ſuch a point to be argued at all; in theſe views, I will not object to the reading of it.

But if it be offered as a piece of evidence for the priſoner, ſo that I muſt admit or object to it now, I ſhall certainly inſiſt upon going on with the proſecution, and drive this article of evidence into its own place, the priſoner's defence. There it will be better ſeen, how far it is available, or even competent.

Unleſs I could learn the purpoſe of offering it from thoſe who adviſed it, I do not know how to make a more particular anſwer to your lordſhips queſtion.

Ducheſs of Kingſton. Will your lordſhips pleaſe to permit my counſel to be heard to this point?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, you may proceed for the priſoner.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I have the honour to be aſſigned one of the counſel to adviſe and aſſiſt the noble priſoner at the bar in all matters of law that may ariſe in the courſe of the trial.

I ſhall ſubmit with great deference to your lordſhips, that the preſent ſtage of the buſineſs is the proper ſeaſon to introduce the ſentence which has been mentioned to the court.

My lords, the ſentence is conceived to be concluſive upon the fact of that marriage which is the ground of this indictment. The indictment ſuppoſes that the priſoner at the bar was married to Auguſtus John Hervey: the ſentence now offered to your lordſhips is not only of a competent juriſdiction to decide that queſtion, but the only conſtitutional juriſdiction.

My lords, whilſt this ſentence remains unimpeached, I conceive that it is concluſive againſt all evidence to be produced of the fact of the marriage. It is in that light the priſoner is adviſed to offer it to your lordſhips, that a court of competent juriſdiction having decided the point, it will be in vain to call parole witneſſes to the fact; and it will only take up your lordſhips time, and it will be of no real uſe, to ſtate the evidence of witneſſes, which witneſſes cannot appear to give that evidence before the court.

My lords, the office of a counſel in opening the caſe to any court is, as I conceive, to ſtate with clearneſs the evidence that is to be adduced, that the court may better underſtand and apply it: therefore, unleſs the evidence is competent, your lordſhips will not hear any ſtate of it. This too perhaps may be the time, though I ſhall forbear at preſent to enter into it, to diſcuſs whether the ſentence be admiſſible; or, if admiſſible, whether concluſive: but we are now, my lords, upon the order of producing this ſentence; and if it has the effect which I ſhall humbly ſubmit in a proper ſeaſon to your lordſhips that it has, of being abſolutely concluſive, then the evidence, which is now ready to be ſtated by the counſel for the proſecution, ought not to be produced, and of courſe ought not to be ſtated. This is the light in which the cauſe appears to me at this moment; and I truſt your lordſhips will concur in opinion, that if the ſentence has the concluſive effect which we are ready to ſubmit to your lordſhips it has, it repels all teſtimony, and makes it improper therefore to ſtate any. If a precedent ſhould be thought neceſſary for what is prayed by the noble priſoner at the bar, I beg leave to refer your lordſhips to a caſe determined at the bar of the court of King's Bench in the reign of king William: it is reported in Mr. Serjeant Carthew's Reports, 225, upon a trial of an ejectment. The queſtion was, if ſir Robert Carr was actually married to Iſabella Jones, by whom he had iſſue, and under whom the plaintiff in that cauſe claimed the eſtate. The defendant, by way of anticipation of the evidence which the plaintiff was about to give, moved the court, that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to prove a marriage between them, becauſe there was a ſentence in the Arches upon a ſuit of jactitation brought againſt her; by which it was decreed, that there was no marriage between them, but that they were free from all matrimonial contracts and eſpouſals. The ſentence was then offered in evidence by the defendant's counſel at the bar, to conclude the plaintiff from any proof of the marriage, unleſs he could ſhew that the ſame was repealed: and upon a debate, the court were all of opinion, that this ſentence, whilſt unrepealed, was concluſive againſt all matters precedent; and that the temporal courts muſt give credit to it, until it is reverſed, it being a matter of mere ſpiritual cognizance: and upon this the plaintiff was nonſuited. Your lordſhips may perceive that this caſe is applicable to another part of the buſineſs before your lordſhips; but I cite it now merely to ſhew the ſentence was offered, and received, to preclude the examination of witneſſes; and ſurely if witneſſes are not admiſſible, their teſtimony ought not to be ſtated.

Mr. Attorney-general. My lords, I do not even now comprehend the order of proceeding propoſed.

If there be any thing in the preſent motion, conſidered as propoſing a fit manner of regulating this trial, or as a point of general law—in ſhort, if their propoſition be maintainable at all—I do aſſure your lordſhips, that I am not anxious, or in any degree deſirous, to ſtate a caſe to this audience which muſt wound the ſenſibility of the priſoner: this I would avoid, unleſs public juſtice, and the neceſſity of the proſecution, ſhould abſolutely require it of me.

If it be poſſible, on her part, to make any ground for ſtopping the proſecution in this manner, I ſhall be well content to ſtop here: to me it appears flatly impoſſible. I ſtated ſome general hints to this effect when I ſpoke laſt.

The learned counſel, in attempting to make good their propoſition of ſtopping the trial in this ſtage, have contented themſelves with a general averment, that the law is with them; and refer to the manner in which evidence was received in the particular caſe of one ejectment, where no contradiction or controverſy appears to have been raiſed among the counſel about the nature of the cauſe depending, the ſentence produced, or the parties to both. Here, a great deal is to be previouſly ſettled on thoſe heads.

I did not imagine the learned counſel would have ſtopped ſo ſhortly: but if they thought well of the motion, I expected they would have gone the length of arguing on it, and of endeavouring to demonſtrate the poſſibility of winding up the whole proceeding here, by comparing the nature of the ſentence with the whole compaſs of the proſecution, ſtated with every degree of imaginable aggravation.

Your lordſhips might eaſily perceive my reaſon for expecting the argument to take this courſe. The ſentence may be read—indeed it muſt be read. It is the only ground of the motion. But unleſs ſuch is demonſtrated to be the effect of it, your lordſhips can take no order upon it, nor make any uſe or application of it, without hearing the proſecutor's caſe. It is not therefore enough to read the ſentence.

My reaſon for troubling your lordſhips at all was only to obſerve, that the motion concludes againſt even hearing the proſecutor; and to ſubmit, according to my humble duty, to your lordſhips, whether that be a point of law fit to hear the priſoner upon by her counſel. If it be, your lordſhips will call upon the learned counſel whom you have allowed the priſoner, to ſuſtain it fully in argument. Otherwiſe your lordſhips will reject it as inadmiſſible. All proſecutions might be ſtopped in this manner.

A Lord. Does Mr. Attorney-general object to the reading of the ſentence?

Mr. Attorney-general. Subject to the reſervation of my right to object to it in every ſhape, when it ſhall be offered in evidence: upon that ground I do not object to it. I am not now admitting this ſentence to be adduced in the courſe of the cauſe, or as a part of the defence, to which I ſhall ſay, it is incompetent. But I let it in, to ground a motion anterior to the hearing of the cauſe. In that view, and in that view only, I admit it to be read. Indeed it ſeems to be offered as a part of the counſel's ſpeech; and I admit it as containing the whole of the argument, yet offered in ſupport of the motion.

That your lordſhips may underſtand what is to be made of this ſentence when read, they muſt read, in their order, the original allegation of Elizabeth Chudleigh; the croſs-allegation delivered in by Mr. Hervey; her anſwer; the articles on which the proofs were taken; the depoſitions; and the ſentence: for thus the ſentence proceeded.

Lord Mansfield. They muſt give in evidence the whole ſentence.

(The ſentence only begun to be read.)

Mr. Attorney-general. I muſt trouble your lordſhips again.

They are now offering to read the ſentence only, without reading the allegations of the parties, their articles and proofs. For what reaſon I very well comprehend. But I apprehend, that, if a judgment be read in a court of law, they muſt read the declaration, plea, replication, and all other matters leading to the judgment, in order to make it intelligible. Here they would read the ſentence, abſtractedly from the allegations and other matters upon which that ſentence proceeded.

Lord Camden. I wiſh to know of the counſel for the priſoner, whether they meant to object to the whole proceedings in the jactitation cauſe being read.

Mr. Wallace. I have not, upon the part of the noble priſoner, the leaſt objection that all the proceedings ſhould be brought before your lordſhips. I conceive that what the officer has now brought before the court was what is uſually given in evidence in ſuch caſe. I do not recollect any other, in any caſe I have found, being produced but the ſentence, which ſtates in ſhort the proceedings had in that court; but I underſtand the proceedings are here; and on the part of the noble priſoner there is not the leaſt objection to the whole being laid before the court.

The lords then permitted the following proceedings in the jactitation cauſe, and the ſentence pronounced in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, to be read de bene eſſe.

SECOND SESSION. Michaelmas-Term 1768.

Chudleigh againſt Hervey. Libel given the 9th of November 1768. Biſhop.

In the name of God, Amen. Before you the worſhipful John Betteſworth, doctor of laws, vicar-general of the right reverend father in God Richard, by divine permiſſion, lord biſhop of London, and official principal of the conſiſtorial epiſcopal court of London lawfully conſtituted, your ſurrogate, or any other competent judge in this behalf of the proctor of the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, of the pariſh of Saint Margaret, Weſtminſter, in the county of Middleſex ſpinſter; againſt the honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, of the pariſh of Saint James's, Weſtminſter, in the county of Middleſex and dioceſe of London, a batchelor; and againſt any other perſon or perſons lawfully intervening or appearing for him in judgment before you by way of complaint, and hereby complaining unto you in this behalf, doth ſay, alledge, and in law articulately propound as follows; that is to ſay,

1. THAT the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh was and is free, and no way engaged in any matrimonial contract or eſpouſals with the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey; and for and as a perſon free, and no way engaged, was and is commonly accounted, reputed, and taken to be, amongſt her neighbours, friends, and familiar acquaintance: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound every thing in this article contained jointly and ſeverally.

2. That the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, ſufficiently knowing the premiſes, and notwithſtanding the ſame, did in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-three, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-four, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-five, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-ſix, and one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-ſeven, and in the ſeveral months therein concurring, and in this preſent year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-eight, within the pariſh of Saint James, Weſtminſter, aforeſaid, and in other pariſhes and places in the neighbourhood thereof and thereto adjoining, or in all, ſome, or one of the afore-mentioned times and places, in the preſence of ſeveral credible witneſſes, falſely and maliciouſly boaſt, aſſert, and report, that he was married to or contracted in marriage with the aforeſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh; whereas in truth and fact not any ſuch marriage was ever ſolemnized or ever contracted between them: and this was and is true, publick, and notorious; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound of any other time or times and places as ſhall appear from the proofs to be made in this cauſe, and as before.

3. That the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey hath been oftentimes, or at leaſt once, on the part and behalf of the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, and her friends and acquaintance, aſked and requeſted, or deſired to deſiſt and abſtain from his aforeſaid pretended falſe and malicious boaſting, aſſerting, and reporting, as mentioned in the next preceding article: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

4. That the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, being as aforeſaid aſked and requeſted to ceaſe, deſiſt, and abſtain from his aforeſaid pretended falſe and malicious boaſting, aſſerting, and reporting, hath not in the leaſt, nor doth in the leaſt at preſent, ceaſe, deſiſt, and abſtain therefrom, but continually with like malice and raſhneſs does conſtantly, falſely, and maliciouſly boaſt, aſſert, affirm, and report the ſame, to the great danger of his ſoul's health, no ſmall prejudice to the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, and pernicious example of others: and this was and is true, publick, and notorious; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

5. That of all and ſingular the premiſes it was and is, by and on the part and behalf of the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, thinking herſelf greatly injured, aggrieved, and diſquieted by reaſon of the aforeſaid pretended falſe and malicious boaſting, aſſerting, and reporting of the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, rightly and duly complained to you the judge aforeſaid, and to this court, for a fit and meet remedy to be had and provided in this behalf: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

6. That the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey was and is of the pariſh of Saint James, Weſtminſter, in the county of Middleſex and dioceſe of London, and therefore and by reaſon of the premiſes was and is ſubject to the juriſdiction of this court: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

7. That all and ſingular the premiſes were and are true, publick, and notorious, and thereof there was and is a public voice, fame, and report, and of which legal proof being made, the party proponent prays right and juſtice to be effectually done and adminiſtered to him and his party in the premiſes; and alſo that by this court it may be pronounced, decreed, and declared, that the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh at and during all the times in this libel mentioned was a ſpinſter, and free from all matrimonial contracts and eſpouſals with him the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey; and that he, notwithſtanding the premiſes, did, in the years, months, and places in this libel mentioned, or in ſome or one of them, falſely and maliciouſly boaſt, aſſert, and report, that he was married to, or contracted in marriage with, the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh; and that he may be enjoined perpetual ſilence in the premiſes, and obliged and compelled to ceaſe, deſiſt, and abſtain from ſuch his aforeſaid falſe and malicious boaſtings, aſſertions, and reports for the future; and that he may be condemned in the coſts made and to be made in this cauſe on the part and behalf of the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, and compelled to the due and effectual payment thereof by you or your definitive ſentence or final decree to be given in this cauſe; and further to do and decree in the premiſes what ſhall be lawful in this behalf, the party proponent not obliging himſelf to prove all and ſingular the premiſes, or to the burthen of a ſuperfluous proof, againſt which he proteſts; and prays, that, ſo far as he ſhall prove in the premiſes, he may obtain in his petition, the benefit of the law being always preſerved, humbly imploring the aid of your office in this behalf.

Hervey againſt Hervey called Chudleigh. Fountain—Biſhop.

Which day Fountain, in the name of and as the lawful proctor of the right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, and as ſuch, and under that denomination, did, by all ways and means which may be moſt beneficial and effectual for his ſaid party in this behalf, and to all intents and purpoſes in law whatſoever, ſay, alledge, and in law articulately propound as follows; to wit:

1. THAT ſome time in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-three, or one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four, the right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, then the honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, and ſon of the right honourable John late lord Hervey, became acquainted with Elizabeth Chudleigh, now Hervey, at Wincheſter races; and the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, having conceived a liking and affection for the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, and being a batchelor, and a minor of the age of ſeventeen or eighteen years, and free from any matrimonial contract, did privately make his addreſſes of love and courtſhip to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, who was then alſo a minor, and a ſpinſter of the age of about eighteen years, and alſo free from any matrimonial contract; and ſhe the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, now Hervey, did receive and admit ſuch his addreſſes and courtſhip, and entertain him as a ſuitor to her in the way of marriage, but without the privity or knowledge of either of their relations or friends, excepting her aunt the late Mrs. Hanmer; and they mutually contracted themſelves to each other: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound of any other time and place, and of every thing in this article contained jointly and ſeverally.

2. That in the ſaid year one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four, the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, was a lieutenant in the navy, and belonged to his majeſty's ſhip Cornwall, which in Auguſt one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four lay at Portſmouth; that the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, in July one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four, being on a viſit at John Merrill's, eſquire, at Lainſton, in the pariſh of Sparſhot, in the county of Southampton, with her aunt Mrs. Hanmer, and the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, being then on board the ſaid ſhip the Cornwall at Portſmouth, went from thence to the ſaid Mr. Merrill's in order to ſee the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh; and the ſaid ſhip being under ſailing orders for and being ſoon to depart for the Weſt-Indies, it was propoſed between the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey and Mrs. Hanmer, that they the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey and Elizabeth Chudleigh ſhould be married privately at the ſaid Mr. Merrill's houſe; and accordingly they the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey and Elizabeth Chudleigh were, on or about the fourth day of Auguſt one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four, in Mr. Merrill's houſe in the pariſh of Sparſhot aforeſaid, joined together in holy matrimony, about eleven o'clock at night, by the reverend Thomas Amis, ſince deceaſed, a clergyman in holy orders, according to the rites and ceremonies of the church of England, in the preſence of Mrs. Hanmer, the aunt of her the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, and Mr. Mountnay, both ſince deceaſed; and were then and there by him the ſaid Thomas Amis pronounced for and as lawful huſband and wife: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

3. That after the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey and Elizabeth Chudleigh, now Hervey, were ſo privately married, they conſummated ſuch their marriage at the ſaid Mr. Merrill's houſe, by having the carnal knowledge of each other's bodies, and laying for ſome time in one and the ſame bed naked and alone, but without the privity or knowledge of any part of the family and ſervants of the ſaid Mr. Merrill: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

4. That the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, continued at the ſaid Mr. Merrill's about two or three days, and then returned to his ſaid ſhip Cornwall, wherein he in November following ſailed for the Weſt-Indies; and that, on account of certain circumſtances of his family, it being neceſſary that the ſaid marriage ſhould be kept a ſecret from every perſon, except thoſe before-mentioned, therefore the ſaid Elizabeth Hervey continued to go by the name of Chudleigh when ſhe left the ſaid Mr. Merrill's, reſiding at different places, and paſſing for a ſingle perſon; that the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, remained in the Weſt-Indies till the month of Auguſt in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-ſix, when he ſailed for England, and landed at Dover on or about the ſixteenth of October following; that the ſaid Elizabeth Hervey at that time reſided in Conduit-Street, where the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, went to ſee her as his wife ſeveral times, and ſhe received him and acknowledged him to be her huſband, but they did not publickly own their marriage, or cohabit together as huſband and wife: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

5. That the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, on the twenty-eighth day of the month of November in the ſaid year one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-ſix, went to ſea again, and returned to England in the January following; that the ſaid Elizabeth Hervey otherwiſe Chudleigh at that time continued in Conduit-Street; but ſome differences ariſing between them on account of the conduct of the ſaid Elizabeth Hervey, they continued to live ſeparate from each other for the future; and the ſaid honourable Auguſtus John Hervey thereupon forbore viſiting the ſaid Elizabeth Hervey, and, ſome time in the month of May one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-ſeven, ſailed for the Mediterranean ſea in the ſhip called the Princeſſa, and continued abroad till the month of December in the following year; that from the time they ſo continued to live ſeparate as aforeſaid to this time, the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey has never viſited the ſaid Elizabeth Hervey: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

6. That all and ſingular the premiſes were and are true, publick, and notorious, and therefore there was and is a publick voice, fame, and report, of whichl egal proof being made, the party proponent prays right and juſtice to be adminiſtered to him and his party in the premiſes, and that it may be pronounced, that the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey and Elizabeth Chudleigh were and are lawful man and wife.

Geo. Harris.

Conſiſtory of London, FOURTH SESSION of Michaelmas-Term, 6th December 1768.

Chudleigh againſt Hervey. Biſhop—Fountain.

On which day Biſhop, in the name of and as lawful proctor of the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, and as ſuch, and under that denomination, did, by all ways and means which may be moſt beneficial and effectual in this behalf, and to all intents and purpoſes in law whatſoever, ſay, alledge, and articulately propound as follows; to wit:

1. THAT as well before as ever ſince the pretended time of the pretended marriage pleaded and propounded by the right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, the other party in this ſuit, to have been on or about the fourth of Auguſt one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four, the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh has always paſſed as a ſingle woman, and has always gone, been known, and been addreſſed by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and by no other, and hath always viſited and received viſits as a ſingle woman, and hath always lived ſeparate and apart from the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, and hath not at any time lived or cohabited with him, or he with her: and this was and is true; and ſo much the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey well knows and believes in his conſcience to be true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound every thing in this article contained jointly and ſeverally.

2. That in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-three, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh was admitted a maid of honour to her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales; and on the death of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, on or about the ſeventeenth of April one thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-one, re-admitted and continued maid of honour to her royal highneſs the princeſs-dowager of Wales, without any let or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, and hath during the whole of the ſaid time continued and now continues a maid of honour to her royal highneſs the princeſs-dowager of Wales, without any let or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey: and this was and is true; and ſo much the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey knows and believes in his conſcience to be true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

3. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex two certificates, and copies of the entries from the treaſurer's office of the princeſs-dowager of Wales, marked with the letters A and B, of the admiſſion of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh as maid of honour, and of her continuance now in ſuch poſt, and prays that the ſame may be here read, and taken as if herein inſerted; and doth alledge that the ſame contain true copies of the entries of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh as maid of honour, and was and is ſigned by Mr. William Watts, deputy-treaſurer to her royal highneſs the princeſs-dowager of Wales; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh therein named, and Elizabeth Chudleigh party in this ſuit, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

4. That in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-three, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, in her own name as a ſpinſter, and without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, or his being a party thereto or any ways concerned therein, took a leaſe of the right honourable lord Berkeley of Stratton of certain land in Hill-Street, in the pariſh of St. George, Hanover-Square, in the county of Middleſex, whereon the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh cauſed to be built a houſe, wherein ſhe continued to live for the ſpace of five years and upwards, and afterwards ſold the ſame to Hugo Meynell, eſquire, and received the money proceeding from the ſale thereof to her own uſe: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

5. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex the original leaſe of the land aforementioned, dated the fourteenth of April one thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-three, executed by the ſaid lord Berkeley and John Phillips, who was intereſted therein, and thereby leaſed to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, her executors, adminiſtrators, and aſſigns, for the term of eighty-ſeven years, and marked with the letter C, and prays that the ſame may be here read, and taken as if herein inſerted; and doth alledge that every thing was ſo had and done as is therein contained; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, therein mentioned, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this cauſe, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

6. That on the third day of February, in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-ſeven, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, was admitted a copyholder and tenant to the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter for the houſe and land, or ſome part thereof, wherein ſhe now lives, at Knightſbridge, in the county of Middleſex, in her own then and now maiden name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, or without his being a party thereto or any ways concerned therein: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

7. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, a copy of the court-roll of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh's being admitted tenant to the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, and marked with the letter D; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh therein mentioned, and Elizabeth Chudleigh party in this cauſe, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

8. That in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-two the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, tranſacted buſineſs with John Butcher in her own maiden name of Chudleigh, and took a leaſe from the ſaid Mr. Butcher of certain lands ſituate in the pariſh of Kenſington, in the county of Middleſex, and this without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, or his being a party thereto or any ways concerned therein; and in ſuch leaſe the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh was deſcribed by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

9. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if therein inſerted, the ſaid leaſe mentioned in the preceding article, and marked with the letter E; and doth alledge that every thing was ſo had and done as therein is contained; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh therein named, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this cauſe, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers:

and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

10. That Mrs. Ann Hanmer, the aunt of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, the party proponent, and who, in the ſecond article of the pretended allegation admitted on the part of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, is pretended to have been preſent at the pretended marriage pleaded by the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, did, in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-two, write a letter with her own hand to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, wherein ſhe addreſſes her as a ſingle woman, therein calling her ‘ dear Mrs. Chudleigh;’ and alſo in or about the year following did make her laſt will and teſtament, and codicil, the codicil not dated, but the will bearing date the eleventh day of June one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-three, and both will and codicil, as well as the letter aforeſaid, are of the hand-writing of the ſaid Mrs. Ann Hanmer, and ſo known to be by perſons who have ſeen her write and ſubſcribe her name to writings, and are well acquainted with her manner and character of hand-writing; and in which will and codicil, proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and now remaining in the regiſtry thereof, the ſaid Mrs. Hanmer hath by the will given a ſilver ſugar-urn and ſpoon, and by her codicil hath given and bequeathed a legacy of one hundred pounds, to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, by the name and deſcription of the honourable Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

11. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party propounding doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, the ſaid letter marked with the letter F, beginning thus; ‘ Sunning-hill, Auguſt the 14th ‘ —62. Dear Mrs. Chudleigh,’ and ending, ‘ I am, dear madam, your ‘ ſincere well-wiſher and humble ſervant, A. Hanmer;’ and alſo doth exhibit a copy of the ſaid will and codicil of the ſaid Mrs. Hanmer, marked with letter G; and doth alledge that Mrs. Hanmer, the aunt of the party proponent, who wrote the ſaid letter to the ſaid Mrs. Chudleigh, and who made the ſaid will and codicil, and Mrs. Hanmer, whom the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey pretends to have been a witneſs to his pretended marriage, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers; and that Mrs. Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid letter, and the honourable Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid laſt will and codicil, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this cauſe, was and is the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

12. That Mr. Merrill, at whoſe houſe the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey hath pleaded the ſaid pretended marriage to have been ſolemnized, wrote two letters with his own hand, and ſent them by the poſt to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, party in this cauſe, wherein he addreſſes her as a ſingle woman, the ſaid letters being dated Nov. 1ſt, 1765, and Nov. 3d, 1765, written in one ſheet of paper, and ſuperſcribed or directed thus; ‘ To the honourable Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh, at Chal‘mington, near Dorcheſter, Dorſet;’ and in the letter of the 3d of Nov. 1765 are theſe words, to wit; ‘ I have added your Chriſtian name to your ‘ ſurname in the direction of this, leſt the word honourable ſhould not ‘ be ſufficient to prevent a blunder, and the letter ſhould be given to Mrs. ‘ Chudleigh. I have met with ſo many and ſuch groſs blunders, that I think ‘ I can never enough guard againſt them;’ and the party proponent doth alledge, that by theſe words, ‘ ſhould be given to Mrs. Chudleigh,’ was meant Mrs. Chudleigh, at Chalmington, aunt to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, the party proponent, at whoſe houſe ſhe then was: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

13. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes in the next preceding article mentioned, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, the ſaid two letters mentioned in the next preceding article, the firſt marked with the letter H, beginning thus, ‘ Lainſtone, November the 1ſt, 1765. Dear ‘ madam, tho' I have nothing particular to write to you upon,’ and ending thus, ‘ Tho' had I mentioned it to them, Mrs. Kelly's and Mrs. El‘ſtob's would not have been wanting. I am, dear madam, your moſt ‘ obedient humble ſervant, John Merrill;’ and the other letter, marked with the letter I, beginning thus, ‘ November 3d, 1765. Dear madam, ‘ the above, as you ſee, was intended to go by the laſt poſt,’ and ending thus, ‘ that I think I can never enough guard againſt them. I am, dear ‘ madam, your moſt obedient humble ſervant, John Merrill;’ and the party proponent doth alledge and propound that the whole body, ſubſcriptions, and ſuperſcription of the ſaid letters were and are of the proper hand-writing and ſubſcription of the ſaid John Merrill, and ſo known and believed to be by perſons who are well acquainted with his manner and character of hand-writing and ſubſcription; and that by the words, ‘ I have added your Chriſtian name to your ſurname in the direction of ‘ this,’ was meant and intended the Chriſtian and ſurname of Elizabeth Chudleigh the party in this ſuit; and that the honourable Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid ſuperſcription, and the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh party in this ſuit, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

14. That the ſaid Mr. Merrill hath alſo in and by his laſt will and teſtament, bearing date the firſt day of January one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-ſeven, proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and now remaining in the regiſtry thereof, given and bequeathed a legacy or legacies to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, by her then and now maiden name of Elizabeth Chudleigh: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

15. That in ſupply of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, a copy of the clauſe of the will of the ſaid Mr. Merrill, marked with the letter K; and doth alledge that Mr. Merrill at whoſe houſe the pretended marriage pleaded by the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey is ſaid to have been ſolemnized, and Mr. Merrill who made the ſaid will, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers; and that the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid will, and the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, was and is alſo one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

16. That in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-ſix, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh borrowed of Mr. John Drummond, a banker, at divers times, on mortgage and bond ſecurity, in her own name, and without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, or his being a party thereto, or his being any ways concerned therein, the ſum of five thouſand one hundred and ſixty pounds, and gave the ſaid Mr. Drummond a bond for one thouſand pounds, part thereof, in her then and now maiden name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and alſo mortgaged certain premiſes ſituate in the manor of Knightſbridge, in the county of Middleſex, in her ſaid then and now maiden name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, unto the ſaid Mr. Drummond, for the repayment of the ſum of four thouſand one hundred and ſixty pounds to the ſaid Mr. Drummond, as will appear by the original bond and mortgage-deed now in the cuſtody or power of the ſaid Mr. Drummond, to which ſhe refers; and the party proponent doth alledge that Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid bond and mortgage-deed, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

17. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, the counterpart of the ſaid mortgage-deed, dated the eighteenth of April one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-ſix, marked with the letter L; and doth alledge and propound that the ſame was and is the counterpart of the ſaid mortgage-deed remaining in the cuſtody or power of the ſaid Mr. Drummond, as mentioned in the next preceding article; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid bond and mortgage-deed, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, was and is the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

18. That in the month of February in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-five, and in the month of June one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-eight, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, borrowed of Mr. William Field, of the Inner-Temple, attorney at law, ſeveral ſums of money, to the amount of the ſum of one thouſand nine hundred pounds, or thereabouts, for which ſhe gave to the ſaid Mr. Field, as ſecurity, two bonds in her own name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, without the interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, or without his being party thereto, or any ways concerned therein: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

19. That on or about the twenty-fifth of February one thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-ſix, adminiſtration of the goods, chattels, and credits of Harriot Chudleigh, late of Windſor-Caſtle, in the county of Berks, widow, deceaſed, the mother of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, party in this ſuit, was granted to the ſaid William Field, as the attorney and for the uſe and benefit of Elizabeth Chudleigh, deſcribed in the ſaid adminiſtration, and in the records of the Prerogative-Court of Canterbury, by the name and deſcription of Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, the natural and lawful daughter and only child of the ſaid Harriot Chudleigh deceaſed, without the interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, or without his being party thereto, or any ways concerned therein: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

20. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes in the next preceding article mentioned, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, a copy of the adminiſtration-act entered on record in the ſaid Prerogative-Court of Canterbury, and ſigned by the deputy-regiſtrars of the ſaid court, or one of them, marked with the letter M; and doth alledge that Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, therein mentioned, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this cauſe, was and is one and the ſame perſon: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

21. That the ſaid Mr. William Field, as the attorney of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, and by virtue of a letter of attorney from her for that purpoſe, given in her name of Elizabeth Chudleigh to him, uſed to receive her ſalary as maid of honour, without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

22. That on or about the fifth day of May one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-ſix, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, party in this ſuit, preſented, in her own name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, by virtue of a preſentation ſigned by her for that purpoſe, the reverend Mr. John Julian junior, to the living of Hartford, in the county of Devon, who was in virtue of the ſaid preſentation duly inſtituted and inducted to the ſaid living, without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, or his being a party thereto, or any ways concerned therein: and that this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

23. That in ſupply of the proof of the premiſes mentioned in the ſaid next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, an authentic copy of the ſaid preſentation marked with the letter N, ſigned by   and alſo a certificate of the inſtitution of the ſaid reverend John Julian to the ſaid rectory of Hartford, ſigned by Richard Burn, notary-publick, ſecretary to the lord biſhop of Exeter, and marked with the letter O; and doth alledge that Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid preſentation and certificate, and Elizabeth Chudleigh party in this cauſe, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers:

and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

24. That the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, for many years ſubſequent to the pretended time of the pretended marriage aforeſaid, kept a current account of caſh with the Bank of England in her name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and as a ſingle woman; and alſo in all common as well as other occurrences of buyings and ſellings, and other money matters, whenever occaſion happened, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, hath, as well before as ever ſince the pretended time of the pretended marriage pleaded by the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, conſtantly in her own name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, tranſacted ſuch buſineſs, by paying and receiving money, giving and taking receipts for the ſame, hiring and diſcharging ſervants, and on all other occaſions, without the interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, or his being any ways concerned therein: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

25. That all and ſingular the premiſes were and are true, and ſo forth.

Chudleigh againſt Hervey. — Sentence read and promulged the 10th of February 1769.

IN the name of God, Amen. We John Betteſworth, doctor of laws, vicar-general of the right reverend father in God Richard, by divine permiſſion, lord biſhop of London, and official principal of the conſiſtorial and epiſcopal court of London, having ſeen, heard, and underſtood, and fully and maturely diſcuſſed the merits and circumſtances of a certain cauſe of jactitation of marriage which was lately controverted, and as yet remains undetermined before us in judgment, between the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, of the pariſh of St. Margaret, Weſtminſter, in the county of Middleſex, ſpinſter, the party, agent, and complainant, of the one part, and the right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, of the pariſh of St. James, Weſtminſter, in the county of Middleſex and dioceſe of London, batchelor, falſely calling himſelf the huſband of the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, the party accuſed and complained of, on the other part; and we rightly and duly proceeding therein, and the parties aforeſaid lawfully appearing before us by their proctors reſpectively, and the proctor of the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh praying ſentence to be given and juſtice to be done to his party, and the proctor of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey alſo earneſtly praying ſentence and juſtice to be done to his ſaid party; and we having carefully looked into and duly conſidered of the whole proceedings had and done before us in the ſaid cauſe, and obſerved by law what ought to be obſerved in this behalf, have thought fit and do thus think fit to proceed to the giving and promulging our definitive ſentence or final decree in this ſame cauſe, in manner and form following (to wit):

Foraſmuch as by the acts enacted, alledged, exhibited, propounded, proved, and confeſſed in this cauſe, we have found and clearly diſcovered, that the proctor of the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh hath fully and ſufficiently founded and proved his intention deduced in a certain libel and allegation and other pleadings and exhibits given in, exhibited, and admitted on her behalf in this ſame cauſe, and now remaining in the regiſtry of this court (which libel and allegation and other pleadings and exhibits we take and will have taken as if herein repeated and inſerted for us to pronounce as herein after we ſhall pronounce); and that nothing, at leaſt effectual in law, hath on the part and behalf of the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey been excepted, deduced, exhibited, propounded, proved, or confeſſed in this ſame cauſe, which may or ought in any wiſe to defeat, prejudice, or weaken the intention of the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh deduced as aforeſaid; and particularly that the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey hath totally failed in the proof of his allegation given in and admitted in this cauſe, whereby he pleaded and propounded a pretended marriage to have been ſolemnized between him and the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter: and therefore we John Betteſworth, doctor of laws, the judge aforeſaid, firſt calling upon God and ſetting him alone before our eyes, and having heard counſel in this cauſe, do pronounce, decree, and declare, that the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh at and during all the time mentioned in the ſaid libel given in and admitted in this cauſe, and now remaining in the regiſtry of this court, was and now is a ſpinſter, and free from all matrimonial contracts or eſpouſals (as far as to us as yet appears) more eſpecially with the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey; and that the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, notwithſtanding the premiſes, did in the years and months libellate wickedly and maliciouſly boaſt and publickly aſſert (though falſely) that he was contracted in marriage to the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, or that they were joined or contracted together in matrimony: wherefore we do pronounce, decree, and declare, that perpetual ſilence muſt and ought to be impoſed and enjoined the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey as to the premiſes libellate, which we do impoſe and enjoin him by theſe preſents; and we do decree the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey to be admoniſhed to deſiſt from his boaſting and aſſerting that he was contracted to or joined with the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh in matrimony as aforeſaid; and we do alſo pronounce, decree, and declare, that the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey ought by law to be condemned in lawful expences made or to be made in this cauſe on the part and behalf of the ſaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, to be paid to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh or her proctor; and accordingly we do condemn him in ſuch expences, which we tax at and moderate to the ſum of one hundred pounds of lawful money of Great-Britain, beſides the expence of a monition for payment on this behalf by this our definitive ſentence or final decree, which we read and promulge by theſe preſents.

This ſentence was read, promulged, and given by the within-named the vicar-general and official principal on Friday the tenth day of February in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-nine, in the dining-room adjoining to the common-hall of Doctors-Commons, ſituate within the pariſh of St. Benedict, near Paul's Wharf, London, there being then and there preſent the witneſſes ſpecified in the acts of court, which I atteſt.

Mark Holman, notary-publick, deputy-regiſter.

Mr. Wallace.

Your lordſhips are now poſſeſſed of a ſentence given by the conſiſtory court of the biſhop of London in a cauſe inſtituted there to try a claim made by Mr. Hervey of marriage with the noble priſoner; your lordſhips find by that ſentence the claim examined, and the decree pronounced upon the allegations and the evidence given in the cauſe; by which decree the noble priſoner at the bar is declared free from all matrimonial contracts and eſpouſals with Mr. Hervey.

My lords, the noble priſoner by the indictment is charged, ſubſequent to this ſuppoſed marriage to Mr. Hervey, to have married the late duke of Kingſton.

It is for me now to ſubmit to your lordſhips, that this ſentence is concluſive as long as it remains in force, and that of neceſſity it muſt be received in evidence in all courts and in all places where the ſubject of that marriage can become a matter of diſpute.

My lords, I don't know any court which the conſtitution of this kingdom has placed the deciſions of the rights of marriage in but the eccleſiaſtical: I believe it will not be contended, that the common-law courts of this country have any ſuch original juriſdiction. Marriages may indeed incidentally come to be diſcuſſed and determined in the courts of common law, and in many caſes abſolutely neceſſary to the due adminiſtration of juſtice; but, my lords, it will not be found, that where the proper forum has given a deciſion upon the point, the common-law courts have ever taken upon themſelves to examine into the grounds, or at all queſtion the validity, of that ſentence.

My lords, as far as we have books to reſort to, we find inſtances from the earlieſt times down to the preſent, where the power of the eccleſiaſtical courts is in terms recognized by the common-law courts, and where their deciſions have been conſidered as concluſive upon every queſtion in which they have juriſdiction, and eſpecially in caſes like the preſent, particularly belonging to them.

My lords, I don't know in the common-law courts any inſtance where the legality of marriage can come directly in queſtion, that the courts have decided upon it without referring to the biſhop, the ordinary of the place, to certify; unleſs the marriage has been decided by a ſuit inſtituted in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts.

Your lordſhips will permit me to refer your lordſhips to thoſe authorities of law which are to be found in our books; and by the able aſſiſtance which your lordſhips indulgence has given the priſoner at the bar, you will more particularly have explained the nature of the proceedings in the eccleſiaſtical courts, how far and to what purpoſes in thoſe courts they are concluſive, and where they are open to ſuch litigation. I ſhall beg to refer your lordſhips to a caſe reported by lord chief juſtice Coke, in the fourth part of his Reports, by the name of Bunting and Addingſhall. In the 27th year of the reign of Elizabeth, there was a marriage between one Thomas Tweede and one Agnes Addingſhall, and ſubſequent to this marriage a perſon of the name of Bunting libelled againſt the wife of Tweede, claiming under a pre-contract, and the Spiritual Court enforced that contract: afterwards, on the death of Bunting, a queſtion aroſe between the iſſue of the ſecond marriage and the collateral relations of Bunting; the collateral relations inſiſting that the ſecond marriage was utterly void, becauſe there had exiſted a firſt marriage, and the huſband living at the time of the ſecond. Another objection I ſhall ſtate to your lordſhips was, that though it might be concluſive between the parties, yet Tweede the firſt huſband being no party to the ſuit, nor to the ſentence which diſſolved the marriage between them in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, it could not affect him, nor indeed any body but the parties: the reſolution of the court was, that he being then de facto the huſband, though he was not a party to the ſuit, nor in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, yet the ſentence againſt the wife ſhould bind the huſband de facto; and ‘foraſmuch as the cognizance of the right of marriage belongs to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and the ſame court has given ſentence in this caſe, the judges of our law ought (although it be againſt the reaſon of our law) to give faith and credit to their proceedings and ſentences, and to think that their proceedings are conſonant to the law of holy church, for cuilibet in ſuo arte perito credendum eſt; and ſo the iſſue of the firſt marriage, in conſequence and upon the credit of the ſentence, were conſidered as legitimate.’ My lord chief juſtice Coke has alſo reported another caſe upon the ſubject of marriage in the 40th year of queen Elizabeth, which your lordſhips will find in the ſeventh part of his Reports, page 41, by the name of Kenn's caſe, which is ſhortly this:— Chriſtopher Kenn, eſquire, married Elizabeth Stowell, and had iſſue; afterwards the Eccleſiaſtical Court pronounced a ſentence of divorce between Mr. Kenn and the lady, who were not of the age of conſent at the time of the marriage; and in conſequence of this ſentence he married a ſecond wife: the iſſue of the firſt marriage, claiming the inheritance, exhibited a bill in the court of Wards of that day, in order to have the benefit of the ſucceſſion; and offered to prove, that though the ſentence had been given in the Eccleſiaſtical Court on the ground of his father and mother being within the age of conſent, yet that they were above the age of conſent; that in truth they had cohabited together for eight or nine years, and had iſſue of that marriage. There could be no doubt, if the matter was open to examination, that the firſt marriage was effectual: for, in the firſt place, the parties were above the age of conſent, and if they had been under the age of conſent, yet their cohabitation together after that age, and more eſpecially as they had iſſue, would have been ſufficient to eſtabliſh the marriage. It was argued too, that it was open to examination, becauſe both the ſtatute and common law of the country take notice of the age of conſent; and therefore it was equally competent to a court of common law to examine into the queſtion, as to an eccleſiaſtical court. It was further urged, that the queſtion related to an inheritance of which the Eccleſiaſtical Court had no juriſdiction or controul, and therefore it was a queſtion properly before a court of common law: but the court then conceived themſelves ſo far bound by the deciſion of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, though founded on falſe ſuggeſtion, that they held the plaintiff in that cauſe not intitled to any relief.

My lords, I beg leave to trouble your lordſhips with the words of the court upon that ſubject: after ſtating the reaſons, the book proceeds:

'But it was reſolved by all the juſtices' (for it was a reference to the two chief juſtices, to two other juſtices, to the chief baron, and two other barons) 'that the ſentence ſhould conclude as long as it remained in force.' And, my lords, the reaſons given are, 'that the eccleſiaſtical judge has ſentenced the contract and marriage to be void and of no effect; and although they were of the age of conſent, yet if the original contract was void and of no effect, then there was juſt cauſe of divorce; and if the marriage had been within the age of conſent, the eccleſiaſtical judge is judge as well of the aſſent as of the firſt contract, and what ſhall be a ſufficient aſſent or not; and although the eccleſiaſtical judge ſhews the cauſe of his ſentence, yet foraſmuch as he is judge of the original matter, that is, of the lawfulneſs of the marriage, we will never examine the cauſe, whether it be true or falſe; for of things the cognizance whereof belongs to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, we ought to give credit to their ſentences, as they give to the judgments in our courts.'

Your lordſhips find here a caſe where, according to the facts ſtated, there was no doubt of the validity of the firſt marriage, and of the legitimacy of the iſſue claiming in that cauſe; and if there had been no ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, no doubt could have exiſted of the right of ſucceſſion: but the ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court having interpoſed, the court of common law conceived themſelves abſolutely bound, nay, that they had no right to look into the cauſe of that ſentence, for it was a matter originally of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, and they muſt give faith and credit to the ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical judge in that cauſe. Your lordſhips will find that my lord chief juſtice Coke cited a caſe ſo long ago as the 22d of Edward the fourth, where the ſame doctrine was laid down in the Eccleſiaſtical Court having a complete and deciſive juriſdiction upon this point.

My lords, theſe caſes, from the reporter and from the judges who determined them, the reporter being one, I take to be of the higheſt authority, and acknowledging thoſe principles which occur frequently in the books, though not under ſolemn deciſions, but as the received opinions of judges and of lawyers from the earlieſt of times.

My lords, I did before mention to your lordſhips a caſe from Carthew; I ſhall not ſtate it particularly now, but only to the point which we are now upon, that is, of the ſentence being concluſive.

My lords, this was not, as ſuppoſed in the argument, a niſi prius opinion, which every judge muſt give with the information he carries with him, and without the aſſiſtance of the reſt of the judges of the court, but a ſolemn deciſion in trial at bar in the court of King's Bench in the fourth of king William, when I think lord chief juſtice Holt preſided in that court: it was too upon a ſentence of jactitation of marriage, which your lordſhips have now before you, which was there held to be concluſive evidence, and that no teſtimony whatever ought to be received againſt it. Your lordſhips will take the words of the court upon that occaſion: 'upon the debate, the court were all of opinion, that this ſentence whilſt unrepealed was concluſive againſt all matters precedent; and that the temporal courts muſt give credit to it until it is reverſed, being a matter of mere ſpiritual cognizance.'

Your lordſhips find, that in the reign of king William, that notion which had from all time prevailed was as ſtrong as ever, and that the judges of the court of King's Bench, in which it was tried, were all clearly of opinion, that a caſe like the preſent of jactitation of marriage was concluſive upon the point, till it was reverſed or repealed.

My lords, the ſame doctrine is laid down by my lord chief juſtice Holt, who preſided at the trial of this cauſe, in a caſe reported in Salkeld, 290, by the name of Blackham's caſe: it turns upon the claim of property in the goods of a woman deceaſed. The plaintiff proved the goods to be in his poſſeſſion, and to be taken away by the defendant. Againſt this claim of the plaintiff, the defendant ſhewed that theſe were the goods of one Jane Blackham in her life-time, and that the defendant had taken out letters of adminiſtration to her, and ſo was intitled to the goods. Upon this the plaintiff proved, that ſome few days before her death ſhe was actually married to him; and in anſwer to that it was inſiſted, that the Spiritual Court had determined the right to be in the defendant; for they could not have granted adminiſtration to the defendant but upon a ſuppoſition that there was no ſuch marriage; and that this ſentence being a matter within their juriſdiction was concluſive, and could not be gainſaid as in evidence. My lord chief juſtice Holt, who was the judge ſitting at niſi prius, who determined the caſe I laſt cited, ſays thus: 'a matter which has been directly determined by their ſentence cannot be gainſaid; their ſentence is concluſive in ſuch caſes, and no evidence ſhall be admitted to prove the contrary; but then it muſt be in point directly tried.'

My lords, the ſentence before your lordſhips at preſent is in a cauſe, where the object of the proſecution was to queſtion the claim of marriage, and where the marriage is the point directly tried and determined; ſo that according to lord Holt's opinion, if the ſentence be directly upon the queſtion, it is ſo concluſive, that it is not competent for any court of common law to examine into the matter, or receive any evidence to contradict it.

My lords, theſe are caſes as far as have happened in the courts of law.

I ſhall now trouble your lordſhips with a caſe determined in the houſe of lords, under the name of Hatfield and Hatfield: it came on before the houſe of lords in the year 1725. The caſe, as collected from the printed caſes of the times, is thus:—one Leonard Hatfield married Jane Porter, who had different names I ſee aſſigned her, and by his will made a proviſion for her as his wife. In March, 1720, ſhe filed a bill in the court of Exchequer, in Ireland, where the ſubject of her proviſion lay, againſt Leonard Hatfield, a ſon by a former wife, and againſt a truſtee, to have the benefit of the proviſion. In January following the defendant, the ſon and heir of her huſband, having diſcovered that ſhe had been before married to one Porter, which Porter was then living, he procured a releaſe of part of the proviſion from Porter, and filed a croſs-bill for a diſcovery of the marriage, and to ſtay the proceedings upon her bill. In this croſs-bill he queſtioned her upon her marriage to Porter: ſhe denied that ſhe had ever gone by the name of Porter; but with reſpect to a marriage with Porter, ſhe pleaded that ſhe ought not to make a diſcovery, becauſe it tended to criminate herſelf; and being an accuſation of bigamy againſt her, the plea by the rules of the court of equity was of courſe allowed, that court never compelling perſons to diſcover on oath crimes which may be the ſubject of proſecution againſt themſelves.

My lords, however by the plea one pretty plainly diſcovers, that there was reaſon to ſuppoſe ſhe was the wife—indeed ſhe knew it—it was capable of proof, and would be proved in the cauſe.

My lords, they proceeded to the examination of the witneſſes, and clear evidence was given that this woman was the wife of Porter: Porter himſelf had confeſſed it in his anſwer, and he had ſtated the miniſter and the witneſſes who were preſent at the marriage; ſo that he gave Hatfield, the heir at law, an opportunity of bringing direct proof of the marriage from the very perſons preſent. This woman, finding that ſhe would be preſſed by that proof, had recourſe to the Eccleſiaſtical Court: ſhe inſtituted a ſuit againſt this Porter of jactitation of marriage, pending the cauſe; and after depoſitions taken, though not publiſhed, ſhe got Porter over to her intereſt. He was willing to defeat that releaſe which he had given; and therefore he does not enter into proof, but appears by a proctor for form ſake, that a judgment might paſs againſt him. Upon this the eccleſiaſtical judge decreed, as in all cauſes of jactitation they do where they find that there is no marriage, that the party libelling was free from all matrimonial contracts and eſpouſals with Porter. In this caſe Porter had given a releaſe, as her huſband had upon oath, in the court of Exchequer in Ireland, ſtated the marriage with preciſion, even named the miniſter and the witneſſes at the marriage, yet in the Eccleſiaſtical Court he appears by a proctor, and has ſentence paſſed againſt him, without inſiſting on the marriage or any defence. The court of Exchequer in Ireland received this ſentence as concluſive againſt the marriage with Porter; they conceived they were bound to give credit to the Eccleſiaſtical Court. The plaintiff in the cauſe, knowing in what manner he had been deceived, that in truth Porter was the huſband of this woman, appealed to the houſe of lords in England. The houſe of lords here conceived, as the court of Exchequer had done, that the matter was determined by a competent juriſdiction; and yet your lordſhips ſee there was fraud upon the face of the proceedings, if it had been competent to the court to have entered into that conſideration: but the houſe of lords here conceived the matter at an end whilſt the ſentence remained in force, and the decree of the court of Exchequer was affirmed. Upon the pleading this ſentence, the court of Exchequer in the firſt inſtance, the houſe of lords in the laſt, proceeded to determine the matter. It is ſo taken notice of by ſir John Strange, in a caſe I ſhall preſently mention. It is taken notice of by a very laborious compiler of the law, Mr. Viner: under his title of Marriage, he mentions the ground of the determination thus:—the legality of marriage ſhall never be agitated in equity, eſpecially after ſentence in the Spiritual Court in a cauſe of jactitation of marriage, although the proceedings in the Spiritual Court were only faint and colluſive.

My lords, I take this to be a caſe of the greateſt authority, a deciſion of the houſe of peers in this country, and upon a point of jactitation of marriage, a ſentence of the ſame nature with the preſent before your lordſhips.

I ſhall beg leave to trouble your lordſhips with a caſe or two more upon the ſubject, which are of more modern times: one is reported by ſir John Strange in the ſecond part of his Reports, 960, under the name of Clews and Bathurſt. The action was for maliciouſly procuring the plaintiff's wife to exhibit articles of the peace againſt him, and for living with her in adultery: the plaintiff proved the marriage by the parſon and a woman, and alſo a conſummation; to encounter which, the defendant produced a ſentence of the Conſiſtory Court of London, in a cauſe of jactitation of marriage brought by the woman againſt the plaintiff, wherein ſhe was declared free from all contract, and perpetual ſilence impoſed upon the plaintiff; which ſentence was pronounced ſince the iſſue had been joined in the cauſe; and the chief juſtice ruled this to be concluſive evidence till reverſed by appeal, and the plaintiff was non-ſuited. Your lordſhips find here was a cauſe rightly brought, clear proof of the marriage made at the trial by the witneſſes preſent, no doubt of the fact, but the production of a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court in diſaffirmance of that marriage; a ſentence of jactitation. The chief juſtice who tried the cauſe conſidered the buſineſs as concluded; that it was of no conſequence when the deciſion was made; if the moment before the trial, it was enough, being by a court having the proper and the ſole juriſdiction of the matter, and whoſe opinion muſt be deciſive; and therefore, though the cauſe had been brought before any ſuit inſtituted in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, though there was no doubt of the foundation for that cauſe, yet the ſentence is permitted to have effect, and to non-ſuit that plaintiff who had been injured in the manner the caſe ſtates.

My lords, there was too, at the ſame ſittings, another caſe which is reported in the following page by ſir John Strange, of Da Coſta and Villa Real, which was an action upon a contract of marriage, per verba de futuro, brought by the gentleman againſt the lady, who pleaded the uſual plea non aſſumpſit. When the plaintiff had opened his caſe, the defendant offered in evidence a ſentence of the Spiritual Court in a cauſe of contract, where the judge had pronounced againſt the ſuit for a ſolemnization in the face of the church, and declared Mrs. Villa Real free from all contract: and the chief juſtice held this to be proper and concluſive evidence; that it was a cauſe within their juriſdiction; that the nature of the contract was properly examinable by them; and therefore, as a point determined, he non-ſuited the plaintiff in that cauſe, though the plaintiff there opened, and was ready to have proved, the fact of the marriage before the court; but the ſentence having interpoſed, the court conceived they were to pay that credit which every court before had done in Weſtminſter-Hall, which all judges in every age had done to the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction in caſes within their juriſdiction; and finding himſelf concluded by that, defeated the plaintiff of the effect of this ſuit. My lords, it was in this caſe that the caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield was quoted as an authority.

My lords, theſe are caſes upon the very points of marriage, and many of them your lordſhips find upon the effect and force and concluſion of a ſentence ſimilar to that now under conſideration, that of a jactitation cauſe. My lords, this has been more recently and within our own memory underſtood to be law, recognized to the law, and decided accordingly. It is not long ago ſince an action was brought againſt the honourable Mr. Thomas Hervey, by a tradeſman, to recover a debt for neceſſaries found for his wife. On that trial the marriage was proved to the ſatisfaction of the jury, and the defendant found liable to pay for thoſe neceſſaries. Mr. Hervey inſtituted a ſuit, in the conſiſtory court of the biſhop of London, of jactitation, and he was declared free from all eſpouſals and contracts of marriage with the lady. During the continuance of this ſentence, though appealed from, another creditor brought an action againſt Mr. Hervey, and had to produce in evidence the ſame witneſſes who had proved the caſe of the other creditor before any ſentence had been obtained, and had ſucceeded; but the learned chief juſtice who tried that cauſe, conceived it was not then open to examination; that though, in the firſt inſtance, when the cauſe of the firſt creditor came to be diſcuſſed, there was no ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and of neceſſity the court of common law muſt decide upon the marriage; but there had then intervened a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, which, whilſt in force, was concluſive; and of courſe diſmiſſed the plaintiff's claim; and the intent of that appeal was to ſuſpend and reverſe that ſentence; yet while it ſtood unreverſed it was concluſive, the fact of marriage was open to no examination in any court whatſoever. This is only an affirmance of the principles of the law, and the doctrine found in the determinations of a thouſand caſes which the books furniſh.

My lords, it is not peculiar to the caſe of marriage; it is the ſame in other inſtances where the eccleſiaſtical courts have the juriſdiction; it is ſo in the probate of wills, it is ſo in the granting of letters of adminiſtration: if a will is forged, if a will is fraudulently obtained of a perſonal eſtate, of which the Eccleſiaſtical Court has the juriſdiction; if that court has granted a probate, it is not open to a court of common law, it is not open to a court of equity, to enter into the fraud made uſe of in obtaining the will, or to the forgery committed upon a teſtator. I ſhall refer your lordſhips to a caſe or two upon that head: that of Noel and Wells, in firſt Levinz's Reports 235, in the 19th of king Charles the ſecond: it was an action brought by the executrix of the huſband, and upon the trial the plaintiff produced the probate of the will in evidence. The defendant inſiſted the will was forged; and the chief juſtice before whom it was tried was of opinion, he could not give ſuch evidence directly againſt the ſeal of the ordinary, in any things within his juriſdiction: upon which a caſe was made for the opinion of the court, and a verdict was for the plaintiff, and the court held that the chief juſtice at the trial had done right in rejecting the evidence of the forgery, that no ſuch evidence ought to be given till the probate was repealed: they might indeed, by proving the ſeal of the ordinary forged, have relief; but if the ſeal of the ordinary was genuine, then whatever forgery or fraud was committed, it was not open to the examination of a common-law court.

My lords, the ſame doctrine is to be found in the caſe of Branſby and Kerrick and others, which was determined by the houſe of lords. It was ſtated in that caſe, that one Robert Branſby, the complainant's ſon, being intitled to the reverſion of a freehold and copyhold eſtate expectant upon the death of the complainant, made his will, by which he gave all his real and perſonal eſtate to the defendant Kerrick, and made him his executor, who proved the will in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, in common form: afterwards, in a conteſt in the Eccleſiaſtical Court touching the validity of that will, a ſentence was given in favour of the will in the year 1716. Branſby, the father, filed a bill in Chancery, to ſet aſide the will for fraud and impoſition. Witneſſes were examined, and many acts and circumſtances of impoſition were proved upon the defendant. The cauſe came to be heard before lord Macclesfield, then chancellor, upon the 14th of November 1718, when his lordſhip, ſtruck with the monſtrous fraud and iniquity of the tranſaction, declared the executor ſhould ſtand as a truſtee for the next of kin. Upon appeal, the houſe of lords reverſed the decree, upon the ground that it was not competent to a court of equity to examine into fraud and impoſition in a will touching perſonal eſtate; that the court of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction had decided that point; that it was no longer open to diſcuſſion.

My lords, the ſame rules obtain with reſpect to every court of competent juriſdiction, whether foreign or domeſtick: we give credit to the deciſions of all foreign courts in points within their proper juriſdiction, and do not examine into the facts, but are concluded by the ſentence. I will only refer your lordſhips to a caſe in Sir Thomas Raymond's Reports 473. In the war between the Dutch and the French in the time of Charles the ſecond, a ſhip was ſeized by the French as a Dutch ſhip, and condemned. The ſhip being in truth Engliſh, the purchaſer under the French condemnation, brought the ſhip into England, where the right owner ſeized her: upon this an action was brought by the purchaſer under the condemnation. The defendant, the original owner, offered to prove his property, and that the ſhip was never a Dutch ſhip, nor was liable to be taken and condemned by the French: but what ſaid the court? We muſt give credit to the condemnation of the court in France; we are forced to give credit to and believe that this ſhip was in the condition of a Dutch ſhip, and ſubject to a condemnation: and, upon the ground, that if a court of competent juriſdiction gives a ſentence, all other courts muſt be bound by it, the Engliſhman was precluded from aſſerting his right. It was the ſame upon a caſe of an inſurance, which will occur to ſome of your lordſhips, where the ſhip was warranted Swediſh, and condemned in the war between England and France: the parties were concluded from inſiſting that the ſhip is any longer Swediſh or a neutral, becauſe a court of competent juriſdiction had decided the matter. The ſame law holds in reſpect to the courts of Admiralty: whether prize or not prize, belongs to the court of Admiralty; juriſdiction of that court decides upon the ſubject; though they have given a wrong deciſion, though the facts did not warrant it, though the judge has done it corruptly, yet it is a ſentence which the common-law courts muſt be bound by, wherever it comes in litigation here: and I have known, in point of experience, in an action of treſpaſs brought here for ſeizing a ſhip, where it has been before a court of Admiralty and received a deciſion, that the court of common law no longer entertains the cauſe, for the queſtion of prize or not prize is peculiarly belonging to the admiralty juriſdiction, and you give faith and credit to that juriſdiction. I might refer your lordſhips too (but the caſes are innumerable upon the ſubject) to that of Burroughs and Jamineau, in Strange, 233, which was upon a bill of exchange, where, by a peculiar local cuſtom within Leghorn, it is competent to the acceptor of a bill, by a judgment of the court, to have his acceptance annulled, if the drawer becomes bankrupt before the bill be payable. There is no ſuch law in this country; yet, giving credit to the ſentence of that court, the court of Chancery here would not ſend it to a trial at law, but determined upon the point, that the ſentence in that court was deciſive upon the ſubject, it being a matter within their juriſdiction.

My lords, in almoſt every caſe where judgments or records of other courts have been the ſubject of diſcuſſion, the ſentences of the Eccleſiaſtical Court have always been cited and argued from as concluſive upon the ſubject of diſpute, and the courts have uniformly adopted thoſe caſes as law; but the attempt has ever been to diſtinguiſh caſes immediately before the court from thoſe determined by the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction. Your lordſhips will find much of that in the caſe of Philips and Bury, in Skinner, 468.

My lords, there was a very late caſe determined in the court of Common-Pleas, and which is now got into print, reported by Mr. Serjeant Wilſon, which is Biddulph and Ather. It aroſe upon a queſtion of claim by the duke of Norfolk to all wreck within the cape of Bramber, in Suſſex, which was proved by many records: it was a queſtion whether thoſe records were admiſſible, or, if admiſſible, were concluſive evidence. The counſel who argued in favour of thoſe records and the concluſion which was to ariſe from them, compared them to the caſe of eccleſiaſtical ſentences, and would gladly have brought thoſe records within that rule. The court in that caſe acknowledged the argument proper with reſpect to the eccleſiaſtical courts. The court admitted that the ſentence of an eccleſiaſtical court, in a matter whereof they have the ſole cognizance, is concluſive evidence, and parole evidence ſhall never be received. My lords, there is a manuſcript note in being of what the judges particularly ſaid; and I find it was cited, as one of the inſtances where the ſentence was concluſive, by the learned chief juſtice who then preſided in the court: he ſays, if there is a ſentence in an eccleſiaſtical court declaring a marriage—for inſtance, if it could be proved by a hundred witneſſes that the parties were never within 500 miles of each other, that evidence is not to be received, but the judgment of the Eccleſiaſtical Court is concluſive upon the point. In many of the caſes I have cited to your lordſhips, the queſtion came directly before the court, and received a ſolemn diſcuſſion: in ſome the doctrine has been recognized; in none, nor in any caſe that I know of, has it ever been doubted. My lords, though the caſes reſpect civil ſuits, I truſt that no real ground of diſtinction can be made between criminal and civil proceedings: in civil ſuits, courts go as far as poſſible to relieve claims founded in equity and juſtice; in criminal caſes, the leaning is always to the defendants; and therefore I ſhould conceive ſuch evidence ſtronger, in a criminal proſecution, in favour of innocence.

My lords, I will take the liberty, however, of reminding your lordſhips of two or three caſes in criminal law, where the ſame doctrine has been eſtabliſhed, and the acts of the Eccleſiaſtical Court deemed concluſive upon the ſubject, until reverſed by appeal. My lords, in the firſt volume of ſir John Strange's Reports, 481, your lordſhips will find a caſe that happened at the Old-Bailey in the 8th of George the firſt; it was an indictment for forging a will of a perſonal eſtate. On the trial, the forgery was proved; but the defendant producing a probate, that was held to be concluſive evidence in ſupport of the will, and the defendant was acquitted. This your lordſhips ſee was a proſecution for a very ſerious offence indeed; a proſecution for the forgery of a will: the forgery is ſtated to have been actually proved at the trial, but upon the production of a probate from the Eccleſiaſtical Court, whoſe deciſions are final and concluſive upon ſuch ſubjects, the defendant was acquitted, and the evidence of the forgery rejected. It ought not to have been received, if that circumſtance of the probate had been diſcovered ſooner to the court; but the defendant, perhaps conceiving that there could be no evidence to affect him with the guilt of forgery, with-held the probate; whatever might be the reaſon, it is immaterial, he produced it in time to ſave himſelf; for you muſt receive a probate in the Eccleſiaſtical Court againſt the teſtimony of ten thouſand witneſſes.

Your lordſhips will find the ſame doctrine in the ſame book, 1ſt ſir John Strange's Reports, in the caſe of King and Roberts, where that defendant exhibited a will in Doctors-Commons, as executor, and demanded probate; after long conteſt, it was determined in favour of the plaintiff; and upon an appeal to the Delegates, this ſentence was confirmed; after the ſentence, the parties who had brought it about fell out amongſt themſelves, and diſcovered that the will which had been proved was a forgery. The manner of giving relief was to grant a commiſſion of review; but the perſon who had been diſappointed and injured by this forgery, alſo preferred a bill of indictment againſt the perſons concerned in the act of forgery. The chief juſtice refuſed to try the cauſe whilſt the ſentence was in force, but inſiſted that it ſhould ſtand off till the ſentence was laid out of the caſe by the deciſion of the commiſſioners under that commiſſion of review. My lords, in this your lordſhips find the doctrine recognized in the ſtrongeſt manner.

The next caſe, which came before the court of King's Bench, is the King and Gardell. It was an indictment proſecuted by Mr. Crawford, a fellow-commoner of Queen's College, for aſſault upon him. At the trial of the indictment, the defendant, who had acted by the orders of the college, produced the acts of the college by which Mr. Crawford was expelled. He came into the garden of the college afterwards with an intent to take poſſeſſion of his rooms, and the officer of the college took hold of him, and conducted him out of the limits of the college; and this was the aſſault in that indictment, and which was in point of law an aſſault; and unleſs the defendant had a defence, or an excuſe for his acts, he muſt have been found guilty. The act of expulſion was given in evidence. An offer was made by Mr. Crawford to prove the invalidity of thoſe acts, that by the conſtitution of this college more perſons were neceſſary to concur in an act of expulſion than had been preſent at that time, and other objections were made to the validity of thoſe acts. The learned judge, before whom that cauſe came to be tried, conceived himſelf concluded upon this ſubject; that as the college had the ſole juriſdiction of the cauſe, their deciſion was concluſive upon him; and it did not ſignify upon what grounds they had gone, for the effect of their judgment was an excuſe of the defendant, and ſo long as it remained unimpeached, and unreverſed in the proper courſe, there could be no doubt but it furniſhed protection to the defendant, or, to ſpeak more properly, a defence againſt this indictment. This doctrine not being ſatisfactory to the gentleman, he brought the buſineſs before the court of King's Bench; and that court were unanimouſly of opinion, that the court had done right at the trial of the cauſe to reject all evidence upon the ground of theſe acts of expulſion; that the acts themſelves, being within the juriſdiction of the college, were ſufficient for the defendant to avail himſelf of; and that it was not competent to the proſecutor of that indictment to ſhew to the court that theſe were not regularly or orderly done, or that they were invalid in any reſpect whatſoever. My lords, in that caſe the general doctrine was recognized, that in all courts of competent jurſdiction their acts, however wrong they are, yet while they remain in force, are concluſive upon every other court: the caſes of eccleſiaſtical ſentences, and many others, were then mentioned.

I might refer your lordſhips memory to the caſes in Exchequer ſeizures, where condemnations are given conſtantly without a defence almoſt, and yet all other courts are concluded by them. It has been thought ſo extremely hard a doctrine, that judges have wiſhed for the liberty of examining into the fact, and to have the matter fully diſcuſſed in the courts; yet when the matter came to be fully argued, the reſult has ever been, that the judgment has been found concluſive upon all other courts whatever.

My lords, under theſe authorities for a ſucceſſion of ages, I confidently reſt that your lordſhips will, in the preſent cauſe, conceive the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court now produced, in a caſe clearly within their juriſdiction, in a caſe in which they have the ſole juriſdiction, to be concluſive; no courts whatever have a direct cognizance of marriage but the Eccleſiaſtical Court. Suppoſe a perſon without any grounds whatever claims a marriage; it may be highly injurious to the lady; ſhe has no remedy but by reſorting to an eccleſiaſtical court, becauſe there is no other court that can bring the matter immediately and directly in queſtion: if a woman ſeparate from her lawful huſband, what court is there to compel her to cohabit with him but the cenſure of the Eccleſiaſtical Court? It is that forum which the conſtitution of this country has intruſted with the deciſion of the legality of marriages.

As there are not to be found, in common-law or eccleſiaſtical courts, any deciſion contrary to thoſe I have, with great deference, already ſubmitted to your lordſhips conſideration, I truſt your lordſhips will give that determination upon the validity and effect of this ſentence, which courts of law have ever done, when a ſentence of the ſame kind has been a matter of diſcuſſion.

Mr. Mansfield.

My lords,

I am alſo to trouble your lordſhips in ſupport of that ſentence, which has been offered to you as concluſive upon the preſent occaſion. The ſentence having been read to your lordſhips, you are now apprized of the contents of it. The proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, of which the noble lady at the bar hopes to avail herſelf, begin, as your lordſhips have heard, by a complaint on her part, that Mr. Hervey did, before that ſuit was commenced, improperly and without ground lay claim to her as his wife; in other words, in the language uſed in that court, that he did jactitate that the lady was his wife. The ſuit being thus begun, the next proceeding in it is in the common way, where a perſon thus called upon means to inſiſt upon a marriage. The defendant in the ſuit admits that he did claim the lady as his wife, and contends that he had a right to do ſo, becauſe he was lawfully married to her. Such being his allegation, her ladyſhip's anſwer to it is, that there is no foundation for his claim; that ſhe is not, that ſhe never was his wife; and ſhe ſtates in the allegations made by her, which your lordſhips have heard, a great variety of particulars during a very long period of her life, in which in the moſt public manner, and upon the moſt important occaſions, ſhe was univerſally reputed, received, and acted as a ſingle woman. After this allegation of hers, the next proceeding was to examine a great variety of witneſſes, upon the reſult of whoſe teſtimony follows that which is the important part of the buſineſs, that is, the ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical judge; which ſentence pronounces in the ſame way in this as in all other ſuits, where two parties litigate a marriage claimed on one ſide and denied on the other—that theſe two parties were free from any matrimonial contract. If that ſentence is to have the force which, as it is apprehended by thoſe who ſit on this ſide of the bar, by law it muſt have, it will of courſe follow, that this indictment muſt fall to the ground; becauſe the ſole foundation of the criminal charge is the ſuppoſed marriage with Mr. Hervey, which this ſentence, if concluſive, muſt unanſwerably prove never to have exiſted. It muſt, we ſubmit to your lordſhips, follow as a conſequence, that this is the proper place and point of time to ſtop: it would be to no purpoſe for your lordſhips to ſit here to hear a long ſtory, the object of which, when the ſentence was concluſive, would only be to give pain to one whoſe ſufferings no one would wiſh to encreaſe, and at laſt, after it had been heard, no poſſible good effect could follow from it. As evidence ought not to be heard, if this ſentence is concluſive, becauſe it would be hearing that which could have no intention, no weight, no conſequence; ſo it would be nugatory to ſtate it, and every body would wiſh to decline the hearing it for the reaſons to which I alluded; and I am perſuaded, not only for the ſake of the noble lady at the bar, but for the ſake of preſerving that which every one will always think of great importance, that is, uniformity in legal deciſions and judicatures, that this ſentence muſt upon this occaſion, as I believe on every one has been in which any ſuch ſentence has ever been produced in a court, be deemed deciſive and unanſwerable.

My lords, that it ought to be ſo upon this occaſion, I will firſt endeavour to ſhew to your lordſhips by conſidering the nature of that act of parliament upon which the preſent proſecution is founded, and the ſtate of the law before that act of parliament was made.

My lords, the act of parliament creates no new offence; it puniſhes nothing but what was puniſhable before, a ſecond marriage while a former exiſted: taking a ſecond huſband or wife while there was a former in being, was undoubtedly an offence long before this ſtatute of king James the firſt; indeed as long as the eccleſiaſtical conſtitution of this country has ſubſiſted. This act of parliament makes no other alteration in the law, but as it ſubjects perſons committing this offence to temporal proſecution and puniſhment; before this act, ſuch an offence could only be the object of eccleſiaſtical cenſure and puniſhment: but, my lords, the makers of this ſtatute never dreamt, that they were in any reſpect altering the eccleſiaſtical conſtitution of this kingdom; that they were in any inſtance invading or breaking in upon the rights of the eccleſiaſtical courts: no ſuch thing is to be found in the ſtatute; nothing is to be collected from that. Indeed, if you might collect from the preamble to the act of parliament, it will appear to every one who reads it, that it was not in the imagination of thoſe who framed this law, that a ſecond marriage could be made the object of puniſhment, where there had been a ſentence which prevented a ſuppoſed former marriage being binding upon the parties. When I ſay that, I allude to the exceptions in the act, which make no part of your lordſhips preſent conſideration. But beſides that, the preamble of the act tells your lordſhips what it was that the makers of it had in view: the preamble tells your lordſhips, that divers evil-diſpoſed perſons being married, run out of one county into another, or into places where they are not known, and there become to be married, having another huſband or wife living, to the great diſpleaſure of God and utter undoing of divers honeſt mens children and others. Now it never was ſuppoſed by the makers of this act of parliament, that the perſons deſcribed in the preamble of it would go through the form and ceremony of a trial and litigation, and obtain a deciſion in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, before ſuch ſecond marriage was to take effect, which was to be the object of this law: but it is enough that in this ſtatute there is not any thing that tends to diminiſh or break in upon the dominion of the Eccleſiaſtical Court; but that the ſtatute left thoſe courts and the law relating to them juſt in the ſame ſituation as they were before. Now if this was an offence before the act, how was it puniſhable? What would have been the operation of ſuch a ſentence before this law? Unqueſtionably, a perſon taking a ſecond huſband or wife, the firſt being living, might have been made the ſubject of puniſhment in the eccleſiaſtical courts. Let me ſuppoſe a proſecution commenced for that purpoſe by the ſecond huſband or wife, the firſt huſband or wife being living: thoſe who ſtand near me, who are much better acquainted with the proceedings of the Eccleſiaſtical Court than myſelf, will tell your lordſhips, that, ſo long as this ſentence remains, the relation of huſband and wife could not exiſt, which alone muſt be the foundation of a proſecution; for taking a ſecond huſband upon this ſtatute, the act upon which the whole proceeding is founded, having made no alteration in the caſe, the law remains the ſame. It does not follow from thence, nor are your lordſhips to ſuppoſe it, that ſuch a ſentence as this would in the Eccleſiaſtical Court have made adultery lawful, or have made a marriage with a ſecond huſband or wife a good one: certainly not; but while the ſentence ſubſiſted, it would have proved, that there was no firſt marriage at any time by any parties intereſted. Such a ſentence as this may be undone; it is a fundamental rule in all matrimonial cauſes in the eccleſiaſtical courts, that, in their language, ſententia contra matrimonium non tranſibit in rem judicatam. The iſſue or the kindred of perſons intitled to eſtates may have a variety of reaſons for impeaching marriages. As to the continuing in a ſecond marriage, the continuing in adultery, the repeating it is only an increaſe and aggravation of ſin where the firſt marriage ought to have prevented it. At any time there may be a ſuit to reſtore and ſet up a firſt marriage, which has been undone by a ſentence by accident, by miſtake, by collusion, or from any other reaſon not ſatisfactory. If all the evidence that could have been had reſpecting the marriage has not been laid before the ſpiritual judge, any party who has any intereſt may at any time again apply to that court, again inſtitute a ſuit, offer new evidence, have that which has been already heard, heard again, that the marriage, if it did really exiſt, may be eſtabliſhed by a ſentence of that court: this is I believe clear law, and undoubted in that judicature. If it is, then your lordſhips are not to conclude, that by any ſanction which you give this ſentence, you either authorize adultery, or give effect to ſecond marriages while firſt marriages ſubſiſt; no, at any time that firſt marriage may be eſtabliſhed notwithſtanding a ſentence againſt it, when any perſon ſhall think fit in a legal way in ſuch judicatures to impeach that ſentence: but all that is contended for is, that while that ſentence remains, the matter is concluded; the marriage cannot be proved to exiſt; the relation of huſband and wife is deſtroyed.

My lords, if this which I have now ſubmitted to your lordſhips be, as I apprehend it is, well founded in the known practice and law of theſe courts, the conſequence I truſt will be, that this ſentence muſt now have the effect under a proſecution upon the preſent act of parliament, as it would have had in a proſecution in the Eccleſiaſtical Court for an adultery, or a crime againſt the firſt marriage. In that judicature, the only one which by the laws of this country has a regular juriſdiction to enquire into marriages, by a ſolemn judgment theſe two parties are declared not to be married; that would have been an anſwer to any proſecution before the ſtatute. The ſtatute leaves the power of the eccleſiaſtical courts exactly as it was before; leaving it ſo, a ſentence pronounced by that court in a cauſe, in which it has clear juriſdiction, muſt I apprehend be deciſive. But, my lords, it is undoubted. Various caſes, which I ſhall not trouble your lordſhips with the repetition of, have been mentioned, which prove that to no purpoſe can this noble lady at the bar and Mr. Hervey be conſidered as man and wife, or proved to be man and wife while this ſentence ſubſiſts. No conjugal duties can be exacted from one to the other; was a wife ſtarving in the ſtreets, ſhe could not in any way oblige him to contribute to her ſupport. Whilſt ſuch a ſentence remains, the woman cannot be a wife for any beneficial purpoſe reſulting from matrimony: and it will be, I believe, difficult to point out one for which ſhe can be a wife, unleſs it be for the ſingle purpoſe of ſubjecting her to be puniſhed as a felon for marrying a ſecond huſband. I can hardly believe that any human creature can be found, who would wiſh that the noble lady at your bar ſhould for this purpoſe alone, and in this ſingle inſtance, be deemed a wife, when ſhe can be in no other. But if there be any who wiſh it, I am ſatisfied your lordſhips wiſhes will go along with the law as I underſtand it to be, if the law be ſo: and that it will be very difficult to convince your lordſhips, that ſhe, who was not a wife for any other purpoſe, ſhould be deemed a wife in order to be ſubjected to criminal puniſhment for an open, an avowed, and by her thought an honourable marriage with a noble duke.

My lords, in every inſtance in which an iſſue in the temporal courts, in the courts of common law, is joined upon matrimony, where a marriage is inſiſted upon on one ſide and denied on the other; in every inſtance of that ſort we know the temporal courts decide not; they ſend to the ſpiritual courts to have the matter enquired into and decided upon; nothing is more clear than that rule of law. So it is in caſes of dower; where dower is claimed by a widow, where it is denied that ſhe was ever lawfully married to her huſband, the temporal court ſays, it has no power to enquire into the matter, it muſt refer it to the Spiritual Court; and the deciſion of the biſhop is final upon the point. It is not only in the caſe of marriage, but in other caſes, that the deciſion of the Eccleſiaſtical Court is the only competent one, and is final and concluſive to all purpoſes: ſo it is upon queſtions of legitimacy, where baſtardy is alledged and denied; the common-law courts decide not the point; they ſend it to the Eccleſiaſtical Court: ſo it is with regard to the probate of wills; and no caſe can be ſtronger than that which was mentioned to your lordſhips, where even upon a criminal accuſation, a charge of forgery, an accuſation reſembling the preſent, a deciſion of the Eccleſiaſtical Court in favour of a will was held to be concluſive evidence upon an indictment for forgery, and that no proof could be received of the fact of forgery in oppoſition to ſuch a ſentence. It is not only ſo in theſe inſtances of the Eccleſiaſtical Court; there are others with regard to captures; the deciſions of the courts of Admiralty are in like manner concluſive: ſo the court of Exchequer, upon diſputes concerning the revenue: there are many other inſtances which might be pointed out to your lordſhips, in which, after the ſentences of courts having competent juriſdiction, all other courts are ſhut out from enquiry into the matter, however it might appear that ſuch ſentences are not founded in truth. This rule is ſo clear and ſo well known, that I will trouble your lordſhips with no particular caſes or inſtances in which any ſuch matter is determined: but there are ſome that have been already mentioned to your lordſhips, and one other which I ſhall add, to which I ſhall beg your lordſhips attention on account of another view, which it is neceſſary for him, who would contend for the full force of this ſentence, to ſee this ſubject in.

My lords, it may be ſaid, ſomething of that has been hinted already; much we know has been talked out of doors, not all I believe warranted by the fact; but of that now we are not to judge or enquire: but it may be ſaid, in anſwer to theſe arguments giving the utmoſt force to ſuch ſentences, let them be final and concluſive as they may, yet if a ſentence can be ſhewn to be the effect of agreement and colluſion, that it ſhall not be final, that it ſhall not have a binding force. If thoſe, who are to argue againſt the effect of this ſentence in the extent in which it is now endeavoured to be urged, ſhould be at liberty to ſay, that they would attempt to ſhew that this ſentence now in queſtion before your lordſhips was the effect of what is called in the common-law courts, covin, or colluſion; if there was any ground, as I do moſt firmly believe there is not, to impute this ſentence to any ſuch original; yet before your lordſhips I truſt it will appear, that this is not the place in which any ſuch colluſion ought to be enquired into. Thoſe courts, which the conſtitution has truſted with the inveſtigation and deciſion of matters relating to marriage, are fully equal to the deciſion of any ſuch colluſion; they may undo their ſentences where they appear to be colluſive: and it is not to be preſumed that any colluſive ſentences would be encouraged in thoſe courts. Indeed there is one ſtrong and cogent reaſon, why no ſuch colluſive ſentences are to be feared in thoſe courts; becauſe, as I before obſerved to your lordſhips, a ſentence there, though concluſive while it ſtands, may at any time be attacked or impeached by thoſe who find an intereſt in ſo doing: and if it may, then it would be idle for perſons to be colluſively obtaining a ſentence, when any relations that might be affected by iſſue of a ſecond marriage, in ſhort, any perſon who has an intereſt, might overturn and deſtroy it. This at leaſt is very obvious upon the ſentence that is now urged to your lordſhips, and the effect of it with regard to the preſent proſecution, that, if it was to ſtop the preſent proſecution, the utmoſt conſequence that would follow from it would be this, that it could only prevent ſuch proſecutions having effect in caſes in which in truth the parties, who had to do in the cauſe in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and who obtained the ſentence, were ſo circumſtanced, that it would not be the intereſt of any human creature to endeavour to undo their work: and that it is not one of that ſort of marriages, ſuch a ſecond marriage, as it was the object of this temporal law, the ſtatute of James the firſt, to make the ſubject of puniſhment. It was made on account of temporal miſchiefs happening, as recited in the preamble. Although it is mentioned, and truly mentioned in that ſtatute, that ſuch ſecond marriages are to the diſhonour of God, and are undoubtedly high offences againſt religion, and the holy ceremony of marriage; yet if that had been the only evil that had been apprehended or found from ſuch ſecond marriages, it is not to be believed, but that the legiſlature of this country would have left ſuch marriages to have been conſidered, enquired into, and puniſhed in thoſe courts, in which all other offences againſt religion are very properly only cognizable and puniſhable. It was the temporal miſchief that produced that law; and your lordſhips may eaſily judge, what apprehenſions of any temporal miſchief would ariſe from ſuch weight being given to this ſentence, as is contended for from proſecutions being ſtopped by ſuch ſentences, when it is clear that ſentence cannot do miſchief to any human creature, who does not chuſe to ſit down and acquieſce under it; for the remoteſt iſſue, at the greateſt diſtance, that can be hurt, may commence a ſuit in the Spiritual Court, and may therefore get rid of this ſentence. Give it therefore its utmoſt force, let it weigh as much as is deſired in the ſcale in favour of this lady, it would only go to prevent a proſecution, where the marriage undone was of ſuch a ſort, that no human creature would have an intereſt to ſupport it. This I obſerve to your lordſhips, ſuppoſing that it may be urged againſt this ſentence, that it will be attempted to be proved to be produced by agreement and colluſion.

My lords, there are caſes, one of which has been already mentioned to your lordſhips, that in terms prove that that colluſion is not the ſubject of temporal enquiry, that it ought to be confined to the ſpiritual courts. There are other caſes, which ſeem to me in effect to prove the ſame thing.

The caſe of Kenn has already been mentioned to your lordſhips: in that caſe it was an attempt by the iſſue of that marriage, where there had been a divorce between the parents of that iſſue, to eſtabliſh the marriage. In the divorce the ſentence had proceeded upon the parties not having been of marriageable age, that is, the man of fourteen, the woman of twelve; that they had never cohabited together, or conſented to the marriage after they had attained to marriageable years, to the years of conſent, as they are called. But who is it attempts to undo that marriage?—The child who was born of thoſe parents, cohabiting together long after they had attained the age of conſent. And yet that iſſue was not heard: no, the ſentence was held to be concluſive; a ſentence proceeding clearly upon a ground which muſt be falſe; ſtating that the parties were not of the age of conſent; ſtating that they had never conſented after they had attained that age; when it was an undoubted fact, indeed the exiſtence of that iſſue which litigated it proved, that they muſt have conſented to the marriage after the age of conſent.

The next caſe that I would ſuggeſt to your lordſhips is one that has not been mentioned, but which appears to me to be extremely ſtrong to the preſent purpoſe. It is the caſe of Morris and Webber, in Moore's Reports, 225. The caſe, in ſhort, was this: two perſons, one of the name of Berry and the other of Wilmot Gifford, had been married; they had been married ſome years; they had no offspring; a ſuit was commenced in the Spiritual Court for a divorce; a ſentence was pronounced, which in the words of the book are propter vitium perpetuum et impotentiam generationis in the huſband. The ſentence having ſo proceeded, not long afterwards both theſe parties married again, and each by the ſecond marriage had ſeveral children: ſome years afterwards a cauſe aroſe, in which it became a queſtion, whether the iſſue by the ſecond marriage of the huſband thus divorced could be legitimate? It was contended, that thoſe ſubſequent children by that huſband had proved, and irrefragably proved, that the foundation of the divorce was falſe; that there could not be that vitium perpetuum which was made the ground of the divorce. The common-law court, before whom this queſtion came, clearly held, that that was neceſſarily proved by the ſubſequent children which that huſband had had; but ſtill clear as it was, that this ſentence was founded in an apparent falſhood, yet it muſt ſtand: it is the ſentence of that court to which the conſtitution of the country has entruſted the deciſion of ſuch matters; it is not for our courts to enquire into it; we ſhould uſurp a juriſdiction which does not belong to us; and upon that ground it was determined, that till that ſentence of divorce was undone in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, it muſt be binding and concluſive, and the iſſue of the ſecond marriage muſt be deemed legitimate.

My lords, no caſes can well be imagined ſtronger than theſe to ſhew, that even ſentences founded in agreement, founded on what may be called colluſion of the parties, are yet binding, till they are reſcinded in that court to which alone the law of England has intruſted and confined the conſideration of ſuch matters.

Another caſe, which has already been mentioned to your lordſhips, is the caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield, which ſeems to me alſo to decide this point, and to decide in terms. The caſe has been already fully ſtated to your lordſhips; I need therefore only point out one or two particulars of it. There was a diſpute between the heir of one Hatfield and a woman, who claimed to be the widow of the father of that heir. He inſiſted upon it, that ſhe was not the wife of Hatfield his father, becauſe ſhe had been married to one Porter. The marriage with Porter was proved. Porter, who was a party to the ſuit in the court of equity, admitted it upon his oath. A releaſe was obtained by the heir from that Porter. In order to get rid of this releaſe, and though the fact of marriage was proved in the cleareſt terms, the woman commenced a ſuit for jactitation of marriage againſt Porter in the Spiritual Court. A ſentence upon his not appearing was pronounced in that court againſt him, and that was held in the houſe of lords to be concluſive. Thoſe who went before your lordſhips, then ſitting in judicature, ſaid, this was a ſentence by a court which had the alone juriſdiction of the matter, and, while it ſtood, it muſt decide. The books that take notice of this caſe expreſsly ſay, that the ſentence was conſidered—indeed, after the caſe ſtated to your lordſhips it could not but be ſo conſidered,--as colluſive, I think is one of the words to be found in the books; and yet though appearing to be a feigned and colluſive ſentence, the anſwer was, that colluſion is to be judged of alone in the court where the original matter ariſes, which has alone juriſdiction upon the ſubject; no other court can conſider it.

My lords, I am aware that it may be ſaid in anſwer to this caſe, that this was in a court of equity, which had no juriſdiction to enquire into queſtions concerning marriage in the Eccleſiaſtical Court. My lords, that is no anſwer; for wherever a ſentence founded in agreement between parties is uſed to the prejudice of a third perſon, in whatever court it is, unleſs the ſubject be of ſuch a nature that it is excluſively confined to the particular court in which it ariſes, wherever ſuch a ſentence is attempted to be uſed againſt a third perſon, that third perſon may avail himſelf of the colluſion upon which it is founded: for how is it, that in all common caſes, where queſtions ariſe about colluſive ſentences, that the party againſt whom they are uſed gets rid of them? In order to do that, no proceeding is requiſite in the court in which the ſentence is: no; the perſon againſt whom it is urged ſays, However that ſentence may be between you two, who are parties to it, however it may bind you, it is founded in agreement between you two, and it is nothing to me; as againſt me it is void. Thus in the common caſe of executors, a creditor has a right to be paid out of the effects left by a dead perſon, who is debtor: the executor intending to cheat the creditor by an agreement with another perſon, who is no real creditor, prevails upon him to commence a ſuit, and ſuffers judgment to paſs at the inſtance of ſuch a friend; by which he is made the original creditor, and the executor, as repreſentative, debtor to the perſon ſo ſuing by agreement. The real creditor cannot purſue any ſteps to undo the judgment: no; he ſays, by way of anſwer, That judgment is void againſt me; you two perſons agreeing and colluding together ſhall not turn the forms of law to my prejudice: and as this may be done in one caſe, why not in every other, where a judgment or a ſentence founded upon colluſion is uſed againſt a third perſon, who has no way to anſwer it but by ſaying at once, It is void againſt me, however it may ſtand good between you?

This, my lords, is the way in which all judgments by colluſion or by covin, in my knowledge, are anſwered and got rid of. But in the caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield, which I laſt alluded to, it is anſwered, that the court of equity, and the houſe of lords judging as a court of equity, had no authority to enquire at all into a matter depending in the Eccleſiaſtical Court relating to marriage, becauſe that court hath an excluſive juriſdiction upon the ſubject; and yet in that caſe and in this there could be no reaſon, I ſubmit to your lordſhips, why, if an agreement of the parties could be a ground for impeaching a judgment, it might not be as well done in that judicature as in this?

My lords, when I am ſpeaking of any arguments that one may ſuppoſe to be urged from an attempt to prove colluſion, there are differences between any ſuch judgments as are got rid of by a third perſon, becauſe prejudicial to him, and founded upon an agreement between two parties to a ſuit with which he has nothing to do: is that the preſent caſe? No third perſon, that has an intereſt, attempts now to ſet aſide this judgment: the object here is to annul the judgment as between the parties to that ſuit. In all the caſes that can be referred to, where queſtions ariſe upon judgments paſſing by agreement, intended to be levelled againſt a third perſon; in all ſuch caſes, as between the parties, the judgment ſtands good. The object of thoſe, who in ſuch reſpects impeach the judgment, is merely to prevent its having effect againſt thoſe who are ſtrangers to it: but here this judgment, this ſentence muſt, as between the parties, be totally undone and annihilated, or elſe it decides the queſtion; becauſe unleſs it is undone, if it ſtands good between thoſe two parties till properly impeached in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, why then they are not huſband and wife: and this conſideration materially diſtinguiſhes ſuch a judgment, ſo impeached as the preſent is, from the common caſe in which judgments are to be affected; not ſo as to be avoided between the parties, between whom they ſtand good, but as being laid aſide more properly than being avoided, ſo as not to be turned to the prejudice of a third perſon, who is not a party to them.

My lords, another diſtinction which I have before ſuggeſted to your lordſhips, which I remind your lordſhips of, as upon the preſent head of the arguments I am ſuggeſting to your lordſhips, there is this difference between all the caſes that can be brought before your lordſhips upon the head of colluſion or agreement; in all thoſe caſes, in ſuch as I have alluded to, and a hundred others might be put which fall within the ſame rule as a judgment ſet on foot by an executor to defraud an honeſt creditor; in ſuch caſes the parties have no way themſelves to commence a ſuit to ſet aſide this judgment; their mode of doing it is, when the judgment is uſed againſt them, anſwering, Whatever the judgment may be as between you two, as to me it is void: but there is no regular proceſs of law, no ſuit to be commenced, by which any ſuch judgment can be ſet aſide by a third perſon; there is no ſuit. If it could be done at all, it muſt be done in a manner which furniſhes argument in ſupport of the preſent ſentence, becauſe it could only be done by an application to that court in which ſuch a judgment is given. Another court may ſay, where it is attempted to be uſed, that if it be proved to be founded in agreement by thoſe who are parties to it, it ſhall not be turned againſt a third perſon; but no other court but that in which the judgment is given can ſet it aſide and annul it.

My lords, theſe diſtinctions clearly appear, as I ſubmit to your lordſhips, in ſuch caſes where ſuch judgments are attempted to be got rid of by third perſons as detrimental to their intereſts: but I believe I can produce to your lordſhips a legiſlative inſtance, that a colluſive judgment in the Spiritual Court cannot be ſet aſide after once given; that it is final and concluſive. I have already mentioned it to your lordſhips as one of thoſe points ariſing in courts of juſtice, upon which all conſideration is confined to the eccleſiaſtical courts: none is more important than a queſtion concerning baſtardy or legitimacy. The way, your lordſhips know, in which that queſtion is ſent to be tried by the Eccleſiaſtical Court, is this: in actions of various ſorts, where a perſon claims a title by deſcent, the legitimacy of his birth becomes material. If the party againſt whom he claims ſays that he is a baſtard, and upon that an iſſue is joined, the common-law courts in which the queſtion ariſes ſend the matter to the Eccleſiaſtical Court to be enquired of and decided. In anſwer to a writ for that purpoſe going from the common-law court the eccleſiaſtical judge makes a certificate, and he certifies that the party is a baſtard, or is legitimate: that certificate is concluſive; it is not only concluſive between the parties to the ſuit, it is concluſive to all the world; it never can be touched or moved again; that certificate once received, that record in the common-law courts is final for ever.

My lords, to prevent the miſchiefs that might ariſe from ſuch tranſactions happening by agreement, and a falſe certificate obtained by colluſion, depriving perſons of their legal rights, various forms are now requiſite by an act of parliament, which I will ſtate to your lordſhips, that originally were not ſo. Various proclamations are neceſſary in the court of Chancery, and likewiſe in the court of common law, in which ſuch queſtion ariſes, in order to give univerſal notice to all perſons who may by poſſibility be intereſted, that ſuch a queſtion is to be ſent to the Eccleſiaſtical Court: but before that act of parliament no ſuch proclamations were neceſſary. The act of parliament will ſhew your lordſhips what then was the effect of a colluſive ſentence in the Spiritual Court upon the ſubject of baſtardy; and the ſentence of that court was concluſive, and could not be touched by any temporal judicature.

My lords, the act of parliament was made in the 9th of king Henry the VIth, chapter the 11th: the title of the act is, ‘ proclamations before a ‘ writ be awarded to a biſhop to certify baſtardy.’

My lords, the preamble of the act before it comes to the enacting part is very long. I need not read the whole of it to your lordſhips: it is in ſubſtance this: ‘ that ſeveral perſons, who are named as petitioning in the law, who claim, ſome as ſiſters, and others as claiming under ſiſters, to be heirs of Edmond earl of Kent, were apprehenſive of the effect of a colluſive certificate that would be obtained by Eleanor the wife of James lord Audley, who pretended herſelf to be the daughter of that Edmond earl of Kent; and the meaning of the act was to prevent the effect of ſuch a colluſive certificate, which was apprehended would be obtained by this Eleanor wife of James lord Audley; and ſtating that there was no foundation for any ſuch pretence; that ſhe was not the daughter of the ſaid Edmond. The act goes on to ſay; ‘ nevertheleſs the ſaid Eleanor, the wife of James, upon great ſubtilty, proceſs imagined, privy labour, and other means and coloured ways, to the intent that ſhe ought to be certified mulier by ſome ordinary, in caſe that baſtardy ſhould be alledged in her perſon, hath brought, as it is ſaid, in examination before certain judges in the Spiritual Court, knowing nothing of theſe contrivances, certain ſuborned proofs and perſons of her aſſent and covin, depoſing for her, that ſhe was begotten within marriage had and ſolemnized between the ſaid Edmond and Conſtance, late wife of Thomas lord Deſpenſer; ſo that it is very likely that the ſame ordinary would certify the ſaid Eleanor the wife of James mulier; which certificate ſo had and made ought, by the law of England, to diſherit the ſaid ducheſs, duke of York, earl of Saliſbury, earl of Weſtmorland, John earl of Typtoff, Alice, Joyce, and Henry, and their iſſue for ever, of the whole inheritance aforeſaid.’ Thus your lordſhips ſee it is ſtated that ſuch a certificate, ſo obtained by the moſt flagrant covin and colluſion, which is ſtated here in this preamble of the act, is ſaid to have ſuch effect, that it ought by the law of England to diſinherit the heirs and their iſſue for ever, though a certificate moſt palpably obtained upon the groſſeſt fraud and colluſion. Then it goes on to provide, ‘ whereupon the premiſes tenderly conſidered, and to eſchew ſuch ſubtle diſheriſons, as well in the ſaid caſe as in other caſes like in time to come, by the advice and aſſent of the lords, and at the requeſt of the ſaid commons, it is ordained, that if Eleanor the wife of James be certified mulier, that no manner of certificate ſhall in anywiſe put to prejudice, bind, endamage, or conclude any perſon, but him or his heirs that was a party to the plea.’ Thus it provides a remedy in that particular caſe. Then it goes on to enact, that in future all proceedings of this ſort ſhall be attended with different proclamations that are ordered by that act, that it may in future be known when ſuch certificate will be applied for to the ſpiritual courts, and that all parties intereſted may have notice to make their objections. Now, my lords, what will be ſaid of the effect, the weight, the authority of eccleſiaſtical ſentences in this part of the law after the act of parliament? Does it not appear by this law, that the certificate, in other words the deciſion, of the Eccleſiaſtical Court in a caſe of baſtardy, even though founded upon colluſion, was deciſive, when once it was formally received from the eccleſiaſtical judge? And if it was ſo, will it be at all a ſtretch of the authority of that judicature now to ſay, that a ſentence in a cauſe of marriage, which is as peculiarly to be confined to their juriſdiction, ought to have the ſame force? And if it is not to have the ſame force, will it not be breaking in upon or evading that juriſdiction, in a way which your lordſhips predeceſſors have never done, if you ſhould now ſuffer this ſentence in another place to be impeached and overturned?

My lords, your lordſhips will remark, that in thoſe caſes which your lordſhips have been referred to, there is one, the caſe of forgery, which is the caſe of Farr, that is more exactly like the preſent, and where a deciſion of the Spiritual Court upon a will is held to be deciſive againſt the cleareſt proof of forgery. But with reſpect to the other caſes, your lordſhips will obſerve, that they are all civil caſes: and if this deference and reſpect is to be paid to ſentences by the eccleſiaſtical judicature in civil cauſes, I am ſure I need not obſerve to your lordſhips that in criminal cauſes, where the noble lady at your lordſhips bar is to be entitled to every indulgence, to every favour, theſe deciſions do from that conſideration acquire double force.

My lords, it may be ſaid, what did this act of parliament of James the firſt mean? That when there had been ſuch a ſentence as this, though thoſe who were parties to it knew that they were in truth man and wife, that after ſuch a ſentence either of the parties, ſo knowing that they were man and wife, ſhould be at liberty to marry again without incurring the penalties of this ſtatute? In anſwer to that it may be replied, that whilſt this ſentence ſtands, if there be any weight in the arguments urged in ſupport of it, it is not to be preſumed that it was ſo, or could be ſo, known to the parties; becauſe that was to impeach the ſentence. But another anſwer occurs from the act itſelf; for the act did not mean in all caſes to puniſh a ſecond marriage, where the former huſband and wife were found to be living; becauſe there is an exception in the act, an exception which permits, I mean ſo as not to make it puniſhable, permits a marriage with a ſecond huſband or wife, even though the former be living, and be known to be living. Let but the ſea be placed between the huſband and wife for ſeven years, though they know each other to be living, the law takes not place; they are not the ſubjects of puniſhment: that I take to be extremely clear. The circumſtance of knowledge does not neceſſarily import, that a perſon marrying a ſecond huſband or wife muſt be ſubject to the penalties of this law on account of that knowledge of the firſt huſband or wiſe being living. As to the immorality of the caſe, as to the effect againſt religion, againſt the eternal ſacred obligation of marriage, it remains exactly the ſame, whether the huſband is on this ſide the channel or the other. But the law has ſaid in that caſe, though the ceremony of marriage would be thus offended againſt, though the obligation would be ſo far violated, that a huſband or wife, knowing that the other huſband or wife were living, ſhould take a ſecond; yet that knowledge is not ſufficient within the act in that inſtance to ſubject the party to puniſhment. It is not therefore in every caſe that the taking a ſecond huſband or wife, even with knowledge that there is a former ſubſiſting, will ſubject a party to puniſhment: that the act ſays. It is not a part of the preſent queſtion before your lordſhips. To ſuppoſe that after this ſentence, the noble lady at your bar could be ſo well acquainted with the eccleſiaſtical law, as to know that this ſentence would not be binding; that is too abſurd to ſuppoſe. If a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court is to have that weight, which it has had from the earlieſt times; if the ſame rule is to take place in criminal courts of judicature, and in favour of the criminal, which has been again and again eſtabliſhed in civil cauſes; then this ſentence is concluſive; there will be an end of the preſent proſecution. And your lordſhips will not forget what I did before take the liberty to ſuggeſt to your lordſhips, that giving the utmoſt ſanction to this ſentence, you never baſtardize iſſue, you never diſturb families, you never deprive individuals of their right; becauſe every human creature, who is at all intereſted to diſpute a ſentence againſt a marriage, who wiſhes to ſet up or ſupport it, may at any time apply to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and there have the marriage ſet up again and eſtabliſhed. No cauſe therefore can ever paſs, in which a marriage will remain undone by ſuch a ſentence, except where there is no human creature who thinks it worth their while to endeavour to ſupport it: and this temporal law may ſurely very well go uninforced while a ſentence ſtands, and on account of that ſentence, which, with the utmoſt weight and credit given to it, can produce no temporal miſchief. If it be wrong, if the parties to it in procuring it did wrong, it may at any time be undone in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and as to the offence againſt the right of marriage, againſt the religious conſtitution of the kingdom, that court may at any time effectually puniſh thoſe who have been guilty of any ſuch offence, who have improperly married a ſecond huſband or wife, who have improperly attempted to get rid of a marriage that was legally eſtabliſhed.

And therefore upon the whole I ſubmit to your lordſhips, that upon the authorities of law there is no ground to impeach or attack this ſentence; that it is final, it is concluſive, of courſe no other evidence ought to be received impeaching this marriage; that the indictment therefore muſt fall; and that as no evidence can be received, it would be idle, impertinent, and of no uſe to ſtate it.

Doctor Calvert.

My lords,

It is my duty likewiſe to treſpaſs a little upon your lordſhips patience on the ſame ſide with the gentlemen who have gone before me, though this queſtion has been by them conſidered in the wideſt extent of view that I believe it is capable of.

My lords, the motion now made by the noble lady at your lordſhips bar is this, that having that ſpecies of evidence which ſhe apprehends is concluſive in her favour, and precludes the proſecutor from going into any evidence on his part, it may be received by your lordſhips as the only matter proper to take into conſideration.

My lords, that evidence which her grace offers, is a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, pronounced in a due ſuit thereupon, in a direct line of marriage; the purport of which was, that there was no marriage ſubſiſting between the honourable Mr. Auguſtus Hervey and the noble lady at the bar, as the indictment lays there was, at the time ſhe married the late duke of Kingſton, that marriage being the ſole foundation of this accuſation; for if that fails, the marriage with the duke of Kingſton was perfectly innocent. If this is a proof, ſuch a one as your lordſhips by law ought to abide by, that there was no ſuch marriage ſubſiſting between them, to go into evidence of any ſort muſt be totally nugatory.

My lords, it is well known, that by the conſtitution of this kingdom there are different courts appointed for the litigation of different queſtions. Theſe courts are, as the conſtitution ſuppoſes, well adapted to the purpoſes, and exerciſe that juriſdiction which can take up the point originally, and determine it directly; and it is contended, that while that determination ſubſiſts, it ought to have its effect in all other places, and in all other courts where there ſhall be occaſion to make uſe of it.

My lords, this is not aſſerted only of one ſpecies of courts, I mean the eccleſiaſtical courts, but it applies, I apprehend, to ſentences of all others whatever, that when a judgment has been given by any court having original and direct juriſdiction, though that may incidentally come before another court, yet they don't go into that queſtion which has by a competent judicature been before determined.

My lords, it is true, it is impoſſible for any courts to continue to exerciſe their juriſdiction for any conſiderable time without many queſtions incidentally ariſing, which are not really and originally within their juriſdiction, many of eccleſiaſtical cognizance; and for the purpoſe of determining that cauſe, if the incidental point has not already had a deciſion in an eccleſiaſtical court, they muſt be gone into; becauſe if they were not, there would be no end of the interruption of juſtice. Many queſtions ariſe in the eccleſiaſtical courts, which are originally of common-law juriſdiction, yet the Eccleſiaſtical Court muſt go ſo far into that conſideration, as to ſee whether the pretence be true: for the purpoſe only of determining the cauſe then before that court, they could not have originally determined this queſtion. Suppoſe, for inſtance, a legatee claiming a legacy in an eccleſiaſtical court, the executor may plead a releaſe; now the validity or invalidity of that releaſe is originally cognizable by the common-law courts and no other, yet the eccleſiaſtical judge muſt ſo far take that plea into conſideration, as to ſee whether there is prima facie a releaſe or no: but it was pleaded in reply, that there had been a queſtion upon that releaſe at common law, that it had been there put in iſſue, and that there was a verdict againſt that releaſe. I apprehend, that no eccleſiaſtical judge then would think himſelf at liberty to enter into the queſtion, whether it was a good releaſe or no; but the verdict muſt be taken as true, becauſe the court, though incidentally it was obliged to take notice of it, has not a juriſdiction to determine the original queſtion.

My lords, this may be applied to the queſtion that is now before your lordſhips: marriage cauſes are peculiarly by the conſtitution given to the eccleſiaſtical courts; they alone can determine an original and direct queſtion of marriage as between the parties; and if determinations of courts, having original and direct juriſdiction, are to receive weight, and meet with credit from all other, then the determinations of eccleſiaſtical courts upon marriage ought, wherever they come in queſtion in any other court, likewiſe to be received as concluſive. The obvious reaſon of this ſtrikes me to be, becauſe though every court can determine in ſome meaſure a queſtion merely as applied to what is then before them, yet they cannot determine it generally, they cannot determine the very queſtion as applicable to other purpoſes. As for inſtance, ſuppoſe any temporal right under a marriage is to be conſidered in a common-law court, and it may be neceſſary for that purpoſe to enquire whether there be ſuch a marriage; the general queſtion, whether ſuch perſons are to all intents and purpoſes man and wife, whether they are bound by the obligations of duty ariſing from that ſtate, is certainly not to be determined but in a court of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction: and when that court has been in poſſeſſion of the original and general queſtion, and has determined it, for the common-law court to enter into it, might be in effect to alter and undo a judgment, as far as the conſideration then is before the court, which certainly that court has no juriſdiction to do. That this is to be received as a general poſition, I apprehend, is ſupportable upon this ground; upon the great incongruity of ſentences which otherwiſe muſt ariſe. Now ſuppoſe there be a ſentence in a court that has the original juriſdiction to determine marriages between man and wife; to determine upon the ſtate of thoſe perſons, whether they are in fact in that relationſhip; all determinations upon that queſtion in any other court may be directly contradictory to that ſentence, which ſtill muſt remain; for the parties will and muſt remain man and wife, or the contrary not man and wife, according as the ſentence was, if that queſtion has been directly determined in an eccleſiaſtical court; and any determination that would be given by another court, may be contrary to that obligation and that connection which the court, having a power, has determined was between them. On theſe conſiderations, therefore, I apprehend it is, that whenever a queſtion of matrimony has ariſen in any common-law court, if there has been no determination in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, the queſtion may be open; but if that queſtion has ever come directly in point before the court, having direct juriſdiction to determine it, I apprehend to this time there always has been ſuch credit given to the ſentence, that it is taken to be concluſive and be determined between the parties.

My lords, this diſtinction was made, I conceive, upon the beſt grounds, ſo long ago as that caſe alluded to by the learned gentlemen who have gone before me: I mean Kenn's caſe, reported by ſir Edward Coke; that was in the reign of king James I. In that caſe there is cited the caſe of Corbett, which was as early as Edward IV. Taking the doctrine laid down upon theſe two caſes together, the poſition there eſtabliſhed, and I truſt adhered to ever ſince, is this, that when there has been a queſtion of marriage litigated by the parties themſelves in a proper court, and the queſtion has been determined upon the marriage, the ſentence will always hold good, till it is reverſed by that court. So much was determined in the caſe of Kenn. In the caſe of Corbett it was determined, that where one of the parties is dead, and no ſuch ſentence was had between the parties while living, a perſon cannot commence proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Court relative to that marriage. The reaſon is, that then the object of ſuch a ſuit muſt be temporal conſiderations only; it muſt be to baſtardize iſſue, or it muſt be for ſome purpoſes which the Eccleſiaſtical Court has not original juriſdiction of. But the mere queſtion of marriage, of connection between man and wife, can never come into queſtion, nor ought it to be litigated after the death of the parties: therefore, the Eccleſiaſtical Court, after the death of the parties, does not entertain that ſuit, nor can it be legally commenced.

My lords, there are a variety of caſes which have been determined that have been quoted already to your lordſhips, and which I ſhould be very ſorry to take up your time in repeating; but it ſeems to me on thoſe authorities to have been eſtabliſhed, that as often as theſe ſentences have been pleaded they have been allowed, whether they were ſentences in cauſes of nullity, of marriage, or in jactitation of marriage.

My lords, if danger is to be apprehended from too much credit being given to ſuch ſentences, leſt for improper purpoſes they might be unduly obtained, there ſeems to be leſs danger in queſtions that ariſe upon marriage than in any other; for this reaſon, that there can be no determination againſt a marriage but what is open to future litigation. We all know, that in a queſtion of marriage any perſon that has an intereſt may intervene before ſentence given; and any perſon having an intereſt, though they have neglected to intervene in that cauſe, might appeal within the proper time: nay, I will go ſo far as to ſay, that if any perſon having an intereſt ſhould have ſo far neglected it as to omit availing himſelf of an intervention or appeal, yet he might ſtill come before the court, ſhew his intereſt, and be heard. A marriage cauſe goes farther ſtill; for I believe in moſt other caſes a determination would be for ever binding, at leaſt to the parties; but in theſe queſtions, I conceive it is not: for if there was to be a queſtion between a huſband and wife in a cauſe of jactitation, and, as in this cauſe, it was determined that there was no marriage; yet the party againſt whom that ſentence was obtained, I apprehend, might appear afterwards, he might produce any new proof that he did not know of at that time, or, even if he had not produced what proof he had, he might be heard upon it. The reaſon of that indulgence I take to be this: by the canon-law a marriage was held to be indiſſoluble, and for that reaſon a ſentence againſt it never could be final; ſententia contra matrimonium nunquam tranſibit in rem judicatam. The canon-law, it is well known, has been received in this country with reſpect to marriage, particularly as to that poſition of its being indiſſoluble. In moſt other queſtions, as of property, a perſon might be bound by time, bound by not making ſo good a caſe as he ſhould have done; but as a perſon cannot releaſe himſelf from the obligations of marriage by any lapſe of time, or any neglect in ſtating his caſe, the queſtion is ever open; therefore theſe caſes are certainly the leaſt dangerous, becauſe if any body appears who apprehends himſelf injured in this matter, and has an intereſt to ſhew that this judgment was not duly obtained, he may be heard; but while ſuch a ſentence remains unimpeached, I apprehend it is concluſive. The ſentence now before your lordſhips is a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation. It has been ſuppoſed upon the authorities, many of which have been cited to your lordſhips to-day, that when a ſentence determining upon this point has been offered in any court coming in incidentally, it has been conſtantly received: but, my lords, it has been received with this reſtriction, as it is laid down expreſly in Blackham's caſe, which has been already quoted, it muſt be where the marriage has been directly in iſſue; for if it be an incidental point only, it would not then be ſatisfactory. In Blackham's caſe, where the queſtion aroſe upon the grant of an adminiſtration, it was argued, that the Eccleſiaſtical Court having determined upon that adminiſtration, they had virtually determined the marriage, and therefore it was binding upon all parties: but it was ſaid, No, the queſtion muſt be originally and directly upon the marriage, or it ſhall not have effect; and the diſtinction ſeems to be exceedingly good.

My lords, in order to bring the preſent caſe therefore within this principle, it is neceſſary to ſhew, that the ſentence now under your lordſhips conſideration is a direct determination upon a marriage; becauſe if it be not, it would be liable to the objection which I have now ſtated.

My lords, the proceeding is that of a cauſe of jactitation, which is begun by a man or woman: in this cauſe it was the woman calling upon the perſon who claims to be the huſband, for having boaſted and aſſerted that lady to be his wife, to abſtain from ſuch aſſertions for the future.

My lords, here the queſtion originally ſeems to be, whether the perſon called upon had ever really claimed the lady. In that ſtage of the cauſe, if the claim had not gone as far as a juſtification, ſome of the books aſſimilate this proceeding to a cauſe of defamation, ſuppoſing it to be a caſe of words only; and when upon a marriage being pleaded to juſtify the claim, the queſtion turns upon that marriage, it may perhaps be argued, that it is not a direct caſe of marriage, but an incidental one only: it may not therefore be improper to conſider it in this caſe, leſt ſuch an obſervation ſhould be made. I take it, that when in a cauſe of jactitation the defendant gives in a plea ſtating a marriage, and that marriage is contradicted by the plaintiff, though it is intended indeed as a defence to the accuſation for which he is called upon to anſwer, that of having claimed the lady, yet the queſtion then alters its nature; the plea is not only intended to entitle the defendant to his admiſſion, but the court is then in poſſeſſion of the queſtion, whether there was a marriage between the parties, and the determination is direct upon a marriage. If the marriage be proved, there is the ſame ſentence paſſed as in a matrimonial cauſe; there is a ſentence directly pronouncing there was a marriage, the parties are pronounced to be man and wife, and they might be admoniſhed to reſtore to each other conjugal rights. If, on the contrary, the defendant ſhould fail in proof, the determination is this, that the party has failed in his juſtificatory matter; and the ſentence in this caſe goes, that the judge has found that he has failed in the proof of the marriage alledged to have been had between them, he is declared to be free from all matrimonial contracts, and injoined not to boaſt in future; it would be therefore a fallacy to argue, that this is not a direct determination of the queſtion of marriage: it is indeed ingrafted upon the original cauſe of jactitation, but that is agreeable and conſonant to practice in other inſtances.

My lords, it is not a monſtrous thing to aſſert, that a cauſe may change its nature from its original inſtitution.

[At a motion of one of the peers, part of the ſentence read.]

Doctor Calvert. Unacquainted as I am with the proceedings of this high and auguſt court, which I never had the honour to appear in before, I conceive it is my duty to take immediate notice of thoſe words which have been read, as I ſuppoſe they were called for, becauſe I ought to confine my obſervations to them before I go any farther. The lady, who is the object of that enquiry, is pronounced to be a ſpinſter as far as yet appears.

My lords, theſe words are inſerted in this ſentence, and I apprehend are in every ſentence of this nature; the purport of which, I truſt, means this, that the caſe is open to future diſquiſition upon the principles that have been already ſtated; that though the judge determines upon the evidence that is then before him, yet the parties having an intereſt to bring that queſtion on again, may be heard. As far as yet appears to us, ſays the judge, the lady is free from all matrimonial contracts; and as long as that ſentence remains, I mean to argue that it is a concluſive ſentence. I don't mean that the court is precluded from another enquiry; I have ſtated, that no parties are precluded from another enquiry; and I conceive the meaning of thoſe words are to expreſs, that according to the light which then appears to the court, the court pronounces the ſentence. But a ſentence of that ſort is not from thence to be argued to be nugatory, and that the court determines nothing: the court determines upon what it has heard; and as long as that ſentence remains, that is the way in which I meant to put it, it is deciſive and concluſive.

My lords, I have ſaid, that though the cauſe began originally upon the one party calling on the other to juſtify his claim as huſband in a cauſe of jactitation, it is nothing monſtrous to ſuppoſe it has ſo far changed its nature as to become a marriage cauſe; and I will mention other caſes in which the eccleſiaſtical courts, as is well known to the practitioners in thoſe courts, adopt and admit of a ſimilar practice. Suppoſe, for inſtance, a man was to bring a ſuit againſt his wife for the reſtitution of conjugal rights; in bar of that reſtitution, the woman may plead adultery or cruelty in the huſband, which is certainly a reaſon againſt admoniſhing her to return home to her huſband. But, my lords, this is not all that the court would do in ſuch a caſe; for ſhe having pleaded adultery, that plea becomes in fact a libel in the cauſe, and it will become a cauſe of adultery; and I have known within my memory, and ſince my attendance at the bar, inſtances of that ſort. In a caſe of Mathews and Mathews, determined in 1770, in the Conſiſtory of London, the wife pleaded adultery in bar to reſtitution; the cauſe went on in that ſuit, and there was a ſentence of divorce: would any body contend, that it was not as direct a ſentence of divorce, as if it had been ſo originally inſtituted? and in caſe either of thoſe parties had married again during that divorce, and an indictment had been preferred for polygamy, can it be contended that this ſentence of divorce would not be a defence under the proviſo in the body of the act?

My lords, another inſtance: ſuppoſe a man brings a ſuit for ſeparation by reaſon of adultery againſt his wife; the wife may recriminate, and may give in an allegation pleading adultery in the huſband. The prayer indeed on each ſide would be for a ſeparation; but there is a very conſiderable difference between a ſentence for ſeparation formed upon a crime being in the man or in the woman, whether it is at the ſuit of one or the other: but if the party that is defendant in the original ſuit ſhould go on and prove that adultery, and the plaintiff ſhould not, the defendant would be intitled not only to a diſmiſſion from the ſuit the plaintiff originally brought, but to a ſeparation upon account of the adultery pleaded by the defendant.

I mention theſe caſes to ſhew, that it is not enormous to ſuppoſe, that though the original queſtion might begin in a cauſe of jactitation, yet the marriage being pleaded, the ſentence either one way or the other is and muſt be as determinate as if the queſtion had originally been upon marriage. There is a caſe that was litigated in the Eccleſiaſtical Court not long ago, and which at the time was much talked of, and is well known; I mean the caſe of Mr. Thomas Hervey, who brought a ſuit of jactitation of marriage in the Conſiſtory Court of London againſt Mrs. Hervey. In that court a marriage was pleaded; the ſentence was againſt that marriage; the ſame was affirmed in the court of Arches; but when it was appealed to the court of Delegates, they reverſed this judgment, and pronounced for the marriage; pronounced not only that Mrs. Hervey was juſtified in her jactitation, but pronounced expreſly and directly for the marriage; and I believe nobody will doubt, but that marriage was as concluſively determined between them as if it had been originally a marriage cauſe, or a ſuit of nullity of marriage. That theſe ſentences have been held to be concluſive in the courts of common law where they have been offered, thoſe many inſtances that have been mentioned ſeem to me to put it out of all doubt.

It will not be improper to conſider what effect a ſentence of this ſort would have in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and I ſhall contend, that while a ſentence of this ſort is exiſting, a wife could not be heard to have any claim upon her huſband; ſhe could not claim the reſtitution of conjugal rights; there is no light in which ſhe would be underſtood to be the wife until the marriage be again brought into queſtion. There is a caſe in print that ſeems to me to go exactly to the point I am now contending for; it is in the caſe of Clews and Bathurſt, which has been mentioned already to your lordſhips, as reported in Strange 968. But, my lords, that caſe is reported likewiſe in another book, a book lately publiſhed, which I am told is good authority, and the caſes well and correctly taken; it is called, Caſes in the time of Lord Hardwicke, and it is to be found in page 11. There the caſe is ſtated a little more at large; and a caſe is ſaid to be quoted by Dr. Lee, of Melliſent and Melliſent in the year 1718. In that caſe a woman had claimed to be the wife of a Mr. Melliſent. Melliſent libelled her in the Eccleſiaſtical Court in a jactitation of marriage. She pleaded a marriage, but failed in the proof; and there was a ſentence, I apprehend, of the ſame ſort as in this cauſe. After the death of her huſband the woman would have made out her right to the adminiſtration, and for that purpoſe ſhe pleaded her marriage; that muſt have originally began in the inferior court, and from the nature of the ſuit, I ſuppoſe, came from the Prerogative; but however, the determination I am alluding to was in the court of Delegates: it was determined, as there remained in force a ſentence which was a bar to her, ſhe could not be heard to make out her caſe as a widow to the deceaſed. Your lordſhips very well know, that though the Prerogative is an eccleſiaſtical court, yet the juriſdiction of that court is confined merely to probates and adminiſtrations, and it does not entertain cauſes of marriage. Mrs. Melliſent there claiming as the widow of the deceaſed in that court where the ſentence of the marriage could not be ſet aſide, it was held, there being a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation, in which the marriage was pronounced againſt, ſhe could not claim as widow. In that caſe the Prerogative Court held the ſame, as we are contending your lordſhips will upon this occaſion.

There was another caſe in the Prerogative Court in the year 1771, lady Mayo againſt Brown. The queſtion aroſe upon an adminiſtration to Gertrude Brown, who died inteſtate. Adminiſtration had been granted to Stephen Brown as her huſband, he having married her in the year 1720. Afterwards that adminiſtration was called in by lady Mayo, a daughter by a former huſband; and ſhe contended that Brown had no right to that adminiſtration, inaſmuch as at the time he married Gertrude he was already the huſband of one Eleanor Cutts. In anſwer to that it was pleaded, that there had been a ſuit of jactitation of marriage brought by Brown againſt Cutts, in which the marriage was pronounced againſt, and he was pronounced to be free from all matrimonial contracts with Eleanor. In anſwer to that, another plea was given, ſtating that it was a colluſive ſuit; that they could ſhew fraud and colluſion. The admiſſion of this allegation came on to be debated before the judge of the Prerogative; and thus far the judge ſaid: There being a ſentence now in another court (this was in the Prerogative that had not juriſdiction of marriage, there being a Conſiſtory of London) by which it is pronounced that this perſon was free from matrimonial contract, this court cannot admit this allegation: and all proceedings in that court were ſtopped, that is, that allegation was not admitted, till the party, if ſhe thought proper, might go to the proper court to reverſe it. Nothing has been done in that cauſe ſince; and I conceive in all probabilityy never will: I apprehend thererefore that this ſentence, which is now under your lordſhips conſideration, muſt, as long as it remains in force, be held to be concluſive, for this reaſon; becauſe though it can be enquired into, yet it is not now even in a way of litigation; nothing has been done to repeal it, nor are there any ſteps towards it, but it remains in its full force.

My lords, the learned gentlemen who have gone before me have thought proper, in order to obviate any objections that may ariſe, to conſider what would be the caſe, ſuppoſing it ſhould be urged by the counſel on the other ſide, that the proſecutor would undertake to ſhew that this was a fraudulent ſentence, and obtained by colluſion. My lords, the reaſon of our mentioning that is, not on ſuppoſition or belief that there would come out any ſuch practices in the preſent cauſe, but that, taking it up as we do as a previous queſtion, it is our duty to conſider it even in the moſt diſadvantageous view, and to maintain, that in no caſe which they can ſuppoſe ought evidence to be received againſt the ſentence: and upon that head I apprehend that every argument which can be adduced to ſhew that the conſideration of truth or the want of truth in ſuch a ſentence ought not to be gone into by this court, may with equal propriety be applied againſt going into the queſtion of colluſion, becauſe that court which gave the ſentence is open to that enquiry, and, I apprehend, alone proper and competent to the purpoſe. How vague and unſatisfactory muſt be the enquiry of different courts proceeding upon different matter, different principles, even the terms made uſe of quite different! Should they enquire into the queſtion, whether the proceedings were fair or not, it may be productive of error. Suppoſe it ſhould be ſhewn in ſome particular that there was evidence ſupplied, how would it appear the judgment did depend upon that ground? Their entering into the proof of colluſion would be as ſtrongly exceptionable as their enquiring into the right or propriety of the ſentence, whether it was duly and rightfully pronounced by the judge, which is an exerciſe of juriſdiction which no independent court has over the ſentences or judgments of another. Your lordſhips are well acquainted, that there is no appellate juriſdiction in a criminal court over an eccleſiaſtical court; the queſtion can only be, whether that ſentence ſhall be received as final and concluſive: but the method in which it was obtained, whether it was rightly and duly pronounced, are very good queſtions for a court of appeal, which can reverſe that ſentence; but an enquiry into the method of obtaining it is improper, as long as the ſentence remains. If then a ſentence of this ſort will be held to be concluſive and ſatisfactory in all civil queſtions, and I conceive the authorities which have been quoted will be ſufficient to eſtabliſh that principle, ſurely it will much more ſtrongly apply to all criminal caſes; becauſe your lordſhips will ſee it to be the ſtrangeſt propoſition to maintain, that when a man or woman are not to be conſidered as huſband and wife to any civil purpoſe, yet they ſhall be ſo only for the purpoſe of puniſhment: this ſurely would be the greateſt abſurdity. Yet ſuppoſing the ſentence not repealed, which imports the man and woman are not huſband and wife; and ſuppoſe that be the general ſentence that ought to apply to them in every ſituation whatever, though the criminal juriſdiction ſhould go on to paſs cenſure upon the perſon accuſed (for that is all the criminal juriſdiction can do) that will not deſtroy the ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and they will remain not huſband and wife, though the criminal court ſhould puniſh one of them for what is ſuppoſed a ſecond marriage.

My lords, I ſuppoſe it will not be contended, that a determination before a criminal judicature ought to have the effect of a determination directly upon the marriage: I apprehend, that in point of law it cannot be ſuppoſed it ſhould be ſo argued. Your lordſhips will ſee the injuſtice of ſuch a proceeding then would be prodigious, becauſe then a criminal juriſdiction muſt determine upon the rights of many perſons who have not a poſſibility of being heard. Keep their queſtion in the civil court, adhere to the determination of that court that has an original juriſdiction, there all parties might have been heard, and they may in future, if they can ſet up any intereſt; but a determination in a criminal court that might apply in the moſt remote degree to determine civil cauſes, would be the moſt manifeſt injuſtice, becauſe no perſons could be heard for their intereſt.

The queſtion for your lordſhips determination, if it ſhould be ever gone into, will be upon the marriage ſaid to be had with Mr. Hervey. Any determination here that may affect that right, may affect not only the perſons that were immediately the parties to that ſuit; but your lordſhips ſee many connections ariſe upon marriage, many relationſhips and new claims that may be precluded by ſuch a ſentence as this. Suppoſe the duke of Kingſton had had children by his marriage, it would be as much their intereſt to eſtabliſh this ſentence, as it would be of intereſt of any other to impeach it; and that ſuch rights as theſe ſhould be determined in a criminal juriſdiction where the parties cannot be heard, I apprehend, is a poſition that never was yet maintained.

Upon theſe principles I hope your lordſhips will be of opinion, that the rule ought to be applied as well to queſtions that can ariſe in criminal juriſdictions as in civil ones. That criminal courts have determined upon theſe principles, there are caſes which have been alluded to, and which are, I apprehend, extremely pertinent. One is the caſe of the king againſt Vincent, Strange 481, mentioned to be an indictment for forgery in having forged a will. The reporter ſays, forgery was proved, but the defendant produced a probate under the ſeal of the ordinary; and it was held, that that was ſatisfactory proof of the validity of the will. That is a very ſtrong caſe; but that there is no right to determine upon civil matters in ſuch a way as this, or even to prejudice civil matters, is very clear in that Report.

My lords, there is another caſe reported by the ſame author ſir John Strange 703, the king againſt Rhodes, that came before the King's Bench, when ſir Robert Raymond was the chief juſtice. That was upon an indictment likewiſe upon a forgery for having forged a will. That will had been proved in the eccleſiaſtical courts. My lords, it appears by this Report, that it was not only a probate in the common form, it was when there had been a long litigation in the eccleſiaſtical courts, and when by a decree of the court of Delegates the will was pronounced for. Upon application to the King's Bench for a Habeas Corpus ad teſtificandum, the court there decreed not to iſſue the writ for this reaſon, becauſe it appeared that there was then exiſting a direct ſentence for the will; and that ſentence, if it had been pleaded in bar to going into the queſtion of forgery, I apprehend, would have been allowed to be concluſive evidence: for the court ſaid, it was not fitting to determine the property on an indictment. It likewiſe appeared, that though there had been a ſentence of the court of Delegates pronouncing for the will, that yet there had been an application for a commiſſion of review; ſo that it was within the knowledge of the court that the cauſe was in a means of having a reviſion. But it was underſtood that the ſentence ſtill remained perfectly in force; for your lordſhips know perfectly well the difference between an appeal and an application for a commiſſion of review: in caſe of an appeal, the ſentence is ſuſpended, but not ſo on an application for a commiſſion of review. By the ſtatute of Henry VIII. it is provided, that the ſentence of the Delegates ſhall be final, and no appeal ſhall be had from them; but it is now indiſputable law that the king may by his royal prerogative, upon a perſonal application, and a ſpecial caſe laid, direct a commiſſion for reviewing the ſentence: but there is no appeal; the ſentence remains the ſame, unleſs the reviewers in their judgement ſhall think proper to reverſe it. In this caſe it appears, that there was then exiſting a full and direct ſentence upon the validity of that will. It was underſtood then that this right had been pleaded by the defendant, and the chief juſtice ſtopped the proceeding, and did not even grant that motion which was then ſent. Theſe two caſes, I am told, have been recognized again in that court in a very late caſe of a man who was executed for a forgery, one Perry; and I am told the judge at that trial offered to the priſoner to put off his trial, if he had a mind to make uſe of that plea: but I am told, it was not accepted by the priſoner, and the trial went on. But this I am ſure, no uſe can be made of that caſe to ſhew, that the former determinations were at all impeached by it; becauſe at leaſt, if the probate was not inſiſted on by the defendant, conſequently not over-ruled by the court, theſe caſes then remain in their full force. And I will aſk, in what manner they may be ſaid not to be applicable to the principle we are contending for, that in a criminal court caſes of this ſort ought not to be gone into? Will it be ſaid, that this being a proſecution under a ſpecial act of parliament, the crime conſiſts in having married two perſons, that the marriage muſt neceſſarily come under the conſideration of that court which is to determine? and they cannot by the act of parliament itſelf acquire an original juriſdiction to enquire into the right of marriage. Does not it apply exactly as ſtrong to the caſe I have now alluded to of forging a will? for it is by expreſs act of parliament made a felony of death to forge a will; and it may as well be argued from hence, that every criminal court has by that act acquired an original juriſdiction as to wills. It cannot be argued a moment, that a criminal court has original juriſdiction of marriage. I do not ſay, when it has not been determined before, but that the court muſt neceſſarily enquire into the fact; but that it cannot originally entertain ſuch a queſtion. Now there cannot be a caſe ſtated wherein a queſtion was between the parties upon the validity of their marriage and upon their ſtate of man and wife, to ſhew that it can be determined by a criminal court. If it cannot, I conceive clearly, it cannot be ſaid to have original juriſdiction upon the point, the fraud and colluſion; which, for the reaſon that has been given, it was thought proper to mention, leſt it ſhould be made uſe of upon the other ſide. It will be ſaid perhaps, that there are many inſtances where parties trying to avail themſelves of a judgment, or the ſentence of another court, of the adverſe parties being allowed to ſhew that thoſe ſentences were obtained colluſively: this diſtinction I conceive has been made. If any court ever is permitted to enquire into the queſtion, it muſt be a court having concurrent juriſdiction; and then your lordſhips will ſee the queſtion upon very different grounds; becauſe a court having concurrent juriſdiction has alſo the opportunities, all the methods of enquiring into the original queſtion. They being competent to determine the original point, it makes no conſiderable difference whether it comes before them at firſt, or whether it has before been determined by another court. It will not be contended, I conceive, that a criminal court has any concurrent juriſdiction with the Eccleſiaſtical Court. It clearly cannot be ſo; it can never entertain the abſtract queſtion between parties, whether they are man and wife or no. The only way it can be taken up is incidentally; and if the authorities are good to ſhew, that where an incidental queſtion ariſes, if it has been determined by a court having original juriſdiction, it ought to be concluſive, that will apply to the caſe now before the court. For theſe reaſons, and for thoſe that have been more weightily argued by the gentlemen who have gone before me, I hope your lordſhips will not think proper to recede from the eſtabliſhed and legal principles, or make a precedent on this occaſion. But if whatever has been, was upon the ſtrength of former determinations; and if there is good ground in law to ſay that this ſentence ought to be concluſive to the point to which it is now offered; I truſt your lordſhips will be of opinion that the proſecution ought not to be permitted to go into any evidence.

Doctor Wynne.

Notwithſtanding there has been ſo much and ſo ably ſaid upon this queſtion, I hope that the duty I owe to the noble perſon at your lordſhips bar, will plead my excuſe for offering a few words upon the ſame ſide, in ſupport of the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, of the effect with a view to which it is now produced before your lordſhips.

My lords, the ducheſs of Kingſton is now upon her trial, upon an indictment found againſt her grounded on ſtatute 1 Ja. cap. 11, for that being the wife of Auguſtus John Hervey, ſhe married the duke of Kingſton, the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, her former huſband, being then alive. The foundation of this whole proceeding therefore is a marriage alledged in the indictment to have been had between the ducheſs of Kingſton, at that time Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh, and Mr. Auguſtus Hervey.

That marriage, my lords, is the only fact that can make any criminality in the preſent caſe; and if it ſhall appear to your lordſhips a fact, which has been already enquired into and decided upon; that it has been put in iſſue in that court which alone could properly take cognizance of it; that that court has pronounced its ſentence againſt the marriage then put in iſſue, or any matrimonial contract between Mr. Hervey and Mrs. Chudleigh, who were the parties to that ſuit; and that this ſentence ſtill remains in force; it is ſubmitted to your lordſhips to be impoſſible that thoſe who are proſecuting this indictment againſt her grace, can be allowed to go into an examination of witneſſes upon that marriage; it being a fact now decided by the legal ſentence of a proper court, and conſequently not the ſubject of that kind of evidence which the proſecutors are, we preſume, endeavouring to offer to your lordſhips upon it, as if it had been a queſtion upon which no ſentence had ever been given.

My lords, the ſentence, upon which we rely, was paſſed in the month of February 1769, and it recites all the proceedings had in that cauſe prior to the ſentence, and which are ſufficient, as we apprehend, to found that effect which we contend it ought to have before your lordſhips. The ſentence recites, that a ſuit had been brought by the ducheſs of Kingſton againſt Mr. Hervey for boaſting that he was her huſband; that Mr. Hervey appeared in that cauſe; that he admitted and juſtified the jactitation; and alledged, that he was well warranted in making ſuch jactitation, for that he was actually married to the lady: by that means they were at iſſue upon the fact. The ſentence goes on to ſay, that he had entirely failed in the proof of the marriage which he had pleaded and propounded; in conſequence of which the court pronounces Mrs. Chudleigh to be entirely free from all matrimonial contract, and particularly with the ſaid Mr. Hervey, ſo far as to us as yet appears; and upon that goes on to admoniſh him to ceaſe from farther jactitating in that behalf. The queſtion now for your lordſhips conſideration therefore is, what is the effect of that ſentence? And I contend, that in the way in which this cauſe was proceeded in, it is as deciſive, as abſolute a ſentence againſt the marriage, as the Eccleſiaſtical Court has power to give.

If the party who is accuſed in ſuch a ſuit does not juſtify the jactitation by pleading a marriage, it is otherwiſe; for in that caſe, whether the fact of jactitation is admitted or denied, the ſentence is only upon the jactitation, not upon the marriage. If the jactitation is admitted, and is not juſtified, the party is admoniſhed to do ſo no more: if the jactitation is denied, the only queſtion before the court is, did the party jactitate or not? and if the jactitation is proved, the ſentence is the ſame, viz. a monition to ceaſe from doing ſo for the future. But if the party cited confeſſes the jactitation, and juſtifies it by pleading that he or ſhe was and is actually and lawfully married to the other party who has brought the ſuit, it is no longer a cauſe of jactitation, it is as much and as directly a marriage cauſe as a cauſe of nullity of marriage, or a cauſe for reſtitution of conjugal rights. It is as abſolute and deciſive proof of this, in my humble apprehenſion, that if the party cited in a cauſe of jactitation pleads and proves a marriage, the court does not in that caſe diſmiſs, and ſay, The party it is true jactitated, and had a ground for jactitating, therefore we diſmiſs: no, the court pronounces for the marriage. And I take it to be moſt clear, that ſuch a ſentence having been pronounced in any eccleſiaſtical court, if the party cited ſhould immediately pray reſtitution of conjugal rights, the court will grant its monition grounded upon that ſentence, that the parties who were proved to have been lawfully married, ſhould cohabit and perform the duties of their marriage. It will not I preſume be contended, that any court can deal ſo very unequal a meaſure of juſtice between parties, as to ſay, If a marriage is proved, we will pronounce for it; and yet in a cauſe of exactly the ſame nature, if a party pleads a marriage, and fails in the proof of it, we will not pronounce againſt it. The ſuppoſition is abſurd and ſhocking to common ſenſe; and it is impoſſible that ſuch a cauſe as a cauſe of jactitation could ever have been in uſe, if the party who brought it might loſe his cauſe, and be engaged in a marriage he was deſirous to avoid, but could never obtain any ſentence againſt the party jactitating, that would have any legal effect. It is impoſſible, with great deference to your lordſhips, that ſuch doctrine ſhould ever have obtained; but the truth is directly the reverſe, and in all courts where theſe ſentences againſt a marriage in a cauſe of jactitation have been produced, they have been allowed to be as deciſive as any ſentence in an eccleſiaſtical court in a marriage cauſe could be. In the caſe of Jones and Bow, reported in Carthew, it is expreſly ſaid, that it was a cauſe of jactitation. In the caſe of Claws and Bathurſt, which has been mentioned to your lordſhips, it was a cauſe of jactitation; and I rather rely upon that caſe, becauſe it appears by the report of it in the book intitled Caſes in lord Hardwicke's time, p. 11. H. l. 7. Geo. II. that it was attended by as able a civilian as any of his time, doctor Lee, afterwards dean of the Arches: he argued in that cauſe, that a ſentence againſt a marriage in a cauſe of jactitation is an abſolute and deciſive ſentence. And it appears from the Report, that he quoted another caſe, which was that of Melliſent and Melliſent; in which it had been ſo held in the court of Delegates, which your lordſhips know is a court of appeal in eccleſiaſtical cauſes, in which there are both judges of the common law and civilians. The caſe which was laſt alluded to, and which was in the Prerogative Court, your lordſhips will allow me to ſtate a little more fully, becauſe it will ſhew the opinion of the great judge who now preſides in that court. It was upon the right of adminiſtration to one Mrs. Gertrude Brown. The queſtion was between Stephen Brown, who alledged himſelf to be the huſband, and the lady viſcounteſs Mayo, the daughter of the deceaſed by a former huſband. The marriage between Brown and Mrs. Aylemore, which was the deceaſed's former name, was not denied; but lady Mayo inſiſted, that at the time of the marriage with Mrs. Aylemore, Mr. Brown had another wife at that time living, whoſe name was Eleanor Cutts. Mr. Brown to that replied, that he had brought a cauſe of jactitation in the Conſiſtory Court of London againſt Mrs. Eleanor Cutts, and that ſentence had been pronounced exactly as in the preſent caſe, and that he was free of all matrimonial contracts with ſaid Elizabeth Cutts. Lady Mayo then offered an allegation, in which ſhe pleaded, that the ſentence in ſuch cauſe of jactitation had been obtained by colluſion; and annexed to that allegation ſhe exhibited many letters between Stephen Brown and Elizabeth Cutts, by which it appeared, that after the date of the ſentence they had correſponded together; that he had acknowledged himſelf to be her huſband in ſeveral of theſe letters, but told her it would be exceedingly inconvenient to his affairs, and entirely deſtroy his claim to the adminiſtration of Mrs. Aylemore, which was of ſome conſiderable value to him, if his marriage with Mrs. Cutts was known, and therefore deſired her to be ſilent, and not give him any further trouble: that was the effect of lady Mayo's allegation. The moment that allegation was brought into court, the proctor for Brown deſired that the proctor for lady Mayo might be aſked, whether he confeſſed or denied the ſubſcription of the officer who authenticated the copy of the ſentence given in the cauſe of jactitation? which being confeſſed, and the ſentence by that means regularly proved, the judge ſaid he could go no farther; he could not enquire upon what grounds that ſentence was given, but would give a time to the party, if ſhe thought it for her intereſt to apply to the Conſiſtory Court of London, and ſee whether that ſentence could be reverſed; but it was held, that ſo long as it remained in force, it was deciſive upon the queſtion of the marriage, and abſolutely binding upon the judge of the Prerogative Court.

This being the caſe then, the queſtion for your lordſhips conſideration now is, what effect the ſentence given in the Conſiſtory Court of London in 1769, in the cauſe of jactitation of marriage brought by the ducheſs of Kingſton, then Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh, againſt Mr. Hervey, ſhould have in the preſent cauſe before your lordſhips? My lords, it would be a very unpardonable waſte of your lordſhips time, at this hour of the day, for me to take up a moment of it in arguing, that marriage is by the law and conſtitution of this country of eccleſiaſtical cognizance. There cannot be a doubt, that if there be any impediment to the marriage of two people living together as man and wife, that if one of the parties denies either the fact or validity of the marriage, that if one of the parties refuſes to perform the duties of it by cohabitation, that if one of the parties treats the other with intolerable ſeverity, that if a perſon boaſts of a marriage which he cannot juſtify, or if ſome kind of contract or ſolemnity paſſed between parties which may occaſion a doubt whether it amounts to a lawful marriage or not; in every one of theſe caſes the Eccleſiaſtical Court has cognizance to decide upon the queſtions that ariſe; and it is a denial of juſtice to refuſe it, and would be a juſt ground of appeal to a ſuperior court.

It is true, that in ſome caſes where a marriage is brought not directly, but collaterally and conſequentially in queſtion, as where it is a queſtion of legitimacy in order to make a title to an inheritance, it may originally commence in the temporal courts, and ſometimes is finally determined there; as in the caſe of what is by common law called ſpecial baſtardy, that is, where there is no doubt about the marriage, but about the priority or poſteriority of the birth of the party who is claiming the inheritance to that marriage; there, it being a mere matter of fact, whether the perſon was born before marriage or after, it is proper for the jury to determine; and there is no need of the interpoſition of the Eccleſiaſtical Court at all. So in other caſes, where the matter begins as a queſtion upon an inheritance. A perſon makes a claim to an inheritance as being the lawful ſon of A. and B. If the parties to the marriage or one of them be dead, the application muſt be made originally in this caſe to the temporal courts, and they will proceed in it, and will either determine it finally, or direct a caſe to the ordinary to certify upon the marriage, according as they find it neceſſary to do, and according as any queſtion ariſes upon the legality of the marriage or not. But even in this caſe, which is merely a queſtion upon a right to an inheritance, and not between parties to a marriage, but between parties claiming under a marriage, if one of them produces a ſentence formerly given upon the marriage by the Eccleſiaſtical Court in the life-time of the parties to ſuch marriage, the moment that ſentence is produced, the court of common law is eſtopped; and notwithſtanding the original parties to that ſentence are dead, the parties to the ſuit upon the inheritance muſt ſtill have recourſe to the Eccleſiaſtical Court to repeal the ſentence formerly given upon the marriage, before the temporal court can proceed a ſtep further: and if this ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court is not ſet aſide, the judgment of the temporal court muſt be agreeable to that ſentence. The caſes of Bunting and Leppingwell, and Kenn's caſe, reported by lord Coke, are deciſive upon this point: and it would, I ſhould conceive, in framing your opinion upon the credit due to the doctrine laid down in theſe caſes, be worth one moment's conſideration at what time the lateſt of them was determined. Kenn's caſe was in the fifth of king James the firſt. Your lordſhips know extremely well, that was a time when the different juriſdictions of the temporal and eccleſiaſtical courts were not ſo completely ſettled, or at leaſt that ſettlement was not ſo completely acquieſced in, on the part of the eccleſiaſtical courts then, as it has been ſince: they did frequently deſire to arrogate to themſelves more juriſdiction than the temporal courts were willing to allow; and the conſequence of that was, they were very frequently withſtood. This produced a complaint to the privy-council in the 3d of king James I. when archbiſhop Bancroft, in the name of the whole clergy, exhibited a ſet of articles againſt the judges of the realm (as lord Coke expreſſes it, 2d Inſt. 601.) intitled, 'certain articles of abuſes which are deſired to be reformed in granting prohibitions.' Theſe articles were delivered to the judges, who in the 4th of king James made their reply to them; in which they juſtified the proceedings objected to by the archbiſhop in every particular, and that not without ſome conſiderable degree of warmth and reſentment. Now, with great deference to your lordſhips, I ſhould conceive, that a reſolution ſolemnly and unanimouſly made by the two chief juſtices and five other judges of the common law in the very next year after ſuch a diſpute as this had been carried on between the two juriſdictions, cannot well be ſuſpected of partiality to the Eccleſiaſtical Court: and lord chief juſtice Coke, who was one of the court, was not a judge that would at any time have ſtood up for their encroachments; and therefore there is not the leaſt room to apprehend, that there was any undue or improper degree of authority attributed by that reſolution of the judges to ſentences of the eccleſiaſtical courts.

My lords, this caſe of Kenn, which is reported 7 Coke, 43, has been already opened to your lordſhips: but it being in my apprehenſion extremely material in this cauſe, containing the whole learning that is to be met with in the book upon the ſubject, and going the whole length, as I humbly ſubmit to your lordſhips it does, that it is our buſineſs to contend for in behalf of the noble perſon at the bar, your lordſhips will not perhaps think it miſpent time in me to ſtate it more particularly. It was a caſe in the court of Wards, in which Thomas Robertſon and Elizabeth his wife were plaintiffs, and Florence lady Stallenge defendant. The caſe was, that Chriſtopher Kenn de facto took to wife Elizabeth Stowell, and had iſſue by her Martha; ſoon after this, there appears to have been a ſuit brought in the court of Audience, in which the judgment given was in theſe words: prætenſum contractum et matrimonium inter Chr. Kenn et Eliz. Stowel in minore ætate eorundem aut eorum alterius habitum fuiſſe: eoſdemque Chr. et Eliz. tam tempore ſolemnizationis dicti matrimonii quam etiam continuo poſtea, eidem matrimonio diſſenſiſſe, ac eo prætextu hujuſmodi matrimonium irritum et invalidum fuiſſe: necnon antedictos Chr. Kenn et Eliz. Stowel ab dicto matrimonio ſeparandos et divorciandos fore pronunciamus, eoſque ſeparamus et divorciamus, iiſdemque Chr. et Eliz. libertatem ad alia vota convolandi concedimus per hanc ſententiam noſtram definitivam.

My lords, after this Kenn married another wife, Elizabeth Beckwith; and after this it appears that Elizabeth Beckwith brought a ſuit before the commiſſioners eccleſiaſtical to enquire again into the validity of the marriage between Chriſtopher Kenn and Elizabeth Stowell: there that marriage was again pronounced againſt, and the marriage of Chriſtopher Kenn with Elizabeth Beckwith was affirmed. Then Elizabeth Beckwith died, and Chriſtopher Kenn married Florence, by whom he had iſſue Elizabeth, and then died. At laſt the queſtion came on between the iſſue of Chriſtopher Kenn by Florence, and Martha the iſſue of ſaid Chriſtopher Kenn by his firſt wife Elizabeth Stowell, who deſired ſhe might be permitted to aver againſt the ſentence formerly given againſt the marriage between Chriſtopher Kenn and Elizabeth Stowell, declaring that ſhe could prove, that the whole was founded on an abſolute falſehood; and that thoſe parties, who are declared by the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court to have been married in their minority, and to have diſſented to the marriage in the moment it was ſolemnized, and ever after, had cohabited as huſband and wife for ten years, and haid ſſue Martha, the party before the court. This the ſaid party averred, and undertook to prove in the court of Wards, in order to avoid the effect of the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court againſt the marriage between her father and mother. But it was reſolved by all the juſtices and barons, that the ſaid ſentence ſhould conclude as long as it remained in force. And in anſwer to the averment that the ſentence was founded upon falſe facts, they ſaid, that though the eccleſiaſtical judge ſheweth the cauſe of his ſentence, yet foraſmuch as he is judge of the original matter, the loyalty of matrimony, we ſhall never examine the cauſe, whether it were true or not: for of things the cognizance whereof belongeth to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, we muſt give credit to their ſentences, as they give to the judgments in our courts. In that ſame caſe it was, that lord Coke quoted the caſe of Corbett, and there there had been no ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court: that originally began upon the queſtion of a right to an inheritance; and the party who claimed the inheritance was adviſed to bring a ſuit in the Eccleſiaſtical Court then againſt a woman who jactitated, as he ſaid, of an undue marriage with his elder brother. The party againſt whom this ſuit was brought in the Eccleſiaſtical Court applied for a prohibition, and the temporal court granted it; for they ſaid, There is no ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court in this caſe for you to reverſe, no ſentence has been given; therefore we will enquire, as far as we ſee we can do without interfering in matters of mere eccleſiaſtical cognizance, reſpecting the loyalty of the marriage; and we may direct the ordinary to certify hereafter, if there is a neceſſity for it; but there is no need to apply to the Eccleſiaſtical Court in the preſent ſtate of the caſe.

In exact conformity to this principle, it was reſolved by the judges of the common law in the caſe of Bunting and Leppingwell, 4th Coke, 29, Foraſmuch as the cognizance of the right of marriage doth belong to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and the ſame court hath given ſentence in this caſe, the judges of our law ought (although it be againſt the reaſon of our law) to give faith and credit to their proceedings and ſentences, and ſo always have the judges of our law done: and ſo it was reſolved, that the plaintiff was legitimate and no baſtard.

This is the light in which the ſentences of the eccleſiaſtical courts, given in matters properly within their cognizance, were conſidered in the courts of common law at the time when the caſes I have juſt referred to were determined; and there is ſuch a train of caſes exactly conformable to them down to very modern times, which have been already quoted, and therefore I will not trouble your lordſhips with repeating them, that I cannot help thinking it muſt be looked upon as a point abſolutely ſettled and at reſt.

But, my lords, not to reſt the matter merely upon authority, however ſtrong, if your lordſhips conſider the grounds upon which theſe determinations were made, I apprehend they will be founded, not only in juſtice, but in abſolute neceſſity; and that the confuſion would have been ſo infinitely great, if, admitting different courts to take cognizance of different matters, their ſentences ſhould not be allowed to take effect when they were given, but the matter might be examined over again, and a different ſentence given in another court, the former ſentence remaining unrepealed, that there would be no poſſibility of enduring ſuch a practice. Conſider for a moment what effect it would have. Suppoſe a man to have brought a ſuit for jactitation of marriage againſt a woman in the proper eccleſiaſtical court; that ſhe ſhould plead her marriage by way of juſtification, and obtain a ſentence for it: the man dies inteſtate after that, and ſhe applies to the Prerogative Court for an adminiſtration as the widow: the next of kin of the deceaſed appears there, and denies her to be the lawful widow; in proof of which ſhe produces the ſentence: is the Prerogative Court to give credit to this ſentence or not? If it is to give credit to it, (as it does daily) the reaſon is, becauſe it binds univerſally as long as it is in force; for, though they are both eccleſiaſtical courts, there is no more privity between the Prerogative Court and the Conſiſtory Court of any dioceſe, than between the Prerogative and the court of King's Bench. The Prerogative Court has the mere cognizance over probate and adminiſtration; and therefore if univerſal credit is not due to the ſentence of the court which pronounced for the validity of the marriage, the Prerogative Court muſt in the caſe ſuppoſed go into the queſtion over again, whether the party deceaſed and the party claiming to be his widow were married or not married. The Prerogative Court is an eccleſiaſtical court, and proceeds upon the ſame rules, ſo far as they are applicable; it proceeds in the ſame manner by allegation and by written evidence; the judge is a perſon bred in the ſame profeſſion; and the practicers are the ſame with thoſe that practiſe in the Conſiſtory Court of London; and therefore there is a probability that the Prerogative Court in this caſe might agree with the judge of the Conſiſtory in opinion that the marriage was a good one, and conſequently decree the adminiſtration to the party praying it as the widow. What would be the conſequence of that? Why, the party would have had two law-ſuits inſtead of one, and have got by them two pieces of paper called ſentences for her marriage, and letters of adminiſtration, but ſhe would not be a bit the nearer getting poſſeſſion of the deceaſed's effects. For theſe ſhe muſt apply to a court of common law; and there, according to this doctrine, the firſt perſon ſhe is obliged to bring an action againſt will be at liberty to ſay, Who are you?—The adminiſtratrix and widow.—No, I deny that: it is true, you have obtained a ſentence for your marriage and an adminiſtration from the Prerogative Court as the widow; but thoſe ſentences were founded upon falſe facts: therefore I object to them, and deſire there may be a third ſuit, to have it inquired into in this court, whether there was a real marriage or not. Now, ſuppoſing that in this third ſuit a jury ſhould be of a different opinion from the two former courts, what would be the conſequence? Why, that the party who brought a ſuit for a debt would be non-ſuited: ſo that here would be a legal adminiſtration ſubſiſting (unleſs the court in which the action was brought could repeal it and grant a new one, a power which I believe no temporal court has ever yet exerciſed) but the hands of the adminiſtrator would be abſolutely tied up, the effects could never be adminiſtered, the debts of the teſtator could never be called in, the eſtate could never be diſtributed. Your lordſhips ſee plainly that the confuſion would be ſo extreme, if this doctrine was to prevail, that no error in a ſentence, however apparent, nor any inconvenience ariſing from it to particular perſons, however great, can be a ſufficient cauſe for any court to examine into the merits of a ſentence given in a matter of which itſelf has no legal cognizance; and that there is the utmoſt wiſdom in thoſe reſolutions which declare, that there is an implicit credit due from all other courts to the ſentences of courts having the proper juriſdiction over the matter in which the ſentence has been pronounced.

My lords, the caſes that I have hitherto mentioned and alluded to have been all in civil cauſes. Will it be ſaid, that the queſtion now before your lordſhips, being in a criminal cauſe, that varies the caſe? and, that although a ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court would be binding and concluſive evidence in a civil cauſe, yet in a criminal cauſe it would not have the ſame effect? My lords, the ſame effect I can very readily agree that, according to my poor notions of law and juſtice, it would not have; but I ſhould think it would have ten times greater: and I cannot conceive it poſſible, that it can be held in any caſe, or in any country in the world, that a ſentence, which would be held to be concluſive evidence to avoid a civil demand againſt a perſon, would not be held to be concluſive evidence and defence againſt a criminal proſecution: I cannot conceive that to be poſſible. In pœnalibus cauſis benignius interpretandum eſt, is a maxim of univerſal law. Undoubtedly it is the buſineſs of all criminal judicatures to enquire ſtrictly into crimes; to puniſh thoſe acts which the law has made criminal, and which are legally proved; but courts of law do not ſtrain points in order to make crimes, and inflict puniſhments; it never was ſo contended: and I do conceive that many inſtances might be enumerated by thoſe who are converſant in the practice of the criminal law, which I am not in the leaſt, in which parties proſecuted are indulged with peculiar privileges. I believe that they are not bound by their firſt plea. If a party has been ill-adviſed in his plea, he is bound down by that in a civil cauſe; but in criminal proſecutions the priſoner may plead over and over again, and is allowed to avail himſelf of every nicety in the law to avoid conviction.

Upon theſe grounds therefore I hope it will appear to your lordſhips to be moſt clear, that the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court always has been eſteemed and muſt be allowed to be final, to be the only evidence that can be received concerning the fact upon which it has been pronounced, and that the fact is no longer the legal object of enquiry by any other court. I do apprehend this to be ſo clearly and fully eſtabliſhed, that I can ſcarce conceive that the gentlemen will deny it; but I apprehend and do expect that they will endeavour to find a diſtinction. And they will ſay, Though we ſhould admit your rule, that the ſentence of an eccleſiaſtical court is binding ſo long as it ſubſiſts in general, yet if that ſentence was obtained by colluſion and fraud, it is otherwiſe; and if it can be proved to have been ſo obtained, it will immediately loſe its effect. I expect we ſhall be ſo told; and I do admit, that to maintain our preſent point, which is, that the ſentence is concluſive evidence, we muſt ſay that it is a rule without any exception; we muſt ſay, that colluſion in obtaining the ſentence would not give your lordſhips any juriſdiction to enquire into the fact: and I do, with great ſubmiſſion, contend before your lordſhips, that no court which has not an abſolute and an entire juriſdiction over a fact, as much as the former court had, can take cognizance of a matter that has been already decided upon in that former court, upon a ſuggeſtion or even proof that colluſion was uſed in obtaining the former ſentence. I may, and I am afraid I ſhall, talk very ignorantly reſpecting thoſe caſes in which the courts of common law take cognizance of matters which have been already decided upon by other courts, upon proof that the deciſion was obtained by fraud and colluſion of the parties at that time before the court. I own I am by no means maſter of that ſubject; but I apprehend they are only in ſuch caſes where each court, ſuppoſe the court of King's Bench and Common Pleas, or any other, has an entire concurrence of juriſdiction; where there was an option in the parties to commence the ſuit originally either in one court or the other, and where the effect of the ſentence of the two courts would be perfectly equal. In ſuch a caſe, if after ſentence given in one of thoſe courts application ſhould be made to the other to rehear the matter, on proof that the former deciſion was not fairly obtained, this might be a juſt ground for the court to which proof of the fraud is offered, to ſay, We will hear the matter over again, which we had a right to have heard as well as the other court had, had it not been that the cauſe was commenced with them: but I apprehend no court can do this, the ſentence of which, when it is given, will not have the ſame legal effect to the full as the ſentence of the former court. Nor can it be ſaid that this court, high and auguſt as it is, or any other court of criminal juriſdiction, can give a ſentence upon a marriage, which will have all the effects that the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court will have. Strip the queſtion of its circumſtances, and let it be aſked ſimply, Has the houſe of lords a power to try the validity of a marriage? Every body will ſay at once, It has not. Allow me to conſider what would be the conſequence if your lordſhips were to take cognizance of this matter, and were, notwithſtanding the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, upon the ſuggeſtion of colluſion, or any other ſuggeſtion, to ſay, We are not barred by it, we will go into it; and that the party tried under ſuch circumſtances ſhould be convicted of polygamy: what would be the conſequence of that? Would it ſet aſide the ſecond marriage? I take it moſt clearly it would not. Suppoſe that after the wife had been convicted of polygamy for marrying B. in the life-time of A. her former huſband (a ſentence againſt her marriage with A. having firſt been obtained in the Eccleſiaſtical Court) ſhe ſhould by any means become entitled to a fortune, by legitimacy or otherwiſe, would not B. have a right to demand the legacy, or any other effects that came to the woman ſubſequent to the conviction? I ſubmit to your lordſhips, he certainly would. Suppoſe B. to die inteſtate, might not the wife, notwithſtanding ſuch a conviction as this, pray the adminiſtration to his effects? and if her intereſt as widow was denied, as having been the wife of A. at the time ſhe married B. and ſhe in reply to this ſhould produce the ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court againſt her marriage with A. bearing date prior to her marriage with B. the court could not refuſe to grant adminiſtration to her. Suppoſe that after the conviction the parties to the ſecond marriage ſhould continue to cohabit, and ſhould have children, would not they be entitled to the inheritance as the legitimate iſſue of the ſecond marriage? I take it, that under the authority of the caſes of Bunting and Leppingwell, Kenn, and the reſt that have been ſince determined conformably to thoſe caſes, there cannot be a doubt that they would, if a queſtion ſhould ariſe upon the right to the inheritance in a court of common law, ſo long as the eccleſiaſtical ſentence againſt the firſt marriage remained in force: in ſhort, the conviction would have no operation at all upon any civil effect of the ſecond marriage. The conſequence therefore of proceeding to convict for polygamy for a ſecond marriage, in a caſe where there had been a ſentence of the proper eccleſiaſtical court againſt the firſt, would be, that a woman who had been convicted of felony for marrying, might under that criminal act (as it would then be pronounced to be) derive to herſelf all the privileges and advantages that accrue to a wife in the fortune of her huſband by a lawful marriage, and convey a title to her iſſue to the greateſt honours and eſtate in the kingdom. Theſe are ſuch glaring contradictions and abſurdities, as I ſhould with great deference apprehend that neither your lordſhips, nor any other court of juſtice, would give occaſion to, without the utmoſt reluctance. There is a caſe or two which have not yet been mentioned, and which appear to me to be extremely material, to ſhew the extraordinary and unuſual ſteps that have been ſometimes taken by courts, and in caſes extremely ſimilar to the preſent, to avoid a contrariety of ſentences of courts having different and diſtinct juriſdiction. In the caſe of Boyle and Boyle, in the King's Bench in 1687, reported 3d Mod. 164. a libel was admitted in the Spiritual Court againſt a woman cauſa jact tationis maritagii. The woman prayed a prohibition to the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and the ſuggeſtion was, that this perſon, who now libelled againſt her in a cauſe of jactitation, had been indicted at the ſeſſions in the Old-Bailey for marrying her, he having a wife then living; that he was thereupon convicted, and had judgment to be burnt in the hand; that therefore they had no right to proceed, and therefore a prohibition was prayed. Serjeant Levinz in that caſe moved for a conſultation, becauſe no court but the Eccleſiaſtical Court can examine the marriage. Upon the contrary it was ſaid, that if a prohibition ſhould not go, then the authority of theſe two courts would interſere, which might be a thing of ill conſequence: that if the lawfulneſs of this marriage had been firſt tried in the court chriſtian, the other court at the Old-Bailey would have given credit to their ſentence, and upon this ground and this principle merely, that there might be a contrariety of ſentences, which would be miſchievous. The court went certainly a great way, for it prohibited the Eccleſiaſtical Court from proceeding in a marriage cauſe inter vivos, of which it has the cleareſt and moſt uncontroverted juriſdiction.

My lords, another caſe was that of Furſman and Furſman, which began in the Conſiſtory Court of Exeter: it was a cauſe of reſtitution of conjugal rights brought by the woman. The libel was admitted; and then there was an appeal to the court of Arches. The judge pronounced for the appeal, and was proceeding upon the merits of the cauſe; but upon the 4th of November 1727, he was ſerved with a prohibition. And the ground for obtaining this prohibition was, that Sarah Furſman, pretending to be the lawful wife of the ſaid Furſman, had indicted him for bigamy in marrying another wife, and failed in proof of her own marriage; whereupon the ſaid Furſman was acquitted; and therefore it was ſaid the Eccleſiaſtical Court ſhould not proceed. Now, my lords, if a prior judgment given by a court, in a matter in which it can have only an incidental partial juriſdiction, is a ſufficient cauſe for ſtopping all ſubſequent proceeding in the ſame caſe, even in the court which has the entire ordinary juriſdiction over the queſtion, on account of the ill conſequence that would enſue from the interference of the authority of the two courts; ſurely, by all parity of reaſoning, in a caſe where it appears that the court, which the law and conſtitution have entruſted with the entire juriſdiction over the matter in queſtion, has already taken cognizance of it and pronounced its ſentence, the court of incidental juriſdiction will give credit to ſuch ſentence, and conform its own ſentence to it.

If the ill conſequences ariſing from claſhing and contradictory judgments of different courts may be allowed to have any influence upon your lordſhips judgment in this matter, there is no need to rack the invention for circumſtances that might happen: the caſe before your lordſhips need but be plainly ſtated, to ſhew thoſe inconveniencies in the ſtrongeſt light. The ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court pronouncing and declaring the noble priſoner to be free from all matrimonial contracts with Mr. Hervey, was given in February 1769: ſoon after, ſhe married the duke of Kingſton under the diſpenſation that is uſually granted for the marriage of perſons of that rank. Under this marriage the duke and ducheſs cohabited between four and five years as huſband and wife; at the expiration of which the duke of Kingſton died, having firſt made his will, by which he gave the moſt affectionate and moſt honourable teſtimony of his conſidering her as his wife. At laſt, in July 1775, comes a bill of indictment, which is to ſet the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court entirely at nought, and to brand this open and ſolemn marriage, confirmed by a cohabitation and reputation of ſo many years, with the name of a felony.

My lords, if this indictment ſhould be proceeded upon, and the fact of the firſt marriage found differently from what appeared to the chancellor of London at the time of pronouncing his ſentence upon it, the confuſion, the ſcandal (I think I may venture to call it) that would ariſe from the contrariety of the two ſentences that would then be pronounced, and both ſtill in force, would be ſuch, that I cannot conceive that any court of juſtice would hazard it, upon any ſuggeſtion or apprehenſion of error in the former ſentence, or fraud in obtaining it, and which was irremediable by any other means, or any other the moſt ſtriking or plauſible argument that could be urged to induce them to it. But the plea of the neceſſity of doing an extraordinary act to ſet aſide an improper ſentence, or the effect of ſuch a ſentence, is certainly leſs applicable to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, than to any other court known in this kingdom; and leaſt of all is it applicable to their proceedings in marriage cauſes. There is a courſe of appeal in the eccleſiaſtical courts, a deliberation in their proceedings, that is unknown to any court in this kingdom; from the archidiaconal court (if the cauſe be originally inſtituted there) to the conſiſtory of the dioceſe; from thence to the metropolitical court, which is the court of Arches; from thence to the king in his court of Chancery; from which a commiſſion of Delegates, to hear appeals, iſſues ex debito juſtitiæ: in every one of theſe courts the parties are not bound down to what has been given in evidence in the court below: it is not merely error in law, but error in fact likewiſe may be corrected upon appeal in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and if there are any facts material to the point in iſſue, that have not been pleaded and examined to in the inferior court, they may be pleaded and given in evidence in the Court of Appeal; and ſo down to the laſt court. Beſides this, in every one of theſe courts it is not a matter confined to the two parties that inſtitute the ſuit, and therefore may carry it on colluſively; for in any period of the cauſe a third perſon, that has any intereſt in the matter in queſtion, if he ſees that the two original parties are colluding, or that one of them is negligent, or if he has any other reaſon to be diſſatisfied with the manner in which the buſineſs is conducted, he may intervene for his intereſt, and the court muſt ex debito juſtitiæ admit him to do ſo; he may give in a plea, if he intervenes before the cauſe is concluded; he may examine his own witneſſes, and act in all reſpects as a party in the cauſe. What poſſible human means of providing againſt colluſion and ſurprize is omitted out of this method of proceeding! But, my lords, even this is not all; for when the cauſe has run this great length, application may be made to his majeſty in council, who, if he is adviſed that there is a ground for it, has a power ex gratia to grant a commiſſion to review the whole matter over again. From this view of the method of proceeding in eccleſiaſtical courts, I apprehend it will appear to your lordſhips, that they are not ſo ill provided with means either to avoid, or to reform errors in their judgments, as to ſtand in need of the extraordinary interpoſition of other courts, in any matters that are properly within their juriſdiction; but leaſt of all is this neceſſary in a marriage cauſe, for a marriage cauſe is never at an end: let the cauſe have been argued ever ſo often, let it have been ſifted with the moſt ſcrupulous exactneſs and attention, let there have been one or more appeals, let every ſtep have been taken that can be taken to give a final and concluſive judgment, ſtill the ſame party may come before the court, and ſay, The court has been impoſed upon; I deſire this matter may be examined over again. The court, upon ſuch application, would and muſt take cognizance of it.

I will trouble your lordſhips with quoting but one authority for this, which is that of Sanchez in his treatiſe de Matrimonio, lib. 7. diſp. 100. c. 1. who lays it down in theſe poſitive and explicit terms: 'Id in matrimonio ſpeciale eſt, ut ſententia in conjugali cauſa lata, quacunque circumſpectione præmiſſa, ſive bis ab ea provocatum fuerit confirmataque ſit, ſive lapſus terminus ad appellandum ſit, nunquam tranſeat in rem judicatam, ac proinde non ita efficacem auctoritatem ſortiatur, quin retractanda ſit, quoties compertum fuerit eam errore quodam latam fuiſſe.' And the reaſon aſſigned for making this material and ſingular diſtinction between marriage cauſes and all other cauſes is, that in general the conſent of the party who does not appeal from a ſentence which is given againſt him, gives force and authority to the ſentence, though there might otherwiſe be a ground for him to complain of it. But, ſays the author before quoted, 'ſententia per errorem lata in cauſa conjugali, tranſiens in rem judicatam, foveret peccatum, ſeparando veros conjuges, vel uniendo eos qui tales eſſe nequeunt: at nullum vinculum quantulumcunque multiplicatum, poteſt firmare actum, ex quo peccatum conſurgit.'

The ſame doctrine is laid down in a multitude of other writers upon the canon law, of which there are waggon loads; but they are unanimous in eſtabliſhing the maxim, 'ſententiam in cauſa matrimoniali nunquam tranſiere in rem judicatam;' which I am ſure your lordſhips will not hear denied or diſputed by the other ſide.

From hence it will appear to your lordſhips, how little ground there is for that notion which ſeems to have got abroad, that the proceedings of the eccleſiaſtical courts in cauſes of jactitation, or any other cauſes, are ſuch as tend to looſen the bonds of matrimony (which both in a civil and a religious light without doubt is the moſt eſſential bond of ſociety) and give parties an opportunity of diſſolving it at their pleaſure. The court in theſe, as in all other caſes, muſt determine ſecundum allegata et probata, according to the evidence before it: but where is the encouragement given to parties to collude, or what ſecurity can they have under a ſentence obtained by fraud, when that fraud may at any future time be detected, by bringing forward that evidence which was before withheld, and, upon proof that the former ſentence was erroneous, another of a direct contrary tendency will be given?

My lords, the marriage, which is the only fact in diſpute in the preſent caſe, has many years ago been put in iſſue in the proper manner in the proper court, and a ſentence given againſt it as deciſive as any that court can give in a marriage cauſe: upon truſt and confidence in that ſentence it was that the act was done for which the noble priſoner is now accuſed before [illegible] lordſhips; the ſentence is produced, remaining in full force; and, for the reaſons that have been urged, we humbly hope your lordſhips will be of opinion, that it is the only legal evidence that can now be given reſpecting the fact upon which the accuſation is founded, and that your lordſhips will therefore receive it in bar of any other.

Then the lord high ſteward returned back to the chair.

Lord Preſident of the Council. My lords, I move your lordſhips to adjourn to the chamber of parliament.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. This houſe is adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The lords and others returned to the chamber of parliament in the ſame order they came down, except the lord high ſteward, who walked after his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland; and, the houſe being thus reſumed, reſolved to proceed further in the trial of Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, in Weſtminſter-hall, to-morrow at ten of the clock in the morning.

Tueſday, April 16. The Second Day.

THE lords and others came from the chamber of parliament in the ſame order as on Monday, except the lord high ſteward, who walked after his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, and the peers were there ſeated, and the lord high ſteward in his chair.

Lord High Steward. My lords, the houſe is reſumed. Is it your lordſhips pleaſure that the judges may be covered?

Lords. Ay, Ay.

Then the ſerjeant at arms made proclamation for ſilence as uſual; and the ducheſs of Kingſton being conducted to the bar,

Lord High Steward. Mr. Attorney-General, you may proceed.

Mr. Attorney-General.

My lords, I find myſelf engaged in a very ſingular debate; upon a point perfectly new in experience, analogous to no known rule of proceeding in ſimilar caſes, founded on no principle, none at leaſt which has been ſtated.

The priſoner, being arraigned upon an indictment for felony, pleaded not guilty; upon which, iſſue was joined. In this ſtate of the buſineſs ſhe hath moved your lordſhips, that no evidence ſhall be given or ſtated to prove that guilt upon her, which ſhe hath denied and put in iſſue.

The only caſe cited in ſupport of ſo extraordinary a motion, that of Jones and Bow, Carth. 225, bears no relation or proportion to it. In the trial of an ejectment, the defendant, admitting the plaintiff's title to be otherwiſe clear, avoided it by a ſentence againſt the pretended matrimony of his mother with Sir Robert Carr; after which both parties married with other perſons; a ſentence, unimpeached in form or ſubſtance, againſt his own mother, from whom he was to derive title to his ſtate; deciſive conſequently as a fine with non-claim or any other perfect bar, and ſubmitted to accordingly; for the plaintiff was called, and did not appear. Here, if the ſentence ſhould ever come properly under examination, it will appear to differ in all thoſe reſpects.

In the mean time, inſtead of defending, this motion is only putting queſtions to your lordſhips, hypothetically, for opinion and advice how to order the defence. If this ſentence be, as they argue it, a definitive and precluſive objection to all enquiry, the priſoner ought to have pleaded it in bar, and to have put the proſecutor upon dealing with her plea as he ſhould be adviſed; or ſhe may ſtill rely upon it in evidence of not guilty. But without placing any ſuch confidence in it themſelves, they call upon your lordſhips to make it the foundation of an order to ſtop the trial.

My lords, to ſay that this is wholly unprecedented, goes a great way to conclude againſt it. To ſay that ſuch a rule would be inconſiſtent with the plea, and repugnant to the record as it now ſtands, ſeems deciſive. After putting herſelf for trial upon God and your lordſhips, ſhe beſeeches you not to hear her tried. But I ſhall not content myſelf with this anſwer; becauſe, as your lordſhips have thought proper to hear counſel in ſupport of this extraordinary motion, I am bound to ſuppoſe it a fit ſubject for argument, and to lay before your lordſhips my thoughts upon it as they occur.

Before I go into particular topics, I cannot help obſerving with ſome aſtoniſhment, the general ground which is given us to debate upon. Every ſpecies and colour of guilt, within the compaſs of the indictment, is neceſſarily admitted. So much more prudent it is thought to leave the worſt to be imagined, than even to hear the actual ſtate of her offence. Your lordſhips will therefore take the crime to be proved in the broadeſt extent of it, with every baſe and hateful aggravation it may admit; the firſt marriage ſolemnly celebrated, perfectly conſummated; the ſecond wickedly brought about by practiſing a concerted fraud upon a court of juſtice, to obtain a colluſive ſentence againſt the firſt; a circumſtance of great aggravation. When Farr and Chadwick defended a burglarious breaking and entering, under a pretence of an execution, upon a judgment fraudulently obtained againſt the caſual ejector, it was thought to aggravate their crime, and they ſuffered accordingly. I allude to the caſe in Kelyng, 43.

My lords, I take the ground ſo given me with this reſerve, not that I wiſh to have her crime implied, from the conduct ſhe is adviſed to hold here, to all purpoſes and concluſions; but that the neceſſity of the argument obliges me to aſſume it, as plainly and diſtinctly confeſſed, while this ſentence is urged as an irrefragable bar to the trial, whatever may be the degree of her guilt, however ſuch a ſentence may have been obtained, and whether it tends to aggravate that guilt, or to extenuate it. The propoſition looks ſo enormous, that it requires great abilities to give it any countenance, and the moſt irrefragable argument to force the concluſion.

I muſt alſo remind your lordſhips again, that the ſentence has been read in this ſtage of the proceeding, by the conſent of the proſecutor, and under the expreſs reſervation of his right to object to the competence of it, as evidence on the iſſue joined, unleſs he ſhould think fit to make it part of his own cauſe; at preſent it ſtands admitted merely as the ground of this previous motion. The ſentence being colluſive, is a nullity. If fair, it could not be admitted againſt the king, who was no party to the ſuit. If admitted, it could not conclude in this ſort of ſuit, which puts both marriages in iſſue. The objections ariſe from the general nature of the ſentence propounded, which is never final; from the parties, who could not, by their act, bind any but themſelves, or thoſe who are repreſented by them, or at moſt thoſe who might have intervened in the ſuit; from the nature of the preſent indictment, which puts the marriage directly in iſſue; from the circumſtances peculiar to this ſentence, which prove it to be colluſive.

Without adverting much to thoſe particulars, the learned counſel for the priſoner affected to lay down an univerſal propoſition, that all ſentences of peculiar juriſdictions are not only admiſſible, but concluſive evidence; and referred to many caſes, of which I ſhall controvert nothing but the application.

The caſe of Burroughs and Jamineau, 2 Str. 733, is nothing to this purpoſe. That was a ſuppoſed contract by accepting a bill of exchange at Legborn; which acceptance was void by the peculiar laws of that country, becauſe the drawer had failed without aſſets in the hands of the acceptor; and was pronounced to be ſo by a competent court in Legborn. The plaintiff inſiſted upon it, becauſe, if the acceptance had been made here, it would have bound; but, according to the law of the place where it was made, the acceptance did not conſtitute a contract. The plaintiff might, if he had been adviſed otherwiſe, have defended that ſuit; he acquieſced in the deciſion.

Courts of Admiralty ſit between nation and nation. They proceed in rem, and they bind the property, not only againſt the apparent poſſeſſor, but all the world; or elſe the very exiſtence of the court would be ſubverted. Any body may claim; and proper monitions iſſue for that purpoſe: therefore, in the caſe of Hughes and Cornelius, the plaintiff failed in his action of trover; although the verdict found his property, and conſequently the ſentence of the French Admiralty erroneous; becauſe the court had no ſuch juriſdiction over that ſentence. For the ſame reaſon, in Green and Waller, the ſentence of the Admiralty could not be gain-ſaid. There is no appeal but to the ſword.

The ſame principle governs as to ſeizures in the Exchequer; where any perſon may come in and claim; which if they neglect, they tacitly aſſent to the condemnation. So of ſeizures tried before the commiſſioners of Exciſe.

So in the caſe of Moody and Thurſton, 1 Str. 481, where an act of parliament gave an action (on a certificate of commiſſioners that money was due from an agent to officers of the army) the agent could not defend, by controverting the truth of the certificate. It was contrary to the act, and he might have been heard before the commiſſioners.

Where a ſoldier had complained of his major for undue correction to a court-martial, which diſmiſſed his petition, he could not maintain an action, for he had been heard in a court competent and final to that purpoſe.

No temporal remedy lies to recover poſſeſſion of a benefice forfeited by deprivation, while the ſentence of a court competent to declare the forfeiture remains in force.

The ſame rule holds as to derivative claims. Therefore the judgment of ouſter againſt a mayor is good evidence againſt the corporator, who claims under him.

Thoſe who enter into collegiate eſtabliſhments agree to ſubmit themſelves to the laws and magiſtrates appointed by the founder; and conſequently cannot reclaim againſt them. This was all which was determined in the King and New-College, and many other caſes which might have been referred to under the ſame head. In moſt, if not all the caſes cited, the parties had actually been heard before the proper tribunal.

The office of granting probate and committing adminiſtration is a ſpecial authority committed to the eccleſiaſtical courts, where all, who claim intereſt, may be heard; ſo there can be no defect of juſtice. Therefore, in a vaſt abundance of caſes from Noel and Wells ſoon after the Reſtoration, to Barnſley and Powell in lord Hardwick's time, the temporal courts have refuſed to take cognizance of the right of perſonal repreſentation. All the caſes under this head prove no more.

Caſes were alſo cited to prove, that iſſues joined upon the lawfulneſs of marriage, profeſſion, general baſtardy, and ſo forth, muſt be tried by the biſhop, and to infer that his juriſdiction is excluſive; and the ſtatute of 9 H. VI. c. 11, was cited to prove, that it is final not only to parties and privies, but to ſtrangers. The effect of that ſtatute is rather to prove, that all the world are, or may be, parties or privies. The only public object of it is to provide ſufficient notoriety to make them privy in fact, as well as in law. It provides a great variety of proclamations, to the end 'that all perſons, pretending any intereſt to object againſt the party 'which pretendeth himſelf to be mulier, may ſue to the ordinary, to 'whom the writ of certificate is or ſhall be directed, to make their allegations and objections againſt the party which pretendeth him to be 'mulier, as the law of holy church requireth.' For the reſt, the ſtatute ſeems to have been an act of violence and fraud, by the powerful pretenders againſt lady Audley. The miſchief, they affected to dread, could not happen. A certificate is utterly void, unleſs made upon proceſs, at the inſtance of the parties. The certificate of mulierty binds the parties to the ſuit (as in all reaſon it ought, while ſuch a trial is tolerated) but nobody elſe: and ſo it had been often decided before; and yet the ſtatute provided that every ſuch writ and certificate at the ſuit of lady Audley ſhould be void. On the other hand, no ſuch iſſue as profeſſion, baſtardy, or lawful matrimony, could be tried by the biſhop between ſtrangers; and when tried by the country, it bound only thoſe who were parties to the trial and attaint. Nor was an infant bound to anſwer a plea of general baſtardy. But whether the concluſion was too extenſive or not in theſe caſes, ſtill it was only in reſpect to a civil right, and tried by a competent juriſdiction, ſitting for the expreſs purpoſe of deciding upon it, the juriſdiction being created and eſtabliſhed by the writ.

Sentences, which are given by the biſhop or his official of his own mere authority in matrimonial cauſes, have the leaſt pretence of all others to bind or influence any queſtion which may ariſe afterwards in judicature. Such cauſes puniſh no crime, try no right, proceed to no civil effect. They proceed pro ſalute animæ rei, to reform ſome enormity or neglect in religious life; in qua (ſays Covarruvias in his epitome of the fourth book of the Decretals, par. 2. c. 8, ſ. 12, n. 1.) de maximo ſacramento agendum eſt. The proceſs is, ſimpliciter, de plano, ſine ſtrepitu et figurâ judicii. Clement, lib. 2, t. 1. ſ. 2. From the very nature of ſuch a cauſe, it muſt follow, that the judgment cannot be final. No conſent of parties, or omiſſion to appeal, or repeated affirmation of the ſame judgment, gives it any force. Quia ſententia illa tranſiens in rem judicatam foveret peccatum, ſeparando veros conjuges, vel uniendo eos qui tales eſſe nequeunt. At nullum vinculum, quantulumcunque multiplicatum, poteſt firmare actum, ex quo peccatum conſurgit. Sanch. de Matrim. lib. 9, diſputat. 100. In the ſame diſputation Sanchez ſays, poteſt etiam judex, ex officio, parte invitâ, procedere ad retractandam hujuſmodi ſententiam; imo ad id teneri judicem probat textus; quia ſui intereſt peccata auferre. Hinc deducitur, certâ regulâ preſcribi minime poſſe, quoties audiendus ſit volens prædictam ſententiam impugnare. He illuſtrates the doctrine, by obſerving, that in coſts, which is a civil intereſt, a matrimonial ſentence is binding. Ratio eſt aperta: ſententia enim matrimonii ideo non tranſit in rem judicatam, ne foveretur peccatum, ſuſtinendo matrimonium irritum, aut diſſolvendo validum; quæ ratio in expenſarum condemnatione ceſſat; et ideo ſortitur naturam aliarum ſententiarum, quæ in rem judicatam tranſeunt. Gaill, in his Obſervat. 107, and Obſ. 112, holds exactly the ſame language.

The ſame rule obtains, for the ſame reaſons, in all ſentences pro ſalute animæ. A ſentence is inconcluſive (ſays Vulteius in his treatiſe de Judiciis, lib. 3, c. 12, ſ. 38.) ex qualitate cauſæ; puta, quod eſt matrimonialis, vel alia quæcunque, in quâ animæ periculum verſatur. Scaccia, a very authoritative writer on the effect of ſentences, in his book de Sententia, gloſſ. 14, queſt. 2. n. 44, obſerves as a general rule, ſententia, in quâ vertitur animæ periculum, nunquam tranſit in rem judicatam. The ſum of their maxims is given by Oughton, tit. 205. which is taken almoſt literally from Conſett, and by him extracted from the books of practice.—'Altho', generally, witneſſes are not 'admitted after publication, yet in a matrimonial cauſe they are, even 'without oath, that they are come to the knowledge of the parties after 'publication. And, ſuppoſing that ſentence has paſſed againſt the plaintiff, that he has failed in proof of his libel, and the defendant is acquitted; yet the plaintiff may either in the ſame cauſe, or in another, 'raiſe a new ſuit againſt the ſame perſon, not only on a new or ſecond 'contract, but on the former, and produce proofs known or unknown 'to him before: and he is not bound by the exceptio rei judicatæ, or 'that the former ſentence has paſſed in rem judicatam; becauſe a ſentence 'given in a matrimonial cauſe never paſſes in rem judicatam, and has many 'privileges. When the church is deceived in promulging ſentence 'againſt matrimony, the ſentence may be revoked by new proofs, and 'even by the ſame; and the reaſon is, to eſchew ſin and danger to the 'ſoul, if a wrong ſentence ſhould prevail.'

So far as it appears to us is therefore no idle form of words, but an expreſs reſervation of a neceſſary power to alter the ſentence whenever it ſhall appear to the biſhop that a different rule of life is neceſſary pro ſalute animæ rei.

The miſtake ſeems to have ariſen from conſidering the biſhop as a court of civil judicature, and his ſentence as pronounced upon the trial of a civil right. In this perverſe view, thoſe maxims are abſurd, and thoſe rules merely vexatious, which, tried by the real nature and end of a matrimonial ſuit, are founded in piety and zeal for the diſcipline of religion. In all civil cauſes the maxim is univerſal, expedit reipublicæ, ut finis aliquis ſit litium. In proceedings pro ſalute animæ, the reaſon of the thing is altogether on the other ſide.

Even in the moment of ſtating theſe ſentences to be concluſive, one of the learned counſel could not forbear to give your lordſhips a lively repreſentation of the frivolouſneſs of their proceedings and the vanity of their decrees. The doctors have been at the pains to write (ſays my learned friend) ſome waggon-loads of volumes to prove, that theſe matrimonial cauſes proceed to no end, and terminate in nothing. All parties, all privies to the ſuit, all who have intereſt in the matter of it, may prevent its effect by intervention, by citation to hear the decree reverſed by original libel. The ſketch was drawn with a great deal of humour, bordering upon ridicule: a vivacity natural enough within the walls of their own college. Vetus illud Catonis admodum ſcitum eſt; qui mirari ſe aiebat, quod non rideret Haruſpex, Haruſpicem cum vidiſſet. Yet it ſeemed rather aſtoniſhing, that ſo very judicious an advocate ſhould think this picture of futility the beſt recommendation of the ſentence to your lordſhips as an abſolute concluſion upon all your proceedings. Here all the world ſhall be bound by that judgment, which the court, who pronounced it, hold for no judgment, and will ſuffer to bind nobody. But ſuch was the neceſſity of the argument: to give it any effect, they were forced to aſſume, that this ſort of ſentence is the judgment of a civil judicature upon a civil ſubject, which is not true; and to give it effect, againſt others than parties, they were forced to admit, that ſuch others may ſet it aſide; which is true, only becauſe it is no ſuch judgment.

In ſupport of this looſe propoſition, they cited from our own books ſeveral caſes, in which the temporal courts ſuffered themſelves to be concluded by ſuch ſentences.

If it were neceſſary or allowable at this day to reaſon againſt ſo many authorities, I ſhould incline to think, that thoſe caſes proceeded upon the miſtake I mentioned before, namely, that the Eccleſiaſtical Court try and pronounce upon the civil right of marriage, or ever mean to do ſo, except when authoriſed by writ of the king's courts. But for the purpoſe of the argument, I will ſuppoſe that they do; even then the effect of all the caſes will amount to no more than this. Firſt, the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction has (excluſively) conuſance of the right of marriage. Secondly, the Secular Juriſdiction has conuſance of the temporal intereſts which are incident to marriage, and, in order to decide upon them, muſt try the fact of marriage as part of the queſtion. Thirdly, but the judgment of the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction on the principal, viz. the right of marriage, wherever it occurs, is final upon the trial of the incident. Fourthly, this concluſion extends to all who were parties or privies, or who, in notion of law, have committed laches in not intervening or reclaiming. This I take to be the utmoſt extent of the caſes cited.

The earlieſt caſe referred to was Corbett's, Fitz. tit. Conſultation, pl. 5. Sir Robert Corbett had iſſue Roger by his wife Matilda; in whoſe life he married Letitia, and had iſſue Robert. Roger ſued in the court chriſtian to avoid the ſecond marriage, but was prohibited, for that court had no original juriſdiction. 'Otherwiſe,' ſays Cateſby's Juſtice, 'if my father and mother were divorced, married to others, had iſſue, and died, 'then I grant well, that I ſhall have my ſuit originally in the court 'chriſtian, becauſe I cannot have my action in the temporal law, as 'heir, during the divorce; and alſo the divorce is a ſpiritual judgment, 'which ſhall be reformed in the Spiritual Courts.' So it was doubted, whether 'the brother of a monk, who abandoned his habit and vows, 'could, as heir, libel to try his brother's profeſſion, and hold him to ‘ obedience; for he might have his action by the temporal law, and object his profeſſion.’ But it was agreed, ‘ that if the monk had been deraigned for falſe or unjuſt cauſe, the brother might have citation to revoke his deraignment.’ If this proves the effect which a ſpiritual ſentence upon the principal matter, the right of marriage, or profeſſion, has in caſes where theſe come incidentally into queſtion, it alſo confines the extent of that effect to thoſe perſons who may reſcind the principal ſentence; and proves the reaſon of it, namely, that they are not wronged by the concluſion, becauſe they may always be heard againſt it.

The next caſe was Bunting and Leppingwell, 4 Co. 29. a. and Moor 169; which was thus found by ſpecial verdict. Thomas Twede married, de facto, Agnes Adinghall, but under the impediment of a pre-contract between her and John Bunting. Bunting ſued in the court chriſtian on this pre-contract, obtained ſentence for celebration in facie eccleſiæ, married her, and had iſſue two ſons, Charles and Robert. Richard the father of John, gave lands to Robert, for life only. Robert, miſtaking his title, ſettled them on Emma his wife, and died. Charles brought an ejectment, as heir to Richard, his grandfather. It was objected that Twede had been no party to the ſuit in the court chriſtian. But Twede might have intervened, or reclaimed, all his life long. So might Emma, if it could have availed her to prove her huſband illegitimate, which would have deſtroyed her title. But Twede had abandoned his pretenſions. The ſentence was ſubmitted to by Agnes. The marriage was ſolemnly celebrated, and remained uninterrupted during life. The queſtion was between two iſſues. It required little argument to ſuſtain the legitimacy.

The next was Kenn's caſe, 7 Co. 68. Cro. Ja. 186. An Engliſh bill was brought in the court of Wards, praying leave to traverſe an office, whereby Elizabeth was found the infant heir of Chriſtopher Kenn, and whereupon the wardſhip had been granted to Florence, the mother of the infant. Chriſtopher Kenn had married Elizabeth Stowell, by whom he had iſſue Martha, who left iſſue Elizabeth the plaintiff, his heir at law, if the marriage had ſtood; but in the firſt and ſecond of Philip and Mary, the court of Audience pronounced the marriage void for want of age, and gave ſentence of divorce. Chriſtopher Kenn married Elizabeth Beckwith, in the 5th of Elizabeth. She libelled him for jactitation before the commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical cauſes, alledging his former marriage. Elizabeth Stowell intervened for her intereſt. The firſt marriage was a ſecond time pronounced void, and ſentence followed ad exequenda conjugalia obſequia. After the death of Elizabeth Beckwith, Chriſtopher married Florence, by whom he had the ward. This matter was referred to all the judges, who pronounced the ſentence concluſive, ſo long as it ſhould remain in force. And lord Coke relied upon Corbett's caſe, the doctrine of which has been explained before. The point had been twice tried with Elizabeth Stowell, the grandmother of the plaintiff, and the ſentences remained open to litigation, but ſubmitted to.

The caſe of Jones and Bow, Carth. 225, it has been obſerved before, was of exactly the ſame ſort. The plaintiff claimed under the iſſue of ſir Robert Carr by Iſabella Jones, between whom a ſentence had obtained againſt the pretence of marriage, which then ſtood unlitigated.

In Jeſſum and Collins, 2 Salk. 437, there was a ſentence againſt the plaintiff in the Spiritual Court, at the ſuit of the defendant, on that very contract for which he brought his action on the caſe, without diſputing the ſentence.

The caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield was alſo cited; a judgment of your lordſhips in the year 1725. No authority is more concluſive than the judgment of ſuch a court, when the point decided is well underſtood: but nothing is more uncertain than the ſtate of a point drawn from the printed caſes, where each party takes care to ſtate, at leaſt, a probable caſe; and in the multitude of the reaſons, good perhaps in law, if they were true in fact, it is difficult to divine what the houſe went upon. If this judgment depended, as the counſel for the priſoner contended, upon the goodneſs of the marriage, it carries the matter no further than abundance of other caſes; namely, that the ſentence of a court chriſtian, while nobody conteſts it, binds the right of marriage between parties diſputing elſewhere an incidental intereſt under it. There was an attempt to make it prove a colluſive ſentence available, which I ſhall have occaſion to examine hereafter.

In Cleeve and Bathurſt, 2 Str. 960, and Annaly 11, the ſentence was againſt the very plaintiff in the cauſe, and remained uncontroverted.

So Da Coſta and Villa Real, 2 Str. 961, or Mendez and Villa Real, Annaly 18, was a ſentence uncontroverted between the ſame parties.

The like obſervation occurs upon Mr. Hervey's caſe.

In Blackham's caſe, 1 Salk. 290, the ſentence was not held to be concluſive; and as to lord Holt's doctrine, that muſt ſuppoſe the marriage put in iſſue between the ſame parties; for otherwiſe the ſentence would not have concluded; the court, which grants adminiſtration, having no direct juriſdiction in matrimony.

In Milleſent and Milleſent, cited by Dr. Lee in lord Annaly 11, which I take to have been an appeal from the Prerogative Court, a ſentence of the Conſiſtory Court againſt a marriage was, while it remained unlitigated, a bar to the woman, who had been party to that ſentence, from claiming adminiſtration as wife.

Upon all theſe caſes I ſhall repeat but one obſervation; namely, that they bound only thoſe who had been parties to the former ſentence, or who derived under ſuch parties. If they had extended to ſuch as might have become parties by intervention or citation, the ſame principle would equally have borne them out. The general peace and happineſs require, that there ſhould be ſome reſort to hear and determine upon rights; the ſame peace and happineſs require, that litigation ſhould have ſome end. The line ſeems to be fairly drawn, where every claim to every right has had the full opportunity of being heard. But, among all the caſes cited or referred to, I believe none is to be found, where a ſentence has been taken for concluſive againſt perſons, who neither had, nor could poſſibly have agitated it.

It is not enough therefore to eſtabliſh the propoſition, that ſuch ſentences bind all who have or could have interpoſed, unleſs it had been ſhewn that the king could have interpoſed, for the publick good, in order to ſee that no fraud ſhould be practiſed, which might tend to defeat the execution of his laws or police: but it is not pretended that the king can interpoſe in ſuch cauſes.

It is not enough that a court of excluſive civil juriſdiction, pronouncing upon the principal right, binds all the derivative or incidental intereſts. It ſhould be ſhewn, that ſuch a court binds alſo to criminal concluſions: now this I take to be impoſſible, becauſe, on the very ſtate of the propoſition, the court has no criminal juriſdiction.

It has often been attempted in argument to ſhew, that their courts have no more than a cenſorial juriſdiction in their proceedings pro ſalute animæ, et reformatione morum; and to infer from thence that their judgments ought not to bind in queſtions touching civil rights; as in Mendez, and Villa Real in Annaly: but our courts have taken the fact to be otherwiſe, and conſidered their ſentence as a judgment upon the civil right, which is the reaſon why it binds all incidental intereſts in other courts of civil juriſdiction. The true reaſon why ſuch judgments have no effect in a criminal court, ſeems to be this: that there is nothing in common between the juriſdictions, ſo that they can never claſh. A judgment in a civil ſuit will bind to all its conſequences, although every fact, upon which it proceeded, ſhould be evidently falſe; and though a criminal court ſhould have found a crime upon an oppoſite ſtate of the caſe. An action and an indictment for a treſpaſs may have contrary iſſues, and yet both muſt ſtand: ſo it would be if the crime were aſſigned in the very falſhoods by which the civil court was deceived; as in indictments for perjury or forgery. A judgment upon a deed, after verdict on non eſt factum pleaded, is no bar to an indictment for forging or publiſhing, or ſwearing to the deed. The caſe would be the ſame in reſpect to a will of lands eſtabliſhed by verdict, or to a will of perſonality after probate.

It was in this laſt inſtance they attempted to ſhew, that the authority of the Eccleſiaſtical Court had been interpoſed between publick juſtice and the crime of forgery. For this purpoſe they have cited the caſe of the King and Vincent, 1 Str. 481. It is very ſhort: ‘ indictment for forging a will relating to perſonal eſtate; and on the trial the forgery was proved; but the defendant producing a probate, that was held concluſive evidence in ſupport of the will.’ Now the ſupport of the will was not in queſtion. It was proved in common form, which is not binding, even in the Spiritual Court. 1 Ro. Rep. 21. More particulars of this caſe may probably be known to ſome of your lordſhips; but I cannot find any. Stated thus, it certainly requires a great deal of conſideration, before it be admitted as law. Here the queſtion was, not whether the ſentence ſhall have credit in reſpect of the underſtanding which the ſpiritual judges have in the rules and courſe of their own law, but whether a probate, granted of courſe, on the oath of the very party charged with the forgery, ſhall be a full and concluſive bar to the proſecution. This is too monſtrous to be left upon the authority of a ſhort and ſingle caſe, without condeſcending to explain what conſiſtency with publick juſtice, what reſpect to common ſenſe, will allow the crime of forgery or perjury to be defended by the allegation of that very fraud which the indictment meant to puniſh; not ſtating any trial or judgment upon it, but merely that it had been practiſed. If the pretended executor had repelled the objection of forgery, even in that court, it would have borne ſome countenance at leaſt; but the fraud paſſed without examination, where, in the nature of the proceeding, none could be had.

The other caſe, in 1 Str. 703. of the King and Rhodes, proves nothing, for it was merely a queſtion of direction, whether the court would proceed to try the forgery of an inſtrument, while the property to be affected by it remained ſub judice.

This is a matter of great conſequence to publick juſtice; at the ſame time, it is the ſort of caſe which muſt happen frequently. The fraud was commonly practiſed in the late war upon the ſailors; and, if this rule had exiſted, could never have been puniſhed: but it was frequently puniſhed; and although, where no point of law aroſe, it is difficult to recover caſes at the Old-Bailey or on circuits; yet an accidental publication of caſes in the Old-Bailey, without any apparent ſelection, has produced three or four inſtances. One Stirling was convicted and hanged for forging a will; and, ſo little were either proſecutor or court appriſed of this notion of law, the probate made part of the evidence againſt him. He had regiſtered it (as it was neceſſary) in the South-Sea-Houſe. I am not anxious to ſtate theſe caſes with more particularity; becauſe I cannot bring myſelf to imagine it will be entertained as a ſerious opinion, that the mere perpetration of a crime may be pleaded in bar to a proſecution for it. This is certainly not for the intereſt of juſtice, nor for the honour of the Spiritual Court; becauſe it would take away from that juriſdiction one guard againſt falſhood and fraud, of which every other is poſſeſſed.

Thus much concerning the general propoſition, that ſentences in the eccleſiaſtical courts, upon civil rights within their conuſance, have concluſive force upon publick proſecutions for crimes; although it be confeſſed withal, that the publick has no means to intervene or review thoſe ſentences, and although the civil effect of ſuch ſentences is not touched by the event of ſuch publick proſecutions. If this ground fails, there is an end of the preſent motion: but there is another view, in which it has been urged upon your lordſhips, which ſeems to turn out more deciſively againſt it.

Whatever may be ſaid in the inſtances of forgery, perjury, and other frauds upon the ſpiritual court, where the criminal court may ſeem to impeach the foundation of their ſentences, without aſſuming any juriſdiction in the matter of them; in this caſe it is impoſſible to alledge, that the criminal court is not fully competent to decide upon the whole matter of the indictment; particularly on both the marriages there ſtated as conſtituting the crime.

The learned gentleman who ſpoke ſecond for the priſoner, informed your lordſhips, that this crime was formerly puniſhed by the canon law, and in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and inſiſted, that transferring the puniſhment ment of it from the eccleſiaſtical to the temporal juriſdiction ſhould not prejudice any defences which the party might have ſet up in the firſt court.

In order to make that obſervation bear, ſome proof ſhould have been added, that this ſentence would have barred ſuch a ſuit, however promoted, exceptione rei judicatæ. Then, ſuppoſing this juriſdiction no better than concurrent, this court might have been barred, pari ratione. But your lordſhips have already had the trouble of hearing it eſtabliſhed, but too much at length, from their books, that no ſuch exception would lie in their law.

The ſame thing is no leſs true in our law, where the court can, by any means, take conuſance of the right of marriage. Thus in dower, where the Common-Pleas, by writing to the biſhop, can well try the lawfulneſs of the marriage, a ſentence is no plea. This was ruled in the caſe of Robins and Crutchley, 2 Wilſon 118, 127. The demandant counted as of the endowment of Robins: the tenants pleaded, that ſhe was not accoupled to Robins in lawful matrimony. The demandant replied, that on the 12th February 1754, ſir William Wolſeley libelled her as his wife, in the Biſhop's Court of Litchfield, for adultery with Robins; that ſhe pleaded a marriage with Robins: that the cauſe was removed into the Arches; that Robins died; and that afterwards ſentence paſſed for the marriage with Robins, which then remained in force. The tenants demurred; and had judgment. The demandant cited many of the caſes your lordſhips have now heard, to prove, that a ſentence, by a court of direct juriſdiction, ought to conclude another, which has but incidental conuſance of the ſame matter. But theſe were not thought ſufficient to avoid another trial of the ſame marriage in a court, which, by writing to the biſhop, might well decide upon the lawfulneſs of it. It is clear, that the ſentence would not have concluded in the trial before the biſhop.

Nay, the very ſtatute, on which the indictment is framed, proves the ſame thing. It excepts the caſes where the former marriage is diſſolved, or declared void by ſentence, or was contracted under age of conſent; all which would otherwiſe have been triable under an indictment for felony.

In order to prove, that any ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court would bar an indictment upon the ſame matter, the caſe of Boyle and Boyle was cited. It is reported in 3 Mod. 164, and in Comberbatch 72. In that caſe a prohibition was awarded to ſtop the trial, in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, of a marriage there claimed by a woman, in anſwer to a ſuit of jactitation; which marriage had been found bad on an indictment for polygamy, for which the man was convicted and burnt in the hand. The reaſon aſſigned, here, for this judgment was, for fear the ſpiritual court ſhould not take notice of the judgment pronounced in the temporal court. But this would have been extremely irregular; particularly if by the courſe of the Spiritual Court ſuch a judgment would have been concluſive. Prohibition never goes upon an apprehenſion, that the Spiritual Court will do wrong; but where their rules of trial are contrary to the common law, as in preſcription, or requiring two witneſſes to a releaſe; or when they exceed their juriſdiction, by holding plea of temporal matters, as debts, freehold, or temporal offences. The reaſon for granting this prohibition was, becauſe the court chriſtian could not take any conuſance of a matter adjudged in the temporal court; which thereupon became temporal. So in the caſe of Webb and Cook, Cro. James, 535, 625, prohibition went to the court chriſtian at Norwich, for entertaining a libel for defamation, in ſaying, that one had a baſtard, who was adjudged the putative father: 'for that judgment, 'being under the authority of the ſtatute law, ſhall not be impeached 'in the Spiritual Court, or elſewhere; and all are concluded to ſay the 'contrary.' Upon the authority of this caſe, the ſame point was ruled again in Thornton and Pickering, 3 Keb. 200. The Eccleſiaſtical Court has no conuſance of crimes. In the caſe immediately before that of Boyle and Boyle, prohibition went to ſtop a ſuit there for writing a libel; becauſe an indictment will lie for it. In Serle and Williams, Hob. 288, this matter is fully treated. The ordinary has no power, even over clergymen, in a crime or offence touching the crown. Purgation itſelf was by permiſſion, and could not be adminiſtered, if the temporal court delivered abſque purgatione faciendâ; nor between the conviction and ſentence; nor before it. In all theſe caſes prohibition would lie. And in every other caſe, if after trial of a felon they prove or diſprove any thing againſt a verdict, prohibition lies. So in Higgon and Coppinger, ſir William Jones, 320, prohibition went to ſtop a libel for calling one a ſodomite. 'For, as they cannot find the principal offence, it not being 'ſaved to them by the ſtatute, they ſhall not hold plea of the defama-'tion. And, where any thing determinable by the Eccleſiaſtical Court 'is made felony, or treaſon, and the power of the Eccleſiaſtical Court 'is not ſaved to it, there they ſhall not meddle with the offence, or the 'defamation, which ariſes out of it.' The true reaſon therefore, why they were prohibited in the principal caſe, was, becauſe the plea depending before them was out of their conuſance.

Another caſe was cited, where prohibition went to the Conſiſtorial Court of Exeter, after acquittal upon an indictment for polygamy; but I have not been able to find it.

More perverſe inferences were never extorted from any caſes, than from theſe. A court of oyer and terminer is to determine without hearing, for this ſpecial reaſon, that it will be final. A court of direct, complete, and excluſive juriſdiction, is to be bound and governed by one of no juriſdiction, either direct or indirect, on the matter. A court, which decides once for ever, is to be bound by one which never decides. The ſentence remains open for further examination; let it therefore be adopted without examination, in order that it may never be examined.

But, to confeſs the truth, all which I have hitherto ſaid ſeems to have been unneceſſary. This might have been pertinent argument, if there had really been a ſentence to combat: but there is none. It has been virtually, if not expreſsly admitted, that, for the purpoſe of deciding upon the preſent motion, your lordſhips muſt take it for granted, that the ſentence is colluſive and fraudulent in every view, and to every degree, which imagination can repreſent: for your lordſhips will not put us, in this ſtage of the buſineſs, to take ſeparate iſſues upon every ſuggeſtion which may be made for the priſoner. In truth, her counſel have argued it ſo; expreſsly contending, that a colluſive ſentence ſhall bind the judgment of the houſe.

But what kind of caſe has been made, or attempted? What authority has been cited, that a colluſive ſentence ſhall prejudice others, than the parties to it? In every book I have ſeen, it is treated as a mere nullity. The only difference between no ſentence, and a colluſive one, is, that in the firſt caſe, you plead nul tiel record, generally; in the laſt, you plead, that it was obtained by covin; conſequently it is waſte paper. If the court was informed of the covin, it would commit the parties for the contempt, and cancel the record. This could only be done upon the idea of the whole proceeding being a nullity.

In the 44 E. 3, 45. b. in aſſize of novel diſſeiſin, by a dowreſs, the tenant admitted her title to dower; but diſputed her aſſize, becauſe ſhe had been endowed by one, who abated upon his poſſeſſion by covin with her. She argued, that the abator gained a fee-ſimple, whereby he might lawfully endow her; that recovery of dower againſt an abator is ſufficient, and that endowment in pais, to one who has right, is equal to recovery. The tenant replied, that ſuch endowment was but diſſeiſin; therefore his entry was congeable; and that the recovery would have been in the ſame plight. All the judges held clearly, that 'if one has action to cer-'tain lands, and by his aſſent and covin the tenant is ouſted, and he, 'who has the action, brings it againſt the diſſeiſor, he, who is ouſted, 'ſhall have aſſize; and the poſſeſſion of him, who recovered, ſhall be 'adjudged by abatement, and not by recovery; becauſe he was a diſſeiſor. 'Et hoc adjudicabatur coram Knivet.'

The ſame point is laid down in many books; and in 3 Co. 78, it is taken as a general rule, 'that the common law ſo abhors fraud and covin, 'that all acts, as well judicial as others, and which of themſelves are 'juſt and lawful, ſtill, being mixed with fraud and deceit, are in judg-'ment of law tortious and illegal.' Nay, it takes away the privilege of coverture and infancy; for the act is merely void. In the caſe in Coke, the fine (a judicial act) was held for none, by reaſon of the covin. So Farr and Chadwick were both hanged for burglary, though they entered by an habere facias poſſeſſionem; becauſe it iſſued upon a fraudulent judgment. This was thought to heighten the offence.

The principle of the rule applies equally to the judgments of the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and ſo the rule was applied in Dyer 339, where a revocation of letters of adminiſtration was held void for covin. Thus too in Garvan and Roach, 1 Veſ. 157. Lord Hardwick ſays of ſentences in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, that colluſion will overturn the whole.

It would be idle affectation to cite all the caſes on this head, which indexes would furniſh. The books are full of them, from the annals of Edward the ſecond to the Reports of ſir James Burrow. Indeed there never was a period of time, in which this maxim was ſo continually in the mouth of the court, as the laſt. Bright and Eynon, and abundance of caſes more might be cited to prove this. The court ſeems to have thought it the principal and moſt capital part of its duty, the nobile officium judicis, to ſuppreſs and extinguiſh every ſpecies of fraud.

My lords, the language of the civilians and canoniſts is exactly the ſame. Scaccia, in his book de Sententiâ, Gloſſ. 14, Queſt. 12, ſtates this poſition, ex vulgatâ regulâ, rem inter alios actam aliis non nocere. Upon this he makes many limitations; upon all of which he adds, amongſt others, this ſublimitation; quando ſententia eſſet lata per colluſionem: fraus enim, et dolus nemini patrocinari debent, in alterius præjudicium; et ideo ſententia, lata per colluſionem, habetur pro non ſententia; et aliis non nocet; quamvis, ſublatâ colluſione, noceret. The ſame thing is laid down by Covarruvias, in his Practical Queſtions, cap. 15. n. 2. He quotes this text of the Digeſt. Si hæreditatis judex contra hæredem pronunciaverit non agentem cauſam, vel colluſione agentem, nihil hoc nocebit legatariis. In Heraldus de re judicata, lib. 1. cap. 2. n. 1, the ſame rule is given upon the ſame authority.

Nay, their courts will receive an allegation againſt a judgment at common law, that it was by covin; and rightly too; for it is a nullity; and the authority of the court, in which fraud is practiſed, is never in queſtion. In Lloyd and Maddox, Moor 917. One ſued in the court chriſtian for a legacy. The executor pleaded recovery in debt, which exhauſted aſſets. The legatee replied, that the recovery was by covin. This allegation was admitted; and the King's Bench refuſed to award prohibition. Here both courts agreed, that to alledge a fraudulent judgment was to alledge nothing; and the inferior juriſdiction was expreſly permitted to try this ſort of nullity in the judgment of the ſuperior.

There is a great abundance of caſes more, which I ſhall have occaſion to cite to your lordſhips, if the actual fraud of the preſent ſentence ſhould ever be diſputed; caſes, in which much weaker grounds of imputation, than thoſe which occur here, have been thought ſufficient to avoid a judgment.

But, my lords, what arguments have been uſed on the other ſide upon this part of the caſe?

Firſt, it has been inſinuated, that certain ſtatutes, made againſt covin, account for the many judgments to be found in our books; and prove, that, without ſuch ſtatutes, they could not have obtained. But many of the caſes were before the ſtatutes referred to. The principle, avowed by the judges, is independent of them. They all provide either additional ſanctions againſt fraud, or new precautions againſt the opportunity of practiſing it. And it would be a very miſchievous conſtruction, if a ſtatute againſt a particular fraud were to protect every other.

Secondly, the fraudulent ſentence muſt be ſent back to the court where the fraud was practiſed, in order to be corrected. Why ſo? If the thing alledged againſt a ſentence were error, miſ-judging either the law or the fact, it muſt be reverſed in the ſame juriſdiction, original, or appellate. But the court, in which the ſentence is pleaded, muſt determine on the reality and application of that plea, juſt as it would on any other matter pleaded. Fraud is a fact. The concluſion is, that it puts a total end to the cauſe. The court, in which ſuch cauſe depends, muſt be as competent and perfect a judge of that fact, as the court in which the fraud was perpetrated. I ſay as competent and perfect; becauſe the court, where the fraud has been practiſed, which has overlooked ſuch circumſtances as appear on the very face of theſe proceedings, does not ſeem to me the very place to which one would ſend a queſtion of colluſion to be tried. All the authorities referred to before, and the numerous inſtances of replying fraud to pleas of judgments by other courts, on which it was practiſed, contradict this notion. But caſes are cited on the other ſide. Kenn's caſe, it was ſaid, proves, upon the ſtate of it, that the ſentence was fraudulent. The bill in the court of Wards ſtated, that the ſentence was falſe, and with a deal of aggravation. But who ever referred to an Engliſh bill for the true ſtate of any caſe? The queſtion, referred to the judges, ſays nothing of the colluſion. The caſe of Morris and Webber, in Moor 225, was alſo cited to prove, that colluſion apparent in an eccleſiaſtical ſentence did not hinder it from concluding in a court of common law. A man, divorced propter impotentiam, married another woman, and had children. The laſt circumſtance, it was ſaid, diſproved the cauſe of the divorce; and therefore the judgment was apparently colluſive. But that circumſtance did not even prove the judgment falſe: for one may be habilis quoad hanc. The law preſumes the children of a marriage legitimate: but that does not prove the fact of generation to any other purpoſe. If the ground of the ſentence was falſe, it would not follow that it was colluſive. Colluſion was not even alledged in the caſe; and conſequently makes no part of the judgment. In the ſame manner they referred to the appellant's printed caſe, in this houſe, in Hatfield and Hatfield, for an averment, that the ſentence was fraudulent. But there, as it happens, the ſtate of the caſe diſproves the colluſion: for Porter, the defendant in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, was in the appellant's power. They cited alſo the caſe of Prudham and Phillips, from a moſt inaccurate note in the margin of Strange, 961; who certainly knew nothing of the caſe he referred to. The caſe in truth was this: Prudham brought aſſumpſit againſt Conſtantia Phillips. She gave evidence of her marriage with Muilman. Prudham produced a ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, annulling that marriage, becauſe ſhe was already married to Delafield, who was then alive. She ſaid, that ſentence was fraudulent. But the court, admitting that the objection would have been good in the mouth of a ſtranger, would not ſuffer her to alledge fraud in herſelf, for her own avail. The learned doctors alſo cited a caſe of a lady Mayo and a Mr. Brown, in the Prerogative Court. There, a ſentence in a matrimonial cauſe being pleaded, the adverſe party alledged, that it had been obtained by colluſion. One learned gentleman ſaid the allegation was repelled; the other, that it was not admitted. I am informed the laſt is neareſt to accurate; for nothing was done in that matter. The cauſe is ſtill depending. The firſt argument promiſed all that length of erudition, which your lordſhips were favoured with yeſterday: in view to which the judge aſked, whether they had not better agitate the queſtion of fraud where it was committed; an iſſue more natural for the judge to wiſh, than proper for the court to award. The moſt looſe and unconſidered notion, eſcaping in any manner from that able and excellent judge, ſhould be received with reſpect; and certainly will. But it is unfair to him to call this his judgment. If the queſtion were my own, with the choice of my court, I ſhould refer it to his deciſion.

Thirdly, among other reaſons againſt holding plea of the colluſion before your lordſhips, they inſiſted, that it was not worth while; their ſentences are ſo open to repeal at the ſuit of any body, that whoever finds them objected, has nothing to complain of but his own remiſſneſs. Their proceedings are ſo frivolous and ineffectual, their judgments ſo inconcluſive and harmleſs, that nullity, however eſtabliſhed, makes no material difference in them.

Such were their particular arguments. In a more general way, they preſſed upon your lordſhips, with much earneſtneſs, the conſideration of the unhappy caſe, to which they ſaid we would drive the priſoner. The ſentence has deprived her of all conjugal claims upon Mr. Hervey; and we acknowledge it to be concluſive upon her, while we inſiſt that it is merely void againſt all the reſt of the world. She is, therefore, according to us, a wife, only for the purpoſe of being puniſhed as a felon. This ſtrange apology was not inſinuated in mitigation of the puniſhment, or to the compaſſion of your lordſhips; but directly and confidently addreſſed to your juſtice. Do not proceed to try the crime, becauſe the purpoſe of committing it is totally fruſtrated; and many other inconveniencies have enſued. In other words, the crime has been detected. Theſe diſappointments, theſe inconvenient conſequences of guilt, are the bars which God, and the order of nature, have ſet againſt it: but they have not been found ſufficient. It demands the interpoſition of public authority, with ſeverer checks, to reſtrain it. Why is ſhe thus hampered with the ſentence ſhe fabricated? Becauſe ſhe fabricated it; becauſe juſtice will not permit her to alledge her own fraud, for her own behoof, nor hear her complain of a wrong done by herſelf.

In ſhort, my lords, the motion is wholly inadmiſſible. It is inconſiſtent with all order and method of trial for us to debate imaginary topics of defence, before hearing the charge, and for the court to reſolve abſtract queſtions upon hypothetical grounds. Is a ſentence pronounced between two certain perſons admiſſible evidence againſt others? Is this ſpecies of ſentence ſo? Is either admiſſible againſt the king—in any public proſecution—in this particular ſort of proſecution? Is ſuch evidence probable only, or concluſive—againſt the parties to it—againſt ſtrangers—againſt the king—and in what caſes? What, if it were obtained by colluſion? What, if by her colluſion? Will it ſerve her? May ſhe offer it ſafely? How much will it prove againſt her? What evidence will do to prove the colluſion?---There is no end of ſuch queſtions. At the ſame time, I was not ſolicitous to prevent any part of the argument. Were it poſſible for your lordſhips to ſtop this proſecution here, I have no deſire to wound the mind of any perſon unneceſſarily, or if ſo painful a duty may be diſpenſed with. But I have rather wondered to hear ſuch hopes as theſe thus far encouraged, or even entertained, on the part of the priſoner, with confidence enough to make it worth her while to avow, in this ſtage of the buſineſs, that ſhe had rather have every thing preſumed againſt her, than hear any thing proved; and to diſcloſe to your lordſhips, not an anxiety to clear her injured innocence, but a dread of the enquiry; a wiſh to ſubmit, in ſilence, to the charge. Was this her ſolicitude to bring the queſtion here? Of what avail would it be to any body, in any condition, to appear in any court, and defend thus? But, in ſuch a court, before ſo venerable an audience, to hear nothing pleaded againſt a charge of infamy, but a frivolous objection to entering upon the enquiry!---unleſs topics ſtronger, more pertinent, and pointed could have been urged, I am exceedingly ſorry, upon every account, that the time of your lordſhips has been thus taken up, and that we did not go directly into the examination of the matter before you.

Mr. Solicitor-General.

My lords,

There are two queſtions at preſent before your lordſhips: the one turns upon the effect of a ſentence obtained from the Eccleſiaſtical Court in a caſe of jactitation of marriage, which the counſel for the priſoner have maintained to be a concluſive bar to the inquiry now inſtituted in a court of criminal juſtice: the other is, whether that argument ought to be admitted in this period of the proceeding.

My duty requires me, in the firſt place, to ſubmit to your lordſhips ſome objections to admitting that ſentence in anticipation of the charge, after a plea of not guilty to the indictment.

The plea, which is the defence upon the record, denies the charge; but the argument contends, that the charge ought neither to be ſtated nor proved. To proceed firſt to conſider the merits of a defence without a charge eſtabliſhed either by proof or admiſſion of the party, is at leaſt a very great novelty in a criminal proceeding, and a very wide deviation from the ancient courſe of trials; and it is a preſumption of ſome weight, that a mode of trial, which has prevailed for ages, is not founded in folly nor injuſtice.

In the regular and ordinary courſe, a priſoner who has any ſpecial matter to alledge, which ought to bar the enquiry into the crime, muſt ſtate it in the form of a plea of the indictment. Upon the plea of the party every court of criminal juriſdiction muſt form a judicial determination: a pardon, a former acquittal for the ſame charge, are defences which preclude an inquiry into the crime; but the party can only inſiſt upon ſuch defences by pleading them, the court can only take cognizance of them when pleaded.

The preſent proceeding would oblige the court to try the validity of the charge, by firſt hearing the defence; in the courſe of that hearing, not only the ſtate of the charge is ſuppoſed, but a reply to the defence by new facts is alſo taken by ſuppoſition; and, ſhould ſuch a method be permitted, your lordſhips would be placed in a ſituation very different from the exerciſe of judicial authority: for courts of juſtice are not inſtituted to decide a diſputation upon a theſis of law; their province is to decide upon real fact, not upon general or hypothetical propoſitions; nor can they pronounce the law, till the facts, from whence that law ariſes, are firſt eſtabliſhed.

The counſel for the priſoner are obliged to ſtate their argument thus: ſuppoſe, ſay they, the firſt marriage to have been ſolemnized, but a ſuit to have been inſtituted to impeach that marriage; in that ſuit, a ſentence pronounced againſt the marriage; ſuppoſe that ſuit and ſentence to have been fraudulent, yet even ſuch a ſentence ought to be concluſive, and to bar all inquiry into the crime of a ſecond marriage. The only anſwer, which I ſubmit to your lordſhips ſuch an argument at preſent demands, is, that a court of juſtice cannot ſuppoſe the fact of the marriage, nor the ſuit to impeach the legality of it; no ſuppoſition can be formed, whether the proceeding in that ſuit was fraudulent or was fair, the ſentence real or colourable; the parties muſt agree upon the facts before the court can be aſked to decide the law; if they do not admit the facts upon record, it remains for both parties to prove what they think material; then, and not till then, it is the duty of the court to pronounce the law.

No precedent has been quoted to ſhew, that a ſimilar proceeding was ever admitted in a court of criminal juriſdiction. One caſe only was faintly alluded to, by the learned gentleman who ſpoke firſt yeſterday. The caſe of Jones and Bow, cited from Carthew; where the reporter ſays, that, 'by way of anticipation to the evidence that the plaintiff 'was about to give, the defendant produced a ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court in a cauſe of jactitation; a debate aroſe upon the effect of that ſentence, and the court being of opinion that the ſentence 'was concluſive, the cauſe between the parties ended.'

That cauſe was an action of ejectment to try the title to an eſtate. A proceeding by ejectment is well known to be entirely fictitious. In a ſuit founded upon a legal fiction to try a queſtion of right, where the judgment is not concluſive on either party, there may be no miſchief in preſſing forward to the concluſion without an exact attention to forms. The caſe therefore does not prove, that in a civil action, where judgment is given upon the mere right, ſuch proceeding could have been allowed: but a criminal proceeding requires ſtill more preciſion than a civil ſuit, and a deviation from the forms would very ſeldom be favourable to the accuſed. If the priſoner is not confined to the defence pleaded, neither would the proſecutor be confined to the matter of the charge; the judge and the jury would mutually encroach upon each other: nor could there be a more dangerous ſource of error and confuſion, than to permit a mixed conſideration of law and of fact, of hypotheſis and of argument, to be introduced into criminal trials. The only plea to the preſent indictment is, not guilty: the argument your lordſhips have heard ſuppoſes, that ſuch a plea ought not to have been put in; that there is a more prudent and cautious method of defence which you are deſired to hear upon ſuppoſitions, without the form or ſubſtance of a plea.

The counſel for the proſecution are bound to oppoſe this experiment. It would ill become them, acting in the character of a public accuſer, to advance any doctrine which they did not believe to be founded in law, or to ſuppreſs an objection to a proceeding which, as it is novel, cannot paſs into a precedent without great danger and miſchief. Should that objection prove, that the argument, which in this ſtage of the buſineſs the counſel in defence have been permitted to urge, is inadmiſſible, your lordſhips will however have no reaſon to regret the delay it has occaſioned, nor to deem that time miſ-ſpent, which has been employed in the preſent enquiry, ſince the object of it, though fruitleſs, has been directed to the relief of a party accuſed. Suppoſing then the debate upon the effect of the ſentence urged in bar of the trial to be proper at this time, I ſhall proceed to the conſideration of the argument.——The propoſition advanced is this; that in an indictment upon the ſtatute of James I. for marrying a ſecond huſband, living the firſt, a ſentence of an eccleſiaſtical court, in a cauſe of jactitation of marriage, pronouncing, that it does not as yet appear to that court that there hath been a firſt marriage, is a concluſive evidence that no ſuch marriage ever was had.

In order to make out this propoſition, the counſel contend, firſt, that it is an univerſal rule, that the decrees of courts, having competent juriſdiction, bind all perſons, and conclude in all caſes, in any manner touching the matter decided: ſecondly, they maintain, that the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court in queſtion is a deciſion: they urge in the third place, that the rule firſt laid down admits of no exceptions, but applies with more force to criminal, than to civil caſes. In the laſt place they inſiſt, that ſuppoſing this ſentence to be the effect of fraud, colluſion, and agreement between the parties to the ſuppoſed ſuit in the Spiritual Court, it is notwithſtanding concluſive upon all other courts, and the fraud can only be examined in that court whoſe juſtice has been thus enſnared.

My lords, I have ſtated fairly the argument on the other ſide, which reſts on theſe four propoſitions; and, were I only engaged in a diſputation with the learned gentlemen upon a mere theſis in law, I ſhould be inclined by a denial to inſiſt upon better proofs than have been offered in ſupport of theſe propoſitions. I feel myſelf however under a very different impreſſion of duty, as one of the counſel for the proſecution. The priſoner may take every advantage that the law will allow; from us your lordſhips have a right to expect every conceſſion that juſtice requires. I ſhall therefore admit (as far as in my conſcience I think them admiſſible) the ſeveral propoſitions urged by the oppoſite ſide, ſtate with as much fidelity as I can the true limitations of the doctrines advanced, and aſſert no point but what I hold to be clear law, ſupported by undoubted authority.

It is contended, in the firſt place, to be a univerſal rule, that ſentences of courts of competent juriſdiction are binding upon all other judicatures, in which any inquiry ariſes into the matter determined: that propoſition I conceive to be much too largely ſtated. The rules and principles that I have learnt upon that ſubject, I will very briefly ſubmit to your lordſhips, not meaning to argue, but only to ſtate them.

It is a general maxim of law, that the ſentence of a competent court binds the parties, and all perſons deriving any right under them; as to third perſons, it neither prejudices nor benefits them.

Another maxim, equally true, is, that a ſentence of a court having competent juriſdiction, if it comes collaterally before another court in another ſuit, ſhall be preſumed juſt till the contrary appears. One court has no authority to direct the judgment of another; but it is a fair preſumption, that what hath been decided, hath been juſtly decided; it is, however, but a preſumption, and in moſt caſes it obtains only till the contrary is proved.

I admit at the ſame time, that there are caſes, in which that preſumption may amount to a concluſion. Where the ſentence has been pronounced in rem, by a judicature having a peculiar and excluſive juriſdiction over the ſubject-matter of the cauſe, the effect of ſuch a deciſion is not to be controverted in any other civil ſuit. Theſe propoſitions are founded in the conſent of all lawyers, who have treated of general law, and are proved by a ſeries of judicial authorities: to quote them would lead into an unneceſſary detail upon a part of the argument, which does not immediately apply to the deciſion of the point in queſtion.

The caſes cited on the other ſide agree with the diſtinction I have mentioned. A ſentence of a court of Admiralty upon the forfeiture of a ſhip; the judgment of the court of Exchequer condemning goods as forfeited; are each of them concluſive upon this principle, that the ſentence is in rem, the court has pronounced upon the property itſelf. The caſes quoted of ſentences of an eccleſiaſtical court, are all in matters of which that Court has the peculiar and excluſive cognizance. The Eccleſiaſtical court has the ſole juriſdiction of caſes teſtamentary, and of caſes matrimonial, to a certain effect; if therefore a queſtion ariſes, who is intitled to the perſonal eſtate of a man deceaſed with or without a teſtament, the probate of the will, or a grant of adminiſtration, gives the title to the property in queſtion; the effect of it cannot be conteſted in other courts collaterally and incidentally, becauſe no other court has power to controvert the act, no other authority can confer the title to the thing in diſpute. Such ſentences are in rem.

The caſe is very different, where the deciſion is upon a perſonal contract, or any matter ariſing out of the various civil relations of perſons, in which the original cognizance of the cauſe might have come before the court. Where that deciſion is offered as an evidence of right, there the judgment of the foreign court can only have effect ſo far as it is juſt; no authority belongs to it but from its internal juſtice; for the court in which it is produced owes no obedience to the court which pronounced it, and is equally competent to give the law to the parties. The effect of the ſentence is beneficial, however, for the party who has obtained it; becauſe the juſtice of it is preſumed, the truth of the facts on which it proceeded is admitted without proof, and the adverſe party is obliged to demonſtrate the falſhood or iniquity of it.

In ſupport of this diſtinction, I will only mention to your lordſhips one authority of a late date, which I ſelect from a multitude of caſes, not merely becauſe it is a determination in the laſt reſort, but becauſe the rule of law is ſtated in the judgment. The caſe I allude to was decided by your lordſhips on the 4th of March 1771, upon appeal from the court of Seſſion in Scotland, by Sinclair againſt Fraſer. The queſtion there was, what ſhould be the effect of a judgment obtained by the appellant in Jamaica? The perſon, againſt whom that judgment was directed, was ſued upon it in Scotland. It happened, that the court of Seſſion refuſed to give any effect to it, and held the party bound to prove the ground, the nature, the extent of his demand. From that determination an appeal was taken to your lordſhips, the judgment of the court of Seſſion was reverſed, and the words of the order of reverſal were, 'that the judgment complained of be reverſed;' and declare 'that the judgment of the court of Jamaica ought 'to be received as evidence prima facie of the debt, and that it lies on the 'defendant to impeach the juſtice of it, or to ſhew that it was irregularly 'and unduly obtained.'

My lords, the authority that I quote to your lordſhips will have conſiderable effect in a ſubſequent part of the argument: at preſent, I only urge it as a proof, that though in caſes where the ſentence is in rem, where the court has a peculiar and excluſive juriſdiction to determine the title to the thing in queſtion, the preſumption in favour of the judgment is admitted to be concluſive; yet where the judgment is applied to perſonal rights, to matters of which other courts have equal cognizance, the party againſt whom it is urged is at liberty to impeach it, to ſhew that it is not juſt, or that it has been irregularly and unduly obtained.

This being the diſtinction in civil caſes, the queſtion ariſes, how far theſe rules are applicable to criminal ſuits? what effect ought the ſentence of any civil court to have as a bar to the juſtice of the ſtate in the trial and puniſhment of crimes?

The counſel for the priſoner argue, that if the civil right is deſtroyed by the ſentence of a competent court, to examine into the crime is an abſurd inquiry; where there is no relation, there is no duty, and there can be no breach of it. Is this ſo? Is it then competent to a party by any act, deſtructive of the civil relation, to aboliſh the duties of that relation? Perſons may deprive themſelves of the benefit of any civil right, may diſpenſe with the advantages of any relation of life, may be intitled to claim neither as wife, mother, nor child; but can they abſolve themſelves from the duties that belong to the natural relation? Can they, by their own act, abſolve themſelves from the ſacred duties of thoſe civil relations which, in a ſtate of ſociety, are natural relations?

My lords, the propoſition I contend for is ſo far from abſurd, that the contrary of that propoſition would involve in it the moſt manifeſt abſurdity: the civil intereſt is important only to the parties themſelves. Whether an eſtate belongs to one perſon or another, whether a party is intitled to rank and diſtinction, to whom related, whoſe wife ſhe is? the queſtion is of great indifference to ſociety: but if the eſtate, the relation, the rank, is obtained by criminal means; if the ſituation which a perſon chuſes to relinquiſh is attended with duties, the advantage, but not the duties, may be waved; the peace and order of ſociety muſt be maintained, and no violation of them can paſs with impunity.

If there is an univerſal propoſition of law, I take this to be ſo, that no determination between party and party can preclude public juſtice from inquiring into the criminal tendency of their actions. Daily experience proves this in the moſt trivial inſtances. An action is brought for an aſſault, the party fails in it, there is a verdict againſt him; it does not prevent a proſecution by indictment, upon the very ſame fact, againſt the very ſame party. In ſuch an indictment was it ever pleaded, that an action had been brought againſt the party for that alledged treſpaſs and beating, and that he had been acquitted upon that action? The learned and reverend judges will inform your lordſhips, that there is not a ſitting or an aſſize without ſome inſtance of this ſort. A queſtion may ariſe in an action upon property, to which of two perſons a thing, an horſe for example, belongs. It is decided to belong to A. and not to B.: would that deciſion bar an indictment againſt A. for ſtealing the horſe? It is no anſwer to public juſtice, that he has acquired that property, when the object of the criminal inquiry is, whether he has committed a crime in acquiring it.

The propoſition advanced on the other ſide, that a ſentence in a civil ſuit is concluſive in a criminal proceeding, was not ſo much preſſed upon any deduction of argument, as aſſerted on the authority of a caſe cited from Strange's Reports; in which it was ſaid to have been determined, that the grant of the probate of a will by the Eccleſiaſtical Court was a bar to an indictment for felony in forging that will.

In the firſt place, your lordſhips will give me leave to aſk, does it enter into the imagination of any lawyer, that the ſame rule would take place with regard to a will of real eſtate? Had ſuch a will been produced in judgment, the witneſſes to it examined, the validity of it canvaſſed, a judgment in favour of it, even a decree of the court of Chancery eſtabliſhing it, I do preſume it will not be maintained, that all thoſe proceedings would prevent a proſecution for the forgery of that will. The ſame thing might happen in the caſe of a deed; a deed may have been eſtabliſhed by a decree; the property of an eſtate ſettled by it, irretrievably perhaps; would there be no puniſhment for the crime, if it ſhould be diſcovered afterwards, that that deed was a manifeſt forgery? The eſtate might be held indefeaſibly by the party who had obtained it; but I do not conceive that his having got poſſeſſion of that eſtate, having obtained an advantage of which human laws could not deprive him, would be an anſwer to human juſtice why he ſhould not be puniſhed for the crime by which he had gained that advantage.

It is ſuppoſed, however, that there has been a deciſion, that a probate of a will of perſonal eſtate bars an indictment for forging that will. Is the grant of a probate then an act of ſo high a nature, requiring ſo much judicial accuracy, that it is not to be queſtioned? A probate in common form is not even a judicial act, it is merely official; there is no litigation, no inquiry; the conſcience of the judge is not engaged in it. What is the purpoſe of forging a will of perſonal eſtate? To obtain a probate; for without it there might be a criminal intention, but no prejudice could ariſe to any perſon from that intention: ſhall it be ſaid then, that the accompliſhment of the crime is to afford protection for itſelf? The authority relied on is a note in Sir John Strange's Reports, under the name of the King and Vincent; that a perſon being indicted for forging of a will, upon producing a probate, a probate in the common form was held a bar to the proof of the forgery, and he was by the judge acquitted. This is the whole note. It is a great misfortune that notes, very often taken upon looſe information, are given to the world under reſpectable names. The collections of a lawyer, made only for his own uſe, muſt abound with errors; in publiſhing ſuch collections many of theſe will eſcape; and this is not the only inſtance of miſtake in that collection. I conceive it to be impoſſible at any period, at any time of the day, by the negligence of any judge who might happen to be preſent at the Old-Bailey, that a priſoner could have been acquitted of a charge of forgery upon ſuch a defence. I ſay this with confidence; becauſe, in the inquiry that hath been made into the caſes determined, many have been found, where parties have been tried and convicted for forging a will of perſonal eſtate, and the evidence to prove the publication of the forged will has been the probate, produced by the officer of the court, and his teſtimony that the priſoner was the perſon who obtained the probate.

Mr. Attorney-General quoted to your lordſhips the caſe of the King and Murphy. The priſoner there had the double villainy to turn the charge upon his proſecutor. The trial was attended by counſel who do not uſually go to the Old-Bailey; it is ſtated very fully by a ſhort-hand writer at the end of the State-Trials. The caſe of the King and Sterling was alſo mentioned; it is very manifeſt that that unfortunate perſon was unjuſtly hanged, if the caſe in Strange is law. Sterling's caſe was this: he was indicted for having forged a will, of which will he had obtained a probate, and under that title had transferred ſome ſtock. The perſon whoſe will he ſaid it was, was alive, and produced as the witneſs againſt him, and of courſe to impeach the probate of her own will. Abſurd as it may ſeem to doubt whether that evidence was competent, if the caſe of the King and Vincent was law, undoubtedly that witneſs ought not to have been permitted to prove her own exiſtence; ſhe was dead by irrefragable legal argument; but the event was different, and Mr. Sterling, notwithſtanding the probate, ſuffered for his crime.

Beſides theſe caſes, there was another in no very remote period, in which a party was tried for the forgery of a will, in September ſeſſions 1765, at the Old-Bailey. One Richardſon and one Carr were indicted for having forged a receipt for the payment of money, with intent to defraud a particular perſon, who was a ſeaman, intitled to wages: the common caſes of forgery of wills have been in the caſe of ſeamen. Upon the trial it appeared, that the receipt was given in the name of Jane Steward, who was the ſuppoſed executrix of a will of this ſeaman, which had been proved by the defendant Carr, upon the oath of the other defendant Richardſon. The learned judge, Mr. Baron Perrot, who tried them, was of opinion, that the priſoners ought to be acquitted of the charge of forging a receipt for the money; but, being ſatisfied from the evidence that Richardſon had forged the will, notwithſtanding it had appeared in the trial before him that a probate had been granted of that will, he remanded Richardſon to gaol to take his trial for the forgery of the will. Richardſon was accordingly tried in October ſeſſions 1765, for forging the will of John Steward, a mariner: the officer of the Prerogative Court proved upon that trial, that the will was brought to his office by Richardſon, and a probate of that will granted; and upon that proof he was convicted, and executed. The firſt learned judge had remanded him to priſon to take his trial at the enſuing ſeſſions for the forgery of a will, the probate of which was then in court; and upon the ſecond indictment, which was tried by the noble lord who preſides in the court of King's Bench, the priſoner was convicted notwithſtanding the will had been proved. Other caſes have been mentioned to your lordſhips to the ſame effect with theſe, which ſufficiently refute that ſingular caſe of the King and Vincent, the only authority to ſupport the argument, that the ſentence of an eccleſiaſtical court is a bar to an indictment.

Having thus removed the only obſtacle to the propoſition I meant to rely upon, that in a criminal matter a ſentence of a civil court ought not to be concluſive againſt a publick accuſation, I now proceed to a more limited and cloſe enquiry, what effect the ſentence of jactitation ought to have in this proceeding, an indictment for bigamy?

It is of no importance to the preſent enquiry to inveſtigate, by what means the cognizance of cauſes matrimonial and teſtamentary belongs not to the ſovereign of the ſtate, but is given to an order of men dedicated to the ſervice of religion. The fact is, that in the juriſprudence of this country, cauſes matrimonial and teſtimentary are of eccleſiaſtical cognizance. The right to try them is not derived from the king as the fountain of juſtice, nor exercifed by the king's court; but wherever the royal authority interpoſes, it is not as ſovereign of the ſtate, but as ſupreme head of the church. The law did not even interfere to puniſh the violation of the matrimonial rights, and adultery, which in moſt countries of Europe is treated as a crime, but was not conſidered in England as an offence puniſhable by the magiſtrate, but left to the correction of eccleſiaſtical cenſure. At length however the violation of conjugal duty, accompanied with the circumſtance of an open attack upon the order of ſociety, by a ſecond marriage, was, by ſpecial ſtatute, made a crime: when I ſay made a crime, I do not mean it was made more immoral; but it was made a ſubject of criminal cognizance by the magiſtrate. The learned counſel who ſpoke ſecond yeſterday contended, that this ſtatute gave no juriſdiction to the temporal courts to pronounce upon the legality of the marriage; but that the juriſdiction of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, as to the trial of the marriage, remained ſtill abſolute. It was neceſſary for his cauſe to attempt this argument; but to maintain this propoſition is a very difficult taſk. The legiſlature, fifty years after the Reformation, has declared that the crime of bigamy ſhall be puniſhable as a felony by the magiſtrate. To convict a perſon of that crime, muſt not the magiſtrate try him? Has he not the power to acquit or condemn him? Has he only an authority to inflict the puniſhment, as in old times, when the church delivered over the offender to the ſecular arm? and is the ſentence of the ſpiritual court to guide the conſcience of the judge and jury in the criminal court? The ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court in the preſent caſe is ſaid to be againſt the firſt marriage, and therefore it is urged the priſoner ought to be protected by it; but, if the argument is juſt, it muſt hold equally where the ſentence is for the marriage: it ſounds leſs harſh to contend that a party, declared not to be married in the firſt inſtance by the Spiritual Court, ſhall not be queſtioned for the ſecond marriage. But by the ſame rule we muſt conclude, that if the Spiritual Court had determined for the marriage in the firſt inſtance, and the fact of a ſecond marriage had been proved, it would not have been competent for the priſoner in an indictment for bigamy, ſo circumſtanced, to have made any defence: he is concluded by the ſentence, the judge and jury are bound to believe it, and, upon that ſentence, without examination, to convict and to puniſh.

The effect of the ſtatute I take to be very different: it has created a new offence, and for the trial of that offence the cognizance of the lawfulneſs of marriage is given to the temporal courts. As to all criminal conſequences, that court has cognizance to determine, as well as the Eccleſiaſtical Court, what is and what is not a legal marriage between the parties. That it has ſo, the caſe of Boyle and Boyle, quoted to your lordſhips for another purpoſe, is a clear proof: that was a prohibition iſſued to the Eccleſiaſtical Court to enter into an examination into that cauſe of marriage, which the court, in trying the indictment, had determined. The other caſe mentioned by the learned doctor is to the ſame effect. The two caſes differ only in this, that in one the party was convicted, in the other acquitted; but the court was of opinion in both, that the Eccleſiaſtical Court could not interfere.

It is unneceſſary however to have recourſe to authorities, for the ſtatute itſelf has decided this queſtion. The legiſlature ſeems to have had it in view, that a juriſdiction being newly given to the temporal courts in the trial of marriage, queſtions might ariſe, as between concurrent juriſdictions, what ſhould be the effect of ſentences pronounced by the Eccleſiaſtical Court. It was a wiſe foreſight in thoſe who compiled the ſtatute, to define in what caſes the ſentences of the eccleſiaſtical courts ought to preclude any enquiry for the crime; and it is defined in the words of the exception, 'that this act ſhall not extend to any per-'ſons divorced by the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, nor to any 'perſons where the former marriage has been by the Eccleſiaſtical Court 'declared void and null.' There are two caſes then put by the ſtatute, in which the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court protects the party againſt a criminal inquiry; ſentence of divorce, and ſentence of nullity of marriage: if therefore the Eccleſiaſtical Court, having competent juriſdiction, has either divorced the parties, or if it has pronounced ſentence of nullity of marriage, the ſentence in theſe two inſtances is concluſive: but the ſtatute has no exception in favour of a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation. There is no pretence to argue, that a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation is either a ſentence of divorce, or that ſentence which makes the marriage void and of no effect: no lawyer, no civilian can make that miſtake. What then does the exception prove? Two ſentences of the Eccleſiaſtical Court are recited in it, the third is omitted; and it is a general rule of law, that wherever a ſtatute excepts particular caſes, the exception of thoſe caſes extends the ſtatute to all caſes not excepted. That propoſition is too clear to require authorities to be cited in ſupport of it. The law therefore, which ſays the trial of polygamy ſhall proceed in all caſes, except where a ſentence of divorce, and except where a ſentence of nullity of marriage, has intervened, does virtually ſay, that a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation of marriage, which is neither of divorce nor of nullity, ſhall not bar the trial. I conceive therefore the ſtatute to have decided this queſtion.

The argument on the other ſide is put in a more plauſible form, by ſtating the defence to be founded upon a fact, of which the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court is the beſt evidence: there can be no double marriage, it is ſaid, becauſe the ſentence diſproves the firſt marriage. This mode of ſtating the argument makes it neceſſary to examine the nature of a ſuit for jactitation of marriage, in order to ſee what credit is due to the ſentence, when offered as evidence to diſprove the firſt marriage.

A ſuit for jactitation of marriage is, from beginning to end, totally ſingular. Some writers on the canon law derive its origin from the doctrine of pre-contracts, which, by the eccleſiaſtical law, conſtituted a marriage: and till that very miſchievous prejudice was deſtroyed by the late marriage-act, it is not ſurprizing that any attempt to leſſen the evil ſhould meet with encouragement. The form of the ſuit is this: the ſuppoſed huſband or wife complains to the eccleſiaſtical judge, that he or ſhe is a perſon free from all matrimonial contracts or engagements with the adverſe party, and ſo eſteemed by all neighbours, friends, and acquaintance; that the adverſe party, notwithſtanding the knowledge of this, has falſely and maliciouſly boaſted of a marriage with the party complaining; it concludes then, by ſuch falſe aſſertions an injury is committed, and prays that right may be done by declaring the party free from all matrimonial engagements with the other, and by enjoining that party perpetual ſilence. The party defendant may either ſay, I have not boaſted, I deny that fact; or, if he admits that he has boaſted, he is then to go on and alledge circumſtantially a marriage, which the other party denies, under the circumſtances alledged. If the marriage is not proved, then the court pronounces, that, ſo far as yet appears, the party complaining is free from matrimonial contract with the other party, and enjoins perpetual ſilence.

After this ſentence, ſo gravely pronounced, your lordſhips are told by all the learned doctors, and all the books of practice agree, that this injunction of perpetual ſilence continues no longer than till the party chuſes to talk again; and the perſon, to whom he may with the moſt perfect ſafety repeat his aſſertions, is the judge who enjoined him ſilence; for, it is agreed on all hands, that the party may at any time inform the court, that though it did not appear formerly that he was married, he can make it appear now; and ſuch proof is admiſſible.

The forms of all courts had probably a good original, and this ſuit may have been introduced to prevent a greater miſchief; but it is impoſſible to avoid colluſion in ſuch a proceeding, which has no avowed object, but to correct the indiſcretion of a ſuppoſed diſcourſe; and which, as the learned doctors on the other ſide truly ſtate, has no termination; and between the parties themſelves never obtains the beſt effect of a judgment, to put an end to litigation. In modern times, ſuch ſuits have ſeldom been commenced but to favour ſome indirect purpoſe; and were the ſentences allowed to have the effect that is now contended for, were they to be a bar to all criminal enquiry, it might be expected that ſuits, which, as the learned doctors ſtate, may be carried on without end, would very frequently ſpring up.

Nothing can be further from the temper of my mind upon the preſent occaſion, than to uſe a ludicrous argument: but when the uncontroulable effect of ſuch ſentences as theſe, ſo contrived and framed for fraud, was urged yeſterday; and while, to leſſen the objection to them, it was gravely argued, that no great miſchief could happen from the deciſion, becauſe you may reverſe this ſentence to-morrow, that the next day, and a third after that, and that the ſuit was in its nature eternal; an ingenious perſon among the byſtanders was calculating, how many wives a man that had a taſte for polygamy, might marry with impunity; and I think he made it out, according to the probable duration of ſuch a ſuit, that a man between twenty-one and thirty-five might, with good induſtry, marry ſeventy-five wives by ſentences of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, each ſentence ſtanding good till reverſed, and all reverſible by that judicature.

My lords, the argument is ſerious, though it preſents a ludicrous idea; for one conſequence would probably attend a deciſion in ſupport of the authority of ſuch a ſentence. The marriage-act put an end to that terrible diſgrace of a civilized country, Fleet marriages: while they ſubſiſted, it was a common practice for indigent women of eaſy virtue to get a Fleet huſband to protect them from their debts. If a ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court is to have effect againſt all but the parties, a cauſe of jactitation will ſupply the place of a Fleet marriage, and furniſh an huſband by ſentence, whom the lady may remove whenever he proves inconvenient. This is but one inſtance, and in the loweſt claſs of the evils, that would follow from allowing ſuch ſentences to be interpoſed againſt publick juſtice, or the rights of third perſons. What guard can there be againſt uncertain iſſue, uncertain rank, and all the numerous miſchiefs that ariſe from doubt and colluſion, introduced in the relations that form the bonds of ſociety?

Were all conſiderations of the conſequences attending ſuch a deciſion to be laid aſide, the very form of the ſentence argues againſt its being concluſive. What ſays the Eccleſiaſtical Court in that ſentence? 'As far 'as yet appears, no marriage is proved.' The verdict upon an indictment will ſay, 'it does now appear, that a marriage is proved.' The two propoſitions do not claſh with each other; there is no contradiction in them: to the party it is ſaid, You have not proved the marriage; a publick accuſer does prove the marriage; the juſtice of the country has brought out the evidence of that fact, which the party either did not incline, or was not able to produce. There is no repugnance in the different propoſitions, no incongruity in ſuppoſing that the ſentence may ſtand as between the parties, and yet ſhall have no concluſion either as to the publick, or as to third perſons.

The argument in favour of the ſentence was ſupported by this dilemma. What becomes of this ſentence, if the indictment for bigamy goes on? Is it null, or has it any effect? Is the party a wife, or no wife? I anſwer, to all civil effects no wife; the party has bereaved herſelf of any right to benefit by the relation; to all criminal effects a wife, becauſe that relation, the duties conſequent upon it, and the reſponſibility for the breach of thoſe duties, cannot be deſtroyed by the act of the party. I could quote to your lordſhips other caſes, where the party takes no benefit from his act, where he holds the ſituation only to make himſelf amenable to the juſtice of his country. I refer to a known caſe: a man had committed an act of bankruptcy by colluſion with a creditor, and a commiſſion of bankruptcy was taken out againſt him, the object of which was, to procure a diſcharge from his debts. He choſe to conceal a part of his effects, for which he was indicted upon the ſtatute making it a capital felony for a bankrupt to be guilty of any wilful concealment: it came out clear as the light, that he was no bankrupt, that is, no bankrupt to any civil effect; he could not avail himſelf of that commiſſion of bankruptcy againſt any creditor that had a mind to diſpute it, except the creditor who had colluded with him; but though he was in fact no bankrupt, he was tried and convicted as ſuch.

My lords, after the indulgence with which your lordſhips have been ſo good as to hear me ſo long upon this ſubject, I am ſorry to be obliged ſtill to treſpaſs a little longer upon your patience, when I conſider the fourth propoſition, which certainly is not the leaſt material; that is, that a ſentence, infected with fraud, to which colluſion may be objected, is no bar in any cauſe. My lords, upon that head the principle is ſo plain, that the illuſtration of it will not run into much length, and the authorities are ſo deciſive, that I ſhall only ſtate, and not argue upon them.

A ſentence obtained by fraud and colluſion is no ſentence. What is a ſentence? It is not an inſtrument with a bit of wax and the ſeal of a court put to it; it is not an inſtrument with the ſignature of a perſon calling himſelf a regiſter; it is not ſuch a quantity of ink beſtowed upon ſuch a quantity of ſtamped paper: a ſentence is a judicial determination of a cauſe agitated between real parties, upon which a real intereſt has been ſettled: in order to make a ſentence, there muſt be a real intereſt, a real argument, a real proſecution, a real defence, a real deciſion. Of all theſe requiſites, not one takes place in the caſe of a fraudulent and colluſive ſuit: there is no judge; but a perſon, inveſted with the enſigns of a judicial office, is miſemployed in liſtening to a fictitious cauſe propoſed to him: there is no party litigating, there is no party defendant, no real intereſt brought into queſtion; and, to uſe the words of a very ſenſible civilian on this point, fabula, non judicium, hoc eſt; in ſcena, non in foro, res agitur.

The ground then upon which I contend, that a colluſive ſentence is no bar, is ſhortly this; that ſuch a ſentence is a mere nullity. But it is inſiſted, that the court which pronounced the ſentence can alone declare the nullity of it, and, till repealed, it muſt ſtand good and valid. The authorities to which I mean to refer upon this head, will refute that argument, at the ſame time that they prove the general doctrine.

The firſt is my lord Coke's reaſoning in Fermor's caſe, 3 Coke 77: he concludes the reſolution of the caſe in this manner: 'Thereupon it was 'concluded, that if a recovery in dower, or other real action, if a remitter 'to a feme-covert or an infant, if a warranty, if a ſale in market overt, if 'letters patent of the king, if preſentations and admittances, that is to 'ſay, if all acts temporal and ſpiritual ſhould be avoided by covin, for 'the ſame reaſon a fine in the principal caſe levied by fraud and covin 'ſhall not bind.' Nothing can be more explicit than theſe words to ſhew, that there is no neceſſity that the covin ſhould be proſecuted in the court in which the judgment was obtained. The caſe of Lloyd and Maddocks in Moore, 917, is a direct and a plain authority: there a fraudulent judgment was ſet up againſt a plea of a legatee in the Spiritual Court. The queſtion in the court of King's Bench was, whether the Spiritual Court ſhould be prohibited to enter into the conſideration of the fraud of the judgment, which is certainly not a matter of eccleſiaſtical cognizance; but the court was of opinion, that the covin was aptly examinable in a court chriſtian to that effect, and therefore the prohibition was denied.

My lords, the other authorities are more modern, though not more deciſive upon the point than this. The firſt I mention to your lordſhips is the caſe of Prudham and Phillips: there is a very bad and a very inaccurate note of it in Sir John Strange: the note, from which I cite it, is a manuſcript note of Mr. Ford. In that caſe it was determined by lord chief juſtice Willes, that a fraudulent and colluſive ſentence againſt Mrs. Conſtantia Phillips was binding upon her; but he concludes it was binding upon no other party: the fraud was a matter of fact, which if uſed in obtaining judgment was a deceit upon the court, a fraud upon ſtrangers, who as they could not come in to reverſe it, they could only alledge it was fraudulent. He ſaid in that caſe, that any creditor of hers might reply that it was fraudulent, and avoid the effect of it. The other caſes I refer to are, my lord Hardwicke's authority in the caſe of Roach and Garvin, 1ſt Vezey 159; and in the caſe of Brownſword and Edwards, 2d Vezey 246. In the caſe of Roach and Garvin, the queſtion was upon the effect of a marriage, ſaid to be eſtabliſhed by the ſentence of a court in France. Lord Hardwicke enters into the conſideration of it thus: 'The 'queſtion is, whether this is a proper ſentence, in a proper cauſe, and 'between proper parties; whether a marriage is had in fact, or any con-'tract in præſenti, as a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court would be 'concluſive, unleſs there be colluſion, which would overturn the whole.' In the other caſe the ground is exactly the ſame.

From theſe caſes, I conclude it to have been the uniform opinion of all the great judges who ſat in Weſtminſter-Hall, from the time of lord Coke down to the preſent time (and the courts were never more ably filled) that fraud and colluſion not only vitiates, but abſolutely annuls; and that a ſentence obtained by fraud is, literally, no ſentence at all; therefore the objection of ſuch an inſtrument, of ſo much paper and writing, is the objection of a mere nullity, and can have no effect neither in a civil nor in a criminal ſuit. Having troubled your lordſhips ſo very long, I will take up no more of your time, even to recapitulate the heads of the argument, but haſten to return my humble thanks for the great indulgence I have already experienced.

Mr. Dunning.

My lords, I purpoſe to give your lordſhips very little trouble: indeed, I ſhould be without an apology, if I had thought of giving you much, finding, in the ſtation which I hold in this cauſe, the ſubject completely exhauſted; and I cannot but ſuppoſe your lordſhips attention in a great meaſure tired, notwithſtanding the occaſional relief which the entertaining parts of the cauſe have afforded, has given you. I have the leſs inclination to give your lordſhips much trouble, as I feel a degree of ſurprize, that it ſhould have been thought neceſſary for the counſel on the part of the proſecution to give your lordſhips any.

My lords, the ſubject for immediate conſideration is, the competency of obtruding this ſentence, in this ſtage of the cauſe, to ſtop the cauſe here, and to require of your lordſhips to decide it, without any regard to the truth or the juſtice of the caſe: ſuch however it is contended is the effect of this paper, that is offered to your lordſhips under the name of a ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court.

The novelty of the attempt it is not my intention to expatiate upon: it has been truly obſerved to your lordſhips, that ſome prejudice at leaſt may be expected in the minds of your lordſhips againſt an attempt ſo novel; for though I am not ſo blind an admirer of antiquity as to take for granted, that every thing that is new is therefore wrong; ſure I am, I am warranted in expecting your lordſhips concurrence in thinking, that thoſe, who propoſe at this time of day to introduce into the judicature of this country a new practice, ought to be prepared with ſuch reaſons as ſhould compel your lordſhips aſſent. This I think may be fairly inſiſted, upon the head of novelty.

My lords, the gentlemen undertake to maintain, firſt, that this evidence is competent and admiſſible; ſecondly, that it is concluſive; and thirdly, they inſiſt on this concluſion, not only upon the ſuppoſition, that it is a ſentence fairly obtained between real parties, after an adverſe agitation of the queſtion, which it is ſuppoſed to have decided; but though all theſe circumſtances ſhould be totally wanting, and though the contrary of them all ſhould be the truth of the caſe, the ſentence is inſiſted on as equally concluſive. In that extent it is, that the gentlemen have undertaken to maintain this propoſition; and a very conſiderable taſk it ſeems to me they have undertaken. My lords, I conſider the ſentence as read only de bene eſſe, merely that your lordſhips may know what the contents of it are, that you may have the aſſiſtance of that knowledge in judging not only of the ultimate effect of it, but of the propriety of receiving it at all in this ſtage of the buſineſs. At the firſt bluſh, to be ſure it ſeems a little abſurd, that your lordſhips ſhould be to decide the cauſe before you have the ſmalleſt knowledge of what the caſe is, that is to be ſtated upon the part of the proſecution. It is certainly neceſſary for thoſe that are to judge of this paper, to know what it is. It is a ſentence in a court, of which your lordſhips heard yeſterday abundant commendation. It was obſervable that thoſe who were moſt laviſh in that commendation, were leaſt acquainted with the practice of that court. The firſt of the learned doctors ſpoke with a very becoming modeſty of the court in which he practiſes. The other explained to your lordſhips the nature of a jactitation ſuit as concluding nothing, being to be revived at any time, and conſequently having no end. It was contended by all the gentlemen, that this court was entitled not only to what on the part of the proſecutor we ſhould have had no difficulty perhaps to have admitted, to co-equality with the courts of temporal juriſdiction, but to ſomething ſuperior; it was contended that there was ſomething in the nature of this ſubject that made it peculiarly the province of that court to judge of and to decide upon: not that they have better means of information, not that they have better rules of deciſion; but from ſomething unexplained in the conſtitution of the court, it was rather aſſumed than attempted to be proved, that to that court excluſively belong matrimonial queſtions, queſtions on the rights of marriage, and even of the facts of marriage. I am perſuaded your lordſhips all go before me in feeling a conviction, that there is not in that extent a foundation for that claim: yet this peculiarity of juriſdiction, and the conſequential neceſſity, in order to get rid of the ſentence, to reſort again to that juriſdiction, appeared to me to be the points principally inſiſted on. Neither of them, I truſt, your lordſhips will think are made out at preſent. I am conſidering the firſt. That to certain purpoſes, and with a view to certain conſequences, the Spiritual Court is the only court in which queſtions of matrimony can be agitated, is moſt true. There alone it is, that the party deprived of, and complaining of the want of conjugal rights, muſt reſort to ſeek them: there it is, where the party ſuppoſed to be injured by a falſe claim of a marriage, when none exiſts, can obtain redreſs for that injury: but, to other purpoſes, and various are thoſe purpoſes in which the queſtion of marriage ariſes, whether it is to be examined into with a view to temporal or ſpiritual advantages, whether it is to be examined into with a view to rights derived from it, or puniſhments for crimes committed in relation to it, to the temporal and not to the ſpiritual courts belongs, I conceive, this queſtion of marriage. My lords, to ſuppoſe otherwiſe would be to deny in fact, that your lordſhips ſit here with any juriſdiction at all; for if it were true in the extent in which it was contended, that to the Spiritual Court excluſively belongs the conſideration and deciſion of the queſtion, marriage or no marriage, it will follow by a neceſſary conſequence, that if there were no ſuch ſentence as the preſent to be thruſt in our way, and to create this temporary difficulty, for ſuch I truſt it will prove to be, if there had been no deciſion in the Spiritual Court at all, your lordſhips would only have been in the poſſeſſion of this cauſe for the purpoſe of writing to the biſhop to know how the fact ſtood, and from his certificate to take your ideas of the queſtion which you are to decide upon. The gentlemen muſt maintain not only that there was not at the common law any thing like a juriſdiction, but that this ſtatute, which means in terms to give a juriſdiction, has not in point of effect given any. I am at a loſs to find a way, conſiſtent with what the gentlemen have maintained, to deliver them from that conſequence. If they inſiſt, that no temporal court has a power to enquire into a queſtion of marriage, it will go to that extent. They have made a diſtinction between thoſe caſes, in which the queſtion is the point of the cauſe, and in which it ariſes incidentally. The queſtion does not ariſe at all, unleſs it ariſes materially: if there be any thing in the diſtinction, let us ſee a little how it will help this argument. Was the marriage the giſt of this cauſe in the Spiritual Court? No: the lady applies to the Spiritual Court, aſſuming that there was no marriage, complaining of an injury, which conſiſts in the circumſtance of a man who was not her huſband taking to himſelf and boaſting (as a man would be apt to boaſt in ſuch circumſtances) of the honour of bearing that relation to her.

This cauſe is not in its nature a queſtion of marriage, but of defamation. If that, which the lady ſuggeſted, had been admitted to be the truth of the caſe, he would have been to excuſe or extenuate his offence, juſt as the nature of his caſe would enable him to do, by either denying that he had boaſted, or ſtating what had led him into it: but this defendant ſays, No: I have held that language, which you call boaſting: I will not diſpute with you the propriety of that appellation: I have called this lady my wife; becauſe, whether it be my good or ill fortune, ſhe is my wife. It is for that reaſon, and that reaſon alone, that I have held this language, which is imputed to me as a crime: I am no criminal in holding this language, for that is my ſituation, and this is my defence. Thus it is, that the queſtion of marriage is introduced into the cauſe: it is inſiſted upon as a defence; as a matter material to her defence it is that the queſtion of marriage in this cauſe ariſes. Is it leſs incidental or more direct than the ſame queſtion ariſing in the ordinary way, in which it ariſes in temporal courts? A perſon, claiming to be the legitimate ſon of his father, commences an ejectment, in which the queſtion of legitimacy turns out to be the only queſtion in the cauſe: it is eſſential to his ſupporting his claim, that the court, who are to judge of it, and the jury that are to decide upon it, ſhould be ſatisfied of the facts, that the claimant is the eldeſt and the legitimate ſon of the father. The point of marriage is not the point of the ſuit directly, immediately, oſtenſibly, and upon the face of the record in that cauſe; but incidentally, materially, and neceſſarily that point becomes a point in the cauſe. Juſt thus, in my apprehenſion, this cauſe ſtands; and, as applied to this cauſe, the gentlemen cannot avail themſelves of the diſtinction between the juriſdiction to be exerciſed incidentally, and to be exerciſed directly, upon the ſubject of marriage. One of the learned doctors repreſented his ideas of this juriſdiction exerciſed in the Spiritual Court, as if it was a juriſdiction to decide upon an abſtract queſtion. I am perſuaded the learned doctor in the uſe of that word meant only to ſay, that in their forms of proceeding, and in ſome of thoſe cauſes which are inſtituted in their courts, the right of marriage, in contradiſtinction to the fact of marriage, was more immediately pertinent than in ſome of the proceedings in temporal courts; which to be ſure it is. In any other ſenſe of the word, the learned doctor uſed it inaccurately; for that court, any more than this or any court, has no juriſdiction to try abſtract queſtions of any ſort. No queſtion ought to be agitated in any court whatever, unleſs it be a real queſtion ſpringing from a real intereſt, and between real parties. To agitate any other queſtion is an inſult to the court. There is a ſenſe in which the court may be ſaid to have agitated this, in the nature of an abſtract queſtion; for it is certainly true, if our inſtructions have any foundation in truth, no one circumſtance of the actual caſe of the parties was before the court, or made any part of their enquiry. I truſt, I ſhall be thought to have done enough at leaſt for the Eccleſiaſtical Court in admitting, that their ſentences are equal to our judgments; that they are not entitled to more, I may ſafely contend, when I am admitting, that they are entitled to as much attention as is due to a decree of a court of equity or a judgment of a court of law. In ſuch an admiſſion, at one time I ſhould have been thought to have gone much too far: I truſt, the learned doctors will forgive me, if I cannot carry my civility any farther. God be thanked we live at a time, when a better underſtanding of the ſubject, and a more liberal way of thinking upon every ſubject, has ſo far aboliſhed the antient differences between the different judicatures in this country, that we and the learned doctors may meet together without quarrelling. Their proceedings in caſes in which it is competent to them to proceed, deſerve the ſame attention and faith as thoſe of temporal courts. This appears to me to reduce the claim, upon the part of thoſe that are to ſupport this ſentence, preciſely to this ſituation; and it is impoſſible to carry it one jot further: it is an opinion of a court, not having ſuperior or excluſive, but having a concurrent juriſdiction of this queſtion; having competent power to decide, and having no powers to exclude another deciſion elſewhere, where, for other purpoſes, criminal or civil, it may come to be diſcuſſed, according to the forms which thoſe different judicatures uſually obſerve in their proceedings, totally unobſtructed or aſſiſted by any attention to what has paſſed in any other judicature: this, I truſt, will be your lordſhips judgment upon the queſtion agitated between us, if it ſhould be material.

My lords, I laid in my claim to object to the admiſſibility of this piece of evidence, upon which, if I ſhould have the good fortune to have your lordſhips concurrence, the ſubſequent conſideration of the effects of it, if admitted, will become totally immaterial. I deny, that this is admiſſible in a court like this, a court of the higheſt criminal juriſdiction in this country.

My lords, it is ſo familiar, that it would be impertinent to that part of the court to which I have the honour to addreſs myſelf, which is more particularly converſant in the forms of proceeding in courts of juſtice, to be labouring to prove, that when a ſubject is examined into in the courſe of a criminal enquiry, under the form of an indictment, or of an information, what has paſſed or may paſs in the courſe of a civil enquiry upon the ſame ſubject and the ſame queſtion, is not only not regarded, but is not admitted. In the inſtance that was put, and many others that may occur to ſome of your lordſhips, it is perfectly notorious, and therefore neither requires argument nor proof, that the practice is certainly ſo. Let a man be acquitted in a court of criminal juriſdiction, it does not preclude a party, complaining of an injury ariſing from that act, which in a criminal court has been preſented as a crime, from ſeeking redreſs for the civil injury; and vice verſa, the fate of ſuch an action cannot be enquired into, much leſs cannot it preclude the proceedings in a ſubſequent criminal enquiry, taking its riſe from the ſame act. It has been enquired into in a court of one deſcription, it is now enquiring into in a court of another deſcription.

My lords, one reaſon (there are others, but) one reaſon why courts of criminal juriſdiction do not admit any account of what has paſſed upon the agitation of the queſtion in a court of civil juriſdiction may be, the liability to fraud and colluſion. I am not now arguing upon the fact of colluſion in this caſe: but it is obvious that if this would do, if the ſentence of a court of ſuch juriſdiction, whether eccleſiaſtical or temporal, will preclude a criminal enquiry, the receipt is of ample uſe; and all men may, if they pleaſe, cover themſelves againſt the penal conſequences of their crimes by inſtituting a friendly ſuit. Some ſuch we have known to have been ſo conducted as to eſcape the attention of the judges, who have not found out, till after the cauſe has been decided, that the cauſe has been colluſive. Caſes of this ſort are ſo open to fraud and colluſion, that for this reaſon, if there were no other, the courts of criminal juriſdiction will always reject ſuch evidence. I do not know that caſe has yet exiſted, where any perſon has done ſo ſtrange a thing, as to put it in the power of the court to receive or reject by offering ſuch evidence. Your lordſhips have had cited to you a caſe, which, having been treated as it deſerves, need not be repeated by me; the caſe of the King and Vincent. If it were poſſible to ſuppoſe that caſe could be law, that ſuppoſition is removed, when your lordſhips are told that a different opinion upon the ſame point has been held by the judges that have ſucceeded in the ſame court, and to whoſe knowledge or ability nobody, that knows who they are, would, I believe, object. The laſt of theſe caſes, the King and Stirling, I am aware, may be attempted to be diſtinguiſhed, and for what I know the firſt of them may, by ſaying that the queſtion did not occur, the objection was not taken in either of theſe caſes; but your lordſhips knowing before whom thoſe criminals were tried, will believe that no ſuch objection would have eſcaped theſe judges, if it had been founded in law, although no counſel objected to it, or although the criminals perhaps had not the aſſiſtance of counſel; therefore I conſider that caſe as fairly diſmiſſed, and the ſubſequent caſes as carrying an authority upon our ſide that more than overturns it: but I do not conceive, that even this was wanting; for the inſtrument in the caſe of the King and Vincent has no reſemblance to the ſentence now offered; it was an official inſtrument, neceſſary to give ſanction to a legal right. Letters of adminiſtration, or a probate, may be admiſſible; but it does not by any means follow, that a ſentence like this is admiſſible here: if it be, it muſt be equally admiſſible on all ſides. The gentlemen argue, that your lordſhips ſhould receive it, ſhould act upon it, ſhould conclude upon it. Why? Becauſe it is a ſentence reſcinding the marriage, declaring that there was no marriage; that is the import of this ſentence, and therefore it operates in their favour, and therefore it happens that they produce it. Let me invert the caſe; let me ſuppoſe, that when this lady inſtituted that ſuit, the party, who was the object of it, had ſupported that defence, as we conceive he was very well able to have done, and that in conſequence the cauſe had ended in a declaration or a ſentence, that there was a marriage: in that caſe, would it have been evidence upon the part of the proſecutor? Would it have been attended with thoſe conſequences, which they are claiming for it now upon the part of the perſon proſecuted? Would your lordſhips have endured, that the proſecutor ſhould have come here to ſupport this indictment by no other evidence, than the production of a ſentence in a ſuit like this in the Spiritual Court, by which that court had determined Mr. Hervey and the lady he had married were huſband and wife? Can I poſſibly ſtate it to any mind that comprehends it, that does not at the ſame time revolt at the apparent hardſhip and injuſtice of ſuch an idea? And yet is there any thing more true, than that a record cannot be evidence of one ſide, which would not, if it had imported the reverſe, have been evidence, and with equal force, of the other? I conceive it to be one of the fundamental rules to determine what evidence of this nature is or is not admiſſible, that if it could not have been admitted on behalf of the party objecting to it, ſuppoſing its import had been favourable to him, ſo neither ſhall it be admitted on the part of the perſon propoſing it. I truſt I may be warranted in preſuming that your lordſhips think as I do; that in order to ſupport this indictment ſomething more than ſuch a ſentence would be required from us; and that the legiſlature in making this new proviſion meant, that the fact ſhould be enquired into, as all other facts are enquired into; that the relation ſhould be proved by thoſe who were witneſſes to it, by thoſe who can prove the confeſſion of the parties to it, or by thoſe who can give ſuch other evidence as courts of criminal juriſdiction are authoriſed to act upon. Can any thing then be more obviouſly unſuitable to any ideas of juſtice, than that the enquiry ſhould be precluded by a record in favour of one of the parties, which might have been as favourable to the other party, and which, if it had been, would not have been regarded?

If your lordſhips think fit to admit this evidence, and by ſo doing to raiſe a queſtion upon the effects of it, the gentlemen argue with ſome appearance of triumph, that this kind of ſentence is concluſive, for that there are various inſtances, in which ſentences of theſe courts, in which judgments of other courts, have been held concluſive. For this purpoſe your lordſhips are furniſhed with a great ſtring of caſes, ſome of condemnations in the court of Exchequer, ſome even from boards of Exciſe, ſome from courts of Admiralty, ſome from domeſtic and ſome from foreign courts. There has exiſted, and fitly exiſted, ſuch a comity in the practice of one court towards the proceedings of another, that, whether the court be foreign or domeſtic, the courts preſume, that what is done is rightly done, that there has been no colluſion, that there has been no fraud, that the judgment and decree is what it ought to be, the effect of an adverſe ſuit between adverſe parties. Preſuming the effect of ſuch ſentences, ſuch decrees and judgments, in civil cauſes to have been what it has been ſtated to be, it muſt have been upon the ſuppoſition and upon the preſumption that the ſentence or the decree has been fairly and rightly obtained: but if this degree of concluſiveneſs were allowed to it in criminal caſes, if ſuch a ſentence were allowed to be concluſive, where the parties are unprepared in point of evidence to impeach it, and if ſuch were allowed to be the effect of it in ſuch a caſe in courts of criminal juriſdiction, it would obſtruct the courſe of juſtice in a thouſand inſtances, and in effect operate to the repeal of this and many other wholeſome laws. In this inſtance the miſchief would too be great if the policy of this law be queſtionable, if that which we call a crime is an innocent action. If there is no impropriety in the practice now brought under your lordſhips conſideration, if polygamy deſerves encouragement inſtead of a check, then in another character your lordſhips will do well to repeal the act; but do not do it in your judicial character.

My lords, caſes may be ſuppoſed, and we are in a ſituation that authorizes us, nay, not only authorizes but requires us to ſuppoſe, the groſſeſt caſes that our imaginations can furniſh. It is not difficult to ſuppoſe a caſe, in which the directeſt fraud upon the court may be practiſed by means of the groſſeſt perjury, and yet through the colluſion of the parties it may be managed with ſo much dexterity, that it would be impoſſible to get at them; and in all theſe inſtances the effect I am now deprecating would be of courſe let in upon the criminal juriſdiction of this country.

My lords, I am perſuaded your lordſhips will not do this. In what I have ſaid upon this point, I have anticipated in part the queſtion which I ſtated as the third in the order, in which I purpoſed to conſider the argument on the part of the lady at the bar. All her counſel have attempted to contend for the concluſiveneſs of this ſentence; and they all mean, I preſume, to inſiſt upon it as precluding an enquiry into the mode of obtaining it. The other learned gentlemen will excuſe me, if I ſeem to have been leſs attentive to what fell from them, than to the ſecond counſel on the part of the lady. The fact is, I heard him more diſtinctly than thoſe who preceded or followed him. He choſe to conſider this act as not having created a new offence, but as having ſimply varied the puniſhment and mode of trial of a known offence, which exiſted as the law ſtood then. I am at a loſs to comprehend, in what ſenſe this can be conſidered as having not created a new offence. This act declares ſomething to be a felony, which before was no felony. This act creates that to be a felony, enquirable into in the way in which other felonies are by law enquirable into, in a caſe that was before only cognizable as an offence againſt the canon law, and enquirable into in a ſuit which had nothing for its object but the ſpiritual intereſt of the party. I conceive it to be a new offence in the ſame ſenſe, in which almoſt all the ſtatutable offences in this country are new offences. This act has not only created a new offence, but, as I conceive, aboliſhed an old one; for I doubt whether it be now competent for an eccleſiaſtical court to proceed to enquire into offences of this ſort, if it were (as has been ſuppoſed) their practice before this act. By the cuſtom of London, a certain ſpecies of defamation is actionable there; and upon that ground the temporal courts proceed in granting prohibitions to ſtay proceedings of the Spiritual Court in ſuch caſes; ſo I apprehend the courts would do here, if the Spiritual Court proceeded pro ſalute animæ in a caſe of polygamy. My learned friend aſſumed, that this ſentence would ſtop the proceeding of ſuch a cauſe in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, but referred to the learned doctors to make it out; which the learned doctors, I preſume, not liking the reference, forgot to attempt: ſo it ſtands as a point aſſumed, but not proved, that the Spiritual Court would at this time entertain ſuch a ſuit, and that its progreſs would be ſtopped by ſuch a ſentence. Your lordſhips heard a very pathetic deſcription of the melancholy ſituation in which the lady will ſtand under this ſentence, if this proſecution proceeds, and in conſequence of it ſhe ſhould be treated in the diſagreeable way to which the act expoſes her. She will nevertheleſs, it has been ſaid, after having been puniſhed as a married woman, be totally deſtitute of any advantage in preſent or future of that marriage; ſhe can never claim any conjugal rights, nor (if her circumſtances did not preclude the neceſſity of her ſeeking it) could ſhe compel any maintenance from this gentleman during his life-time, nor can ſhe, if ſhe ſurvives this ſuppoſed huſband, ſupport any claim to his fortune.

My lords, the huſband is in the ſame lamentable ſituation: it is equally incompetent to him, while this ſentence ſtands, to derive any advantage in point of comfort during her life-time, or in point of ſucceſſion upon the death of the lady. It may be ſo; but if it is ſo, it will not be the effect of the judgment your lordſhips will be to pronounce: it is the effect of thoſe practices between the parties which have produced this ſentence, and which have made this their ſituation and their ſtate.

My lords, it will be time enough to conſider this queſtion, when the caſe ariſes. If ever this lady ſhould re-aſſume an inclination to eſtabliſh that relation, which in this ſuit ſhe has thought good to diſclaim; or if it ſhould ever be the pleaſure of the earl of Briſtol to connect himſelf again with this lady under the relation of an huſband; it will then be time enough to enquire, what they can or cannot make of ſuch a claim, or what the impediments are, which they will have to remove in order to eſtabliſh that claim. As neither of theſe caſes are very likely to ariſe, it is immaterial to go further into the enquiry of what may probably or poſſibly be the conſequence of them. It occurred to the learned gentleman to conſider, that it was very poſſible he might be led by this train of reaſoning into the conſideration of the effect of the colluſion. Your lordſhips will permit me to remark, that the learned gentleman who ſpoke firſt upon that ſide of the queſtion, choſe to be perfectly ſilent upon this head. He did not ſeem to know that it would be likely to occur to us in the conſideration of this ſentence to ſuggeſt, that it was colluſive; for unleſs it were by an alluſion to the caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield, the notion of colluſion, as making a part of this queſtion, did not ſeem to have occurred to him. Mr. Mansfield ſaw the certainty of the colluſion being introduced into the argument: to obviate it, he uſed three caſes, two that had been mentioned before, and a third he introduced for the purpoſe. The firſt, in the order of time, was the caſe of Kenn in my lord Coke, which whoever reads, will ſee that the only point determined, and the only point to be determined in that caſe, was, that it was not competent for the party to traverſe an offence that had been found againſt him: all the reſt is that ſort of lucubration which adorns, and in many inſtances improves, the reports of that learned judge of the deciſions of his own time. And this is the uſe that is attempted to be made of this part of the argument; that it was founded in falſhood, and therefore was upon the face of it colluſive. The falſhood was, that the party was in a condition, as it turned out by ſubſequent enquiry, to have made a better caſe than he did make; and from thence it is to be taken for granted, that of purpoſe and deſign he abſtained from making that caſe that he did not make. Your lordſhips know better the nature of buſineſs, than from ſuch a circumſtance to infer a fraud: the beſt-bottomed cauſes often miſcarry for want of that evidence, without which they cannot be ſupported. The next caſe, that of Morris and Webber, from Moore's Reports, ſeems to me to be ſtill leſs material or uſeful to the purpoſe for which it is produced: that was the caſe of a divorce propter impotentiam viri. The parties marrying afterwards, fruit of each of theſe marriages was the birth of children. Perhaps it may occur, that that circumſtance did not afford a very deciſive and concluſive proof of the negative of the ground upon which that decree was pronounced: it is not an impoſſible caſe, that what had happened might happen, although the divorce was perfectly well founded in point of fact. But ſuppoſe it were taken for granted, that the child muſt of neceſſity be the iſſue of a man who had been divorced propter impotentiam; yet that it muſt of neceſſity be inferred from thence, that this ſentence was colluſively obtained, remains to be made out. I conceive that this caſe, any more than the one that preceded it, does not afford a colour to ſay, that the queſtion of colluſion and the competency of going into the queſtion of colluſion occurred to the court in either of theſe two caſes. In the caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield, a man, who, under colour of being the huſband of the woman, had taken upon him to releaſe ſome intereſt which ſhe was entitled to, and he claimed to be entitled to in her right, and the queſtion turned upon the effect of that notion: there was afterwards a ſentence between the parties againſt the marriage; whether the means to obtain it were fair or foul, fraudulent or otherwiſe, we are left to gueſs at. Your lordſhips will not, I preſume, adopt all the printed reaſons, good, bad, or indifferent, that are offered to your lordſhips at the cloſe of your printed caſes. Your lordſhips predeceſſors in that caſe could do no otherwiſe than they did: they ſaw, that the deciſion in the court below was right, and upon that ground they affirmed the decree. Now, what was the thing decreed, and the point in controverſy between the parties? The man, while he paſſed for this lady's huſband, took upon him to releaſe an intereſt, which it was not competent for him to releaſe, whether he had or not that character, the ſubject of the releaſe being a legacy, left to her under a will, in ſuch terms as operated to give her in equity a ſeparate intereſt. I need not contend, that in a ſeparate intereſt of the wife the huſband cannot controul or deprive the wife of it by any releaſe of his. A court of equity had decided againſt the party claiming under the releaſe, which, according to the ſettled doctrine of courts of equity, it was equally bound to do, whether the party releaſing had or had not married the woman whoſe intereſts were to be affected by it; and the queſtion (huſband or no huſband) was juſt as foreign to the merits of that deciſion, as any thing that could be talked about in the cauſe. Totally therefore laying out of the queſtion all that had been ſaid upon the ſubject that was not neceſſary to the deciſion of the caſe, the houſe of lords affirmed the decree of the court, becauſe they ſaw it had rightly decided the only point in controverſy between the parties. Theſe then are the caſes, upon the ground of which, and upon the ground of which alone, (for I have not been able to collect a fourth) your lordſhips are deſired to decline doing that in this inſtance, which we contend your lordſhips are bound in juſtice to do; that is, to let us into the enquiry by what means this ſentence was obtained. The gentleman, particularly, who made this uſe of theſe three caſes, could not forget the familiar practice, which he is a witneſs to every day of the year, of impeaching the judgments of the courts of law, whenever they are impeachable upon the foundation of fraud and covin. It never occurred to a court in which ſuch a queſtion ariſes to refer the party who makes a complaint of a judgment ſo obtained, to the court in which it was obtained, or to direct him to inſtitute a ſuit to get rid of it; he impeaches it juſt when it affects him, and not further than as it affects him; beyond that, it is a matter of perfect indifference to him, whether it ſtands or falls; for the purpoſe of doing that, which alone he is intereſted in doing, the party, who would otherwiſe be prejudiced by ſuch a judgment, is conſtantly and daily permitted to ſay, that this was a judgment obtained by covin: this allegation is uſually formed into an iſſue, and if that iſſue is determined in his favour, though the judgment ſtands as to every other perſon, quoad him it is avoided in the manner we are ready to avoid this ſentence. It was ſaid, that the reaſon why creditors are permitted ſo to avoid judgments ſet up to their prejudice by executors or adminiſtrators, who ſeek to cover effects in their poſſeſſion by falſe judgments, is, becauſe theſe people cannot be relieved in any other form; it cannot be referred to any other court. I am perfectly content to take that as the principle; then it remains, in order to ſupport this diſtinction, for the learned gentlemen among them to make out, that it is competent to his majeſty to make himſelf a party to this ſuit in the Spiritual Court, or to inſtitute there, by his proper officer, a new ſuit to get rid of this ſentence. The gentlemen have not attempted it; it would be ridiculous; and I fancy I may preſume it will not be attempted: it is not competent, much leſs neceſſary, for the king or his law-officers to go into that court for a purpoſe ſo idle as this. Taking this then to be the reaſon why it is admitted in civil cauſes to creditors to get rid of judgments, by which they are attempted to be injured, by ſhewing that they were colluſive and fraudulent, does it not follow by parity of reaſon, that it is equally proper that the ſame thing ſhould be done here, ſuppoſing that your lordſhips ſhould for a moment forget this to be in a criminal cauſe, in which the reaſons for ſo doing are ſo much the ſtronger? Another diſtinction between this caſe and that was attempted. It was ſaid, this is not the caſe of a third perſon complaining of an injury ariſing by a ſentence, and wiſhing to avoid it ſo far only as it affects him; but it is a ſuit inſtituted for overturning the ſentence. I apprehend it is not ſo; we contend for nothing but to lay this ſentence out of our way, as applied to the preſent ſubject; juſt as you lay out of the way a judgment between A. and B. where it is attempted to be uſed to the prejudice of C. After your lordſhips have convicted this lady, if in the reſult of the enquiry it ſhould be proved, that ſuch is the juſtice of the caſe, I do not know that the verdict or the judgment in this caſe will be evidence upon an enquiry into the ſame facts for another purpoſe. If the reſult of the preſent enquiry is underſtood to eſtabliſh the marriage, and to nullify the ſentence, it is becauſe the ſentence is in its nature, when it comes to be enquired into, really and truly null and void; not becauſe that ſuch is the effect of any operative power and force that belong to your lordſhips conviction. This is not a proſecution for the annulling of that ſentence; this is a proſecution to ſubject the party to the puniſhment which is by law due to the offence charged upon her: it cannot be attended with any other poſſible conſequence. Upon the ſame ground that the ſentence is attempted to be impeached here, it may be impeached every where, except by the parties, who may perhaps have precluded themſelves by their conduct from impeaching it.

My lords, as there are no authorities on the one ſide, it remains for a moment only to obſerve, that there are authorities on the other ſide: as applied to civil caſes, two have been mentioned. The good ſenſe of both the authorities, particularly of one, I ſhould apprehend eſtabliſhes this propoſition clear of all controverſy; for, when in the caſe of the action againſt Conſtantia Phillips, of famous memory, it was determined, that whatever objections would avoid a judgment in a court of common law, would be ſufficient to overturn a ſentence in the Spiritual Court, but none other; one ſhould have imagined that the propoſition carried with it ſo much good ſenſe, that all the world ſhould feel it and adopt it. The Scotch caſe is by the higheſt authority, and there the true uſe that is to be made of a judgment in another court is aſcertained and limited; it is evidence; it is ſtrong evidence; but it remains to be explained; and ſtill more, it remains to be laid out of the caſe in a cauſe like this, and in a caſe like that of Phillips, where there exiſted a ground to impute colluſion and fraud to it. In Phillips's caſe, it was not permitted to her to avail herſelf of that colluſion and that fraud. Why? Becauſe it was a fraud of her own. But the learned judge, when he refuſed to permit her to impeach that ſentence, which ſhe had obtained by colluſion and fraud, adds, according to Mr. Ford's manuſcript note, that, 'as againſt all others, whatever objections would avoid a judgment in a court of law, would be ſufficient to overturn a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court.' We deſire to overturn this ſentence upon no other grounds, than ſentences and judgments in courts of law are every day overturned by: they muſt continue to be ſo overturned in future, as long as there continues to be any attention to truth and juſtice in the deciſions of courts of judicature. I do apprehend, that your lordſhips will not think, that I take an improper freedom with the ſentence, or the court whoſe ſentence it is, by deſiring that your lordſhips will by-and-by form an opinion of the purity of their proceedings by the ſpecimen that we ſhall give you of them, when we come to ſtate and prove the means by which this ſentence was procured; and then perhaps your lordſhips will ſee no reaſon for raiſing it above the level of other courts, on which we are content to leave it. With your lordſhips permiſſion, I would ſupply an omiſſion I meant to have ſtated in its proper place; the caſe of Robins and Crutchley. A Mrs. Robins commenced an action of dower, claiming a ſhare of the ſucceſſion to her ſuppoſed huſband Mr. Robins: this lady had been claimed to be the wife of a ſir William Wolſeley. Sir William ———, upon the ſuppoſition that ſhe was his wife, had inſtituted a ſuit in the Spiritual Court, probably with an intention to get rid of her, charging her with having committed adultery with Robins: in the courſe of that enquiry in the Spiritual Court, it came out to the ſatisfaction of the court, that ſhe was the wife of Robins and not of ſir William ———. This ſentence was introduced in pleading in this cauſe of dower for the purpoſe of repelling a denial on the part of the heirs of Mr. Robins, that ſhe bore any relation to them or to their anceſtor. To that replication there was a demurrer, which brought under conſideration of the court of Common Pleas the effect of this ſentence ſo pleaded. The opinion of the court of Common Pleas was to allow that demurrer; and though the point decided may perhaps be only this, that that ſentence could not avail the party in that form of pleading; yet I conceive that point muſt be very erroneouſly decided, if the ſentence were of the deſcription which has been attempted to be paſſed upon your lordſhips: for if it had been underſtood to be concluſive and precluſive of all further enquiry, moſt undoubtedly it would have been a proper ſubject to be introduced in pleading as a bar to any farther enquiry. Your lordſhips, by looking into the only report in print of that caſe (Mr. Serjeant Wilſon's) will find, that the learned judges of the Common Pleas, who decided it, ſeemed to be agreed in thinking, that it was very far from an eſtabliſhed point, that this ſentence was concluſive, that the queſtion could only be tried upon the iſſue ne unques accouple, which your lordſhips know to be the only proper iſſue in a queſtion of dower, and that iſſue muſt be determined by the biſhop's certificate. Now we are told that this ſentence is juſt equivalent to the certificate of a biſhop: this was ſo far from being the opinion of that court, that they leave to the biſhop to judge for himſelf, what regard he would pay to that ſentence on the point which he was to certify.

Doctor Harris.

My lords,

It would ill become me at this time, after the points which have been propoſed have been ſo fully diſcuſſed by the gentlemen who have gone before me, to take up much of your lordſhips time.

There are two queſtions, as I underſtand, before your lordſhips.

The firſt of them is, whether a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation can be given in evidence, as an abſolute bar to a proſecution by the king? and the other is, whether, on ſuppoſition that a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation can be given in evidence, it will afford a complete defence, ſo that no proofs whatever can be admitted afterwards in order to counteract and impeach that ſentence?

How theſe queſtions come before your lordſhips, whether properly or improperly, is not for me to argue. It is out of my profeſſion to ſay any thing about them; but as the gentlemen on the other ſide have been permitted to ſtate them and argue on them, it is certainly neceſſary that they ſhould alſo be diſcuſſed by the counſel for the proſecution.

In regard to the firſt queſtion, I ſhall not trouble your lordſhips long, becauſe the diſcuſſion of it relates principally to the practice of courts of law, but ſhall more particularly attach myſelf to the conſideration of the ſecond; as I ſhall in ſo doing have an opportunity to ſay a word or two in anſwer to what the gentlemen have urged on the other ſide, who are of the ſame profeſſion, and practiſe in the ſame courts where I have the honour to attend.

In reſpect to the firſt queſtion, whether a ſentence of jactitation is an abſolute bar, and can be offered as ſuch to a ſuit at the proſecution of the king, it is to be obſerved, that anciently the whole cognizance of marriage, with that of the crimes attending it, was veſted in the eccleſiaſtical courts: but thoſe courts being either remiſs in the exertion of their juriſdictions, or, more probably, wanting power to inflict an adequate puniſhment ſufficient to ſtop the growth of the increaſing evil, and the legiſlature, for conſtitutional reaſons, being both unwilling and unable to inveſt them with more authority than they then had, the aid of parliament became abſolutely neceſſary; and the ſtatute of James the firſt, on which the priſoner ſtands indicted, was accordingly made; by which it was enacted, that if any perſon being married ſhall marry another, the former huſband or wife being alive, the offence ſhall be felony.

Before this ſtatute, the eccleſiaſtical courts had the cognizance of the crime of taking a ſecond wife, or a ſecond huſband, whilſt the firſt wife or firſt huſband was living: but the ſtatute, as I underſtand, takes that branch of the juriſdiction, namely, the power of inflicting any puniſhment whatever on a perſon guilty of polygamy, intirely from the eccleſiaſtical courts; inſomuch, that, if at this time a proceſs was to iſſue from an Eccleſiaſtical Court in order to call any perſon to account for bigamy or polygamy (whichever it may be termed), the party cited might obtain a prohibition from the judges of the temporal courts to ſtop ſuch a ſuit, a ſuit, in the ſame manner as a prohibition may be obtained in caſe of a proſecution in an eccleſiaſtical court for perjury not committed in that court, or for any other crime puniſhable by a ſtatute. Now, my lords, it is evident, that the one court has loſt what the other has gained, in reſpect to the offence of bigamy; ſo that the temporal court, or rather your lordſhips, are able to judge of bigamy, and of every eccleſiaſtical matter incident to that branch of ſpiritual juriſdiction. It may here be obſerved, that a jactitation cauſe is deſcribed in our books of practice to be a quaſi defamatory ſuit; and moſt certainly it is ſo, and nothing more, when a perſon libelled againſt in jactitation confeſſes the boaſting; as, when a man cites a woman for boaſting, and ſhe acknowledges the jactitation; for the cauſe ends here, and is ſtrictly of a defamatory nature. But I do not mean to deny, when the defendant undertakes to juſtify, that the cauſe then becomes truly matrimonial; for the ſentence will then neceſſarily be, either that the parties are man and wife, or that the plaintiff's or party agent is free from all matrimonial contracts, quantum nobis conſtare potuit, or as far as to us as yet appears. But though a ſentence in theſe words may have frequently been adjudged [as in Jones and Bow, Carthew 225—and in Clews and Bathurſt, Strange 960.] to be binding on the temporal courts in caſes of property, till reverſed; yet it by no means follows, that ſuch a ſentence can amount to an acquittal of the plaintiff from having any farther evidence brought againſt him, the very words, as far as to us yet appears, implying the contrary, and evincing that farther proofs may legally be adduced in the proper court. The words of the ſentence ſpeak ſufficiently for themſelves: there is no occaſion to have recourſe to authorities from books. Let it be ſuppoſed for a moment, that the antient juriſdiction remained in the eccleſiaſtical courts, and that they poſſeſſed their former power; is it poſſible to conceive, that a ſentence like the preſent, pronouncing a woman to be a ſpinſter, as far as to the court as yet appears, could be a bar to a ſuit in the ſame or in another eccleſiaſtical court againſt the ſame woman for polygamy? If it could be a bar, it would amount to an acquittal, till the ſentence in the civil ſuit had been reverſed; which would be ſubverſive of juſtice, by making the commiſſion of an undiſcovered crime in one court a ſhelter againſt the puniſhment of that very crime in another. If the doctrine now contended for ſhould prevail, that the offering of a ſentence in jactitation, pronouncing the party agent free from matrimony as far as it as yet appears, is an abſolute bar to a criminal proſecution, there would be an opportunity on every indictment for polygamy to defeat the ſtatute: for in the caſe of a woman marrying two huſbands, if the firſt huſband ſhould conſent to a colluſive ſuit, the wife would have nothing to do but to cite the firſt huſband into an eccleſiaſtical court for jactitation, if ſhe apprehended a proſecution on the ſtatute; and then, either on confeſſion of the boaſting by the firſt huſband, or on his failing to prove his marriage, if he undertook the proof, a ſentence would be obtained, which would intirely defeat the ſtatute. That this houſe ſhould give a countenance to a doctrine of ſuch tendency, is not to be imagined. It would be ſo far to reſtore the eccleſiaſtical courts to their former authority, as to put it in the power of evil-diſpoſed perſons to uſe thoſe courts to the defeazance of the ſtatute, without giving back to the eccleſiaſtical courts a juriſdiction to puniſh the crime of polygamy, which would thus go unpuniſhed: it would be to render thoſe courts in this reſpect hurtful, without affording them an opportunity of being uſeful; and it would in effect be to deſtroy a law in your lordſhips judicial capacity, which had formerly on the matureſt conſideration been eſtabliſhed in this houſe as a part of the legiſlature.

It would now be improper for me to detain your lordſhips any longer on this queſtion, which has been ſo ably and fully diſcuſſed already; and I ſhall truſt, that your lordſhips cannot be prevailed on to declare the ſentence in jactitation concluſive upon this high court, or to ſuffer it to be read judicially as a ſtop to any evidence which may be brought as a proof of the marriage of the lady at the bar with Mr. Hervey, now earl of Briſtol.

But on ſuppoſition that the ſentence may be permitted to be judicially read, it may be neceſſary for me, in contradiction to what the gentlemen of my own profeſſion have aſſerted, to trouble your lordſhips with a word or two in the briefeſt manner I am able, in order to ſhew, that evidence of a particular kind may be given in all courts, and at all times, to rebut a ſentence in jactitation in disfavour of matrimony, for the purpoſe of relieving an injured party and of puniſhing the guilty.

It is a general rule, which is not to be denied, that reſpect is due from one court in England to the deciſions of another, and that comity is due to the deciſions of all foreign courts; and it might be more accurate and more ſtrictly true to ſay in general, that one court in England is bound by the judgments and ſentences of another; but the generality of this rule does not exclude an exception, which in reality affords a proof of its generality: for, under circumſtances, evidence of every ſort, parole as well as inſtrumental, may be received in one court to affect a ſentence in another. Fraud in a ſingle perſon, and colluſion, where there are two or more, may be given in evidence in the ſame court in a different ſuit, or in another court, to affect the parties to a ſentence; and of courſe to affect the ſentence or judgment itſelf in ſome degree.

It is true, that by the eccleſiaſtical law, a ſentence in any caſe obtained by colluſion may be declared void in the ſame court in which it was pronounced, by means of a ſpecial ſuit for that purpoſe; and moſt certainly at the ſuit of a perſon having an intereſt, who could not even have intervened at the time when the ſuit was pending; and ſuch was the caſe of lady Frances Meadows, who had no intereſt in the years 1768 and 1769, when the ſuit of jactitation was pending: but it does not follow, becauſe a ſentence obtained by colluſion may be annulled in the ſame court where it was pronounced, that ſuch ſentence may not be impeached by any means whatever in another court.

I ſhall not, in proof of what I have advanced, detain your lordſhips with a repetition of the particulars of Fermor's caſe, as reported in the third part of Coke's Reports. I ſhall only obſerve, that it was a caſe depending in the court of Chancery, in the 44th of Elizabeth, before ſir Thomas Egerton, the then lord-keeper, in which Richard Fermor complained, that Thomas Smith the defendant was his tenant, and had levied a fine with proclamations, in order to bar him of his inheritance, by covin and practice. The lord-keeper, conſidering on one ſide the miſchiefs which might ariſe from ſuch practice, and on the other ſide conſidering that fines and proclamations are the general aſſurances of the realm, referred the caſe to the two chief juſtices, Popham and Anderſon, who, after a conference, thought it neceſſary, that all the juſtices of England and barons of the Exchequer ſhould be aſſembled: they aſſembled accordingly, and it was at length reſolved by the two chief juſtices and barons of the Exchequer, except two, that Richard Fermor was not barred by the fine with proclamations. The lord-keeper, ſir Thomas Egerton, commended the reſolution of the judges, and agreed with them in opinion.

The precedents and reaſons, on which the above-mentioned opinion was formed, have already been ably related, and are well known to ſome of your lordſhips: it may ſuffice on my part to add, that a fine, the moſt deliberate (for it is five years in completing) and of courſe the moſt ſolemn of all judgments, was not deemed, in the opinion of the lord-keeper and ten of the judges, to be of weight ſufficient to protect a colluding party; but was ſuffered to be impeached by the admiſſion of evidence in another court than that where the fine was levied, in order to afford relief to an injured man.

It is ſaid by lord Coke in the ſame Report, that all acts eccleſiaſtical as well as temporal ſhall be avoided by fraud and covin. And indeed if one temporal court is bound in juſtice and law to pay no regard to the judgment of another temporal court under the circumſtances above deſcribed, can any reaſon be given, why the ſentence of an eccleſiaſtical court in ſuch a caſe ſhould be treated with more reſpect by the temporal judges, than they are obliged to pay to the judgments of their own courts?

But to the honour of the temporal courts it muſt be ſaid, that, as far as it is in their power, they lend their aid to the eccleſiaſtical courts in caſe of covin and colluſion, by permitting the eccleſiaſtical courts to try ſuch fraud, even when committed in the temporal courts, as incidental matter.

The caſe alluded to is in Moore's Reports, page 917, Lloyd and Maddox.

Mr. Lloyd a legatee ſued Maddox the executor of the deceaſed in the Spiritual Court for his legacy. The executor alledged, that all the teſtator's effects had been recovered from him the executor, in a court of common law, by a creditor of the teſtator. The legatee alledged in his turn, and undertook to prove in the eccleſiaſtical court, that the recovery at common law was in conſequence of colluſion or covin between a pretended creditor and the executor. And, upon the admiſſion of this plea in the eccleſiaſtical court, the executor applied to the temporal court for a prohibition, which was denied.

And from this it is evident by neceſſary inference, that the temporal courts muſt have deemed themſelves competent to judge incidentally of covin or colluſion committed in a ſpiritual court, in order to relieve an injured party or ſuitor in a temporal court.

When this liberty taken by one court with the apparent judgment of another, under circumſtances, comes to be conſidered, it ſeems to be founded on the ſtrongeſt reaſon: for when a judgment has been procured by a colluſion of parties, though it muſt ſtand on record, and may not, I grant, be actually expunged or taken from the file, but by the court in which it was given; yet it is certainly a mere nothing to thoſe, who, not being privies, can ſhew it falſe and covinous. It is a ſentence in which the judge had never an opportunity of doing real juſtice—and is undoubtedly, what it has been juſtly ſtiled by a writer on the civil law, a ſtage-play, a prophane mockery, or any thing but a judgment. It is not to the diſrepute, but to the honour of a court, as well as to the benefit of the publick, that ſuch a fraud ſhould be detected. The upright judge muſt of all things wiſh it.——And confident I am, that to diſcover ſuch a profligate proceeding (from which no human wiſdom can protect the greateſt judicial abilities) could never be conſtrued into a breach of comity between one judicature and another; but, on the contrary, muſt be conſtrued by the deceived court as a vindication of its purity, and a reſcue from an attempt to load it with diſcredit.

I muſt now own, my lords, when I was informed that doctors of the civil law were, by the permiſſion of your lordſhips, to attend on the part of the lady at the bar, and a brief was given to me on the part of the proſecutor on that account, that I was apprehenſive of what might be quoted from ſuch miſcellaneous books, as the digeſts, the code, and the decretals, in favour of colluſion, and to ſhew how honeſtly it might be practiſed under particular circumſtances. Nothing however of this kind has been urged; and I have not myſelf, from any inſpection of the titles and text of the civil and canon law, de colluſione detegenda, which treat principally of colluſive cauſes between maſters and ſlaves, and between certain of the clergy in order to defraud the laity, been able to gather any other idea than that colluſion between parties to a ſuit is a very high offence; and ſuch a one, I make no doubt, for which colluding parties might now be articled againſt in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, where the inſult was offered, and be puniſhed at diſcretion by eccleſiaſtical cenſures. But a particular diſcuſſion of the nature of the offence committed by parties colluding in a cauſe, how that colluſion is to be treated when diſcovered, and what operation the diſcovered colluſion will have upon the ſentence, is rather to be expected from later writers, and ſuch authors as Menochius in his Conſilia, or Scaccia de re judicata, than from the laws in the text of the civil and canon law.

And theſe authors agree in general in ſaying, quod lata ſententia per colluſionem habenda eſt pro non-ſententia, et quod aliis non nocet, quamvis, ſublata colluſione, noceret. Nam facta colluſione cum adverſario [ſays Scaccia] ſententia non prodeſt adverſus tertium; vel quia tertius erat citandus, et tunc victori non prodeſt ſententia, etiamſi eam obtinuiſſet ſincere.

And when an executor [for example] deſirous of proving his teſtator's will, omits to cite one among others of the next of kin; for in that caſe the omitted perſon may, if he thinks it for his intereſt, oblige the executors to prove the will de novo at a ſubſequent time, the ſentence eſtabliſhing the will under the proceſs, by which one of the next of kin was omitted, being as to him in the true ſenſe of the expreſſion, Res inter alios acta.

The ſame author proceeds by adding,

Vel non erat citandus, quia cauſa agebatur cum legitimo contradictore; et tunc licet, ſi ſententia fuiſſet lata ſine colluſione, tertio noceret; tamen, ſi fuerit lata per colluſionem, non nocebit.

This may be explained by the following ſuppoſed caſe: If an executor to prove his teſtator's will ſhould cite all the next of kin regularly, but ſhould collude with that next of kin to whom the management of the ſuit was intruſted, and prevail on him to feintplead, and not put forth his ſtrength on account of ſome private bargain, and by this covin eſtabliſh the will; yet, though the ſentence in this caſe would have bound the legal contradictors, who had been all called, and alſo all other perſons whatever, if there had been no colluſion, it ſhall nevertheleſs not bind the injured part of the legal contradictors, on a proof made of the concerted fraud.

It muſt be allowed, that theſe writers have not (as far as I have been able to obſerve) made mention of the place or court where a ſentence colluſively obtained is to be ſet aſide; and if an actual ſetting aſide or total reverſal is meant, there is no doubt but that this muſt be done in the ſame court where the parties colluded, and in no other.

But if it is only aſked, where and in what court evidence is to be received to relieve an injured perſon, who was not a party to the colluſion? my anſwer is, that it is plain from theſe writers, as well as from reaſon, that it is to be received in every court.

The courts of civil law, known to theſe writers, hear in the ſame court and under the ſame juriſdiction cauſes of property, and alſo accuſations which affect the life of the accuſed, exactly in the ſame manner as our Admiralty-courts in England did before the 28th of Henry VIII. And therefore when Scaccia and other writers, who entertain the idea of the ſame court having both civil and criminal juriſdiction, ſay that a ſentence obtained by colluſion is to be regarded pro non ſententia, their meaning fairly taken muſt be, that ſuch a ſentence would be effectually avoidable, or rather diſregarded every where, on a proper proof made of the fraud by which it was obtained.

I am aware that the caſe of Mayo and Brown was quoted by the advocates on the other ſide, as a late inſtance, in which the preſent judge of the Prerogative Court, Sir George Hay, whoſe decrees will always have great weight, was of opinion, that he could not in his court receive evidence of a ſentence having been obtained by colluſion in the court of the biſhop of London.

The caſe, in brief, was as follows:

One Mrs. Ailmer died inteſtate, and Mr. Brown, as her huſband, obtained the adminiſtration of her effects. Lady Mayo had proved herſelf to be the daughter of Mrs. Ailmer, and had cited Brown to bring in the adminiſtration, and ſhew cauſe why it ſhould not be revoked, as unfairly obtained. Brown proved his marriage to Mrs. Ailmer beyond a doubt; but lady Mayo then alledged, that Brown had been married to one Ellen Cutts, who was living at the time of the fact of the marriage of Brown with Ailmer. Brown anſwered, that Ellen Cutts did once make pretenſions to him; but that in a ſuit of jactitation, brought by him againſt her in the court of the biſhop of London in 1732, ſhe was enjoined ſilence by ſentence; and he was pronounced free from any matrimonial connexion with her. To this lady Mayo replied by plea, that the ſentence had been obtained by colluſion between Brown and Cutts, and deſired to be ſuffered to prove her allegation.

Many of the arguments were then uſed which have been made uſe of on the preſent occaſion; but the judge did not, as I underſtand, reject the diſtinction between receiving evidence in favour of an injured perſon, and being able to annul the ſentence, and abſolutely deny his authority to admit lady Mayo's allegation, but only appeared to make choice of the method of ſtopping the cauſe in the Prerogative Court till lady Mayo had applied to the biſhop of London's court for relief: and in ſo doing he laid great ſtreſs on the note in the margin of Strange's Reports, page 981, where it is ſaid, that the chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas, in the caſe of Prudham and Phillips, held a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court to be concluſive, and would not receive evidence of fraud or colluſion in obtaining it. But it is evident from the very able manuſcript note of the caſe of Prudham and Phillips by the late Mr. Ford, whoſe learning and accuracy are too well known to ſtand in need of any encomium, that the only reaſon why chief juſtice Willes refuſed to ſuffer Mrs. Phillips to relieve herſelf by giving a proof of colluſion in the biſhop of London's court, was, becauſe Mrs. Phillips herſelf was a party to that ſuit in the Eccleſiaſtical Court: ſo that in truth and fact the decree made in the Prerogative Court in Mayo and Brown, appears to have been founded more on the uncertain authority of the note in the margin of ſir John Strange's Reports, than on any other precedent.

Now if a ſuggeſtion of fraud in a ſingle perſon, or colluſion between many, affords a foundation for a court, in which cauſes of property only are decided, to receive evidence that ſuch fraud or colluſion was uſed in obtaining a ſentence in another court which has juriſdiction in caſes of property, it becomes neceſſary, a fortiori, that a court, held for the puniſhment of criminals, ſhould admit evidence to ſhew that a fraud or forgery has been committed in a court of civil juriſdiction: and there are ſtrong inſtances in the law of England to ſhew, that civil judgments have been regarded not only as of no weight to exculpate in criminal proſecutions, but on the contrary as aggravations.

The caſe of Farr in Kelyng's Reports is one of many ſtrongly to this purpoſe.

Richard Farr, having an intention to rob the houſe of Mrs. Stanier, told an attorney that Mrs. Stanier was his tenant, and he could not make her quit his houſe: the attorney proceeded regularly in a cauſe of ejectment; and one Eleanor Chadwick, an accomplice with Farr, having ſworn falſely that ſhe had ſerved Stanier with a copy of a declaration, judgment was obtained, a writ iſſued, the woman was ejected, and her houſe was robbed by Farr and Chadwick, who had got legal poſſeſſion. Farr and Chadwick were afterwards indicted at the Old-Bailey; and on proofs given of the facts, it was agreed by lord chief juſtice Hyde, ſir John Kelyng, and Mr. juſtice Wild, that though the priſoners made uſe of the law, and the officers of the law, yet as this was done in fraudem legis, the courſe they had taken was ſo far from excuſing the robbery, that it heightened the offence by abuſing the law. Kelyng's Reports, page 43, 44.

There is a ſingle caſe on the other ſide, the King againſt Vincent, reported in Strange, 481, where it is ſaid, that Vincent was indicted for forging a will of a perſonal eſtate, and that the forgery was proved at the trial, but that Vincent having produced the probate, it was held to be concluſive in ſupport of the will.

This opinion is ſaid to have been given in the 8th year of George I. and no ſubſequent caſe has been quoted in ſupport of it; but numbers of other caſes have been quoted by the counſel againſt the lady at the bar, where the unfortunate priſoners have been found guilty of forging wills, in part upon the ſame evidence (namely, the probate) on which the very fortunate Mr. Vincent was acquitted.

Among others cited from the State-Trials and Seſſion-Papers, the caſe of one Stirling has been mentioned; and a ſtronger to ſhew the abſurdity of the doctrine held in the King and Vincent could not well be imagined.—One Mrs. Shutter, being known to have money in the funds, Stirling forged a will for her. He gave conſiderable legacies to ſeveral, but to himſelf he gave 30*l.* only as executor; for it was ſufficient for his purpoſe to get poſſeſſion, in order to make her whole fortune his own. He obtained a probate from the Prerogative Court, and endeavoured to receive her ſtock at the South-Sea-Houſe, but was diſcovered in the attempt, and indicted for the forgery. The probate was produced in court, and according to the doctrine in the King and Vincent, the ſight of the probate ſhould have inſtantly occaſioned the acquittal of the priſoner; for though Mrs. Shutter herſelf was alive, and appeared in the court, yet witneſſes muſt have been neceſſarily produced to prove her identity; and ſuch evidence, according to the doctrine in the King againſt Vincent, ought not to have been admitted againſt the probate, which ought to have been concluſive. The priſoner however was convicted.

But admitting for a moment, that the caſe of the King and Vincent was legally determined, it does not ſeem to apply in the preſent inſtance, unleſs it could be ſhewed, that the proſecutor offered to give evidence of colluſion in obtaining it, and was not permitted ſo to do; for it was ſaid by one of the civilians, that the probate iſſued in that caſe by a decree of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and not in common form. If it did ſo iſſue, it is to be preſumed, that ſuch decree was made between parties truly adverſe, till the contrary is made to appear; and the contrary was not attempted to be proved. And it muſt be confeſſed, if the parties to the ſuit in the Prerogative Court were truly adverſe, that then the fraud either was or might have been in proof before the original proper court: and this might have afforded ſome colour for ſaying, the man ſhall not be put twice upon his trial for the ſame offence; though ſuch an argument could only have been ſpecious; for when the queſtion in a court of civil juriſdiction is, will or no will, deed or no deed, and a forgery is detected, the perſon who committed that forgery muſt be tried for it in another court and by another proceeding, or he will never be puniſhed as the law of England directs.

It may be here proper to obſerve, that no one caſe has been mentioned by the gentlemen on the other ſide, where, in any court of civil or criminal juriſdiction, a proof of colluſion in another court had been offered by a proper perſon, and not received or rejected. The caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield in the houſe of lords, in the year 1727, has been anſwered by all the counſel who have preceded me, by ſhewing that colluſion was not at iſſue in that caſe. And in the caſe of Kenn, 7 Coke, ſo much inſiſted on by doctor Wynne, there is no mention nor the leaſt hint given of fraud, covin, or colluſion. In that caſe, Chriſtopher Kenn had iſſue Martha by Elizabeth Stowell; but he afterwards obtained a ſentence in a cauſe of nullity againſt Elizabeth Stowell, as having been married to her infra nubiles annos; and the marriage was pronounced void in an eccleſiaſtical court.

Martha, the daughter of that marriage, in order to make good her title to her father's eſtate, was afterwards permitted, and probably thro' ſome miſtake or haſte in the court of Wards, and without hearing counſel, to give evidence that Kenn and Stowell her father and mother were not infra nubiles annos when they intermarried. But according to lord Coke's Report, the court of Wards agreed, that as the eccleſiaſtical judge had decreed the marriage to be void, his judgment ſhould be credited, although the parties were proved to have been of the age of conſent, and although the foundation was falſe on which the ſentence had been grounded; inaſmuch as the court of Wards would not examine into the cauſe or reaſons of the ſentence, whether true or falſe.

From all which nothing farther is to be collected, than that a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court is to have full credit given to it as long as it ſubſiſts unrepealed; and that it is not to be overturned in the ſame court where it was given, or by any other, on account of error and miſtake in law or fact; and this is certain law: but it is to be obſerved, that the parties divorced had been long dead before the ſuit was commenced, and that there is not the remoteſt hint or ſuggeſtion through the whole caſe, that the Eccleſiaſtical Court had been deceived by any fraud or colluſion between the parties litigant.

As to the caſe of Prudham and Phillips, the counſel for the lady at the bar were certainly led into a miſtake by the note which I have already mentioned, inſerted in the margin of Strange's Reports, page 961, and were not aware of the note in Mr. Ford's manuſcript, which is of undoubted authority, and from which it appears that one Mr. Prudham, as a creditor, brought an action of debt in 1737, againſt the well-known Mrs. Tereſia Conſtantia Phillips.

Mrs. Phillips gave in evidence her marriage with Mr. Muilman.

Mr. Prudham produced a ſentence annulling that marriage, in a cauſe of nullity, on account of a prior marriage with one Delafield; and this Mr. Prudham's counſel relied upon as concluſive evidence of the nullity of the marriage with Muilman;—and ſo it was agreed, unleſs the defendant Phillips might be admitted to ſhew fraud in obtaining the ſentence, and ſo to avoid it, as judgments are daily avoided, by replications of fraud.

‘ Reſolved, on great debate, that the eccleſiaſtical law was part of the law of the land, and that ſentences by their judges were in matters of ſpiritual juriſdiction of equal force with judgments in courts of record and in courts of equity: but that whatever objections would avoid a judgment, the ſame would be ſufficient to overturn a ſentence in the Spiritual Court, but none other. That fraud uſed in obtaining judgments was a deceit on the court, and hurtful to ſtrangers, who, as they could not come-in to reverſe or ſet aſide the judgment, muſt of neceſſity be admitted to aver it was fraudulent.

‘ But that Mrs. Phillips had been a party in the cauſe in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and whether ſhe was impoſed upon, or joined in deceiving the Eccleſiaſtical Court, this is not a time or place for her to redreſs herſelf.’

Now, although Mrs. Phillips was not in this caſe allowed to alledge, that the ſuit in the Eccleſiaſtical Court annulling her marriage was colluſive, yet the reaſon on which the court refuſed to allow her ſo to do, namely, her having been a party to the colluſive ſuit, amounts to a full proof, when joined with the other doctrine laid down by the court and related in the caſe, that any perſon not having been a party would at all times be permitted in a court of common law or equity to alledge fraud or colluſion to have been practiſed to his injury in an eccleſiaſtical court.

On the whole therefore it appears beyond a doubt, from the inſtances which have been given, that in civil caſes a ſtranger is admitted in one court to alledge and prove in his defence, that a ſentence to his prejudice has been pronounced in another court by means of fraud and colluſion; and that a proſecutor in a criminal proſecution is conſtantly permitted to do the ſame.

Taking it then for granted, that this in general muſt be conceded, it only remains to inquire, why evidence, if neceſſary, ſhould not be admitted to deſtroy the force of the ſentence in the preſent caſe, in favour of the crown and of the public, who were not parties to the jactitation ſuit between Mr. Hervey and the lady at the bar, and yet are intereſted, if it is a crime to marry a ſecond huſband whilſt the firſt is living; or, in other terms, to inquire why a ſentence of jactitation of all ſentences ſhould be ſo highly diſtinguiſhed on account of its worth and ſtability, as to be held forth as an exception to the general rule, and as the only ſpecies of ſentence which ought to be ſo favoured and honoured by being regarded as concluſive.

That the proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Court are often rather of longer duration than could be wiſhed, is not to be denied; and that this principally ariſes from the number of poſſible appeals under particular circumſtances from the firſt hearing of a cauſe to what in general caſes may be termed the laſt, is equally true.

When a ſentence [for example] given in a cauſe of jactitation, in which marriage was at iſſue, has paſſed through all the ſtages of appeal, the cauſe is ſtill liable to be opened de novo in favour of matrimony, as if nothing had been done. Was this poſſible prolixity of proceeding, and were theſe opportunities of appealing, an impediment and ſafeguard againſt colluſion (as one of the doctors has gravely alledged them to be) I do not deny that a cauſe of jactitation muſt of all cauſes ſtand faireſt to be the moſt immaculate and moſt free from the ſtain of fraud. But, when it anſwers the purpoſe of parties to collude, is it to be preſumed that thoſe, who could begin a cauſe colluſively, would ſcruple to carry it on from one court to another, till they came to the end of their journey, if it was neceſſary ſo to do to obtain their end? The truth however is, that ſeveral appeals are not abſolutely neceſſary; and that, when there is colluſion in a cauſe, there is either no appeal, or an oſtenſible one only, which is always ſubducted within a convenient time; and the gentlemen beſt know, whether an appeal from the ſentence relied on in the preſent caſe was ſubducted or not. A ſentence in jactitation pronounced in diſfavour of matrimony is defined to be tranſitory, and not final; and this definition ſeems to be founded, as abſurdities ſometimes are, on a tenet of religion.---The religion I mean is that, which after having been received in this kingdom for a long ſeries of years, was afterwards and now is with reaſon proteſted againſt. In this religion it is maintained, among other condemned doctrines, that marriage is a ſacrament, and not to be diſſolved: and although it nearly amounts to a certainty, that the rites of matrimony are not now quite ſo ſtrictly regarded in England as they have been heretofore, and that his majeſty's ſubjects of almoſt every deſcription, from the loweſt to the higheſt, have ſhewed an utter abhorrence of this doctrine of the church of Rome; yet it is not to be wondered at, that the antient canoniſts, who were to a man of the religion I have juſt mentioned, and had the framing of the code eccleſiaſtical, ſhould ſo fabricate or bend the law, as to render it the ſupport of marriage by every poſſible method, and ſhould lay it down as a maxim, that a ſentence in a marriage cauſe ſhould never, in their language, paſs into rem judicatam, or become a final judgment, but be eternally open and liable to reviſion and reverſal, notwithſtanding it may have been eſtabliſhed by appeal upon appeal, and even by the judges of the common law in a court of Delegates under the king's ſpecial commiſſion, and afterwards by the lord-chancellor, who may have refuſed a commiſſion of review. Clarke's Praxis, title 205.

To render the privilege of a jactitation cauſe, in which the proof of marriage has been attempted but not perfected, ſtill more extenſive, the general ſafeguard againſt perjury has been entirely taken away in this ſpecies of ſuit; for the publication of the depoſitions is no obſtacle to freſh examinations, and new witneſſes may continually be admitted in favour of matrimony, even after the former depoſitions have been inſpected, and without any proof made that ſuch witneſſes are lately come to the knowledge of the producer; which is a proof expected and required in all other cauſes whatever, and a rule never departed from.

Clarke, in his book of Practice, is expreſs to this purpoſe, and uſes the following words: licet generaliter non admittuntur teſtes poſt publicationem, admittuntur tamen in cauſa matrimoniali ſine juramento, quod teſtes noviter ad notitiam pervenerunt. Tit. 205. It is allowed too in this ſpecies of cauſe, that not only the party ſilenced, but that any other perſon, intereſted to eſtabliſh the matrimony, may take up the cauſe in the ſtate in which it was left in the ſame court, and proceed, as I apprehend, in another court, and invocate or illate the proceedings.

The pars citata, or defendant, is alſo at liberty to go into another court in a new matrimonial cauſe; as for example, in a cauſe of reſtitution of conjugal rights: licere parti citatæ aut in eodem judicio, aut coram alio judice (non obſtante quod citatio emanavit in cauſa jactitationis) contra actorem inſtituere cauſam matrimonialem. See Clarke's Praxis, tit. 195, 205.

This ambulatory, indeterminate, ſtate of a ſentence in jactitation muſt certainly, in the apprehenſion of any man not a lawyer, be a very improper circumſtance to be urged in order to render this ſpecies of ſentence given in one cauſe an abſolute bar to proceeding to judgment in another cauſe of a civil nature, and more particularly to make it a bar in a cauſe of a criminal nature in another kind of juriſdiction. Taking things therefore as they are, and having proved the law reſpecting this extraordinary ſpecies of ſentence from the books of practice which deſcribe it, can any good reaſon be aſſigned why ſuch a ſentence ſhould be concluſive in the preſent caſe, and ſhould not be reviſed and revoked, if occaſion ſhould require it, in the high court before which we now are?

This ſentence never paſſes into a rem judicatam, or final judgment---it is ſubject to be reviſed in any other court having juriſdiction than that in which it was firſt given. The act of James I. by which the marrying of a ſecond huſband or ſecond wife, whilſt the firſt is living, is made felony, has, by creating the felony, plainly transferred that branch of the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, which before puniſhed polygamy, to thoſe courts where criminals are tried; and to remove even the appearance of any difficulty which might have ariſen on the right of the proſecutor to offer the ſentence, the counſel for the lady have themſelves deſired leave on her part to bring it before the court, and have actually introduced it:---can it therefore be poſſible that this high court ſhould not think themſelves authorized by a complete juriſdiction in every reſpect, ſpiritual as well as temporal, to give the proſecutor, on the part of the crown and of the public, the liberty, under all the circumſtances of this caſe, of offering a proof of the nullity of the ſentence, by pointing out from the proceedings themſelves, if neceſſity ſhould require it, the marks of fraud with which they abound; or, what is rather to be expected, to give the proſecutor the liberty of adducing evidence in a more direct manner, both oral and inſtrumental, to prove the marriage of the lady at the bar with Mr. Hervey, the preſent earl of Briſtol; by which the colluſive proceedings before the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and the truth of the principal accuſation, will at one and the ſame time be plainly demonſtrated?

Lord Preſident of the Council. My lords, I move your lordſhips to adjourn to the chamber of parliament.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. This houſe is adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The lords and others returned to the chamber of parliament in the ſame order they came down; and the houſe, being thus reſumed, reſolved to proceed further in the trial of Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, in Weſtminſter-Hall, on Friday next, at ten o'clock in the morning.

Friday, April 19. The third day.

THE lords and others came from the chamber of parliament in the ſame order as on Tueſday; and the peers being ſeated, and the lord high ſteward in his chair,

Lord High Steward. My lords, the houſe is reſumed. Is it your lordſhips pleaſure the judges may be covered?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then the ſerjeant at arms made proclamation for ſilence; and the ducheſs of Kingſton was conducted to the bar.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, you may proceed with your reply.

(REPLY.)

Mr. Wallace.

My lords,

I muſt beſpeak your lordſhips indulgence to examine and diſcuſs the great variety of arguments and conſiderations, which the counſel on the part of the proſecution have thought proper to enter into, and ſubmit to your lordſhips. I ought in the firſt place to take ſome notice of the charge of novelty imputed to myſelf, and thoſe who aſſiſt me, in the attempt to introduce the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, before the cauſe has been opened, or the evidence on the part of the proſecution ſtated to your lordſhips.

It might perhaps be thought a ſufficient anſwer to obſerve, that no indictment ever yet has been preferred on this ſtatute, where the Eccleſiaſtical Court had given a ſentence upon the ſubject. The proſecutor of this indictment has had the boldneſs to ſet at defiance the proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and, in direct oppoſition to a ſentence pronounced there, to prefer in a court of criminal juriſdiction a charge of felony; for although criminal proſecutions are and muſt be in the name of the crown, yet in moſt caſes they are carried on by private individuals; and your lordſhips particularly know, in the preſent caſe, there is a private proſecutor, and one who might have applied on the ſcore of intereſt to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, to have had that ſentence re-examined.

With reſpect to the novelty of the proceedings, the counſel for the noble lady at the bar would have found themſelves ſtanding much in need of your lordſhips pardon, if they had not interpoſed the ſentence at the time it was offered. If they had permitted a cauſe of this kind to have proceeded into evidence (which, from the accounts we have heard, is to be laid before the court by a number of witneſſes, and of courſe muſt have taken up your lordſhips many days in the examination), and after all, the ſentence had been produced and attended with the effect which we hope it will have, what would have been the ſituation of counſel, who had ſuffered ſo much of your lordſhips time to have been miſ-ſpent in the examination of parole evidence to facts which could not be admitted againſt the deciſion offered to your lordſhips?

But in truth it is not new in practice: the caſe alluded to is not only, as it has been termed, a colour, but a juſtification for what has been done. It is true, it was an ejectment, which the gentlemen have properly called a fictitious proceeding. It was for that reaſon the ſentence was not interpoſed, till the evidence was opened; for till then the defendant is ignorant in what manner the plaintiff intends to make out his claim: but as ſoon as it was ſtated, that he derived through a marriage, which had been examined and decided in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, the counſel immediately, without ſuffering evidence to be given, interpoſed the ſentence. In this caſe there is no occaſion to wait for the opening of counſel; for upon the face of the indictment the ſuppoſed marriage with Mr. Hervey is ſtated as the ground of the offence: the crime in the indictment charged is a marriage with his grace the duke of Kingſton, during the life of Mr. Hervey, to whom the noble priſoner at the bar is alledged to have been before married; and conſequently upon the validity of that marriage the queſtion depends. The marriage with the duke of Kingſton was notorious in the face of the church, under the ſanction of a licence from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and in the preſence of many witneſſes. The ſuppoſed marriage with Mr. Hervey was the ſole queſtion in the Eccleſiaſtical Court: that court has decided againſt it; and as long as that ſentence remains in force, the relation of the parties as huſband and wife is at leaſt ſuſpended, if not abſolutely gone.

The practice every day, where one is in poſſeſſion under a fine, and no claim has been made for five years, is to interpoſe it immediately. I ventured to do it not long ago in the court of King's Bench at a trial at bar, where the claimant came out of Wales with as long a pedigree as that country could furniſh. When I heard it ſtated, and underſtanding that a great number of witneſſes muſt be called to ſupport it, I offered the fine to the court, before a witneſs was called; which inſtantly put an end to the cauſe. I did not by that incur any cenſure from the court, or blame from the counſel. I thought myſelf called upon in duty to inform the court of it; and a cauſe, which would have laſted three or four days, was ended in leſs than ten minutes.

I truſt, a conduct deſigned to prevent your time being miſ-ſpent upon a fruitleſs enquiry, (for whatever ſhould be the reſult, yet this ſentence, if it has the effect we contend for, muſt render it totally nugatory and immaterial) will not be the ſubject of your lordſhips animadverſion.

Enough, I hope, has been ſaid in defence of the attempt againſt the charge of novelty; but an obſervation was made, to create a prejudice againſt the caſe of the noble lady at the bar, from the conduct of her counſel in this ſtage of the proceedings to prevent an examination of witneſſes, as a proof of their opinion upon the merits of the cauſe. God forbid that any impreſſion ſhould be made againſt the noble priſoner at the bar from the conduct of her counſel! Your lordſhips know, that in the forms of proceeding ſhe muſt throw herſelf upon her counſel, and ſubmit to their management; and no miſtake of theirs will, I truſt, ever turn to her prejudice. I feel an happineſs in ſpeaking to a court incapable of receiving impreſſions from an inſinuation of that kind.

An obſervation was made upon the form of the ſentence, which ſeemed to ſtrike many of your lordſhips, that as far as it appeared to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, the parties were free from all matrimonial contracts and eſpouſals; not poſitively that they were ſo; and therefore as far as the evidence went in that court, and no farther, ought the ſentence to be regarded. Your lordſhips have heard from thoſe that practiſe in the courts of eccleſiaſtical law, from the counſel on both ſides of that deſcription, that it is the conſtant uniform method of drawing up ſentences in cauſes of this kind; that it is a ſentence of validity; that it is conſidered by them as ſuch; but that it is open to further proceedings in that court; that it falls within the maxim which was cited to your lordſhips upon the other ſide, which is not denied here, but admitted, nay mentioned in the very opening of this buſineſs, that ſententia contra matrimonium nunquam tranſit in rem judicatam; this ſentence, being againſt a marriage, never paſſes into a definitive judgment of that court; but does it follow, becauſe it is open to further examination, becauſe other ſuits may be inſtituted which may contradict this ſentence, that whilſt it remains unimpeached, till other ſuits are inſtituted, and till a different judgment is given, that the ſentence has no effect; that it is the words of the judge, without having any ſort of conſequence attending of them?

My lords, it is too ridiculous to ſuppoſe a ſuit inſtituted in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, where the proſecutor of the ſuit (or the promoter, in the language of that court) has obtained the ſentence of the court in his favour, that it means nothing at all; that it is mere waſte paper; that he might as well never have commenced the ſuit. Is it poſſible, in a country where the leaſt idea of juſtice prevails, that this ſhould be the caſe? On the contrary, the ſentence of every court of competent juriſdiction has been conſidered in the ſame, and every other court where it has become the ſubject of debate, till impeached, ſet aſide, reverſed, or repealed by the court that gave the ſentence, or by the authority of a court of appellant juriſdiction, to be concluſive.

Your lordſhips have heard from the doctors of the civil law the effect of a ſentence in a ſuit of jactitation of marriage. I took the liberty of ſtating to your lordſhips many caſes referring, where the ſame doctrine had been adopted by the judges of the common law, and conſtantly acted upon without an exception. The proceeding is not, as has been contended, in the nature of an action for words or of ſlander; it has ever been inſtituted upon ſome ſerious claim of marriage, which calls upon the party for an explanation.

Would it be no objection with a lady to a gentleman paying his addreſſes to her, that ſomebody claimed a marriage with him? I believe, my lords, it would at leaſt create a pauſe in the treaty, if it did not abſolutely put an end to it. He certainly would be called upon by the lady or her friends to ſatisfy them, that there did not exiſt a ground for ſuch report. There is no legal courſe to be taken, but by commencing a ſuit of jactitation in the Eccleſiaſtical Court. The proceeding calls in form upon the party who has made the claim to juſtify it. If a marriage be inſiſted on, the parties inſtantly change ſituations; the defendant becomes the plaintiff or actor, and the original plaintiff becomes the defendant, and is called upon to anſwer that claim made in the Eccleſiaſtical Court of marriage, not only to anſwer it in form, but upon oath: the original plaintiff is obliged on oath to declare, whether the allegations of the party reſpecting the marriage are true or falſe. The proofs are firſt made by the party inſiſting upon the marriage; and the judge gives ſentence upon them. The ſuit in truth becomes, and is admitted by the learned doctor on the other ſide to be, to all intents and purpoſes, a matrimonial cauſe; and the judgment is upon the validity and lawfulneſs of the marriage. In that light the proceeding in the eccleſiaſtical courts has ever been received and treated.

But ſuppoſe the ſentence has been received and conſidered as concluſive evidence, it is contended by the counſel for the proſecution to be only in particular caſes, namely, where the perſon againſt whom the ſentence has been given, or one deriving under ſuch perſon, has been a party in the ſuit, in which the ſentence has been offered in evidence; which is not the preſent caſe, as the crown was no party to the ſuit in the Eccleſiaſtical Court.

The diſtinction may be thought ingenious and plauſible; but there is no foundation in law to ſupport it. In the great number of authorities cited to your lordſhips, there is not the leaſt hint of ſuch a diſtinction: the rule is laid down in the moſt general terms, and without an exception, in the caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield before the houſe of lords. The perſon againſt whom the ſentence was given in evidence, was not a party, nor claimed under any party, to the ſuit in the Eccleſiaſtical Court.

No notice was taken of another caſe which I mentioned to your lordſhips, where the perſon againſt whom the ſentence was given in evidence was no party to the proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Court. It was an action againſt Mr. Thomas Hervey for a debt contracted by his wife. Mr. Hervey had a judgment in that ſuit againſt him: but in a ſubſequent ſuit, after a proceeding had in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, in which it was declared that Mr. Hervey, as far as appeared to the court, was free from all matrimonial contracts (juſt as it is in the preſent caſe) the ſentence was received as concluſive evidence upon the fact of the marriage, and defeated the plaintiff.

I am not contending that ſuch ſentences are to be uſed as inſtruments of frauds upon creditors. No; if there is no real marriage, but a man holds out to the world a woman for his wife, and ſhe gets a credit upon that ſcore, he ſhall never be permitted to ſay they are not married: yet where the perſons live ſeparate, where no act of his gives a countenance to the demand, there a creditor truſts the wife upon the ground of a legal marriage; there the Eccleſiaſtical Court deciding upon the marriage is concluſive evidence. That caſe was acquieſced in; no application was made to the court; and I believe all that heard it approved of the deciſion.

A learned friend of mine on the other ſide, after he had as I thought cloſed his argument and ſat down, roſe again to mention a caſe to your lordſhips of Crutchley and Robins.

It muſt have ſtruck him that it would appear a little extraordinary, after ſo full a diſcuſſion, no caſe had been cited to your lordſhips to warrant or give a colour to the diſtinction attempted.

That caſe, when ſtated, and the reaſons given by the court which pronounced the judgment conſidered, will appear not to have the leaſt application to the preſent. It was a claim of dower by Mrs. Robins upon the eſtate of Mr. Robins deceaſed, in Staffordſhire. The defendant in that caſe, the heir of Mr. Robins, pleaded to that claim, that ſhe never was lawfully married to Mr. Robins. The only legal mode of trying that fact is by a certificate from the biſhop of the dioceſe: the pleading between the parties is brought to an iſſue; it is the office of the court to direct a writ to the biſhop to certify whether there was a marriage or not; and upon the certificate the judgment is given. Inſtead of ſuffering the court to iſſue a writ to the biſhop, Mrs. Robins replied to that plea a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, in a ſuit wherein ſhe was by the judgment of that court pronounced the wife of Mr. Robins; the defendant put in a demurrer, inſiſting the replication was not admiſſible: and that was the queſtion before the court of Common-Pleas.

Did the court of Common-Pleas decide, that ſuch a ſentence is not evidence? No: the court of Common-Pleas determined, that by law they could receive no other evidence of the fact than the biſhop's certificate; it was the ſole proof which the law in that particular caſe has required for the deciſion of the cauſe, and they could not depart from it. But they went farther in that cauſe: they told Mrs. Robins that the ſentence, tho' it could not be received there, might be laid before the biſhop, who was to certify to them the marriage. That is the language of the court of Common-Pleas upon the caſe: the biſhop muſt certify the marriage; the ſentence muſt be laid before him, and not before this court. Did the court of Common-Pleas decide, as contended, that it was no evidence? No ſuch thing is to be found in the caſe. All the court did, or meant to do, was to inform the plaintiff that ſhe had miſtaken the time and place to make uſe of that evidence; that the law had in that caſe appointed a certain ſpecific proof to be given to the court, and they could receive no other: the biſhop, who was to examine into the matter, might or might not be concluded by the ſentence; the court muſt be determined by his certificate.

My lords, if the biſhop had rejected the ſentence, he would have done what no biſhop ever did before; yet the court muſt be concluded by his certificate; they could not examine into the proofs: nay, if the biſhop by fraud had certified a marriage, the court would have been concluded. So much for that caſe which has been cited; and which is the only caſe the induſtry of the gentlemen on the other ſide could produce upon this part of the argument.

Your lordſhips have been told that, by the general rules of evidence in civil caſes, no ſentence or judgment can be received, unleſs in a cauſe between the ſame parties, or who derive under them. The candour of the gentlemen on the other ſide has admitted two exceptions to the rule: firſt, ſentences or judgments where the proceeding is in rem; and ſecondly, in cauſes where the court has excluſive juriſdiction.

I will not ſtate to your lordſhips other exceptions to the rule; the two admitted are ſufficient; the preſent caſe falls within both exceptions, though either would be enough.

In the firſt place, it is a proceeding in rem: marriage or no marriage is the point to be determined. It does not come collaterally or incidentally, but directly, in queſtion; and the deciſion of which was the ſole object of the ſuit.

In the next place, it is a ſentence of a court having excluſive juriſdiction upon the ſubject. It is admitted that the Eccleſiaſtical Courts have excluſive juriſdictions in probates of wills, in all teſtamentary diſputes reſpecting perſonal eſtates; and having decided the queſtion, whether right or wrong, upon true or upon falſe grounds, it is not competent to any other court, unleſs in a legal way by appeal, to enter into the matter; but faith and credit is to be given to the deciſion of the Eccleſiaſtical Court. It is alſo admitted, that, till the ſtatute upon which the preſent indictment is founded, the eccleſiaſtical courts had the ſole and excluſive juriſdiction in matrimonial cauſes.

But it is contended, that a concurrent juriſdiction is given by this act to the king's temporal courts: where is the ground of this notion to be found? Was it the intention of the legiſlature to give to the temporal courts a concurrent juriſdiction with the eccleſiaſtical? The intention muſt be collected from the act itſelf. In my own apprehenſion, nothing is more clear than that the legiſlature, at the time of paſſing this act, meant to guard and ſecure the juriſdiction of the eccleſiaſtical courts againſt innovation from the temporal.

The act is general; that whoever ſhall marry a ſecond huſband or wife, living the former, ſhall be deemed a felon, and ſuffer the pains of death. Yet that general enacting clauſe is reſtrained by a proviſo, which demonſtrates the intention of the legiſlature, that the proceedings in eccleſiaſtical courts ſhould remain untouched, and the temporal courts have no juriſdiction in the caſe. The exception runs thus:—Nothing herein contained ſhall extend to any perſon or perſons, that ſhall at any time of ſuch marriage be divorced by any ſentence had or ſhall be hereafter had in eccleſiaſtical courts; nor to any perſon or perſons———

Theſe proviſions ſhew an anxiety in the legiſlature to preſerve the privilege of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and ſave their judgments from an examination; and ſo far from giving a juriſdiction to the temporal courts in ſuch caſes, the act expreſly declares, that where the eccleſiaſtical courts have given a deciſion, the temporal courts muſt ſtop. The caſe is not within the law; it is not permitted to be examined into.—It is pretty extraordinary that hiſtory gives no account of this act, or the immediate occaſion for paſſing it. The preamble ſtates, ‘that evil-diſpoſed perſons, being married, run out of one county into another, to places where they are not known, and marry there.’ If this was the evil meant to be redreſſed, the caſe of a perſon of rank, obtaining a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and acting under the faith of it, can never fall within the deſcription in the act.

The journals of neither houſe furniſh any lights upon this ſubject. The act was brought into the houſe of commons in April, received ſome amendments in a committee there, and ſent to the houſe of lords: it there alſo received amendments; and was returned to the houſe of commons again in June: but what the amendments were, or whether the proviſoes were inſerted by the guardians of the rights of the church, as is moſt probable, or came from the houſe of commons, cannot be diſcovered. Suppoſe a ſentence of divorce pronounced in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; would it be permitted to any court, under pretence of fraud, to examine for the purpoſe of making the parties criminals, when the act has declared ſuch a ſentence ſhall not be meddled with; and the parties under ſuch ſentences are excepted in terms out of the act?

Where a ſentence of nullity of marriage is given, it is equally open to future examination in the eccleſiaſtical courts with a ſentence of jactitation. If this be doubted, your lordſhips, from the abilities and integrity of the gentlemen who aſſiſt us, though counſel in the cauſe, will receive ſatisfactory information.

A ſentence of nullity of marriage is excepted by the words of the act: and would it not ſeem extremely inconſiſtent and harſh, that, where a marriage is doubtful, and the eccleſiaſtical courts have declared it null, neither party can by a ſubſequent marriage be in the predicament of a felon; and yet a perſon, who is by the ſentence of that court declared never to have been married at all, and to be free from all matrimonial eſpouſals, is to be a felon? Such a conſtruction on a penal law would be monſtrous.

The intention of the legiſlature is to me as clear as language can make it, that matrimonial cauſes ſhould be ſtill within the ſole juriſdiction of the eccleſiaſtical courts, and that the temporal courts ſhould have no authority to examine into their deciſions, by declaring, that whereſoever theſe ſentences obtain, the party marrying whilſt they are in force, ſhall not be a felon; and yet the former marriage, if it were a legal one, is not done away: it is capable of being revived, and a ſecond marriage would be null and void. And upon another proceeding, if the ſentence ſhould be in favour of the marriage, either party may commence a ſuit for reſtitution of conjugal rights; the firſt marriage would be eſtabliſhed, and a ſecond marriage, pending the ſentence, void; yet the party would not be in the predicament of a felon. This is clear from the act of parliament; and in this ſenſe your lordſhips will give me leave to uſe it, as ſhewing beyond a poſſibility of doubt the intention of the legiſlature. Where then are the arguments we have heard, that the legiſlature meant in this caſe to give the common-law courts ſuch concurrent juriſdiction, as to diſregard the ſentences of the eccleſiaſtical courts? Has the legiſlature ſaid ſo? Has not the legiſlature ſaid the contrary in expreſs terms? Wherever a ſentence is pronounced, that perſon is not to be tried in the temporal courts. Is it competent to any temporal court? Is it competent to your lordſhips, the ſupreme temporal court in the kingdom? Awful and great as this court is, give me leave to ſay, that the rules of conſtruction are the ſame as in the moſt inferior court of criminal juriſdiction. There is not one law for peers, and another for commons, in this country: the law is the ſame for both; it only varies in the circumſtances of the trial: the evidence to prove the guilt or innocence of the party is the ſame in all.

There is no doubt, but the temporal courts may try marriages upon this act, where no ſentence has been given in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; as they do every day upon titles to lands on ejectments: but where a ſentence has been obtained againſt, or in favour of, a marriage in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, the temporal courts are concluded by it.

The concurrent juriſdiction which they contend for, if I underſtand them right, is this: The eccleſiaſtical courts, ſay they, it is true, have a right to try a marriage; but the temporal courts have alſo a right to try a marriage under this act of parliament. The ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court will not ſatisfy them; they will have the evidence; and if they are ſatisfied with the evidence that the eccleſiaſtical courts have thought inſufficient, they will pronounce the crime, and puniſh the offender. Can there be any ſuch poſition warranted by the act of parliament?

If the legiſlature could have foreſeen, that in any period it ſhould enter into the head of any man to ſet at nothing the juriſdiction of the eccleſiaſtical courts, they could not in more poſitive terms have guarded againſt it.

If the gentlemen ſhould be able to eſtabliſh a concurrent juriſdiction in the eccleſiaſtical and temporal courts, they then beg leave to advance a ſtep further, and lay down a rule, which they hope your lordſhips will adopt to intitle them to enter into evidence, that judgments only bind in courts of concurrent juriſdiction, where they are juſt.

I deny the rule in the extent it has been laid down. Have not the courts of King's Bench, Common-Pleas, and Exchequer, a concurrent juriſdiction in civil cauſes? and was it ever heard, when a judgment of one of the courts is pleaded in another, that the propriety and rectitude of the judgment can be examined into? Certainly not: the party is permitted only to deny the exiſtence of the judgment. The caſe of Sinclair and Frazier, lately determined by your lordſhips upon an appeal from Scotland, was cited as an authority for this purpoſe; in which your lordſhips ruled, that a judgment in the court of Jamaica ſhould not be enforced, unleſs it was juſt; that is, if the defendant in the cauſe could ſhew it was unjuſt, no court ought to lend its aid to carry it into execution.—My lords, nothing is more right or juſt; but does it apply to the caſe before your lordſhips?

Wherever the aid of a ſuperior court is wanted to give effect to a judgment of an inferior court, or of a court which cannot carry into execution its own judgments, from the parties being locally out of its juriſdiction, that court whoſe aid is prayed ought not to give it, if the defendant can ſhew the judgment to be unjuſt:—they will give ſo much credit to the ſentence of every court as to preſume it right, unleſs the defendant can ſhew the contrary. Not long ago, an application was made to the court of King's Bench to inforce the judgment of the juſtices at the quarter-ſeſſions in Lancaſhire. An act of parliament paſſed for the incloſure of a common. By that act, as the public roads are directed to be ſixty feet wide, the common was ſmall, ſituate in a very remote part of the country, where very few people came but thoſe intereſted in the lands, and they thought that roads of leſs breadth would very well ſuffice for the occaſions of the country; the commiſſioners under that act of parliament aſſigned, in the name of private roads, what in truth had before been publick, and allotted half the dimenſions required by the act. There was an application to the ſeſſions, who had juriſdiction, by appeal; and they ordered the roads to be opened to the extent the act directed: but when they had done that, they were left without the power of enforcing their order: they could not compel a ſpecifick execution of it. If they had proceeded for a contempt againſt the commiſſioners by indictment, that would have been tedious and uncertain: the proper method was by an application to the ſupreme criminal court of the kingdom, in which the ſuperintendance of all inferior juriſdictions is lodged. A mandamus was moved for in the King's Bench, to enforce the judgment of the ſeſſions. The court of King's Bench told thoſe who oppoſed the application, We think ourſelves bound to enforce it, unleſs you can ſhew it to be unjuſt: convince the court that the ſeſſions have done wrong, and we will not lend our aid. And on that occaſion a caſe was cited by the learned lord at the head of the court, which happened in the time of lord Hardwicke. Upon a decree of the court of Grand Seſſions of Wales, where a party had removed out of the juriſdiction of that court, a bill was filed in the court of Chancery to enforce the decree of the Grand Seſſions; the defendant by his anſwer inſiſted, that the decree was unjuſt, and ought not to be carried into execution: lord Hardwicke was of opinion, that if the defendant could ſatisfy him that the decree was unjuſt, he would not lend his aid to enforce it.

Do we apply to your lordſhips for the aid of the court to carry the preſent ſentence into execution? No; we aſk no favour; we demand nothing but your juſtice: we produce the ſentence: we do not aſk for your aſſiſtance to carry it into execution; it comes in collaterally; and in ſuch caſes, whether in the courts of law or in the courts of equity, the ſentences of the Eccleſiaſtical Court have been conſtantly attended to and been received as concluſive evidence.

But, my lords, though ſentences of the eccleſiaſtical courts have been ever received as concluſive evidence in civil cauſes, yet it is contended, they are not admiſſible in criminal proſecutions. Is it the genius of this country to attend more to the puniſhment of crimes, than to the adminiſtration of juſtice between the parties in civil rights? Is the diſtinction founded in good ſenſe or ſound policy, that the ſentences of eccleſiaſtical courts ſhould not only be received, but be concluſive, in one caſe, and be no evidence at all in the other? Your lordſhips will expect very ſtrong authorities before you liſten to ſuch a diſtinction.

Suppoſe in a criminal proſecution the property of goods ſhould come in queſtion, and a ſentence of condemnation in the court of Exchequer was produced, is there a doubt of its being received? Where the proceeding is in rem, the ſentence muſt of neceſſity be admiſſible and concluſive in all courts, between all parties, and on all occaſions, and to all intents and purpoſes. Without it there would be contrariety of determinations upon the ſame queſtion; which would be a reproach to the juſtice of the country.

I troubled your lordſhips with a caſe from ſir John Strange's Reports to prove, that the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court was admiſſible and concluſive in criminal caſes: that doctrine is abundantly confirmed by a caſe in the King's Bench four years after; the King and Rhodes. What is the anſwer given to the caſe? The Reporter was a young man, and therefore he is not to be credited; or, his notes of caſes after his death came into the hands of his executors, who knew nothing of law, who publiſh every ſcrap of paper they can find, and give them to the world—to make a volume: ſo the authority is got rid of by an objection to the youth of the Reporter, and the manner of the publication.

If your lordſhips were inclined to liſten to objections of this kind, it would be a curious enquiry, at what period of a lawyer's life he can take a note fit to be reported. I confeſs, I am totally unacquainted with it. Should it be when he is at the bar, a young man, and attending to every thing that paſſes? Should it be, when he is advanced in buſineſs? and when the buſineſs he is concerned in engroſſes his time? If the caſe had happened later, your lordſhips would have been told, ſir John was then a man of buſineſs; he did not trouble himſelf about taking notes; they are very inaccurate. If it had been the note of a judge taken upon the bench, I do not know but it might be ſaid of him, what was ſaid of another judge,—judges are apt to ſleep upon the bench.

I had the curioſity to enquire into the circumſtances of the Report. The caſe happened when ſir John Strange was about twenty-four or twenty-five years of age; he had been at the bar four years. A note ſo taken, and preſerved to the time of his death, ought not to be ſlightly treated. The obſervation of the caſe being publiſhed by his executors would have been ſpared, had the gentlemen gone to the firſt page of ſir John Strange's book; for they would have found by a preface written by ſir John Strange himſelf, when between fifty and ſixty, that he had collected theſe caſes, and meant the publick ſhould have the uſe of them; that he had been at the pains of ſelecting thoſe that he thought fit for publication, and of putting them into order. It appears he had given ſome of his notes to a gentleman, whoſe ſervant had clandeſtinely copied and ſold them to bookſellers; and leſt the caſes ſo ſurreptitiouſly obtained ſhould be imperfectly given to the publick under the ſanction of his name, he was at the expence of having his notes tranſcribed under his own eye: and he ſays, 'if they ſhould not be publiſhed in my life-time, they will 'come perfect into the hands of my executors; and of courſe to the pub-'lick.' He practiſed in the firſt criminal court of this country with the greateſt honour and ability; he had never heard in his time that the caſe had been over-ruled or impeached: if he had, his integrity was ſuch, that the caſe never would have appeared in his book; or if he had inſerted it, it would have been accompanied with a note, that damned it, or threw a doubt on its authority.

There was another objection to this caſe: that it muſt have been determined in the time of the dulleſt alderman that ever ſat in that court. Who, my lords, determine caſes of this kind at the Old-Bailey? Not the aldermen: they attend indeed; they are fine pictures, handſome furniture; they grace and adorn the court; very reſpectable, of conſiderable trade; but they do not deal in law. If they ever ſtudy law, it is to avoid it; in which they are not always ſucceſsful. The judges of the common law, of the ſuperior courts of Weſtminſter-Hall, decide the queſtions which ariſe in trials there.

Your lordſhips have been alſo told, that the authority of this caſe, if ever it had any, was ſoon put an end to in the year 1753, in the caſe of the King and Murphy; where the probate of the Eccleſiaſtical Court was ſet at nought; it was nothing more than paper and wax, without any effect. The caſe of the King and Murphy was thrown in by name. A caſe, the King and ſuch a one, ſhews it to have been a criminal cauſe; but it muſt be from a ſtate of the facts that your lordſhips muſt diſcover the application.

I will let your lordſhips know the ſtate of that caſe. It was an indictment for forging the will of one Wilkinſon. Your lordſhips have many of you heard of the great ſucceſſes of ſome privateers fitted out in the year 1746-7, called the royal-family privateers: they were very ſucceſsful; and they got very ſoon into many diſputes in the court of Chancery and courts of law. Their wages and prize-money were conſiderable. Wicked men were tempted to endeavour to poſſeſs it. A ſailor in a remote part of the world is a being not likely to give himſelf much trouble about money. Murphy, who was proſecuted at the Old-Bailey, knowing Wilkinſon's title to the prize-money, had forged a will of Wilkinſon, had got that will proved, and had received from one Neades, the agent, part of the prize-money of Wilkinſon. All went off very well. Murphy ſpent the money. But in a few months after, Mr. Wilkinſon was reſtored to life. He appeared before the agent, and demanded his money. Says the agent, We have paid your executor. Says he, That is pretty odd! I will ſatisfy you I have not been dead; and nobody can prove my will till I am dead: I inſiſt upon my money. The fraud was detected; Murphy was apprehended, proſecuted, and convicted.

Would the gentlemen have had him ſet up the probate of the will at the Old-Bailey? Would they have told Wilkinſon to go to the Eccleſiaſtical Court to repeal it? What would Wilkinſon, ignorant as he was, ſay? I have heard of probates of wills of dead men, but never heard of probates of wills of living men before: the juriſdiction of the eccleſiaſtical courtd is to grant probates of the wills of the dead, not of the living; an therefore the queſtion could not ariſe.

Another caſe of one Stirling was mentioned. Stirling found out that a Mrs. Shutter had property in the South-Sea ſtock, and his ſcheme to poſſeſs it was like Murphy's: he forged a will, got it proved, went to the South-Sea-Houſe; there he exhibited the probate; they gave credit to the death of the party, and to his being the executor, and they paid the money. The woman, who had nothing elſe to live upon, came to receive her dividend. The clerk ſays, Your executor has proved your will; you muſt be the ghoſt of Mrs. Shutter, not Mrs. Shutter herſelf. She was not to be put off in that way. The Company found out Stirling, and brought him to juſtice. He did not ſay to the court on his trial, Do not believe her; no law ſays you muſt take the evidence of a ghoſt: ſhe muſt go into Doctors Commons and reſcind this, before you believe her evidence. No court would bear ſuch an inſult. The juriſdiction of the Eccleſiaſtical Court does not attach, till the party is dead: there is no ſuch thing as a will for the Prerogative Court to give effect to, whilſt the teſtator is living. It was ſaid, the crime conſiſts in obtaining the probate. The will has no legal effect without it. It is not neceſſary, to conſtitute the crime of forgery, that the will ſhould be proved. If the will is exhibited as a genuine will, and the officers of the court (what has happened in many inſtances) ſuſpect a forgery, they ſtop the probate; and many have ſuffered without a probate being granted, the offer to prove the will being a publication of the forgery.

Two other caſes, the King and Fitzgerald, and the King and Carr and Richardſon, were alſo mentioned to your lordſhips. In neither of theſe caſes was any probate produced or inſiſted upon by the priſoner. One of the gentlemen, who cited the caſes, ſuggeſted that anſwer to them, which was too obvious to be overlooked.

I truſt your lordſhips are ſatisfied, there is no ground in reaſon or authority for the diſtinction attempted between civil and criminal cauſes in the admiſſibility and effect of the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court.

I am now, my lords, arrived at that point to which the whole artillery ſeems to be directed; that the ſentence was obtained by colluſion.—Your lordſhips have been told, that a judgment by colluſion is fabula, non judicium; wax, paper, ink, any thing that you will, but not a judgment: the judge does not act, the judge is impoſed upon; it is of no effect whatever; in no court, in no light, upon no occaſion, can the moſt ingenious imagination ſuggeſt a caſe, in which colluſion does not affect the tranſaction; and being once proved, deſtroys it from the beginning, and as much annihilates it, as if it had never exiſted. This your lordſhips have been told is the clear ſettled law of every court.

I muſt beg leave to deny the doctrine in the extent it is contended for, and to inſiſt before your lordſhips, the colluſion cannot be averred againſt this ſentence, either upon the principles of the common law, or the proviſions of any ſtatute. By the common law of this country, proof of colluſion in ſome inſtances was permitted to reſcind tranſactions: the ſimplicity of the common law, calculated for more honeſt times, was not equal to all the arts of injuſtice which ingenious wickedneſs hath produced.

By the principles of the common law, the perſon permitted to reſcind a tranſaction, on the ſcore of fraud or colluſion, muſt have an intereſt veſted at the time. This is expreſsly laid down by the court in Twyne's caſe, reported by lord chief juſtice Coke. Where goods are unjuſtly taken, and ſold in a market overt by fraud, to change the property, the true owner may retake them. So where a creditor proſecutes his debtor to judgment, and the debtor ſells his goods to a perſon knowing of the judgment, with a view to defeat the execution, the goods may notwithſtanding be taken by the creditor. In both caſes an intereſt was veſted at the time of the fraud.

Many ſtatutes have been made to ſuppreſs fraud; in Henry the IVth's time, in the different reigns of the Edwards, and laſt of all in the time of queen Elizabeth; the main object of which was to enable perſons who became intereſted ſubſequent to tranſactions founded in colluſion and fraud, to impeach and reſcind them.

It has not indeed been expreſsly inſiſted, that by the common law, independent of ſtatuteable proviſions, all fraudulent judgments were void, and that it was competent to any perſon to defeat them: the authorities I have cited, and legiſlative declarations upon the ſubject, prove the contrary. The ſtatute of 9th Henry VIth, c. 11. has already been mentioned: from thence it is clear, the certificate of the biſhop, however colluſively or fraudulently obtained, was concluſive between the parties. And in the caſe of baſtardy, a proviſion is made againſt ſuch certificates in future: but in other caſes, as in marriage, to this day, and alſo before the Reformation, upon the parties being of a religious order, the certificate was concluſive, notwithſtanding any fraud or colluſion.——Colluſive judgments upon penal ſtatutes to protect offenders frequently occur in practice; and when they are inſiſted on, the plaintiff has a right to aver ſuch judgments to have been obtained by fraud and colluſion. This does not ariſe from the proviſion of the common law, but from an act of parliament made in the 4th H. VII. c. 20. The whole ſtatute is material to be attended to. The title of the act is, 'actions popular 'proſecuted by colluſion ſhall be no bar to thoſe which be purſued 'with good faith.' It recites, that if an action popular be commenced againſt an offender by good faith, then the ſame offender will delay the action either by non-appearance or by traverſe; and hanging the ſame action, the ſame offender will cauſe like action popular to be brought againſt him by covin for the ſame cauſe and offence that the firſt action was ſued: and then by covin of the plaintiff in that ſecond action, he will be condemned either by confeſſion, feigned trial, or releaſe; which condemnation and releaſe ſo had by colluſion and covin pleaded by the ſaid offender, ſhall bar the plaintiff in the action ſued in good faith: it is therefore enacted, that in future the plaintiff ſuing in good faith may aver the former recovery to have been by covin and colluſion; but no ſuch averment is to be received after a trial on the point of the action, or on the covin or colluſion.

Here your lordſhips find the origin of averments, that judgments on penal ſtatutes were obtained by colluſion. This act affirms the principle of the common law, that none but perſons intereſted were intitled to reſcind judgments on the ground of colluſion. A penalty given to a common informer is not veſted in any individual, till he commences the action; and conſequently he could not aver colluſion in a former judgment: ſuch judgment was not then fabula, or waſte parchment, but of ſuch effect and concluſion as called for an act of parliament to remedy the miſchief.

There can be no greater authority to prove the common law of the land, than a parliamentary declaration upon the ſubject: this act furniſhes a moſt explicit and ſatisfactory one. Your lordſhips will not ſuppoſe an act was made to remedy a miſchief, or ſupply a defect, which did not exiſt. If your lordſhips refer to the acts of thoſe days, you will find them drawn with great preciſion and accuracy, and with great knowledge of the ſubject: I will not ſay ſo much for the acts of the preſent time.

This act muſt evince to your lordſhips, that colluſive judgments in courts of law bound in collateral ſuits. Is it then to be wondered at, that there was no proviſion by the common law reſpecting fraudulent ſentences in the eccleſiaſtical courts, which had the ſole and excluſive juriſdiction in themſelves? But it does not follow, that colluſive practices are to have effect, or the parties go unpuniſhed.

A power is incident to every court to prevent its proceedings from being made the inſtruments of fraud and iniquity, and to puniſh the perſons concerned in the attempt. It may be done upon the information of one intereſted or not intereſted. The court is called upon for its own honour to examine into the buſineſs.

Your lordſhips have been told, that the crown cannot get at the colluſion; that the eccleſiaſtical courts will not attend to the application of the crown. If that were the caſe, it would not follow as a neceſſary conſequence, that the crown ſhould be admitted to alledge colluſion here. But has the attorney-general ſurmiſed to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, that there has been ſuch an impoſition put upon them as is inſinuated? Has the judge of the Eccleſiaſtical Court told the attorney-general, I cannot attend to the ſuggeſtion; no application has been made to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, either on the part of the crown, or by the real proſecutor in this caſe, or any other perſon, though the duke of Kingſton and the noble lady at the bar lived together five years under the ſanction of a marriage ſolemnized with the archbiſhop's licence, in the preſence of friends, and known to the world? Does the proſecutor ſay, he is actuated by motives of juſtice, and alledge the ſuppoſed colluſion newly diſcovered?

A caſe happened in the court of King's Bench, which is known to many of your lordſhips. Mrs. Phillips had married Mr. Muilman—Mr. Muilman had got rid of that marriage by a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, by proving a former marriage with one Delafield.—It was then the lady's turn. She meditates getting rid of Delafield's marriage, by proving that Delafield at the time he married her had another wife; and ſo the lady was to fix herſelf upon Mr. Muilman in order to give effect to her ſcheme. An action was brought for a real demand againſt her in the court of King's Bench by a brewer, who had got a note from her for a valuable conſideration: the intent of this was to create a rumour that Muilman and ſhe were married. They might have brought this and a thouſand ſuch actions, and no verdict given could be evidence againſt Mr. Muilman. But when Mr. Muilman heard of this proceeding, and the purpoſe of it, though it could not affect him, he applied to the court of King's Bench, not as a party in the cauſe, but informed the court that ſuch a proceeding was had by colluſion, that it was an abuſe of the court, and ought to be rectified. Lord Hardwicke was then at the head of that court: he conſidered it as a high contempt of that court: he attended to the application of Muilman. An objection had been made by counſel, that Muilman was not to be heard. What! ſaid lord Hardwicke, to inform the court of a contempt, is he not to be heard? Any perſon as amicus curiæ may inform the court of a contempt that has been committed. The court ordered the record to be taken off the file, and puniſhed the parties. If the preſent ſentence was by colluſion, the Eccleſiaſtical Court would eraſe from their records the memorial of the tranſaction at the ſurmiſe of an amicus curiæ: and would not the Eccleſiaſtical Court have thought themſelves honoured with ſuch an amicus curiæ as his majeſty's attorney-general?

Great, and perhaps deſerved, commendation was beſtowed upon the marriage-act, though, I really confeſs, I did not diſcover the application. Your lordſhips were told, that every woman of eaſy virtue and of indigent circumſtances before that act had an immediate receipt for the payment of her debts by getting married at the Fleet. Has the marriage-act been attended with ſuch beneficial conſequences to make all women virtuous, and all women rich? If that be true, it has much greater merit than I conceived belonged to it. Did a Fleet marriage diſcharge the woman from her debts? The only change it made in her ſituation was this: when married, ſhe goes to gaol in company with her huſband; whereas if ſingle, ſhe muſt go alone, and truſt to the company ſhe meets there: and as to future debts, ſhe was not liable, becauſe ſhe was a married woman; and at that time the marriage-ceremony, if performed by a prieſt, was valid. But is there any thing in the marriage-act which ſays, that a woman who now marries ſhall not run into debt? It would be very happy for many huſbands in this country, if there could have been an effectual proviſion of that kind. Before the marriage-act, a woman by her marriage in the Fleet was not liable to future debts; a woman now by her marriage in the church is not liable to future debts. Has the marriage-act made it a difficult matter in this country to be married? Are there many obſtacles in the way? Is there any delicacy in ſurrogates in granting licences? In truth, it is as eaſy to get married in a church as before in the Fleet. Suppoſe a marriage by banns at a diſtance from London; the woman comes here and runs in debt; does any body in London know of her marriage, though it was in a church? She has as much power to run in debt ſince the marriage-act as before, and as exempt from the payment.

Your lordſhips are told, that a man and woman may to civil purpoſes and to civil duties, by a colluſive ſentence of this kind, become ſeparated, and no longer huſband and wife; but to all the public duties they are huſband and wife: they cannot abſolve themſelves from public duties; there is no power upon earth can do it but the legiſlature of the kingdom; and that the noble lady at the bar is free to all civil purpoſes, but to all criminal purpoſes ſhe is a wife.

I wiſh the gentleman, who uſed this argument, had explained himſelf upon the ſubject; for I proteſt to your lordſhips, I am to be informed that there are other public duties by huſband and wife to be performed, but thoſe in a ſtate of cohabitation: I have no idea of any public duties which the ſtate can exact from a huſband and wife in any other ſituation: and yet, my lords, nothing is more clear, than if a man and woman cohabit together as huſband and wife after a ſentence like the preſent, and whilſt it remains in force, they are puniſhable by eccleſiaſtical cenſures.

Are the public duties alluded to the injunctions found in the act of parliament, that no man ſhall take another wife, or any woman another huſband, living the former? The act does not mean to puniſh all ſuch acts: for in the firſt place the act ſays, that it is competent to any man, without becoming a felon or the object of puniſhment by the act, to marry a ſecond wife, provided his firſt wife is beyond the ſeas for ſeven years together, though the huſband knows ſhe is living; and yet the ſecond marriage is void, and the huſband may be puniſhed in the eccleſiaſtical courts, but not in the temporal.

Suppoſe a gentleman from Ireland, for inſtance, ſhould be civil enough to leave his wife, and reſides ſeven years in England; though he hears from her by every packet, though he writes to her by every packet, he may marry a woman in England without offending againſt the act of parliament. It would be the ſame, if a perſon living at Dover could prevail on his wife to go and reſide at Calais for ſeven years: he might marry another woman at Dover without any peril from this law, though every veſſel brought him accounts of her good health. Is this then that great public duty which the ſtate ſo rigorouſly exacts, that none of its ſubjects ſhall marry a ſecond huſband or wife, living the firſt?

It is well known, that a divorce for adultery does not diſſolve the bonds of matrimony; the relation of huſband and wife ſtill exiſts, and neither party can marry again; and yet the day after that divorce is pronounced, ſhe can marry any man ſhe pleaſes without offending againſt this law. It is not then in this act of parliament we are to find the public duties which the ſtate exacts from a huſband and wife; for in many caſes a ſecond marriage is not puniſhed, or even condemned by it.

Poſſibly the gentleman may urge, that a wife's reſiding abroad for ſeven years may be by colluſion to give the huſband an opportunity of marrying again without committing felony: in ſhort, if your lordſhips yield to this objection of colluſion, it is impoſſible to foreſee to what extravagant lengths you may be carried in ſupport of the propoſition, that the noble lady at the bar is to all civil purpoſes ſingle, but to all criminal purpoſes a wife. The caſe of a perſon who committed a fraudulent act of bankruptcy, on which a commiſſion iſſued, and for a concealment of part of his effects he was tried and executed, has been mentioned. The caſe, ſo far from maintaining the propoſition, is an authority againſt it: the colluſive act of bankruptcy was deemed equivalent to a real one; it bound the bankrupt to all civil and criminal purpoſes; it ſubjected his property to be ſeized for the benefit of his creditors; it ſubjected his perſon to the puniſhment ordained by the bankrupt laws: there is no diſtinction made between civil and criminal purpoſes.

Suppoſe a commiſſion of bankruptcy iſſuing fairly upon a real act of bankruptcy, and a concealment by the bankrupt; and let me ſuppoſe farther, which is not an impoſſible thing, that the commiſſion by colluſion between the aſſignees and the bankrupt is ſuperſeded, as having improperly iſſued, by an order of my lord chancellor, and an indictment ſhould be afterwards preferred for the concealment; would any judge ſuffer a man to be tried as a felon under theſe circumſtances on a ſuggeſtion of fraud in ſuperſeding the commiſſion? Certainly not: I am perſuaded every judge, who now aſſiſts your lordſhips, would tell the proſecutor he had miſtaken the place to examine the fraud; that he ought to have applied to the court of Chancery, which has excluſive juriſdiction in bankruptcy; and direct the priſoner to be acquitted.

Fermor's caſe, in lord Coke's Reports, was cited to your lordſhips to prove, that acts temporal and eccleſiaſtical may be avoided for colluſion: does that learned judge ſay where ſuch acts are to be avoided? No; but, my lords, to illuſtrate that paſſage he refers to a caſe reported in lord chief juſtice Dyer's Reports; and there it appears, that the act of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, which was granting an adminiſtration, had been repealed in the Eccleſiaſtical Court for colluſion. If I wanted authorities to add to thoſe I have cited, I would borrow this to put into the number; becauſe it is a direct proof, that the Eccleſiaſtical Court have a power to ſet aſide their own acts for fraud.

A caſe of Lloyd and Maddox was cited from Moore's Reports to prove, that the eccleſiaſtical courts had a power to examine into the colluſive means of obtaining a judgment in the temporal courts; and ſhall not, ſay the gentlemen, the temporal courts take the ſame liberty with the ſentences of the eccleſiaſtical ? The caſe need only to be ſtated ot ſhew the fallacy of the argument. A perſon claiming a legacy ſues in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, the proper forum for the recovery of that demand : the defendant in anſwer ſays, I have nothing to pay you with. Such a one, a daughter of the teſtator, has ſued me in a court of law for a debt ; has recovered a judgment againſt me. I muſt pay that debt. I cannot pay your legacy, unleſs I pay it out of my own pocket, and nothing can be more unjuſt. The executor is to adminiſter the effects as far as they go, but not to pay the debts out of his own pocket. The legatee in anſwer ſaid, The judgment was by fraud, and the temporal court would not prohibit the eccleſiaſtical from examining into the matter. This is not only within the principle of the common law, the legatee having an intereſt at the time of the fraud committed, but falls within the ſtatute of queen Elizabeth, which ordains, that every judgment in any temporal court by colluſion is utterly null and void, as if it had never exiſted ; it is void againſt every perſon having an intereſt ; it is void by force of the ſtatute againſt the crown demanding a forfeiture.

A learned friend of mine, who ſpoke in the cauſe, and who did me the ſingular honour of attending to me, not for what I ſaid, but for what I omitted, obſerved to your lordſhips, that I had avoided entering into the effect of fraud and colluſion upon the ſentence, unleſs by citing the caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield. I knew it would fall to my ſhare to trouble your lordſhips upon that ſubject ; and to avoid a repetition, I contented myſelf in that ſtage of the buſineſs with relying upon the caſe of Hatfield and Hatfield, which appeared to me alone ſufficient to anſwer every argument upon colluſion.

It is pretty ſingular, that as Hatfield and Hatfield was a caſe in equity, and two of the moſt eminent equity-counſel in this kingdom appear for the proſecution, that neither of them thought fit to grapple with that caſe. They found in the principles of the court of equity, that it was not to be anſwered, and therefore prudently paſſed it over to thoſe who ſhould think fit to engage with it. A woman claimed forty pounds a-year, which was veſted in a truſtee for her uſe : but there was another deviſe of an annuity of ten pounds a-year out of lands, and a legacy directly given her. The former huſband releaſed to the heir at law of the ſecond huſband, who had made theſe proviſions for his ſuppoſed wife. She files her bill. The firſt huſband in his anſwer ſtates all the circumſtances of their marriage, the time, the place, the miniſter, and the perſons preſent, to avoid the effect of the releaſe. A ſuit of jactitation is inſtituted in the Eccleſiaſtical Court by colluſion with the ſecond huſband, after proof of the marriage in the cauſe in the Exchequer, and ſhe is declared a ſeparate woman, and the widow of the deceaſed. The court of Exchequer received the ſentence as concluſive evidence. On an appeal to the houſe of lords, the decree is affirmed.

If it had ſtood merely upon the printed caſes in the houſe of lords, I ſhould conceive your lordſhips could not have entertained a doubt ; but the caſe is mentioned in ſir John Strange's Reports, when he was not a young man ; and the ground of the determination is ſtated to be, that the ſentence was concluſive. The caſe is mentioned alſo by Mr. Viner in his Abridgment ; where he adds, that the houſe of lords held, that a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court could not be impeached, though the proceedings were feint and by colluſion. This clear and direct authority is to be got rid of and avoided in this manner : Mr. Viner is a nonſenſical writer ; you are not to give credit to what he ſays. I ſhould have hoped that gratitude to Mr. Viner's memory would have repreſſed that obſervation : he has ſhortened the hours of the labour of lawyers, and more particularly of thoſe who are in great buſineſs. But to caſes in themſelves irrefragable, with deciſions upon the very point, anſwers cannot be given by argument ; unleſs your lordſhips will dignify thoſe obſervations with the name of argument.

The caſe of lady Mayo was cited from Doctors Commons, which is very material to the cauſe now before your lordſhips. It was a caſe of fraud and colluſion, diſcovered in the Prerogative Court upon the appeal, which had been practiſed in the Conſiſtory Court of the biſhop of London. The fraud was apparent ; he that ran might read it : but what ſaid the judge of the Prerogative Court ? You muſt go into the Conſiſtory Court, where the fraud was committed ; I can give you no relief. There the colluſion muſt be gone into, there redreſs may be had, there the honour of the court will be vindicated. This is the opinion of a living judge, of high character for his abilities and integrity : a greater man perhaps never ſat at the head of that court.

Your lordſhips have been preſſed to give a more favourable attention to the wiſhes of the proſecutor, as the preſent is a criminal proceeding. Is it the principle or genius of this country to be more active to find out and puniſh crimes, than to give effect to civil rights ?

My lords, there is a benignity in the laws of this country to the frailties of mankind. The judges are attentive and zealous that the civil juſtice of the country be ſtrictly adminiſtered, and will not ſuffer any contrivance, chicane, accident, or neglect, to defeat it ; but in criminal proſecutions they are humane, they make great allowances, and are not over-anxious to diſcover criminals. This obſervation is verified by daily practice. In a civil cauſe, if the trial comes on before the plaintiff expects it, if a witneſs be out of the way, if the verdict be in favour of a defendant contrary to the evidence, the verdict is ſet aſide, and a new trial ordered and juſtice done : but in a criminal proſecution, if the verdict be in favour of the defendant, though it ariſes from the abſence of a witneſs, or from any other accident, or it be given contrary to the cleareſt and moſt ſatisfactory proof of guilt, though not one of the jury can ſhew his face without a bluſh, yet the verdict ſtands, and a new trial is never granted. It was even denied in perjury committed in the time of king William, where the defendants had the wickedneſs to corrupt the witneſſes for the proſecution to keep out of the way ; for whenever, and by whatever means, there is an acquittal in a criminal proſecution, the ſcene is cloſed and the curtain drops.

I cannot, my lords, ſit down without reminding your lordſhips, that in the courſe of the argument have been cited many determinations in the temporal courts by judges who had no partiality to the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, acknowledging their authority, and declaring unâ voce, that in all caſes, where they have an excluſive juriſdiction, the ſentence is final and concluſive : there is not an exception to be found in the books. Some of theſe declarations were made, when the judges of the temporal courts were exceedingly jealous of the eccleſiaſtical, and when they were even in a ſtate of warfare.

Does the preſent caſe call upon your lordſhips to break down the boundaries which the conſtitution has fixed between the temporal and eccleſiaſtical courts, or to invade thoſe rules of deciſion which have been tranſmitted from the earlieſt of times ? Is there an authority to warrant your lordſhips in taking ſo extraordinary a ſtep ?

Is it expected, that your lordſhips are to be more jealous in finding out crimes and puniſhing offenders than your anceſtors ? and to accompliſh thoſe purpoſes, that you will diſregard the authorities of the law, the practice of ages, and the ſpirit of the Engliſh conſtitution ?

If the matter, inſtead of being clear in favour of the noble lady at the bar, as I conceive it to be, had been only doubtful, I am perſuaded your lordſhips would pronounce an acquittal.

It is the duty and practice of every judge in a criminal proſecution to let the jury know, that, if there hangs a doubt in the cauſe, they ought to give the turn of the ſcale in favour of innocence, and acquit the priſoner.

Can your lordſhips after an argument of three days, in which ſo many reſpectable determinations in favour of the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction have been cited, lay your hands upon your breaſts and ſay, Here is no doubt ; the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, upon the faith of which, and by the advice of a perſon of the firſt knowledge and abilities in the eccleſiaſtical law the noble lady acted, is a nullity and of no avail ; and that ſhe has intentionally violated the laws of her country and become a felon ?

My lords, I will not permit myſelf to ſuſpect any one of your lordſhips can entertain ſuch an opinion ; and I ſit down with the moſt perfect confidence, that by your lordſhips judgment the noble lady at the bar will be diſmiſſed from any farther attendance upon your lordſhips.

Lord High Steward. A noble lord aſks, whether in that caſe you cited, where an action was brought againſt Mr. Thomas Hervey, the court upon hearing the ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court refuſed to proceed farther in it ; or whether it was, that the cauſe was then depending in the Eccleſiaſtical Court ?

Mr. Wallace. I will give your lordſhips an account from my memory, confirmed by a note taken in a ſubſequent cauſe ; and if there is any doubt upon the facts, I am happy to acquaint your lordſhips, that you will have much better information upon the ſubject from the noble judge who tried the cauſe. Mr. Hervey and the lady had lived ſeparate ſeveral years, during which time a creditor, who had furniſhed her with neceſſaries, brought an action againſt Mr. Hervey. He denied his marriage. There had not been a ſentence at that time in the Eccleſiaſtical Court. The jury were ſatiſfied with the evidence of the marriage, and found a verdict againſt Mr. Hervey.—Another creditor, who had furniſhed neceſſaries for the lady afterwards, brought his action againſt Mr. Hervey, and was provided with the ſame evidence which had ſatisfied the former jury : but between the time of the former trial and the trial of this cauſe, a ſuit of jactitation had been inſtituted in the Eccleſiaſtical Court by Mr. Hervey againſt the lady, and a ſentence pronounced in his favour, which was offered in evidence. The learned judge conceived himſelf bound by that ſentence, as the judgment of a court of competent juriſdiction : there was no impoſition upon the creditor, no occaſion for an alarm by the deciſion, the debt was not contracted during cohabitation, no act of Mr. Hervey's had induced the creditor to furniſh the neceſſaries to her as his wife, he renounced the relation ; the plaintiff gave credit upon the marriage itſelf, and therefore took upon him to ſatisfy the court that there was a legal marriage : the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court had determined the point : the judge apprehended that the queſtion was cloſed, and that he was bound to give faith and credit to the ſentence ; and the plaintiff failed on account of the ſentence, though it was afterwards reverſed upon an appeal.

Doctor Calvert.

My lords, the queſtion ariſing upon the ſentence which has taken up ſo much of your lordſhips time, ſeems now confined to a narrower compaſs than we at firſt apprehended.

My lords, when the counſel for the noble ducheſs at your lordſhips bar offered the ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court to be read as concluſive evidence, it was deſired by the counſel on the other ſide, that the reſt of the proceedings in that cauſe might likewiſe be read. This raiſed a belief in us, that exception would be taken to the nature of this ſentence in particular, as differing from ſentences in other matrimonial cauſes.

My lords, we apprehended it would be ſaid, as indeed it was by ſome of the counſel on the other ſide, that a proceeding in a cauſe of jactitation, when the iſſue of it was, pronouncing for the jactitation, and the defendant enjoined ſilence (let the proceeding in that cauſe have been what it might), would not amount to a poſitive decree againſt a marriage, but it would be merely a diſmiſſion of the party ; that it would amount to no more than this, that nothing had been proved for the preſent, and that the judgment never would become decretal.

My lords, I take it to be a mere miſtake, to ſpeak of proceedings in ſuch a cauſe in that way ; but however, we have it now, as I underſtand, in conceſſion from the counſel on the other ſide, and we are perfectly agreed about the nature of the ſentence : it has been allowed, it is as complete a ſentence againſt a marriage, as if it had been pronounced in a cauſe of nullity of marriage.

My lords, a conceſſion of this ſort coming from the counſel on the other ſide, your lordſhips will ſee, muſt leave them much embarraſſed : firſt, by their own conceſſions of the effects ſimilar judgments have had in other queſtions ; and likewiſe by the act of parliament, upon which alone this proſecution can be founded.

My lords, it is conceded, that ſome judgments of the eccleſiaſtical courts are final as to matrimony ; but if they concede that ſome are, there is now remaining no objection to this in particular. Your lordſhips will ſee how much this is ſupported by the ſtatute on which the proſecution is founded ; founded; becauſe the exceptions out of that ſtatute go directly to thoſe ſentences with which it is now allowed this is upon a footing. Can it therefore with any propriety be now urged, that it ought not to be received as concluſive, becauſe there is a poſſibility of ſetting it aſide? This ſeemed aſtoniſhing to the learned gentleman who ſpoke firſt on the other ſide; that, as it is allowed that the court who paſſed that ſentence could at any time upon proper evidence reverſe it, it ſhould be urged in this judicature as concluſive upon your lordſhips. Many inſtances have been given, where ſentences not more final or irrevocable than this have been allowed in the common-law courts. If in a cauſe of nullity, a marriage be pronounced to be void, it would not be contended a moment, but that ſuch a ſentence is within the exception of the act; and no perſon marrying again after ſuch a ſentence could be an object of puniſhment under that act. It is ſurely therefore a very conſiderable conceſſion, and ſufficient to juſtify the reliance we have upon it, that it is a poſitive and direct ſentence againſt the marriage.

My lords, the ground of ſome of the exceptions out of the act of parliament ſeems to be the notoriety of the ſtate of the party, which leaves no room for impoſition on the perſon with whom the ſecond marriage is contracted; for the act has not in view merely the puniſhment of the offence as againſt morality, becauſe the exceptions are ſuch which allow in many caſes a ſecond marriage, though the firſt is really in force. The object therefore of the act of parliament ſeems to be this, that there ſhould be no deceit put upon the perſon: it is expreſſed by the preamble in theſe words: 'Whereas many perſons going from one 'county to another, or into places where they are not known, marry 'again; therefore be it enacted:' but when there has been any proceeding of this ſort, when there has been any queſtion litigated in the Eccleſiaſtical Court relative to that marriage, and when the ſentence of the court is againſt that marriage, I believe it is no ſtrain of the interpretation of that act, to ſuppoſe it is one of thoſe caſes, in which no proſecution of this ſort ought to be carried on.

My lords, the variety of inſtances that have been produced to ſhew, that whenever any ſentence of this ſort has been produced, it has been conſtantly attended to by all civil juriſdictions, will not bear a contradiction; nothing can be more clear. To all the caſes that have been quoted on our ſide, I do not apprehend that any anſwer has been given to affect their authority; what is more, there has been no caſe cited on the other ſide: therefore, if a ſeries of authorities will eſtabliſh any point, it is to be conceded, that in all civil caſes a ſentence thus pronounced by a court having a competent juriſdiction, where the queſtion has come before that court, marriage or not marriage, will be received. The queſtion then will come to this: if it can be eſtabliſhed, that in civil ſuits it would be received, ought it not to have the ſame effect in a criminal proſecution?

My lords, for that purpoſe there have been caſes cited to your lordſhips; that of the King againſt Vincent, where there was a proſecution for a forgery, and the probate was received as concluſive evidence againſt that forgery.

My lords, in anſwer to that it was urged only, that it was a caſe that was too ſtrong, and they could not give credit to the Reporter. That anſwer ſeems by no means ſatisfactory, eſpecially as it does not meet with ſupport from any ſubſequent authority, ſince none has been quoted that comes up to the point. Two or three caſes have been mentioned; but when they are conſidered, and the circumſtances they were attended with, your lordſhips will find, it does not appear that they come up to the caſe in queſtion. In two of theſe inſtances, the ſuppoſed teſtators were living. My lords, it was a groſs impoſition, and the whole proceeding a mere miſtake, and nothing more. The teſtator came into court to give evidence. To be ſure, a probate under theſe circumſtances could not be attended to; it could not be a probate at all; nor could it be contended, that the probate of the will of a living perſon could be received in evidence. I know the treatment it received in the Court of Prerogative in that caſe, where Stirling was executed for a forgery. I enquired, to ſee how that ſtands, and I do not find there were any proceedings to reverſe or revoke the probate; the thing was too abſurd to require a judicial diſquiſition. I was informed, a pen was drawn through the probate, and on the margin was written the word void. There were two other caſes mentioned of indictments for forging wills, where it was ſaid that there was a probate exiſting; but it does not appear throughout theſe caſes, that any mention was made of the probate at the trial, or that the exception was taken for the priſoners. We pointed out to your lordſhips the great inconvenience that would ariſe from going on to enquire into queſtions of this ſort in two different judicatures. It was aſſerted——

A Lord. Whether the ſcratch with a pen through the probate, in the caſe of Stirling, was done by any order of the court?

Doctor Calvert. Not by any judicial order, I believe. I apprehend it never came judicially before the court. By whom it was done I know not: I am not acquainted with that.

My lords, it was aſſerted by the counſel on the other ſide, that no deciſion of a civil nature could be applied to any criminal queſtion: it was aſſerted, but I did not find that it was ſupported by any principles or authorities.

My lords, we, on the other hand, did ſubmit to your lordſhips, that the inconveniencies ariſing from ſuch different enquiries might be extremely great; for if they produce different judgments upon the ſame point, the perſons, who ſhould be affected and intereſted under them, under ſuch a predicament might find it difficult to know what ſhould be their duty. We pointed out, that in caſe the ſentence now in queſtion remains in force, which I truſt it will, notwithſtanding any judgment that may be paſſed in this court; yet if you ſhould proceed to cenſure the perſon thus ſeparated from the ſuppoſed former huſband, from this contrariety of judgments the greateſt confuſion would ariſe: for you would cenſure the perſon for marrying again, as being the wife of that huſband, of whom it had been directly in iſſue and determined that ſhe was never the wife. This, my lords, appears to us a very conſiderable abſurdity. The only anſwer I heard to that was rather avowing the inconvenience than removing it. When it was aſked, in what predicament would a woman ſtand under theſe circumſtances? it was ſaid, ſhe would be a wife to criminal purpoſes, but not ſo as to civil conſiderations. What the diſtinction meant, I confeſs I do not well underſtand; but it was ſaid, the noble lady at the bar ſhould be conſidered as a wife to all criminal purpoſes, becauſe perſons cannot abſolve themſelves from their public duties. I never underſtood, that with regard to matrimony any party could abſolve himſelf from his private duties neither: I always underſtood it, as far as his own act could affect it, to be an indelible obligation. But what are the duties to the publick, which a perſon in this ſituation ſhould be anſwerable for? A woman by law ſeparated from, and even pronounced not to be the wife of, the ſuppoſed huſband, and to whom ſhe cannot return; I do not know what duties there are, that ſhe ſhould be anſwerable to the publick for. It is contended, that of not marrying again; but this is expreſsly contrary to the meaning of the act itſelf, which provides that in many caſes, even where the former marriage remains in force, yet a ſecond marriage ſhall not be criminal: as in the caſe of a ſeparation a menſa et thoro there is no doubt, that the parties remain man and wife as much as if they had never been divorced; nay, it is ſo merely a temporary ſeparation, that there is no occaſion for a judicial proceeding to bring them together again; for whenever the parties chuſe to cohabit, they may live together, and are as completely man and wife as if no ſeparation had happened. It has been obſerved, that ſome inconveniencies, which were removed by the late marriage act, might be introduced again under theſe ſuits of jactitation: it is certainly ſomewhat unintelligible how theſe ſuits could be applied to thoſe purpoſes. The grievance mentioned is this, that ſingle women contracting debts did, before that act of parliament, procure themſelves to be clandeſtinely married to perſons with whom they never intended to cohabit, but merely with a view fraudulently to protect themſelves againſt their creditors. Now, can it be argued, that by going into the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and obtaining a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation, that end would be anſwered? What! when a woman wants a huſband to protect her from her debts, ſhall ſhe get herſelf fraudulently releaſed from her huſband? It ſeems it would have quite a contrary effect, and cannot anſwer the purpoſe for which it would be intended. If any of the excellent regulations made by that act are in danger of being infringed upon by undue practices, it were worthy the legiſlature to attend to it, and provide againſt them; but a court of juſtice cannot for ſuch reaſons depart from ancient and eſtabliſhed modes of proceedings: and in this caſe theſe conſiderations ought not to have the leaſt weight, becauſe there is not any ground for the apprehenſion. In the proceedings in this criminal court, therefore, your lordſhips ought to receive theſe ſentences upon the very ſame principles, or indeed broader than a civil court: for who ſhall pretend to ſay, that in a civil queſtion parties may avail themſelves of ſuch a ſuit? But where a perſon is brought merely to anſwer for a crime, and for the purpoſe of puniſhment, who ſhall ſay, that it is conſonant to the principles of law that ſuch a defence ſhould not avail? So rigorous a determination in criminal caſes has not been ſupported on any authority, or eſtabliſhed on any principle. Upon the authorities therefore which have been quoted, and which remain unſhaken and uncontradicted, we do ſubmit to your lordſhips, that theſe two points are well eſtabliſhed. But it has been ſaid, that we are now arguing for what is not open to be conſidered on the general principles of law; becauſe this queſtion has been already decided by the very act upon which the proſecution is now depending: for when an act of parliament makes ſome exceptions, the true interpretation of that act is, that all caſes, which are not within the exceptions, are within the prohibition.

My lords, ſuppoſing that to be a good principle of interpretation, yet it may very well and with propriety be contended, that the caſe that is now offered, I mean the ſentence pronouncing againſt this marriage in a cauſe of jactitation, is within the exceptions of the act of parliament.

My lords, the two exceptions are, that it ſhall not extend to any perſon, who is at the time of ſuch marriage divorced by any ſentence had in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; or to any perſon, where the former marriage hath been, or hereafter ſhall be, by ſentence in any eccleſiaſtical court, decreed to be void and of no effect.

My lords, it will be difficult to explain the latter words, connected with the proviſion in the former clauſe, without taking in the very ſentence which is now under conſideration. The general words in the firſt clauſe are, that it ſhall not extend to thoſe caſes, in which at the time of ſuch marriage the perſon was divorced by any ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court.

Now, my lords, the word divorce has always been applied, not only to ſeparations a menſa & thoro, but to divorces a vinculo matrimonii. The firſt clauſe therefore, under the general word of divorce, ſeems to take in both theſe caſes, whether it be a temporary ſeparation for adultery or cruelty, or whether it be a divorce a vinculo matrimonii. If that clauſe applies to theſe two caſes, I would aſk, what is the meaning of the ſecond, that ſpeaks of ſentences, declaring a marriage null and void to all effects? A ſentence pronouncing a marriage null and void, and of no effect, is the ſame thing as a divorce a vinculo matrimonii; becauſe if the marriage has ever been a true and legal marriage, it is well known, that no judicial power in this kingdom can put an end to it. In order therefore to give every part of this act ſome meaning, it ought to be underſtood, that the legiſlature by thoſe general words muſt mean any ſentence whatever, by which the Eccleſiaſtical Court ſhould have pronounced, that there is no marriage, or that a marriage is void; it being the purport and the general object of this act to ſave not only the juriſdiction of the Eccleſiaſtical Court (that is not what I am contending for), but it is to ſave the innocence of the perſons acting under ſuch ſentences: becauſe where that queſtion has been agitated in a public court (for the legiſlature does not ſuppoſe, as ſome of the counſel on the other ſide have unwarrantably ſuppoſed, it to be a private and clandeſtine tranſaction; but) the conſtitution ſuppoſes every court to be open and public, and proceedings there to be before the face of the world: every body may ſee and know them, if they pleaſe; and when there has been this public ſentence of any conſtitutional court, the meaning, the equity of the act muſt be, that any one of theſe ſentences ſhall juſtify the party acting under it. To make a diſtinction between a cauſe of nullity and a cauſe of jactitation, I apprehend can be founded upon nothing, but not conſidering the nature of the proceedings; becauſe I can hardly put a caſe, which would be a proper ſubject for a ſuit of nullity, but it might likewiſe be proceeded to the ſame effect in a ſuit of jactitation: the only difference is, the proof being put upon the different party. Suppoſe a perſon means to diſpute the validity of his marriage; he may, if he pleaſes, proceed in a cauſe of nullity of marriage; in which caſe he muſt ſtate the circumſtances of his marriage, and the prayer of his libel will be, that under theſe circumſtances his marriage may be pronounced void: the ſentence then would be direct to that point. Suppoſe, on the other hand, he chuſes to bring a ſuit of jactitation, and charges that the woman has claimed him to be her huſband: if ſhe juſtifies that jactitation by pleading her marriage, it is incumbent on her then to ſtate the caſe, and to go into the queſtion, whether it is a marriage or no: and if in that juſtificatory plea ſuch circumſtances be ſtated, as would have been the contents of the libel in a cauſe of nullity, the ſentence, I contend, would have preciſely the ſame effect.

My lords, I have known more inſtances than one to juſtify what I aſſert. The firſt ſuit that ever was brought upon the marriage act to avoid a marriage by reaſon of minority, where the party under age was married by licence without the conſent of parents, was by a ſuit of jactitation: it was the caſe of Froſt and Waldeck in 1760. I looked into the ſentence that was pronounced in that cauſe, and it was preciſely in the ſame words as this now in queſtion. Will any body contend that it is not an effectual ſentence, declaring the marriage between theſe parties void? Your lordſhips ſee it is a fallacy therefore to ſay, that this method of proceeding in a cauſe of jactitation will not as effectually bring on the queſtion of marriage, as a cauſe of nullity of marriage. There were two other caſes afterwards upon that act, that were brought in the ſame way; neither of them came to a deciſion, but the method of proceeding was the ſame. Afterwards there was a ſuit upon that act of parliament brought as a cauſe of nullity of marriage. I remember it being made a queſtion, whether even that was a proper way of proceeding; but the judge was of opinion, that the party might have proceeded in either way, conceiving, I preſume, that the ſentence in one way would be as effectual as in the other. With what propriety then can it be ſaid, as it was on the other ſide, that all proceedings in cauſes for jactitation of marriage muſt be with an ill intent?

My lords, it doth not apply at all to the manner of proceedings. Suppoſe it to be true, what was aſſerted by the counſel, and I believe it is in a great meaſure ſo, that theſe ſuits were chiefly uſed for the purpoſe of enquiring into contracts of marriage; for before the marriage act put an end to ſuch contracts, it was difficult for parties to know, whether they had entered into ſuch contracts as would bind them or no; with what propriety can it be ſaid, that if a ſuit of jactitation be brought upon ſuch contract, it muſt be with an ill intent? I have mentioned, that theſe ſuits have been brought under the marriage act, and therefore merely upon the queſtion of marriage. In thoſe caſes the ſentences are preciſely conceived in the ſame words with the ſentence in this cauſe: and if a man was to be married again after ſuch a ſentence pronounced, would it be argued one moment, that he would be guilty of polygamy under this ſtatute? If he would not, it muſt be, becauſe ſuch a ſentence is on the ſame footing, as if it had been given in a cauſe of nullity. For, if a ſentence given in a cauſe of nullity was to be offered as concluſive, and before you entered into evidence upon the fact, your lordſhips would think it the proper time to offer it, there would be no occaſion to go into the queſtion; becauſe, let the fact turn out what it might, that ſentence would be ſatisfactory, that the marriage was void, that is, that there was no marriage then ſubſiſting between the parties. What is the aſſertion often then in a ſuit of jactitation; and what was the aſſertion in the cauſe now before your lordſhips? The plaintiff to juſtify his claim upon the lady ſtates, that at a particular time he was married, ſtates the circumſtances, ſtates the perſons preſent: he attempts to prove this fact. The judge having conſidered the proofs, and gone into the queſtion, determined that there was no marriage, or, in other words, that the marriage is of none effect: that is, that the marriage that is pleaded there can have no effect; for he pronounces, that, as far as to him appears, the party is a ſpinſter, and free from all matrimonial contracts. If we are right then in bringing this cauſe within the exceptions of the act, every objection I ſhould conceive, that can be ſtated, is removed under the expreſs regulation of the act of parliament; becauſe the legiſlature taking this matter into their conſideration, well aware, as it muſt be ſuppoſed, of what inconveniencies might be argued to ariſe, have ſtill enacted, that theſe ſentences exiſting, the perſon marrying again ſhall not be within the act of parliament.

Under theſe conſiderations, the reply having been ſo fully and ſo ably gone into by the gentleman who went before me, I ſhall take up your lordſhips time no longer, than in hoping you will be of opinion, that this ſentence coming within the exceptions of the act, it would be improper to go into any proof of the fact: and therefore I hope your lordſhips will admit of this plea of the defendant.

Lord Preſident of the Council. My lords, I move your lordſhips to adjourn to the chamber of parliament.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. This houſe is adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The lords and others returned to the chamber of parliament in the ſame order they came down. The ducheſs of Kingſton retired from the bar.

After ſome time paſſed in the chamber of parliament,

(See the Appendix.)

The lords and others came back from thence in the ſame order; and the peers being ſeated, and the lord high ſteward in his chair, the ducheſs of Kingſton was again brought to the bar.

Lord High Steward. Mr. attorney general, you may go on to ſtate your charge.

Mr. Attorney General.

My lords, it ſeems to be matter of juſt ſurpriſe, that, before the commencement of the laſt century, no ſecular puniſhment had been provided for a crime of this malignant complexion and pernicious example.

Perhaps, the innocence of ſimpler ages, or the more prevailing influence of religion, or the ſeverity of eccleſiaſtical cenſures, together with thoſe calamities which naturally and neceſſarily follow the enormity, might formerly have been found ſufficient to reſtrain it.

From the moment theſe cauſes ceaſed to produce that effect, imagination can ſcarcely ſtate a crime which calls more loudly, and in a greater variety of reſpects, for the interpoſition of civil authority; which, beſides the groſs and open ſcandal given to religion, implies more cruel diſappointment to the juſt and honourable expectations of the perſons betrayed by it; which tends more to corrupt the purity of domeſtic life, and to looſen thoſe ſacred connections and cloſe relations, deſigned by Providence to bind the moral world together; or which may create more civil diſorder, eſpecially in a country where the title to great honour and high office is hereditary.

[Here followed a great uproar behind the bar, and the ſerjeant at arms made the uſual proclamation.]

My lords, the misfortunes of individuals, the corruption of private life, the confuſion of domeſtick relations, the diſorder of civil ſucceſſion, and the offence done to religion, are ſuggeſted, not as ingredients in the particular offence now under trial, but as miſeries likely to ariſe from the example of the crime in general; and are laid before your lordſhips only to call your attention to the courſe and order of the trial, that nothing may fall out, which may give countenance to ſuch a crime, and heighten ſuch dangers to the publick.

The preſent caſe, to ſtate it juſtly and fairly, is ſtript of much of this aggravation. The advanced age of the parties, and their previous habits of life, would reduce many of theſe general articles of miſchief and criminality to idle topicks of empty declamation. No part of the preſent complaint turns upon any ruin brought on the blameleſs character of injured innocence; or upon any diſappointment incurred to juſt and honourable pretenſions; or upon any corruption ſuppoſed to be introduced into domeſtick life. Nor ſhould I expect much ſerious attention of your lordſhips, if I ſhould urge the danger of intailing an uncertain condition upon a helpleſs offspring, or the apprehenſion of a diſputed ſucceſſion to the houſe of Pierrepoint, as probable aggravations of this crime.

But your lordſhips will be pleaſed withal to remember, that every plea, which, in a caſe differently circumſtanced, might have laid claim to your pity for an unfortunate paſſion in younger minds, is entirely cut off here. If it be true, that the ſacred rights of matrimony have been violated, I am afraid it muſt alſo appear, that dry lucre was the whole inducement, cold fraud the only means to perpetrate that crime. In truth, the evidence, if it turns out correſpondent to the expectations I have formed, will clearly and expreſly repreſent it as a matter of perfect indifference to the priſoner which huſband ſhe adhered to, ſo that the profit to be drawn from this marriage, or from that, was tolerably equal. The crime, ſtated under theſe circumſtances, and carrying this impreſſion, is an offence to the law; which, if it be leſs aggravated in ſome particulars, becomes only more odious in others.

But I decline making general obſervations upon the evidence. I will ſtate it to your lordſhips (for it lies in a very narrow compaſs) in the ſimpleſt and ſhorteſt manner I can invent. The facts (as the ſtate of the evidence promiſes me they will be laid before your lordſhips) form a caſe, which it will be quite impoſſible to aggravate, and extremely difficult to extenuate.

My lords, conſidering the length of time which has intervened, a very few periods will compriſe the facts which I am able to lay before your lordſhips. Firſt, the marriage of the priſoner with Mr. Hervey; her cohabitation with him at broken and diſtant intervals; the birth of a child in conſequence of it; the rupture, and ſeparation which ſoon followed. Secondly, the attempt which the priſoner, in view to the late lord Briſtol's then ſtate of health, made to eſtabliſh the proofs of her marriage with the preſent earl. Laſtly, the plan, which makes the immediate ſubject of the preſent indictment, for bringing about the celebration of a ſecond marriage with the late duke of Kingſton.

The priſoner came to London early in life, ſome time, as I take it, about the year 1740. About forty-three, ſhe was introduced into the family of the late princeſs of Wales, as her maid of honour. In the ſummer of forty-four, ſhe contracted an acquaintance with Mr. Hervey; which begins the matter of the preſent indictment. This acquaintance was contracted by the mere accident of an interview at Wincheſter races. The familiarity immediately began; and very ſoon drew to its concluſion.

Miſs Chudleigh was about eighteen years of age; and reſided at the houſe of a Mr. Merrill, her couſin, on a viſit with a Mrs. Hanmer, her aunt, who was alſo the ſiſter of Mr. Merrill's mother. One Mr. Mountenay, an intimate friend of Mr. Merrill's, was there at the ſame time.

Mr. Hervey was a boy about ſeventeen years old, of ſmall fortune, but the younger ſon of a noble family. He was lieutenant of the Cornwall, which made part of ſir John Davers's ſquadron, then lying at Portſ- mouth, and deſtined for the Weſt-Indies. In ſhort, he appeared to Mrs. Hanmer an advantageous match for her niece.

From Wincheſter races he was invited to Lainſton; and carried the ladies to ſee his ſhip at Portſmouth. The Auguſt following, he made a ſecond viſit at Lainſton for two or three days; during which the marriage was contracted, celebrated, and conſummated.

Some circumſtances, which I have already alluded to, and others, which it is immaterial to ſtate particularly, rendered it impoſſible, or improvident in a degree next to impoſſible, that ſuch a marriage ſhould be celebrated ſolemnly, or publickly given out to the world. The fortune of both was inſufficient to maintain them in that ſituation to which his birth and her ambition had pretenſions. The income of her place would have failed. And the diſpleaſure of the noble family to which he belonged, rendered it impoſſible on his part to avow the connection. The conſequence was, that they agreed without heſitation to keep the marriage ſecret. It was neceſſary for that purpoſe to celebrate it with the utmoſt privacy; and accordingly no other witneſſes were preſent, but ſuch as had been appriſed of the connection, and were thought neceſſary to eſtabliſh the fact, in caſe it ſhould ever be diſputed.

Lainſton is a ſmall pariſh, the value of the living being about fifteen pounds a-year; Mr. Merrill's the only houſe in it; and the pariſh church at the end of his garden. On the 4th of Auguſt 1744, Mr. Amis, the then rector, was appointed to be at the church, alone, late at night. At eleven o'clock, Mr. Hervey and Miſs Chudleigh went out, as if to walk in the garden; followed by Mrs. Hanmer, her ſervant (whoſe maiden name I forget; ſhe is now called Ann Cradock, having married Mr. Hervey's ſervant of that name) Mr. Merrill, and Mr. Mountenay; which laſt carried a taper to read the ſervice by. They found Mr. Amis in the church, according to his appointment; and there the ſervice was celebrated, Mr. Mountenay holding the taper in his hat. The ceremony being performed, Mrs. Hanmer's maid was diſpatched to ſee that the coaſt was clear; and they returned into the houſe, without being obſerved by any of the ſervants. I mention theſe ſmall circumſtances, becauſe they happen to be recollected by the witneſs.

The marriage was conſummated the ſame night; and he lay with her two or three nights following; after which he was obliged to return to his ſhip, which had received ſailing orders.

Miſs Chudleigh went back, as had been agreed, to her ſtation of maid of honour in the family of the princeſs dowager. Mr. Hervey ſailed in November following for the Weſt-Indies; and remained there till Auguſt 1746, when he ſet ſail for England. In the month of October following he landed at Dover, and reſorted to his wife, who then lived, by the name of Miſs Chudleigh, in Conduit-Street. She received him as her huſband, and entertained him accordingly, as far as conſiſted with their plan of keeping the marriage ſecret. In the latter end of November in the ſame year, Mr. Hervey ſailed for the Mediterranean, and returned in the month of January 1747, and ſtaid here till May in the ſame year. Mean while ſhe continued to reſide in Conduit-Street, and he to viſit her as uſual, till ſome differences aroſe between them, which terminated in a downright quarrel; after which they never ſaw each other more. He continued abroad till December 1747, when he returned; but no intercourſe, which can be traced, paſſed between them afterwards.

This general account is all I am able to give your lordſhips of the intercourſe between Mr. Hervey and his wife. The cauſe of the diſpleaſure which ſeparated them, is immaterial to be enlarged upon. The fruit of their intercourſe was a ſon, born at Chelſea, ſome time in the year 1747. The circumſtances of that birth, the notice which people took of it, and the converſations which ſhe held about that, and the death of the child, furniſh part of the evidence that a matrimonial connection actually ſubſiſted between them.

After having mentioned ſo often the ſecrecy with which the marriage and cohabitation were conducted, it ſeems needleſs to obſerve to your lordſhips, that the birth of a child was ſuppreſſed with equal care. That alſo made but an aukward part of the family and eſtabliſhment of a maid of honour.

My lords, that which I call the ſecond period, was in the year 1759. She had then lived at a diſtance from her huſband near twelve years. But the infirm ſtate of the late lord Briſtol's health ſeemed to open the proſpect of a rich ſucceſſion, and an earldom. It was thought worth while, as nothing better had then offered, to be counteſs of Briſtol; and for that purpoſe to adjuſt the proofs of her marriage.

Mr. Amis, the miniſter who had married them, was at Wincheſter, in a declining ſtate of health. She appointed her couſin, Mr. Merrill, to meet her there on the 12th of February 1759; and by ſix in the morning ſhe arrived at the Blue Boar inn, oppoſite Mr. Amis's houſe. She ſent for his wife, and communicated her buſineſs, which was to get a certificate from Mr. Amis of her marriage with Mr. Hervey. Mrs. Amis invited her to their houſe, and acquainted her huſband with the occaſion of her coming. He was ill a-bed; and deſired her to come up. But nothing was done in the buſineſs of the certificate, till the arrival of Mr. Merrill, who brought a ſheet of ſtamped paper to write it upon. They were ſtill at a loſs about the form, and ſent for one Spearing, an attorney. Spearing thought, that the merely making a certificate, and delivering it out in the manner which had been propoſed, was not the beſt way of eſtabliſhing the evidence which might be wanted. He therefore propoſed, that a check-book (as he called it) ſhould be bought; and the marriage be regiſtered in the uſual form, and in the preſence of the priſoner. Somebody ſuggeſting that it had been thought improper ſhe ſhould be preſent at the making of the regiſter, he deſired ſhe might be called; the purpoſe being perfectly fair, merely to ſtate that in the form of a regiſter, which many people knew to be true; and which thoſe perſons of honour, then preſent, give no room to doubt. Accordingly his advice was taken, the book was bought, and the marriage was regiſtered. The book was intitled, Marriages, Births, and Burials in the pariſh of Lainſton. The firſt entry ran, The twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-two, buried, Mrs. Suſannah Merrill, relict of John Merrill, eſq. The next was, The fourth of Auguſt one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four, married, the honourable Auguſtus Hervey, eſq. to Miſs Elizabeth Chudleigh, daughter of colonel Thomas Chudleigh, late of Chelſea College, deceaſed, in the pariſh church of Lainſton, by me Thomas Amis. The priſoner was in great ſpirits. She thanked Mr. Amis, and told him, it might be a hundred thouſand pounds in her way. She told Mrs. Amis all her ſecrets; of the child ſhe had by Mr. Hervey; a fine boy, but it was dead; and how ſhe borrowed a hundred pounds of her aunt Hanmer to make baby cloaths. It ſerved the purpoſe of the hour to diſcloſe theſe things. She ſealed up the regiſter, and left it with Mrs. Amis, in charge, upon her huſband's death, to deliver it to Mr. Merrill. This happened in a few weeks after.

Mr. Kinchin, the preſent rector, ſucceeded to the living of Lainſton; but the book remained in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Merrill.

In the year 1764 Mrs. Hanmer died, and was buried at Lainſton. A few days after, Mr. Merrill deſired her burial might be regiſtered. Mr. Kinchin did not know of any regiſter which belonged to the pariſh; but Mr. Merrill produced the book which Mr. Amis had made; and taking it out of the ſealed cover, in which it had remained till that time, ſhewed Kinchin the entry of the marriage, and bade him not mention it. Kinchin ſubjoined the third entry, Buried, December the tenth, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-four, Mrs. Ann Hanmer, relict of the late colonel William Hanmer; and delivered the book again to Mr. Merrill.

In the year 1767 Mr. Merrill died. Mr. Bathurſt, who married his daughter, found this book among his papers; and taking it to be, what it purported, a pariſh regiſter, delivered it to Mr. Kinchin accordingly. He has kept it as ſuch ever ſince; and upon that occaſion made the fourth entry, Buried, the 7th of February, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-ſeven, John Merrill, eſq.

The earl of Briſtol recovered his health; and this regiſter was forgotten, till a very different occaſion aroſe for enquiry after it.

The third period, to which I begged the attention of your lordſhips in the outſet, was in the year 1768. Nine years had paſſed, ſince her former hopes of a great title and fortune had fallen to the ground. She had at length formed a plan to attain the ſame object another way. Mr. Hervey alſo had turned his thoughts to a more agreeable connection; and actually entered into a correſpondence with the priſoner, for the purpoſe of ſetting aſide a marriage ſo burdenſome and hateful to both. The ſcheme he propoſed was rather indelicate; not that afterwards executed, which could not ſuſtain the eye of juſtice a moment; but a ſimpler method, founded in the truth of the caſe; that of obtaining a ſeparation by ſentence a menſâ et thoro propter adulterium; which might ſerve as the foundation of an act of parliament for an abſolute divorce. He ſent her a meſſage to this effect, in terms ſufficiently peremptory and rough, as your lordſhips will hear from the witneſs. Mrs. Cradock, the woman I have mentioned before as being Mrs. Hanmer's ſervant, and preſent at the marriage, was then married to a ſervant of Mr. Hervey, and lived in the priſoner's family with her huſband. He bade her tell her miſtreſs, that he wanted a divorce; that he ſhould call upon her (Cradock) to prove the marriage; and that the priſoner muſt ſupply ſuch other evidence as might be neceſſary.

This might have anſwered his purpoſe well enough; but her's required more reſerve and management; and ſuch a proceeding might have diſappointed it. She therefore ſpurned at that part of the propoſal; and refuſed in terms of high reſentment, to prove herſelf a whore. On the 18th of Auguſt following ſhe entered a caveat at Doctors Commons, to hinder any proceſs paſſing under ſeal of the court, at the ſuit of Mr. Hervey, againſt her, in any matrimonial cauſe, without notice to her proctor.

What difficulties impeded the direct and obvious plan, or what inducements prevailed in favour of ſo different a meaſure, I cannot ſtate to your lordſhips. But it has been already ſeen in a debate of many days, what kind of plan they ſubſtituted in place of the former.

In the Michaelmas ſeſſion of the year 1768, ſhe inſtituted a ſuit of jactitation of marriage in the common form. The anſwer was a croſs libel, claiming the rights of marriage. But the claim was ſo ſhaped, and the evidence ſo applied, that ſucceſs became utterly impracticable.

A groſſer artifice, I believe, was never fabricated. His libel ſtated the marriage, with many of its particulars; but not too many. It was large in alledging all the indifferent circumſtances which attended the courtſhip, contract, marriage ceremony, conſummation, and cohabitation; but when it came to the facts themſelves, it ſtated a ſecret courtſhip, and a contract, with the privity of Mrs. Hanmer alone, who was then dead. The marriage ceremony, which, in truth, was celebrated in the church at Lainſton, was ſaid to have been performed at Mr. Merrill's houſe, in the pariſh of Sparſhot, by Mr. Amis, in the preſence of Mrs. Hanmer and Mr. Mountenay, who were all three dead. Mrs. Cradock, whom but three months before he held out as a witneſs of the marriage, was dropped; and, to ſhut her out more perfectly, the conſummation is ſaid to have paſſed without the privity or knowledge of any part of the family and ſervants of Mr. Merrill; meaning perhaps that Cradock was ſervant to Mrs. Hanmer. It was further inſinuated, that the marriage was kept a ſecret, except from the perſons before-mentioned.

To theſe articles the form of proceeding obliged her to put in a perſonal anſwer upon oath. She denies the previous contract; ſhe evades the propoſal of marriage, by ſtating that it was made to Mrs Hanmer without her privity; not denying that it was afterwards communicated to her. The reſt of the article, which contains a circumſtantial allegation of the marriage, together with the time, place, witneſſes, and ſo forth, ſhe buries in the formulary concluſion of every anſwer, by denying the reſt of the ſaid pretended poſition or article to be true in any part thereof. Finally, ſhe demurs to the article which alledges conſummation.

Denying the reſt of the article to be true in any part of it reſerves this ſalvo. The whole averment of marriage was but one part of the article; that averment (the language is ſo constructed) makes but one member of a ſentence; and yet it combines falſe circumſtances with true. They were, in Mr. Merrill's houſe at Sparſhot, joined together in holy matrimony.

This part of the article, as her anſwer calls it, is not true. It is true they were married; but not true, that they were married at Sparſhot, or at Mr. Merrill's houſe.

How was this groſs and palpable evaſion treated? It is the courſe of the Eccleſiaſtical Court to file exceptions to indiſtinct or inſufficient anſwers. Otherwiſe, to be ſure, they could not compel a defendant to put in any material anſwer. But it was not the purpoſe of this ſuit to exact a ſufficient anſwer; conſequently no exceptions were filed; but the parties went to iſſue.

The plan of the evidence alſo was framed upon the ſame meaſured line. The articles had excluded every part of the family: even the woman whom Mr. Hervey had ſent to demand the divorce, was omitted. But her huſband is produced, to ſwear, that in the year 1744 Mr. Hervey danced with Miſs Chudleigh at Wincheſter races, and viſited her at Lainſton; and in 1746 he heard a rumour of their marriage. Mary Edwards and Ann Hillam, ſervants in Mr. Merrill's family, did not contradict the article they were examined to, which alledges, that none of his ſervants knew any thing of the matter. But they had heard the report. So had Meſſrs. Robinſon, Hoſſach, and Edwards. Such was the amount of Mr. Hervey's evidence; in which the witneſſes make a great ſhew of zeal to diſcloſe all they know, with a proper degree of caution to explain that they know nothing.

The form of examining witneſſes was alſo obſerved on her part; and ſhe proved, moſt irrefragably, that ſhe paſſed as a ſingle woman; went by her maiden name; was maid of honour to the Princeſs Dowager; bought and ſold; borrowed money of Mr. Drummond; and kept caſh with him, and other bankers, by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh; nay, that Mr. Merrill and Mrs. Hanmer, who had agreed to keep the marriage ſecret, converſed and correſponded with her by that name.

For this purpoſe a great variety of witneſſes was called; whom it would have been very raſh to produce, without ſome foregone agreement, or perfect underſtanding, that they ſhould not be croſs-examined. Many of them could not have kept their ſecret under that diſcuſſion; even in the imperfect and wretched manner, in which croſs-examination is managed upon paper, and in thoſe courts. Therefore not a ſingle interrogatory was filed, nor a ſingle witneſs croſs-examined, though produced to articles exceedingly confidential, ſuch as might naturally have excited the curioſity of an adverſe party to have made further enquiries.

In the event of this cauſe, thus treated, thus pleaded, and thus proved, the parties had the ſingular fortune to catch a judgment againſt the marriage by mere ſurpriſe upon the juſtice of the court.

While I am obliged to complain of this groſs ſurpriſe, and to ſtate the very proceedings in the cauſe as pregnant evidence of their own colluſion, I would not be underſtood to intend any reflection on the integrity or ability of the learned and reſpectable judges.

> For oft, though wiſdom wake, ſuſpicion ſleeps
> At wiſdom's gate, and to ſimplicity
> Reſigns her charge; while goodneſs thinks no ill,
> Where no ill ſeems.———

Nor ſhould any imputation of blame be extended to thoſe names, which your Lordſhips find ſubſcribed to the pleadings. The forms of pleading are matters of courſe. And if they were laid before counſel, only to be ſigned, without calling their attention to the matter of them, the colluſion would not appear. A counſel may eaſily be led to overlook what nobody has any intereſt or wiſh that he ſhould conſider.

Thus was the way paved to an adulterous marriage; thus was the duke of Kingſton drawn in to believe, that Mr. Hervey's claim to the priſoner was a falſe and injurious pretenſion; and he gave his unſuſpecting hand to a woman, who was then, and had for twenty-five years, been the wife of another.

In the vain and idle converſations which ſhe held, at leaſt with thoſe who knew her ſituation, ſhe could not refrain from boaſting how ſhe had ſurpriſed the duke into that marriage. Do not you think (ſays ſhe with a ſmile to Mrs. Amis), do not you think, that it was very kind in his grace to marry an old maid? Mrs. Amis was widow of the clergyman who had married her to Mr. Hervey, who had aſſiſted her in procuring a regiſter of that marriage, and to whom ſhe had told of the birth of the child. The duke's kindneſs, as ſhe inſultingly called it, was ſcarcely more ſtrange, than her manner of repreſenting it to one who knew her real ſituation ſo well.

My lords, this is the ſtate of the evidence; which muſt be given, were it only to ſatisfy the form of the trial; but is in fact produced, to prove that, which all the world knows perfectly well, as a matter of publick notoriety. The ſubject has been much talked of; but never, I believe, with any manner of doubt, in any company at all converſant with the paſſages of that time in this town. The witneſſes, however, will lay theſe facts before your lordſhips; after which, I ſuppoſe, there can be no queſtion what judgment muſt be pronounced upon them: for your lordſhips will hardly view this act of parliament juſt in the light in which the priſoner's counſel have thought fit to repreſent it, as a law made for beggars, not for people of faſhion. To be ſure, the preamble does not expreſsly prove the legiſlature to have foreſeen or expected, that theſe would be the crimes of higher life, or nobler condition. But the act is framed to puniſh the crime, wherever it might occur; and the impartial temper of your juſtice, my lords, will not turn aſide its courſe in reſpect to a noble criminal.

Nor does the guilt of ſo heinous a fraud ſeem to be extenuated, by referring to the advice of thoſe by whoſe aid it was conducted, or to the confident opinion they entertained of the ſucceſs of their project. I know this project was not (nor did I ever mean to contend it was) all her own. Particularly, in that fraudulent attempt upon publick juſtice, it could not be ſo. But, my lords, that imparting a criminal purpoſe to the neceſſary inſtruments for carrying it into execution, extenuates the guilt of the author, is a conceit perfectly new in morality, and more than I can yield to. It rather implies aggravation, and the additional offence of corrupting theſe inſtruments. Not that I mean by this obſervation to palliate the guilt of ſuch corrupt inſtruments. I think it may be fit, and exceedingly wholeſome, to convey to Doctors-Commons, that thoſe among them, if any ſuch there are, who, being acquainted with the whole extent of the priſoner's purpoſe, to furniſh herſelf with the falſe appearance of a ſingle woman in order to draw the duke into ſuch a marriage, aſſiſted her in executing any part of it, are far enough from being clear of the charge contained in this indictment. They are acceſſaries to her felony; and ought to anſwer for it accordingly. This is ſtating her caſe fairly. The crime was committed by her, and her accomplices. All had their ſhare in the perpetration of the crime: each is ſtained with the whole of the guilt.

My lords, I proceed to examine the witneſſes. The nature of the caſe ſhuts out all contradiction or impeachment of teſtimony. It will be neceſſary for your lordſhips to pronounce that opinion and judgment, which ſo plain a caſe will demand.

Mr. Solicitor General.

My lords, we will now proceed to call our witneſſes.——Call Ann Cradock.

Who came to the bar, and one of the clerks held the book to her, upon which ſhe laid her hand.

Clerk of the Crown. Hearken to your oath.

The evidence that you ſhall give on behalf of our ſovereign lord the king's majeſty, againſt Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, the priſoner at the bar, ſhall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth,

So help you God.

Then ſhe kiſſed the book.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I am deſired by the noble lady at the bar to apply to your lordſhips for an indulgence, that a queſtion may be put to the witneſs by her counſel.

Lords. Aye, aye.

Mr. Wallace. I ſhall beg the witneſs may inform your lordſhips whether ſhe has not had a ſecurity for ſome proviſion, or benefit, or a promiſe, in conſequence of the evidence ſhe is to give on this indictment?

Ann Cradock. No.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long have you been acquainted with the lady at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Above thirty-two years.

Mr. Solicitor General. Where did you firſt become acquainted with her?

Ann Cradock. I ſaw the lady firſt in London, afterwards at Lainſton.

Mr. Solicitor General. What occaſion carried you to the lady at Lainſton?

Ann Cradock. Along with a lady that I ſerved.

Mr. Solicitor General. Name the lady.

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Hanmer.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was Mrs. Hanmer any relation to the lady at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Her own aunt.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was the lady at the bar at Lainſton along with Mrs. Hanmer?

Ann Cradock. Not when I firſt went down to Lainſton.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did ſhe come down there afterwards?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you remember ſeeing Mr. Auguſtus Hervey there at that time?

Ann Cradock. I remember ſeeing Mr. Auguſtus Hervey there, but not at the time I firſt ſaw the lady there.

Mr. Solicitor General. When did Mr. Hervey come there?

Ann Cradock. It was in June, at the Wincheſter races.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long did he ſtay there at that time?

Ann Cradock. I cannot particularly ſay how long he might ſtay: he was coming and going.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was you in Lainſton church with Mr. Hervey and that lady, at any time in that ſummer?

Ann Cradock. I was.

Mr. Solicitor General. At what time of the day?

Ann Cradock. It was towards night: it was at night, not in the day.

Mr. Solicitor General. Upon what occaſion?

Ann Cradock. To ſee the marriage.

Mr. Solicitor General. Name the perſons who were preſent.

Ann Cradock. Mr. Merrill, Mrs. Hanmer, Mr. Mountenay, Mr. Hervey, Miſs Chudleigh, and myſelf.

Mr. Solicitor General. Who was the clergyman?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Amis, who belonged to the church.

Mr. Solicitor General. Were they married there?

Ann Cradock. Yes; I ſaw them married.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was the marriage kept ſecret?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General. By what ceremony was the marriage?

Ann Cradock. By the matrimonial ceremony; by the Common Prayer Book.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was you employed to take care, that the other ſervants ſhould be out of the way?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did they return to Mr. Merrill's houſe after the marriage?

Ann Cradock. Yes, they did.

Mr. Solicitor General. How far is the church from the houſe?

Ann Cradock. Not a great diſtance, but I cannot ſay how far: it is in the garden.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did Mr. Amis return with the party into the houſe?

Ann Cradock. Not that I ſaw.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you attend on the lady as her maid?

Ann Cradock. I did at that time, her own not being able.

Mr. Solicitor General. After the ceremony, did you ſee the parties in bed together?

Ann Cradock. I did.

A Lord. Repeat what you ſaid.

Ann Cradock. I ſaw them put to bed: I alſo ſaw Mrs. Hanmer inſiſt upon their getting up again.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you ſee them the next morning?

Ann Cradock. I ſaw them that night afterwards in bed, the ſame night after Mrs. Hanmer went to bed.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you ſee them afterwards in bed for ſome nights after that?

Ann Cradock. I ſaw them particularly in bed the laſt night Mr. Hervey was there, for he was to ſet out in the morning at five o'clock; I was to call him at that hour, which I did; and entering the chamber, I found them both faſt aſleep: they were very ſorry to take leave.

Mr. Solicitor General. Can you fix what year this was?

Ann Cradock. I believe it to be in the year 1744, but I am certain it was the ſame year in which the Victory was at Portſmouth.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you recollect what time of the year it was?

Ann Cradock. In the month of Auguſt, I think.

Mr. Solicitor General. What is your reaſon for thinking it was in the month of Auguſt?

Ann Cradock. My reaſon is, that it was in the time of Maunhill fair; and alſo that there were green-gages ripe, which the lady and gentleman were both very fond of.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you recollect how long it was after the death of Mr Merrill's mother?

Ann Cradock. No, I cannot juſtly ſay.

Mr. Solicitor General. Where did Mr. Hervey go, as you underſtood, the morning he went away?

Ann Cradock. To Portſmouth.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you underſtand that he was then in the ſea ſervice?

Ann Cradock. I did, and that he was going with admiral Davers.

Mr. Solicitor General. Have you any particular reaſon for knowing that he did go with admiral Davers?

Ann Cradock. The reaſon I have to believe he did go with him is, the perſon whom I married afterwards was Mr. Hervey's ſervant.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was he ſervant to him at that time?

Ann Cradock. He was.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you receive any letter from the perſon you afterwards married, who was Mr. Hervey's ſervant, and attended him?

Ann Cradock. I did, from Port-Mahon.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you know what relation Mr. Merrill was to the lady at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Firſt-couſin.

Mr. Solicitor General. Who was Mr. Mountenay, whom you mentioned as preſent at the marriage?

Ann Cradock. A friend of Mr. Merrill's, as he pretended.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did he live in the family at that time?

Ann Cradock. He was in the family at that time, and had been from the time of the death of his mother.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you know whether any other part of the family, of both parties, were acquainted with the marriage, except thoſe perſons whom you have mentioned?

Ann Cradock. No, I did not at that time.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did the lady change her name on the marriage?

Ann Cradock. Never in public, to my knowledge.

Mr. Solicitor General. Had you occaſion after this to ſee the lady in London?

Ann Cradock. I ſaw the lady in London many times.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you know whether there were any children of the marriage?

Ann Cradock. I believe one.

Mr. Solicitor General. What reaſon have you for believing ſo?

Ann Cradock. The lady herſelf told me ſo, and her aunt alſo, whom I ought to have mentioned firſt. The lady told me, that ſhe would take me to ſee the child.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did ſhe offer to carry her aunt as well as you to ſee the child?

Ann Cradock. I do not know that.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long after the marriage was it, that ſhe told you ſhe would take you to ſee the child?

Ann Cradock. That I cannot ſay, but it was after Mr. Hervey returned a ſecond time.

Mr. Solicitor General. Returned, from whence?

Ann Cradock. I heard he had been at Port-Mahon.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you recollect how long Mr. Hervey had been abſent the firſt time?

Ann Cradock. No, I do not.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long had he been abſent the ſecond time?

Ann Cradock. After his return the ſecond time, I believe the child to have been begotten.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long after Mr. Hervey's ſecond return was it, that ſhe told you ſhe would carry you to ſee the child?

Ann Cradock. It was after his firſt return.

A Lord. I believe there is ſome miſtake. Let the witneſs explain that.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was it after Mr. Hervey's firſt or ſecond return, that the lady told you ſhe would carry you to ſee the child?

Ann Cradock. I believe the firſt time.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you recollect how long that was after the marriage?

Ann Cradock. I do not recollect.

Mr. Solicitor General. When did you marry Mr. Hervey's ſervant?

Ann Cradock. The 11th of February 1752.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did the priſoner at the bar ſay any thing particular to you about the child?

Ann Cradock. She told me the child was a boy, and like Mr. Hervey.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long did you continue in the ſervice of Mrs. Hanmer?

Ann Cradock. Till ſhe died.

Mr. Solicitor General. When did Mrs. Hanmer die?

Ann Cradock. She has been dead eleven years the ſecond of laſt December.

Mr. Solicitor General. Had you any occaſion to know what became of the child, whether it lived or died?

Ann Cradock. I know nothing further than what the lady ſaid. When I expected to go to ſee it, the lady came in great grief, and told me it was dead.

Mr. Solicitor General. Have you any reaſon to know at what place the child was born?

Ann Cradock. At Chelſea, by reaſon her mother could not go there.

Mr. Solicitor General. Who informed you that the child was born at Chelſea?

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Hanmer told me this.

Mr. Solicitor General. Have you ever heard it from the priſoner?

Ann Cradock. Yes, I certainly have.

Mr. Solicitor General. She ſaid, her mother could not go there. What do you underſtand to be the reaſon, why Mrs. Chudleigh could not go to Chelſea?

Ann Cradock. By reaſon her huſband and ſon were buried there, as I have been told.

Mr. Solicitor General. Had you any converſation with the priſoner, about the year 1768, about any meſſage to be delivered to the priſoner, that Mr. Hervey had given to you?

Ann Cradock. I had a meſſage from Mr. Hervey, ſignifying to the lady he was determined to be parted from her.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you deliver that meſſage?

Ann Cradock. Not for ſome time after I received it, not being able.

Mr. Solicitor General. When did you deliver it?

Ann Cradock. On Saturday morning, when the lady came up to me, and told me, that ſhe knew what had been the matter with me. I told her Mr. Hervey deſired me to let her know, that he was determined to be, I ſhould have ſaid divorced, but I ſaid parted; and alſo, that he deſired me to tell the lady, ſhe had it in her own power to aſſiſt him. I delivered the meſſage, and the lady replied, was ſhe to make herſelf a whore to oblige him?

Mr. Solicitor General. Did ſhe appear to be with child before this converſation with you?

Ann Cradock. She did appear ſo to be.

Mr. Solicitor General. What pariſh is Mr. Merrill's houſe in?

Ann Cradock. I believe in St. George's: his houſe at Lainſton is a pariſh of itſelf.

Mr. Solicitor General. Are there any other houſes in the pariſh beſides Mr. Merrill's?

Ann Cradock. Not at Lainſton, there is not.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was there ſervice regularly in Lainſton church, or did the family go to any other church?

Ann Cradock. They went to ſervice at Sparſhot church.

Mr. Solicitor General. My lords, we have no more queſtions to aſk this witneſs at preſent.

Lord High Steward. The counſel for the priſoner are at liberty to aſk the witneſs any queſtions they think proper.

Mr. Wallace. Have you not declared to ſome perſons, that you had an expectation of ſome proviſion or benefit on the event of this proſecution?

Ann Cradock. I never could declare I had any thing promiſed me by any body.

Mr. Wallace. Expectation of proviſion from the perſons that proſecute?

Ann Cradock. I never had; I know none of the family.

Mr. Wallace. Where have you lived for this month, or two, or three?

Ann Cradock. I have lived at Mr. Beauwater's.

Mr. Wallace. What is the reaſon of your having your reſidence there?

Ann Cradock. In regard to his lady being a relation to Mr. and Mrs. Bathurſt.

Mr. Wallace. Had your reſidence there any relation to this proſecution?

Ann Cradock. It is unknown to me, if it has.

Mr. Wallace. What have you to do with Mr. Bathurſt?

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Bathurſt is ſo kind as to have me there, as being a ſervant to her aunt from my childhood.

Mr. Wallace. How long have you been at Mr. Beauwater's?

Ann Cradock. I am ſure I cannot juſtly ſay the day when I came there.

Mr. Wallace. How long before this proſecution was commenced?

Ann Cradock. I can't tell when I came there; I can't tell how long I have been there.

Mr. Wallace. I do not mean that you ſhould anſwer to a day, but according to the beſt of your memory.

Ann Cradock. About four months, I fancy.

Mr. Wallace. Was it before or ſince you appeared before the grand jury?

Ann Cradock. Since I appeared before the grand jury.

Mr. Wallace. Do you know who is the proſecutor of this indictment?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Meadows, I imagine.

Mr. Wallace. Do you know Mr. Meadows?

Ann Cradock. I have ſeen him twice or three times in my life, and that is all.

Mr. Wallace. Where?

Ann Cradock. The firſt time I ever ſaw him, was at Mr. Beauwater's houſe, ſince I came to town.

Mr. Wallace. Are you to ſtay at Mr. Beauwater's or to return, when this proſecution is over?

Ann Cradock. The laſt home I had is at Lainſton, where I hope I may return again. I went down there in Auguſt was a twelvemonth.

Mr. Wallace. Have you never declared to any body, that you had an expectation of ſome proviſion from the cauſe now in hand?

Ann Cradock. I could not declare it, as I had no offers made me from the proſecutor.

Mr. Wallace. Have you declared it?

Ann Cradock. I have juſt now ſaid, I could not.

Mr. Wallace. Would you be underſtood, that you have not?

Ann Cradock. What was I to declare?

Mr. Wallace. Whether you have not declared, whether true or falſe I do not care, that you had an expectation of ſome proviſion from this proſecution?

Ann Cradock. I could not declare it, before it was made to me.

Mr. Wallace. You muſt ſay, whether you did ſay ſo or not.

Ann Cradock. I never had any offer from the proſecution.

Mr. Wallace. Had not you an expectation from the proſecution?

Ann Cradock. No, I could not ſay that, when they never offered it me.

Mr. Wallace. Do you underſtand the queſtion generally, or confined to the proſecutor?

Ann Cradock. I think it can be confined to none but himſelf.

Mr. Wallace. Have you any expectation from any body elſe?

Ann Cradock. No, none.

Mr. Wallace. Nor ever declared ſo?

Ann Cradock. No. I never declared that I had any ſuch expectations.

Mr. Wallace. At what time of the night was this marriage?

Ann Cradock. I cannot poſſibly tell the hour; it was at night.

Mr. Wallace. Have not you mentioned to any body ſome hour of the night?

Ann Cradock. I do not know that I have mentioned it, any farther than that it was at night.

Mr. Wallace. You have ſaid, that you was employed to keep the ſervants out of the way at the time; how came you then to go to the church?

Ann Cradock. I was employed to come out of the church after the marriage, and ſee that the houſe was clear: after the marriage, and not before.

Mr. Wallace. Was there any care taken before they went to church?

Ann Cradock. No, I do not know that there was. Mr. and Mrs. Merrill dined out that day, and I do not know that any of the houſe knew that there was to be a marriage.

Mr. Wallace. Are you ſure that Mr. and Mrs. Merrill dined out that day?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Mr. Wallace. When did Mrs. Merrill die?

Ann Cradock. I do not know. Mrs. Hanmer it was; there was no Mrs. Merrill at that time.

Mr. Wallace. Then by Mrs. Merrill you meant Mrs. Hanmer, did you?

Ann Cradock. Certainly I did mean Mrs. Hanmer, for there was no Mrs. Merrill.

Mr. Wallace. Was you deſired to go to the church?

Ann Cradock. I don't know whether I was deſired to go, but there I was; that I recollect.

Mr. Wallace. Did you go as a witneſs, or out of curioſity?

Ann Cradock. I was there to ſee the marriage. As to witneſs, I was not called to be a witneſs.

Mr. Wallace. Did any of the parties know you was in the church?

Ann Cradock. Thoſe that were in the church knew it.

Mr. Wallace. Did you hear the ceremony performed?

Ann Cradock. I did.

Mr. Wallace. Did you hear the whole ceremony?

Ann Cradock. I believe ſo: certainly.

Mr. Wallace. Have you not ſaid, you did not hear the ceremony?

Ann Cradock. Not that I know of, and I never was aſked, to my knowledge.

Mr. Wallace. Do you ſpeak poſitively that you have not ſo declared?

Ann Cradock. Certainly I do, for I know whether I was aſked or not.

Mr. Wallace. How long did Mr. Hervey ſtay there after this marriage?

Ann Cradock. I really cannot ſay how many days; he was not long there.

Mr. Wallace. You ſaid that Mrs. Hanmer made them get up ſoon after they went to bed; how long did Mrs. Hanmer ſit up after that?

Ann Cradock. I cannot juſtly ſay how many hours; I can't ſay whether it might have been one, or two, or three hours.

Mr. Wallace. Was it Mrs. Hanmer's cuſtom to lock the door where Miſs Chudleigh lay?

Ann Cradock. I never knew that ſhe did lock the door at all.

Mr. Wallace. Nor any body by her order?

Ann Cradock. Not to my knowledge: I never knew the door ordered to be locked by any body, nor by myſelf neither: I am ſure I never locked it.

Mr. Wallace. You are ſure the door was never locked then, when Mr. Hervey went out, when he was made to get up and leave the room as you have ſaid?

Ann Cradock. Went out where? I don't underſtand.

Mr. Wallace. You have ſaid, he was made to get up again.

Ann Cradock. To the beſt of my knowledge, the lady got up too, as well as Mr. Hervey.

Mr. Wallace. And both left the room?

Ann Cradock. I believe they both left the room, I know nothing to the contrary; but I know they afterwards went to bed together.

Mr. Wallace. Have you not declared, you knew nothing of this marriage?

Ann Cradock. No, never in my life, to my knowledge.

Mr. Wallace. That you did not remember any thing about it?

Ann Cradock. It is very odd that I can remember it now, and ſhould not have remembered it before: I ever had it in my memory.

Mr. Wallace. Have not you declared, that you did not remember it?

Ann Cradock. No, not that I know of.

Mr. Wallace. I deſire you will give a poſitive anſwer, yes or no, whether you have or have not declared it?

Ann Cradock. I never could have declared that which I did not know.

Mr. Wallace. That you did not remember any thing about it?

Ann Cradock. No, I never could ſay that.

Mr. Wallace. Did you or did you not ſay ſo?

Ann Cradock. No, I did not ſay ſo.

Lord Buckingham. I beg to put one queſtion to the witneſs. You know that you ſpeak not only in the preſence of this reſpectable court, but in the preſence of Almighty God?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Lord Buckingham. Have you, or have you not, ever declared that you did expect an advantage from the proſecution? Say aye, or no.

Ann Cradock. I muſt ſay no: I could not ſay aye.

Lord Buckingham. You have told us, that Mr. Merrill and Mrs. Hanmer went out to dinner the day on which the marriage was performed; I ſhould be glad to know at what time Mr. Merrill and Mrs. Hanmer returned home?

Ann Cradock. I believe it might be between ſeven and eight o'clock, as I had given tea out of the houſekeeper's room to the gentleman and lady by candle-light.

Lord Buckingham. What day of the month was it?

Ann Cradock. That I cannot tell.

Duke of Grafton. Did you ever ſee the child, that the lady at the bar offered to carry you to ſee?

Ann Cradock. No, I never did.

Duke of Grafton. What was the interval of time between the offer to carry you to ſee the child, and the death of that child?

Ann Cradock. That I cannot juſtly ſay neither; but as far as I can remember, the day that I was to go to ſee the child, the lady came and ſaid it was dead.

Duke of Grafton. Though you cannot exactly recollect the interval between the one tranſaction and the other, yet ſtill you may ſpeak at large. Was it a week? Was it a month? Was it half a year?

Ann Cradock. It was not a month, nor yet half a year.

Duke of Grafton. Were there a few days interval between the one and the other?

Ann Cradock. There was, but I cannot ſay how many days.

Duke of Grafton. Did you, in the ſpace of theſe few days, ever expreſs to the lady at the bar your earneſtneſs and deſire to ſee the child, which you ſay the lady at the bar told you was ſo like Mr. Hervey?

Ann Cradock. I expreſſed my deſire at the time, when the lady ſpoke of the child to her aunt.

Duke of Grafton. What was the anſwer that you had for not carrying you immediately to the child?

Ann Cradock. The lady told me, ſhe would come on ſuch a day with the princeſs's coach, and that I ſhould go and ſee the child.

Duke of Grafton. Was you examined by the Eccleſiaſtical Court?

Ann Cradock. I was not.

Duke of Grafton. Did you know at the time, that there was ſuch a proceſs going on here?

Ann Cradock. I was told by Mr. Hervey there was.

Duke of Grafton. Did you offer to Mr. Hervey, or to any other of the parties, to give that evidence which you now have proved it was material to give?

Ann Cradock. He told me, he muſt call upon me to aſſiſt him in his marriage.

Duke of Grafton. Did any thing elſe paſs relative to the proceſs in Doctors Commons, after Mr. Hervey's converſation with you?

Ann Cradock. Yes, there certainly was, though I never was called.

Duke of Grafton. Did any thing paſs between Mr. Hervey and you, or between any of the parties and you, after that declaration of Mr. Hervey's to you?

Ann Cradock. I was to acquaint the lady with his intentions.

Duke of Grafton You ſaid you was to remove the ſervants out of the way at Mr. Merrill's houſe at the time of the marriage: how many ſervants might there be about Mr. Merrill's houſe at the time of the marriage?

Ann Cradock. The butler; a maid, who waited on Miſs Merrill; two houſe-maids; a laundry-maid: one of the houſe-maids belonged to Mrs. Hanmer, who always went down along with her, and there was a kitchen-maid.

Duke of Grafton. Were there any lights in the church at the time of the ceremony being performed?

Ann Cradock. There was a wax light in the crown of Mr. Mountenay's hat.

Lord Townſhend. Whether ſhe has ever received or been offered any thing to with-hold her evidence relative to the ſuppoſed marriage?

Ann Cradock. I never have.

Lord Hillſborough. Did you ever receive any letter, offering yo uany advantage in caſe you would appear againſt the priſoner, before you was ſubpœna'd at Hicks's-Hall?

Ann Cradock. I received a letter from a friend, wherein I was told, that a gentleman of their acquaintance would get me a ſine-cure, but on what account I knew not.

Lord Hillſborough. A gentleman of whoſe acquaintance?

Ann Cradock. I do not know who the gentleman was; it never was explained to me who the gentleman was; nor I never aſked.

Lord Hillſborough. Who was the friend who wrote that letter to you?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Fozard, of Piccadilly.

Lord Hillſborough. What anſwer did you make to that letter?

Ann Cradock. I made no anſwer any further, but that it was very kind in any body that would aſſiſt me in getting me any thing?

Lord Hillſborough. Who is Mr. Fozard?

Ann Cradock. A perſon that lives near Hyde-park-Corner, and keeps livery-ſtables.

Lord Hillſborough. You ſay he wrote you word, that ſome of their friends would get you a ſine-cure?

Ann Cradock. I ſaid, a gentleman of their acquaintance.

Lord Hillſborough. Of whoſe acquaintance?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Fozard's.

Lord Hillſborough. Upon what account did you conceive or underſtand that he was to get you a ſine-cure?

Ann Cradock. That I cannot tell.

Lord Hillſborough. What have you done with the letter?

Ann Cradock. I do not know where the letter is; I know I have it not.

Lord Hillſborough. Will you take upon you to ſay, that there was not in that letter an expreſſion intimating, that if you would appear againſt the priſoner at the bar, a ſine-cure would be gotten for you?

Ann Cradock. I certainly do ſay, there was no ſuch expreſſion in the letter; only a friend of theirs, or a gentleman of their acquaintance, I do not know which, would get me a ſine-cure.

Lord Hillſborough. Did you, or did you not, by virtue of your oath, underſtand that that was to be the conſequence of your appearing againſt the priſoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. I did not know that that was to be the conſequence of my appearing. I had no room to imagine ſo, becauſe I know not the perſon of the proſecutor, nor none of his family.

Lord Hillſborough. Did you adviſe with any body concerning what you ſhould do with regard to that letter?

Ann Cradock. I certainly did apply to a friend, and acquainted him I had received ſuch a letter.

Lord Hillſborough. What did you write to your friend?

Ann Cradock. I never writ to any friend; I applied to a friend, and ſhewed the letter.

Lord Hillſborough. Whether you did not aſk advice from ſome body, what you ſhould do with regard to that letter?

Ann Cradock. I did not aſk any body what I was to do with it; I received it.

Lord Hillſborough. What did you conſult that friend about?

Ann Cradock. To let him know I had received ſuch a letter; but I did not know what it might be upon, or what it might not.

Lord Hillſborough. Did he read the letter?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Lord Hillſborough. What converſation paſſed between you and him on the ſubject of the letter?

Ann Cradock. I told him, I did not know what it might be from, but that I apprehended it might be ſomething concerning my being called upon in point of the lady. I think I told him, that I had once been told, that I might have the ſame ſettled upon me as the lady promiſed me when I went into the country.

Lord Hillſborough. What reaſon had you for thinking ſo?

Ann Cradock. The reaſon I had for thinking ſo, was, becauſe I had been told once, that I might have the ſame given me that the lady at the bar offered me, when I was to go into the country, if I would ſpeak the truth; but by whom I know not: I never aſked the queſtion.

Lord Hillſborough. I deſire to know, what you did with that letter, whether you put it into the hands of the perſon whom you conſulted?

Ann Cradock. I put it into no one's hands; the perſon had the letter I conſulted.

Lord Hillſborough. You put it into that perſon's hand to read it?

Ann Cradock. I gave the letter into that perſon's hand to read it, and told him, he might ſhew it to Mr. Hervey, if he would.

Lord Hillſborough. For what purpoſe did you deſire it might be ſhewn to Mr. Hervey?

Ann Cradock. For this purpoſe, believing it might be againſt him and the lady; but by whom I know not, for I never aſked the queſtion, who it was that was to give it.

Lord Hillſborough. Did you deſire your friend to ſhew it to the priſoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. That was impoſſible, for the lady was not in England.

Lord Hillſborough. Did you then deſire him to ſhew it to any body on her part?

Ann Cradock. I ſhould look upon it, if it was ſhewn to Mr. Hervey, it would be on her part, as being man and wife.

Lord Hillſborough. Whether you deſired it to be ſhewn to any body elſe?

Ann Cradock. No, not beſides Mr. Hervey.

ADJOURNED.

Saturday, April 20.

ANN CRADOCK.

Continuation of her examination.

Lord Hillſborough. I WAS exceedingly glad the houſe was adjourned, but I would much rather it had been adjourned ſooner, becauſe I now lie under a good deal of difficulty to reſume the thread of thoſe queſtions, that for my own information, and for that of the houſe, I thought highly proper and neceſſary to be explicitly and exactly anſwered. My lords, I think the laſt queſtion that I put to the witneſs at the bar, was, whether ſhe had put that letter, which ſhe ſaid was ſigned by Fozard, into the hand of any other perſon? If I do not miſtake, my lords, ſhe ſaid, ſhe had put it into the hand of a friend of hers to read. Upon aſking her, whether ſhe had any other intention than that of putting the letter into his hand? I think ſhe ſaid, ſhe told the perſon he might ſhew the letter to Mr. Hervey, as ſhe apprehended it related to him. Now I deſire to aſk the evidence at the bar, whether ſhe knows, that her friend did ſhew that letter to Mr. Hervey or not?

Ann Cradock. My friend did ſhew it to Mr. Hervey.

Lord Hillſborough. Did your friend tell you what Mr. Hervey ſaid concerning the letter?

Ann Cradock. My friend told me, that he deſired I ſhould keep the letter.

Lord Hillſborough. Do you mean Mr. Hervey or the friend deſired you to keep the letter?

Ann Cradock. I mean, the anſwer, that was given upon the letter being ſhewn, was brought by my friend, and Mr. Hervey deſired me to keep the letter.

Lord Hillsborough. Did your friend, who carried the letter from you to Mr. Hervey, ſay any thing more to you, than that Mr. Hervey deſired you ſhould keep the letter?

Ann Cradock. He told me that I ſhould acquaint the lady that was abroad with it.

Lord Hillſborough. Did you acquaint the lady that was abroad with it?

Ann Cradock. I had it not in my power ſo to do.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you acquaint any body elſe with it?

Ann Cradock. I did ſeveral of my acquaintance.

Lord Hillsborough. In particular, did you acquaint any body that was concerned in buſineſs for the lady?

Ann Cradock. No.

Lord Hillsborough. I deſire to know, whether you did by yourſelf, or by any body elſe for you, make any anſwer whatever to the letter to Mr. Fozard?

Ann Cradock. I went to Mr. Fozard when I received the letter, as in the letter it was required to know my age, and where I was born.

Lord Hillsborough. I deſire you will inform their lordſhips of the whole of what paſſed between Mr. Fozard and you at that interview?

Ann Cradock. Nothing in particular, further than relating to where I was born, and my age; my age I did not know. I did not aſk who was to give me the ſine-cure.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you not think it extraordinary, that Mr. Fozard ſhould enquire of you your age, and where you was born?

Ann Cradock. I certainly did think it extraordinary.

Lord Hillsborough. Whether you did not aſk the meaning of it?

Ann Cradock. I did not aſk any meaning for it.

Lord Derby. You ſaid yeſterday, that you did expect to receive ſomething adequate to what you had received from the priſoner at the bar: what did you formerly receive from the priſoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Many favours in friendſhip, but not any thing in particular.

Lord Derby. What was you offered by the lady?

Ann Cradock. Twenty guineas a-year, to go and ſettle in the country, and the choice of three different counties.

Lord Derby. At what time was that offer made to you?

Ann Cradock. The time I cannot juſtly remember.

Lord Derby. Recollect; how many years was it ago?

Ann Cradock. I believe it may be three years ago, or four, I am not certain.

Lord Derby. What was your anſwer to that propoſal?

Ann Cradock. It made me very unhappy to think that I was to be baniſhed, but I conſented to go into Yorkſhire.

Lord Derby. What were the counties that were propoſed to you?

Ann Cradock. Yorkſhire, Derbyſhire, I think, and Northumberland.

Lord Derby. In conſequence of that conſent to go into Yorkſhire, did you go into Yorkſhire?

Ann Cradock. No, I did not; I went to Thoreſby: I tried, but I could go no further.

Lord Derby. What was the reaſon that you could go no further?

Ann Cradock. From being unhappy, and going from all my friends.

Lord Derby. Did you receive any ſum of money in conſequence of going as far as Thoreſby?

Ann Cradock. None, no further than was to carry me to the place where I ſaid I was to go.

Lord Derby. You mentioned an annuity of twenty guineas a-year; has that annuity been paid, or have you received any part of it ſince that agreement?

Ann Cradock. No.

Lord Coventry. You ſaid you was preſent at the marriage in 1744; I deſire to know whether you have ever communicated that information to any perſon till this year, and to whom?

Ann Cradock. I have ſeveral times to many, but to particular perſons I cannot ſpeak.

Lord Derby. I ſhould be glad to know whether you do underſtand, or do not underſtand, that any ſum or ſums were ever paid to any perſon for your ſubſiſtence and board, on the part of the priſoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. No, I do not know that ever any ſum was paid upon my account.

Lord Buckingham. I deſire to aſk the witneſs, whether ſhe at any time did receive any preſent whatever from the priſoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Several in point of friendſhip.

Lord Townſhend. Was you ever offered any ſum of money at any time, to conceal any evidence?

Ann Cradock. No.

Lord Townſhend. By either ſide?

Ann Cradock. No.

Lord Camden. I deſire to know whether you ſaw the lady at Thoreſby, in the way to Yorkſhire?

Ann Cradock. I was in the lady's houſe, and ſaw her ſeveral times.

Lord Camden. In any of thoſe interviews, did any thing paſs reſpecting the annuity of twenty guineas a-year, and the journey you was then making to Yorkſhire?

Ann Cradock. No, not any thing in particular as to that.

Lord Camden. What was the reaſon of your return from Thoreſby, and not going to your journey's end?

Ann Cradock. My reaſon was, from my ill ſtate of health, and unhappineſs of mind.

Lord Lyttelton. Did the lady explain to you what were her motives for ſending you, or, as you called it, baniſhing you, into thoſe diſtant counties?

Ann Cradock. No, my lords.

Lord Derby. What did you apprehend to be the lady's motives for ſuch a propoſal?

Ann Cradock. That I was ever at a loſs to know, becauſe I never aſked.

Duke of Ancaſter. Did you conſult a friend on account of the ſubſtance of Mr. Fozard's letter?

Ann Cradock. I did.

Duke of Ancaſter. I deſire you to tell the houſe, who that friend was?

Ann Cradock. My friend was Dr. Hoſſack, who is phyſician of Greenwich hoſpital.

Duke of Ancaſter. What is become of that letter, or have you it?

Ann Cradock. I have it not; but it is in my box, I believe, at Lainſton, as I carried it with me when I went there with my other things.

Duke of Richmond. Was not the marriage to be kept a ſecret?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Duke of Richmond. If during the time the marriage was to be kept a ſecret, any perſon had aſked you about the marriage, would you have owned it, or denied it?

Ann Cradock. I never from the time divulged the ſecret, until it had been told before.

Duke of Richmond. Did no perſon, during the time it was a ſecret, ever aſk you if you knew it?

Ann Cradock. Several have aſked me, but I have always replied, no.

Lord Preſident. Do you not know, that your husband was examined in the Spiritual Court, in the cauſe of jactitation?

Ann Cradock. I know he was called upon in the court, but what paſſed I am an utter ſtranger to, as I never aſked.

Lord Preſident. Had not Mr. Hervey intimated to you, that you was to be called upon on that occaſion?

Ann Cradock. He did.

Lord Preſident. After that did you hear any thing from Mr. Hervey, reſpecting your attendance in that cauſe?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Hervey told me, he muſt call upon me to aſſiſt him in the marriage, and to ſwear to Mrs. Hanmer's hand-writing.

Lord Preſident. Was you ever called upon that occaſion?

Ann Cradock. I was not.

Lord Derby. Did you live with Mrs. Hanmer until the time of her death?

Ann Cradock. I did.

Lord Derby. Which happened eleven years ago the ſecond of laſt December?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Lord Derby. Upon what have you ſubſiſted ſince that time?

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Hanmer left me two hundred pounds; one was taken up, the other was left: I quitted the lady's houſe, and went to Newington. I ſhould have told you that the two hundred pounds were in this lady's hands [pointing to the ducheſs]; one was taken up, and the other, with my huſband's income, ſupported me whilſt he lived.

Lord Derby. How do you know that that two hundred pounds was left you by Mrs. Hanmer?

Ann Cradock. It was left me in her will.

Duke of Ancaſter. Do you of your own knowledge aſſert that there was a child?

Ann Cradock. I do aſſert I was told ſo. I never ſaw the child.

Duke of Ancaſter. Who told you ſo?

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Hanmer told me ſo, and the lady told me at our return out of the country.

Duke of Ancaſter. Who told you there was a child?

Ann Cradock. This lady at the bar told me ſo herſelf. Both told me ſo.

Duke of Ancaſter. Do you from your own knowledge affirm, that that child is dead?

Ann Cradock. The lady at the bar told me it was dead, as ſhe told me before ſhe would take me to ſee it.

Duke of Ancaſter. Did the lady at the bar bring the princeſs of Wales's coach, and carry you to ſee the child at Chelſea?

Ann Cradock. The lady told me ſhe would come in the princeſs's coach, and carry me to ſee the child.

Lord Radnor. How old do you apprehend the child was at the time of its death?

Ann Cradock. That I can give no account of: it was very young; but the age I know not.

Lord Radnor. Weeks, months, or years?

Ann Cradock. Months, but not years.

Lord Radnor. Did you ever hear that the child was baptized?

Ann Cradock. I did hear that the child was baptized; but Mrs. Hanmer and I were in the country at that time.

Lord Radnor. Did you ever hear what the child's name was?

Ann Cradock. No, I cannot recollect that I did.

Lord Radnor. Did you ever hear where the child was buried?

Ann Cradock. I did hear that it was buried at Chelſea.

Lord Radnor. Who told you ſo?

Ann Cradock. The lady at the bar told me ſo herſelf one day, when I was airing in the coach with her that way.

Lord Forteſcue. How have you ſubſiſted ſince your huſband's death?

Ann Cradock. With what I made of my furniture which was in my houſe, which was all new.

Lord Forteſcue. How long is it ſince your huſband died?

Ann Cradock. Five years laſt March.

Ordered to withdraw.

Lord High Steward. Who do you call next, Mr. Solicitor-General?

Solicitor-General. We deſire to call

Mr. CÆSAR HAWKINS, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Mr. Hawkins, are you acquainted with the lady at the bar? and how long have you been ſo?

Mr. Hawkins. A great many years: I believe above thirty.

Mr. Dunning. Are you acquainted with the preſent Lord Briſtol? and how long have you been ſo?

Mr. Hawkins. I have had the honour of knowing the earl of Briſtol nearly as many years.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know of any intercourſe between my lord Briſtol and the lady at the bar?

Mr. Hawkins. Of an intercourſe certainly; of acquaintance undoubtedly.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know from the parties of any marriage between them?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not know how far any thing that has come before me in a confidential truſt in my profeſſion ſhould be diſcloſed, conſiſtent with my profeſſional honour. [Queſtion and Anſwer repeated.]

Mr. Dunning. I truſt your lordſhips will ſee nothing in my queſtion, that can betray confidential truſt, or diſhonour Mr. Hawkins in giving it. My queſtion is ſimply, whether Mr. Hawkins knows, from the parties, of any marriage between them?

Lord High Steward. The queſtion that was aſked by the counſel at the bar, is, 'Whether the witneſs knew, from any information of either of 'the two parties, that they were married?' The witneſs objects to it, whether he is to anſwer any queſtions that are inconſiſtent with his profeſſional honour. Your lordſhips are to determine, whether the queſtion put by the counſel at the bar ſhall be aſked?

Lord Mansfield. I ſuppoſe Mr. Hawkins means to demur to the queſtion upon the ground, that it came to his knowledge ſome way from his being employed as a ſurgeon for one or both of the parties; and I take for granted, if Mr. Hawkins underſtands that it is your lordſhips opinion, that he has no privilege on that account to excuſe himſelf from giving the anſwer, that then, under the authority of your lordſhips judgment, he will ſubmit to anſwer it: therefore, to ſave your lordſhips the trouble of an adjournment, if no lord differs in opinion, but thinks that a ſurgeon has no privilege to avoid giving evidence in a court of juſtice, but is bound by the law of the land to do it; [if any of your lordſhips think he has ſuch a privilege, it will be a matter to be debated elſewhere, but] if all your lordſhips acquieſce, Mr. Hawkins will underſtand, that it is your judgment and opinion, that a ſurgeon has no privilege, where it is a material queſtion, in a civil or criminal cauſe, to know whether parties were married, or whether a child was born, to ſay, that his introduction to the parties was in the courſe of his profeſſion, and in that way he came to the knowledge of it. I take it for granted, that if Mr. Hawkins underſtands that, it is a ſatisfaction to him, and a clear juſtification to all the world. If a ſurgeon was voluntarily to reveal theſe ſecrets, to be ſure he would be guilty of a breach of honour, and of great indiſcretion; but, to give that information in a court of juſtice, which by the law of the land he is bound to do, will never be imputed to him as any indiſcretion whatever.

Mr. Dunning. My queſtion is, Whether you knew from either of the parties, that there was a marriage between them?

Mr. Hawkins. From the converſation with both parties I apprehended there was a marriage, but nothing in proof appeared before me: I mean nothing as legal proof, but converſation.

Mr. Dunning. But did they in converſation admit, that they were man and wife? and is that the ground upon which you form that apprehenſion?

Mr. Hawkins. Yes, it is; they did admit it in converſation.

Mr. Dunning. Do you, or do you not, know that a child was the fruit of that marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. Yes, I do.

Mr. Dunning. Can you tell their lordſhips, about what time that child was born? and where?

Mr. Hawkins. About the time I cannot tell. If I ever put down any thing in writing at the time, I might have deſtroyed it afterwards, according to my cuſtom, which is to deſtroy papers that are of no uſe, and which might be improper to be found after my deceaſe.

Mr. Dunning. Inform their lordſhips about what time this might be, as near as your memory will enable you to do.

Mr. Hawkins. I ſhould ſuppoſe it was about thirty years ago; but I do proteſt I do not know.

Mr. Dunning. Where was this child born?

Mr. Hawkins. At Chelſea, near to Chelſea-College; but I forget the name of the ſtreet.

Mr. Dunning. Was this marriage, and the birth of that child, at that time kept a ſecret?

Mr. Hawkins. I was told it was to be a ſecret.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know what is ſince become of that child?

Mr. Hawkins. I believe it died in a little time afterwards.

Mr. Dunning. By your anſwer, that you underſtood it was to be kept a ſecret, did you mean the marriage, or the birth of the child, or both?

Mr. Hawkins. Both.

Mr. Dunning. Which of the parties can you recollect it was, Mr. Hervey or Miſs Chudleigh, that deſired this might be kept a ſecret? or both?

Mr. Hawkins. I ſhould take for granted both equally.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know enough of the then Mr. Hervey's motions to be able to inform their lordſhips, whether this child was born after his firſt or ſecond return from ſea, ſubſequent to the marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. No, I do not know enough of his motions to anſwer this queſtion.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know what age this child had attained before its death?

Mr. Hawkins. I proteſt I do not remember now.

Mr. Dunning. Can you recollect about what time of the year it was you firſt heard this child was born, and about what time of the year you heard it died?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not know; I might hear of the death immediately.

Mr. Dunning. Did you ever attend the child in the courſe of your profeſſion?

Mr. Hawkins. I did once: I am not ſure whether I did not attend more, but I remember I attended it once.

Mr. Dunning. Do you remember whether your recollection of this tranſaction was, or was not, helped about the time of the commencement of the ſuit in the Spiritual Court?

Mr. Hawkins. Really I do not know any thing that paſſed to bring it to my mind then.

Mr. Dunning. Was you, or was you not, applied to by either of the parties, or both, at the time of the commencing this ſuit in the Spiritual Court?

Mr. Hawkins. I was applied to by the earl of Briſtol.

Mr. Dunning. Will you be ſo good as to tell what was the purport of lord Briſtol's then application to you?

Mr. Wallace. On the part of the noble lady, I muſt ſubmit to your lordſhips, that nothing ſaid in the abſence of the lady is evidence againſt the priſoner at the bar.

Mr. Dunning. I will put the queſtion in a way that it ſhall be liable to no objection. Did you, or did you not, in conſequence of lord Briſtol's application, apply to the lady at the bar?

Mr. Hawkins. I did.

Mr. Dunning. Then tell us, what was the purport of lord Briſtol's application to you, and what meſſage you carried from lord Briſtol to the lady at the bar?

Mr. Hawkins. To the beſt of my remembrance, the earl of Briſtol met me in the ſtreet, and ſtopped me, telling me that he ſhould be glad I would call on him at his houſe the firſt morning I had half an hour to ſpare; and that if I could then fix the time, he would take care to be in the way, and that no other company ſhould interrupt the converſation. He intimated that it was not on account of his own health, but on account of an old friend of mine. I named the time, and went to him. I found his lordſhip expecting me. Upon a table, at a little diſtance from his right hand, there lay two or three bundles of papers, folded up as theſe papers are (taking up ſome papers at the bar): to theſe papers he often pointed in courſe of what he ſaid afterwards. After making ſome polite apologies to me for the particular trouble he was then giving me, he told me it was on the preſent ducheſs of Kingſton's account: that he wiſhed me to carry her a meſſage upon a ſubject that was very diſagreeable, but that he thought it would be leſs ſhocking to be carried by, and received from, a perſon ſhe knew, than from any ſtranger: that he had been for ſome time paſt very unhappy on account of his matrimonial connections with the ducheſs, Miſs Chudleigh that was then: that he wiſhed to have his freedom; which the criminality of her conduct, and the proofs which he had of it (which, in pointing to the papers I before mentioned, he ſaid he had for ſome time paſt, with intent and purpoſe to procure a divorce, been collecting and getting together): that he believed they contained the moſt ample and abundant proofs, circumſtances, and every thing relative to ſuch proof: that he intended to purſue his proſecution with the ſtricteſt firmneſs and reſolution; but that he retained ſuch a regard and reſpect for her, and as a gentleman to his own character, that he wiſhed not to mix malice or ill temper in the courſe of it; but that in every reſpect he would wiſh to appear and act on the line of a man of honour and of a gentleman: that he wiſhed (he ſaid) ſhe would underſtand that his ſoliciting me to carry the meſſage, ſhould be received by her as a mark of that diſpoſition: that as moſt probably in the number of ſo many teſtimonial depoſitions as were there collected, there might be many offenſive circumſtances named, ſuperfluous to the neceſſary legal proofs, that if ſhe pleaſed I might inform her, that her lawyers, either with or without herſelf, might, in conjunction with his lawyers, look over all the depoſitions, and that if any parts were found tending to indecent or ſcandalous reflections, which his gentlemen of the law ſhould think might be omitted without weakening his cauſe, he himſelf ſhould have no objection to it: that as he intended only to act upon the principles of a gentleman and a man of honour, he ſhould hope ſhe would not produce any unneceſſary or vexatious delays to the ſuit, or enhance the expences of it, as he did not intend to proſecute to gain by any demands of damages, I think, or to that purpoſe. I delivered this meſſage to the ducheſs as well as I could. I do not preſume now, that either the preciſe words, or the identity of the words and expreſſions can be recollected by me, but it was to the purport, as near as poſſibly I can remember, of what I have ſaid.

Mr. Dunning. Will you recollect, whether upon this converſation any diſtinct propoſition was ſtated to the ducheſs which required an anſwer? or, what anſwer you carried back from the ducheſs for that purpoſe? You will of courſe be referring yourſelf to what paſſed between you and the ducheſs.

Mr. Hawkins. I delivered my meſſage to the ducheſs. After a little time taken for conſideration, I do not recollect exactly what her grace deſired me to report to the earl of Briſtol; but it was to this effect: that ſhe was obliged to him for the polite parts of his meſſage, but, as to the ſubject of the divorce, ſhe ſhould cut that ſhort by wiſhing him to underſtand, that ſhe did not acknowledge him for her legal huſband, and ſhould put him to the defiance of ſuch proof: that ſhe had then already, or ſhould immediately, inſtitute a ſuit in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, which ſhe called, I think, a jactitation of marriage; but, as he had promiſed before, that he would act upon the line of a man of honour and a gentleman in his own intended ſuit, ſhe hoped that he would purſue the ſame line now, and that he would confine himſelf to the proofs of legal marriage only, and not to other proofs of connections or cohabitations: if he did, that he would make it a proceſs of no long delay, and that either he would gain an equal freedom to himſelf by a ſentence of that court, declaring them to be free, or he would the ſooner be able to inſtitute his own intended ſuit.——The earl of Briſtol received my meſſage as one affected and ſtruck by it, making no reply or anſwer for two or three minutes; then, not ſpeaking to me, but rather ſeeming to expreſs his own thoughts aloud in ſhort ſentences, that he did not conceive he ſhould have his equal freedom by that method. I believe I ſhould have mentioned, that her grace deſired, in part of her meſſage, that nothing might be brought forwards, which might be the ſubject of uſeleſs converſation and ſcandal. He ſaid, in reply, that he was no more inclined to bring forward any thing for the lovers of ſcandalous converſation only, than ſhe could be; and that, if he could not eſtabliſh the proof of legal matrimony (I do not remember the words, but to the ſenſe of this) that he was too much a gentleman to bring any thing before the publick relative to other connections with the lady. I do not remember that any thing material paſſed, or more than this.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect that in any ſubſequent converſation with the lady, you was deſired to apply to the gentleman for any other civility in the courſe of this cauſe?

Mr. Hawkins. Before the firſt attendance that I have lately alluded to in illneſs, Mrs. Chudleigh, her mother, did us the honour of a private family friendſhip. After theſe meſſages, her grace now and then called on my wife in an evening, frequently ſaying, ſhe was paſſing to or from her law gentlemen. When I happened to ſee her grace, I every now and then aſked how her ſuit went on? to which, I think, ſhe always ſeemed to anſwer chearfully, 'Very right,' and 'Well.'

Mr. Dunning. Did you ever carry any other meſſages?

Mr. Hawkins. Two or three times, I cannot recollect which, ſhe aſked me to deliver ſome meſſage to the earl of Briſtol; I am not ſure whether one was not a letter, or whether upon the occaſion of her aſking me to deliver ſomething, for my own memory I might not aſk her to write it down, but I really do not remember at preſent, though I have endeavoured to recollect what the ſubject of theſe meſſages were: but I know they were of very trifling import, nothing that could have ſtruck me ſtrongly, or I ſhould have remembered them; and I underſtood they were rather given to me, as if the earl of Briſtol was delicate in receiving any meſſage from her grace, and that I was only to expect a verbal anſwer on that account.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect, whether any of theſe meſſages related to any witneſs or witneſſes to be produced or kept back?

Mr. Hawkins. Certainly not; I never had a ſuppoſition, that the ducheſs would have given me ſuch a meſſage. Nothing appeared to me, but what contained matter of little import, and of the moſt honourable kind.

Mr. Dunning. Did you ever obſerve, or do you now recollect, any ground to form a belief, whether the parties had forgotten or remembered, that there was then living one of the witneſſes to the fact of the marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. I profeſs I do not recollect that: I have heard it in common converſation in the town, but not that ever I remember from either him or her at that time.

Mr. Dunning. At what time did you receive that report from him or her?

Mr. Hawkins. I think I have ſeen the earl of Briſtol but once ſince the commencement of this proſecution, and then his lordſhip ſeemed rather to ſpeak peeviſhly.

Lord Mansfield. They will not examine to what lord Briſtol has ſaid ſince the commencement of the proſecution?

Mr. Dunning. Was any thing, that my lord Briſtol ſaid on that ſubject, communicated to the lady?

Mr. Hawkins. I certainly might, and did, I believe, tell her grace what was ſaid.

Lord Mansfield. Then you may go on.

Mr. Dunning. Then tell the houſe what lord Briſtol ſaid, and you repeated to the lady.

Mr. Hawkins. His lordſhip ſeemed to be peeviſh, that ſuch a perſon was now brought forward, and as he had heard it ſuppoſed, I believe, for want of her having ſuch allowance or ſuch care taken of her by the ducheſs, as he ſuppoſed ſhe uſed to have. If I underſtood him right, the earl of Briſtol ſaid, this perſon had been with him to expreſs things to that purpoſe; and ſaid, that if ſhe had been as eaſy to come at, or had had as good a memory when that cauſe was carried on in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, that he believed the iſſue of it would have been different.

Mr. Dunning. Will you be ſo good as to recollect, whether you communicated this to the lady, and what paſſed upon that occaſion?

Mr. Hawkins. I did communicate it to the ducheſs; and I thought ſhe was rather out of temper with the meſſage, or with me, ſhe calling at my houſe at a time I was very much in haſte to go out upon buſineſs, and could not give her grace that time to hear, what ſhe ſeemed to wiſh to have to talk more upon it. She offered to come again, but I was then not well in my health at all, and perhaps, as ſhe might think, not quite ſo civil, would not name another time with her grace for her to call upon me, but ſaid, that I would take an opportunity, as ſoon as I was able, of waiting upon her grace at her own houſe. I did do this ſome time after, and was told at the door, that her grace was not at home. I left my name, and ſaid I ſhould call again. After ſome days interval I did ſo, and then was told, that her grace was at home, but was laid down to ſleep; from whence I concluded, that I was not to call again.

Mr. Dunning. Am I to underſtand from you, that this laſt meſſage from my lord Briſtol was never the converſation between you and the ducheſs?

Mr. Hawkins. I did relate it to her during the time that ſhe was at my houſe.

Mr. Dunning. Have you at any time ſince heard any thing from the ducheſs on that ſubject?

Mr. Hawkins. I did hear, but not from any good authority, that her grace was rather angry.

Mr. Dunning. Has the lady never converſed with you on the ſubject of this living witneſs to the marriage, from that time to this?

Mr. Hawkins. I have never ſeen her grace but once ſince, and that was yeſterday morning for a few minutes at the duke of Newcaſtle's.

Mr. Dunning. Generally, at any time whatever, have you heard any thing from the ducheſs on the ſubject of this living witneſs to the marriage, where ſhe was, or any thing concerning her?

Mr. Hawkins. I proteſt, nothing concluſive. I might hear there was ſuch a perſon, but it was never related to me, whether ſhe was a better or worſe evidence; nothing relative to that, whether ſhe was a better or worſe evidence, or that ſhe was afraid of her, or any thing to that purpoſe.

Mr. Dunning. Am I to underſtand you to have heard her ſay, that there was ſuch a witneſs?

Mr. Hawkins. In what looſer converſation I cannot tell, but nothing that ever made me know, that there was ſuch a perſon, who had ſuch material knowledge.

Mr. Dunning. I underſtand you, that from lord Briſtol you underſtood there was a ſurviving witneſs to the marriage. My queſtion is, whether you ever learnt the ſame thing from the lady, or not?

Mr. Hawkins. If it was, it was ſome accidental looſer converſation, not as truſting me with ſuch a knowledge.

Mr. Dunning. Was it then mentioned in any looſer or accidental converſation, or any converſation?

Mr. Hawkins. I proteſt, it is impoſſible to remember that with any degree of preciſion or of uſe.

Mr. Dunning. I did not mean to aſk you to recollect any particulars of the converſation, but ſimply to the point, whether the ducheſs ever ſtated to you, or acknowledged, there was a living witneſs to the marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. No, I do not remember that ſhe ever ſtated to me, or ſaid, that there was a living witneſs to the marriage.

Mr. Dunning. Is it a fact that ever you learned from the lady?

Lord DERBY moved the clerk might read this part of the evidence.

Mr. Hawkins. I rather (if I may ſay any thing) underſtood from her grace, that there was ſome looſer marriage, not quite in the common manner. I think I could remember an expreſſion of her grace's once, upon her grace's ſpeaking on the occaſion. If I remember, I aſked her grace how her ſuit went on? This was towards the latter part of it. She looked grave, and deſired to ſpeak to me in another room. She ſaid, that ſhe had had a great deal of concern and agitation of mind ſince ſhe laſt ſaw me, which I remarked to her had been for a longer interval of time on her not calling at the houſe upon my wife in the uſual manner. Her grace ſaid, that ſhe had had ſo much concern upon what ſhe had not expected at the commencement of her ſuit, from finding that a poſitive oath was expected from her grace that ſhe was not married, and which ſhe had for ſome time together apprehended would be put to her in that form, that ſhe thought ſhe ſhould have dropped her ſuit entirely, for that ſhe would not for the whole world have taken that direct kind of poſitive oath; but that what had been offered to her, had been ſo complicated (I think, I underſtood) with other things that were certainly not true, that ſhe could and had taken the oath with a very ſafe conſcience. To ſome queſtions, I do not remember the words to her grace from me, how then ſhe came to inſtitute a ſuit at all? She anſwered me, 'O, for that matter (I think 'it was) the ceremony as done, was ſuch a ſcrambling ſhabby bu'ſineſs (I do not ſay theſe were the preciſe words, but to that purport) 'and ſo much incomplete, that ſhe ſhould have been full as unwilling 'to have taken a poſitive oath that ſhe was married, as that ſhe was not 'married.'

N. B. This part of the evidence was ordered to be read by the clerk, who accordingly read it.

Mr. Dunning. I ſhould be glad, if you would tell their lordſhips, what it was that was ſo particular in this buſineſs? if the lady ever explained it to you?

Mr. Hawkins. I never had an explanation from that moment. I had within myſelf a curioſity from the time that I carried the meſſage to my lord Briſtol from her grace, and his reception of it. I had rather imagined that there was ſome marriage of which legal proofs could not be produced, but that was only my own notion: before that time I had no real authority at all; I did not know myſelf honeſtly what to think of it.

Mr. Dunning. Did the lady ever explain to you, by what reaſon it happened, that the queſtion, when it came to be put, came in ſo much more palatable a form than ſhe expected it?

Mr. Hawkins. No, not in the leaſt: I ſhould not have preſumed to have aſked ſuch a queſtion; nor did ſhe give me any explanation at all.

Mr. Dunning. Was any thing ever ſaid by lord Briſtol, and communicated to the lady, reſpecting an intention of his to appeal from this ſentence?

Mr. Hawkins. I know nothing of that.

Mr. Dunning. What ſaid her grace on that ſubject?

Mr. Hawkins. Her grace had told me, that the ſentence was paſſed, and that it was irrevocable and final to them two, unleſs my lord Briſtol, within a certain limited time, did ſomething to keep the cauſe open. I do not know what that was. That there was, ſhe believed, ſome demur at that time, as my lord Briſtol was not ſatisfied with the ſentence, and had made ſome demand by his proctor, if I underſtood right, for the coſts of ſuit which were decreed, I believe, againſt him.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know whether the coſts of ſuit were ever paid by my lord Briſtol?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not, but I believe they were. I was going on to ſay what I recollected upon that. They had ſome demurs upon the coſts of ſuit; but that if my lord Briſtol inſiſted upon it, ſhe would give her proctor directions not to let ſuch a thing ſtop the cloſing of the ſuit.

Mr. Dunning. Do you then know whether my lord Briſtol, who by the terms of the ſentence was to pay the coſts, did not, upon this, receive the coſts he had been put to in the ſuit?

Mr. Hawkins. I know nothing more than I have mentioned: not a tittle more nor leſs.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know of no other means that were uſed to ſatisfy my lord Briſtol, and to prevent this cauſe from continuing any longer open?

Mr. Hawkins. No.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know nothing of any bond that was given from any body to any body, reſpecting this cauſe and this queſtion?

Mr. Hawkins. Not the leaſt in the world.

Mr. Dunning. Am I to underſtand, that you ſay you know nothing of any bond that has any direct, immediate, or other relation to this ſubject?

Mr. Hawkins. Not the leaſt that ever I heard of.

Mr. Dunning. You are not then a truſtee in any ſuch bond?

Mr. Hawkins. Oh no, certainly not.

Mr. Dunning. Can you give us the date of the time when the firſt meſſage was conveyed from lord Briſtol to the lady through you?

Mr. Hawkins. I was endeavouring, before I came into the court, to recollect it, but I could not: I put nothing down in writing relative to it.

Mr. Dunning. Can you recollect the year?

Mr. Hawkins. The meſſage muſt have been immediately before the commencement of the ſuit, whenever that was.

Mr. Dunning. I preſume, though you uſed the terms, her grace, and his lordſhip, you perfectly well underſtood, that neither of the parties had a right to theſe appellations at the time theſe circumſtances paſſed?

Mr. Hawkins. Yes, certainly.

Mr. Dunning. Does any circumſtance impreſs you with the recollection of the time of the year when this converſation paſſed, if you cannot tell us the exact year?

Mr. Hawkins. I might have enquired how long the ſuit laſted; but I proteſt I do not recollect now any particular circumſtances to bring it to my mind.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I have no queſtion on the part of the priſoner to put to Mr. Hawkins.

Duke of Ancaſter. Did you attend the child?

Mr. Hawkins. I think once.

Duke of Ancaſter. Was it a boy or a girl?

Mr. Hawkins. A boy.

Duke of Ancaſter. Do you ſpeak from your own knowledge that the child is dead?

Mr. Hawkins. No; but have no reaſons to doubt it.

Duke of Ancaſter. Do you know of your own knowledge, that that child was the child of the priſoner at the bar?

Mr. Hawkins. No, I could have no proof of that; for from the time that her grace was brought-to-bed of it, I never ſaw the child till I was ſent for to it in its illneſs; perhaps I had hardly ever heard of it: I had never ſeen it.

Duke of Ancaſter. Did you attend the ducheſs at the time ſhe lay-in?

Mr. Hawkins. I did not at her lying-in: I was deſired, in caſe at any future time it had been neceſſary, that I ſhould have been a witneſs of the birth of that child.

Duke of Ancaſter. Did you underſtand that child to be the legitimate child of the ducheſs of Kingſton and Mr. Hervey?

Mr. Hawkins. I did ſuppoſe ſo at that time.

Duke of Ancaſter. Was you told ſo by any body?

Mr. Hawkins. I could not be neceſſarily told ſo at that time, becauſe I had been told of the marriage before.

Duke of Grafton. Was you, from the converſation that paſſed with the party at that time, convinced that it was a ſuppoſed, or that it was a real marriage; and were any expreſſions uſed relative to the concealing the birth of the child?

Mr. Hawkins. I underſtood at that time, that it was a real marriage.

Duke of Grafton. Were there expreſſions made uſe of, that would not have been made uſe of in any other circumſtance?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not remember any particular expreſſion at all, only that I was deſired to attend, with a view and purpoſe that I might be a witneſs to the birth of that child; being, as I ſuppoſe, thought more proper, as a phyſical man, to be in the room at the time of a delivery and the birth of a child than any other perſon.

Lord Lyttelton. Who firſt informed you of the marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. I ſhould rather apprehend it came from the ducheſs, before I ſaw my lord Briſtol.

Lord Lyttelton. Do you recollect how long that was ago?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not indeed; it was a great many years ago.

Lord Lyttelton. Do you remember to have heard any particular circumſtances related to you by either of the parties, concerning the celebration of that marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. No, never more than what I have mentioned juſt now.

Lord Camden. Was you in the room at the time of the delivery?

Mr. Hawkins. To the beſt of my remembrance, I certainly was.

Lord Camden. Did you ever ſee the child itſelf?

Mr. Hawkins. At the time of the delivery I dare ſay I did. Afterwards I never did, but when I was ſent for on purpoſe to ſee it.

Lord Camden. Had you then any certain knowledge of its being the priſoner's child?

Mr. Hawkins. It is impoſſible for me to ſay when I ſaw the child ſome months afterwards, that I could know it to be the ſame child.

Lord Ravenſworth. Did you not underſtand that the ducheſs apprehended and was convinced that the ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court was final?

Mr. Hawkins. Undoubtedly ſo.

Lord Ravenſworth. And that ſhe was at liberty to marry again, unleſs the ſentence was appealed from within a limited time?

Mr. Hawkins. Moſt certainly.

Lord Ravenſworth. Who delivered the priſoner?

Mr. Hawkins. I was endeavouring to recollect before I came, who was preſent beſides myſelf, and who delivered her grace; but I proteſt I have forgotten it, ſo as not to recollect. I could not recollect, it is ſo long ago.

Ordered to withdraw.

The honourable SOPHIA CHARLOTTE FETTIPLACE ſworn.

Mr. Attorney General. How long have you been acquainted with the priſoner at the bar?

Mrs. Fettiplace. A great many years.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you know the lady before the year 1744?

Mrs. Fettiplace. My lords, I have no other knowledge of any of the circumſtances to be enquired after, than what ariſes from my connection formerly with the lady; and unleſs your lordſhips require it of me as a witneſs for juſtice, I ſhould wiſh to be excuſed.

Lord High Steward. The lady muſt certainly diſcloſe what ſhe knows for the purpoſes of juſtice.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you know the priſoner at the bar before the year 1744?

Mrs. Fettiplace. I cannot recollect.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you know the priſoner before ſhe was maid of honour to the late princeſs of Wales?

Mrs. Fettiplace. No, I did not.

Mr. Attorney General. What converſation have you ever had with the priſoner relative to her marriage with Mr. Hervey?

Mrs. Fettiplace. I believe I have heard her ſay that ſhe was married to him.

Mr. Attorney General. Can you recollect what circumſtances ſhe has mentioned reſpecting that marriage, where, and at what time, and before what witneſſes?

Mrs. Fettiplace. In Hampſhire, in a ſummer-houſe, in a garden.

Mr. Attorney General. Can you recollect upon what occaſions theſe converſations have paſſed between you and the priſoner?

Mrs. Fettiplace. Upon my word, I cannot pretend to ſay that: it is long ago.

Mr. Attorney General. Do you recollect any converſation reſpecting the child which the priſoner had by Mr. Hervey?

Mrs. Fettiplace. I know nothing about it.

Mr. Attorney General. Can you recollect how often in converſation it has been ſaid between the priſoner and you, that ſhe was married to Mr. Hervey?

Mrs. Fettiplace. I believe but once.

Mr. Attorney General. My lords, I ſhall not trouble Mrs. Fettiplace with any more queſtions.

Lord High Steward. Would the counſel for the priſoner aſk the witneſs any queſtions?

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I ſhall not aſk Mrs. Fettiplace any queſtions.

Mr. Solicitor General. My lords, I would now call lord Barrington.

Lord BARRINGTON, who was in like manner ſworn.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long have you been acquainted with the lady at the bar?

Lord Barrington. Above thirty years.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you ever hear from the lady at the bar, that ſhe was married to Mr. Hervey?

Lord Barrington. My lords, I am come here in obedience to your lordſhips ſummons, ready to give teſtimony as to any matter that I know of my own knowledge, or that has come to me in the uſual way; but if any thing has been confided to my honour, or confidentially told me, I do hold, with humble ſubmiſſion to your lordſhips, that as a man of honour, as a man regardful of the laws of ſociety, I cannot reveal it.

Lord High Steward. When the laſt witneſs but one (Mr. Hawkins) was at the bar, he made ſomething like the ſame excuſe for his not anſwering the queſtions put to him. He was then informed by a noble and learned lord, and the whole court agreed with that lord, that ſuch queſtions were to be anſwered in a court of juſtice.

Lord Barrington. I have no doubt but that the queſtion is a proper queſtion to be aſked by a court of juſtice, otherwiſe your lordſhips would not have permitted it to be aſked. But, my lords, I think every man muſt act from his own feelings; and I feel, that any private converſation intruſted to me, is not to be reported again.

A Lord. His lordſhip will recollect the oath that he has taken, is, that he ſhall declare the whole truth.

Lord Barrington. My lords, as I underſtand the oath, I can decline anſwering the queſtion that has been aſked me without acting contrary to that oath, without being guilty of perjury. But, if it is the opinion of your lordſhips that I am bound by that oath to anſwer, and that I ſhall be guilty of a perjury if I do not anſwer, in that caſe, my lords, I ſhall think differently, for I will not be perjured.

Ducheſs of Kingſton. I do releaſe my lord Barrington from every obligation of honour. I wiſh, and earneſtly deſire, that every witneſs who ſhall be examined, may deliver their opinions in every point juſtly, whether for me or againſt me. I came from Rome at the hazard of my life to ſurrender myſelf to this court. I bow with ſubmiſſive obedience to every decree, and do not even complain, that an eccleſiaſtical ſentence has been deemed of no force, although ſuch a ſentence has never been controverted during the ſpace of one thouſand four hundred and ſeventy-five years.

Lord Barrington. My lords, I do ſolemnly declare to your lordſhips, on that oath that I have taken, and on my honour, that I have not had the leaſt communication made to me of the ducheſs of Kingſton's generoſity. I have not had the leaſt communication with her grace by letter, meſſage, or in any other way, for more than two months; and I had no idea of being ſummoned as a witneſs here, until the Eaſter holy-days, ſo that her grace's generoſity is entirely ſpontaneous, and of her own accord. But, my lords, I have a doubt, which no man can reſolve better than your lordſhips, becauſe your honour is as high as any men; I have a doubt, whether, thinking it improper that I ſhould betray confidential communications before the ducheſs conſented that I ſhould, and gave me my liberty; whether her grace's generoſity ought not to tie me more firmly to my former reſolutions?

Duke of Richmond. For one, I think that it would be improper in the noble lord to betray any private converſations. I ſubmit to your lordſhips, that every matter of fact, not of converſation, which can be requeſted the noble lord is bound to diſcloſe.

Lord Mansfield. I mean only to propoſe to your lordſhips, to avoid adjourning to conſider this queſtion or any thing further upon it at preſent, that the counſel might be allowed to call other witneſſes in the mean time, and that lord Barrington may have an opportunity of conſidering of the matter, if the counſel ſhould think proper to call his lordſhip again.—— This propoſal was over-ruled.

The counſel againſt the ducheſs deſired to withdraw the witneſs.

Lord Camden. My lords, I underſtand from the bar, that rather than your lordſhips ſhould be perplexed with any queſtion which may ariſe upon the noble lord's difficulty in giving his evidence at the bar, the counſel would rather wave the benefit of his evidence in the cauſe. My lords, if that be their reſolution, and they think, that ſafely and without prejudice to this proſecution they may venture to give up that evidence, your lordſhips, to be ſure, will acknowledge the politeneſs of the ſurrender. But, my lords, now I am upon my legs, you will give me leave to make one ſhort remark on this proceeding, and to hope that your lordſhips, ſitting in judgment on criminal caſes, the higheſt and moſt important, that may affect the lives, liberties, and properties of your lordſhips, that you ſhall not think it befitting the dignity of this high court of juſtice to be debating the etiquette of honour, at the ſame time when we are trying lives and liberties. My lords, the laws of the land, I ſpeak it boldly in this grave aſſembly, are to receive another anſwer from thoſe who are called to depoſe at your bar, than to be told that in point of honour and of conſcience they do not think, that they acquit themſelves like perſons of that deſcription, when they declare what they know. There is no power of torture in this kingdom to wreſt evidence from a man's breaſt, who with-holds it; every witneſs may undoubtedly venture on the puniſhment, that will enſue on his refuſing to give teſtimony. As to caſuiſtical points, how far he ſhould conceal or ſuppreſs that which the juſtice of his country calls upon him to reveal, that I muſt leave to the witneſs's own conſcience.

Lord Lyttelton. The laws of the land have ſpoken clearly on this occaſion, and if your lordſhips had applied them to the noble lord at the bar, he has told your lordſhips that he is willing to ſubmit to your judgment. But, my lords, it is yet a queſtion, whether or not the noble lord will be perjured? It is a queſtion not decided by your lordſhips, that he will be perjured, if he refuſes to betray a confidence. I am ſure that I feel, and I apprehend your lordſhips as men of honour feel, the full weight of the noble lord's objection. He will ſpeak to matters of fact, but he does not deſire to ſpeak merely to converſation. And, my lords, I am not ſurpriſed that he ſhould make that objection: for if you conſider how looſe and inaccurate all evidence of converſation muſt be, it takes off in a court of juſtice much from its availment. The noble lord has told you, that confidential converſation may have paſſed between him and the noble lady at the bar: he has ſtated to you his doubts, and I apprehend he is not obliged to go on with his evidence, until your lordſhips have unanimouſly pronounced, that it is your opinion that he is obliged ſo to do.

Lord High Steward. If the counſel for the proſecution ſay, that they have no queſtions to aſk the noble lord, he may withdraw.

Lord Barrington. My lords, might I be allowed to ſay a word or two, before I withdraw from this bar! It is impoſſible that any perſon can revere this high court, indeed any court of juſtice in this country, more than I do. It is not, my lords, from contumacy, of which I am incapable; it is not with any view or purpoſe that any of your lordſhips would diſapprove, as individuals, I am certain, that I have taken the part which I have done. I do not ſay, that there are no caſes, in which a perſon ought not to reveal private converſation. There are caſes, in my opinion, in which he ſhould: there are caſes, in my opinion, in which he ſhould not: and, my lords, no perſon can draw the line but himſelf. But, my lords, I have recollected (I am obliged to the counſel for the proſecution, who are willing to admit me to withdraw. I return them my thanks. I dare ſay in that they have conſulted my feelings as much as they could, conſiſtent with the duties of their ſtation) but I have recollected, my lords, ſince the generous manner in which the ducheſs of Kingſton has been pleaſed to abſolve me from all ties, I have recollected, that ſhe ſaid, ſhe wiſhed and deſired that I might ſay any thing. If her grace thinks that any thing I can ſay, conſiſtent with truth, can tend to her juſtification, I am then ready to be examined to private communications.

Mr. Solicitor General. I do not deſire to examine the noble lord. I ſtated to your lordſhips, that I do not think the cauſe, in which my duty engages me, will at all ſuffer by having deference to any difficulty that the noble lord may entertain. I will not examine the noble lord on the conceſſion of the lady at the bar. The noble lord ſtands at your lordſhips bar a witneſs. Having taken the oath, though I do not examine him, the priſoner may.

Mr. Wallace. At the ſame time that I expreſs my aſtoniſhment at the offer, lord Barrington is not called to the bar as a witneſs for the priſoner. The noble lady at the bar has her witneſſes, in her turn, to call, with which ſhe ſhall trouble your lordſhips.

Duke of Richmond. I do not look on a witneſs at the bar to be the witneſs of the counſel or of the priſoner, but the witneſs of the houſe. I ſhall, therefore, aſk a queſtion or two of the noble lord. I will not diſtreſs the noble lord's feelings by inquiring into confidential matters. I will merely aſk queſtions of fact. The firſt queſtion I would aſk the noble lord is, whether he knows any fact by which he is convinced that Mr. Hervey was married to Miſs Chudleigh?

Lord Barrington. I do not know of any fact, which will prove the marriage between the ducheſs of Kingſton and Mr. Hervey, of my own knowledge.

Duke of Richmond. The noble lord muſt leave it to the houſe to judge whether it will or not. But does his lordſhip know any fact relative to that matter?

Lord Barrington. I do not know any thing of my own knowledge that can tend to prove that marriage. I know nothing but what I have heard in the world, and from converſation.

Lord Radnor. I am afraid your lordſhips, by your acquieſcence, have admitted a rule of proceeding here, which would not be admitted in any inferior court in the kingdom. I deſire, therefore, to aſk the noble lord, whether he knows any matter of fact relative to that marriage.

Lord Barrington. My lords, if I do, I cannot reveal it; nor can I anſwer the queſtion without betraying private converſation.

Moved to adjourn. Adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

After an adjournment of ſome time, the lords returned to Weſtminſter Hall.

Lord High Steward. My lord viſcount Barrington, I am commanded by the lords to acquaint your lordſhip, that it is the judgment of this houſe, that you are bound by law to anſwer all ſuch queſtions as ſhall be put to you.—Has the counſel for the proſecution any queſtion to put to the witneſs at the bar?

Mr. Solicitor-General. We ſhall not aſk the noble lord any queſtions.

Lord High Steward. Has the counſel for the priſoner any queſtion to put to the witneſs at the bar?

Mr. Wallace. Not any.

Lord Radnor. Does the witneſs know from converſation with the lady at the bar, that ſhe was married to the earl of Briſtol?

Lord Barrington. My lords, I have already told your lordſhips the motives which induce me to think that I cannot, conſiſtent with conſcience, with honour, or with probity, anſwer ſuch queſtions, as will tend to diſcloſe confidential communications made to me. At the ſame time I informed your lordſhips, that if the oath went ſo far as that I ſhould break that oath, if I did not anſwer all queſtions which could be put to me; if that was the determination of your lordſhips, I ſaid I would not break my oath. My lords, I continue in the ſame opinion and principle. My own judgment, as far as it guides me, which is very imperfectly, does tell me, that I am not obliged to anſwer all queſtions that can be put to me. But, my lords, though nobody can draw the line of conſcience, of honour, and of probity in this caſe but myſelf, yet in point of law, and in interpretation of law, and the oath I have taken, I am deſirous of aſſiſtance from thoſe who can beſt give it me, and I had much rather truſt almoſt any man's judgment than my own. I do not dare to aſk again your lordſhips opinion on that point. But, my lords, might I be permitted to apply to the learned counſel who are near me; if it is the opinion of the learned counſel, that I am obliged by my oath to anſwer the noble lord's queſtion, I will readily anſwer it.

Lord Effingham. I apprehend, that no queſtion can be put in this court on a matter of law to the counſel at the bar.

Several lords ſaid, 'You may aſk the counſel.'

Lord Barrington. My lords, I have put the queſtion to the Attorney-General, and I give him my thanks. He ſays, he thinks I am obliged by my oath to anſwer all queſtions. That being the caſe, I have nothing more to ſay, than humbly to beg your lordſhips pardon for having given you ſo much trouble, and to beg and entreat that you will believe, that nothing but the tendereſt and the ſtrongeſt feelings, and the moſt determined reſolution to do what was right in my ſituation, could have induced me to give you ſo much trouble.

Lord Radnor. Whether his lordſhip knows from converſation with the lady at the bar, that ſhe was married to the earl of Briſtol?

Lord Barrington. My memory I have found by long experience to be a very erroneous one, and eſpecially with relation to things paſt long ago. To the beſt of my memory and belief, the ducheſs has never honoured me with any converſation on the ſubject for many, many years paſt; I believe I might ſay for above twenty years paſt. And, my lords, that being the caſe, I muſt anſwer that queſtion very doubtfully: but after the ſolution which the learned counſel has given to my doubts, I mean not to conceal any thing from your lordſhips. Thinking it right to be examined, I think it right to give frank anſwers, and any doubt in any thing I ſay will ariſe from my not remembering well the circumſtances. The ducheſs of Kingſton many (I ſhould not ſay too much if I was to ſay thirty) years ago did entruſt me with a circumſtance in her life, relative to an engagement of a matrimonial kind with the earl of Briſtol, then Mr. Hervey.

Lord Radnor. Whether his lordſhip underſtood, that that matrimonial engagement, which had already paſſed, was a marriage?

Lord Barrington. I underſtood, there had been a matrimonial engagement entered into; but whether it amounted to a legal marriage or not, I am not lawyer or civilian enough to judge.

Lord Radnor. Did his lordſhip ever underſtand, that there was iſſue of that marriage?

Lord Barrington. Upon my word I cannot ſay; I do not know that the ducheſs ever made any communication of that ſort to me. I had heard of it in the world, but I do not know that the ducheſs ever communicated to me the circumſtance of her having had any iſſue.

Lord Radnor. Does his lordſhip know any thing of a bond entered into on the part of the priſoner at the bar, of late years, relative to the ſuppreſſion of evidence, or the payment of coſts of ſuit in the Eccleſiaſtical Court?

Lord Barrington. I never had the leaſt communication from the ducheſs of Kingſton, or from any perſon relative to any thing of the kind; I do not recollect that I ever heard of any ſuch thing even in the world; and the ducheſs of Kingſton has never communicated to me, in the courſe of her life, to the beſt of my memory or belief, any thing which was, at the time ſhe was pleaſed to communicate it to me, in the leaſt a deviation from the ſtricteſt rules of virtue and religion.

Ordered to withdraw.

My Lords, is it too much to beg, that what I have ſaid at the bar may be read over to me? Part of it is of a nice nature; I may have expreſſed myſelf improperly; the writer may have taken it down erroneouſly: I ſhould be glad to have it read over to me, that I may correct it in your lordſhips preſence.

Here the univerſal voice was 'Read, Read!' but lord Barrington ſpared the houſe the trouble, by addreſſing himſelf to their lordſhips as follows:

My lords, I find by the clerk, that the part which is of the niceſt kind with relation to me, wherein I expreſſed the difficulties and feelings I had on the ſubject of queſtions that I thought I ought not to anſwer, and why and on what ground I have ſince thought it my duty, underſtanding that my oath obliges me to it, to give my anſwers; I find, my lords, that part has not been taken down by the clerk, and therefore I ſhall give your lordſhips no further trouble.

Mr. Dunning. My lords, we deſire next to produce

Mrs. JUDITH PHILLIPS, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. You was the widow of Mr. Amis, was you not?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. Mr. Amis was parſon of the pariſh of Lainſton in Hampſhire?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. Did you know a family of the name of Merrill?

Mrs. Phillips. I did.

Mr. Dunning. Was, or was not, Mr. Merrill's houſe in that pariſh?

Mrs. Phillips. It was.

Mr. Dunning. How long ſince did your huſband die?

Mrs. Phillips. Seventeen years ago.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know the lady at the bar?

Mrs. Phillips. Very well.

Mr. Dunning. How long have you known the lady at the bar?

Mrs. Phillips. About thirty years.

Mr. Dunning. Was you privy to her marriage in your huſband's life-time?

Mrs. Phillips. I was not at the wedding; but I heard my huſband ſay, he married them.

A Lord. That is not evidence.

Mr. Dunning. Had you not any other means of knowing that fact from the lady at the bar herſelf?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. Do you remember the lady at the bar coming to Wincheſter?

Mrs. Phillips. Very well.

Mr. Dunning. When?

Mrs. Phillips. She came about the middle of February, 1759.

Mr. Dunning. Was that in your huſband's life-time, or ſince his death?

Mrs. Phillips. In my huſband's life-time.

Mr. Dunning. Was it long before, and how long before Mr. Amis's death?

Mrs. Phillips. Six weeks.

Mr. Dunning. What was the occaſion of the lady's viſit to Wincheſter?

Mrs. Phillips. For a regiſter of her marriage.

Mr. Dunning. If you recollect any particulars of what paſſed upon that occaſion, ſtate them.

Mrs. Phillips. She came to the Blue Boar in Kingſgate-ſtreet, Wincheſter, and ſent for me by ſix o'clock in the morning. When I went to her, ſhe aſked me if I thought Mr. Amis would give her a regiſter of her marriage? I told her, I thought he would. Then I aſked her to my houſe; and when ſhe came, ſhe aſked me to go up with her to Mr. Amis, and aſk if he would ſee her and give her a regiſter of her marriage? I went up to Mr. Amis, and told Mr. Amis what the lady had deſired. Mr. Amis deſired to ſee the lady. Then I came down and told her, that Mr. Amis at that time was confined to his bed. The lady went to Mr. Amis, and told Mr. Amis her requeſt. Then Mr. Merrill and the lady conſulted together whom to ſend for, and they deſired me to ſend for Mr. Spearing, the attorney. I did ſend for him; and during the time the meſſenger was gone, the lady concealed herſelf in a cloſet: ſhe ſaid, ſhe did not care that Mr. Spearing ſhould know that ſhe was there. When Mr. Spearing came, Mr. Merrill produced a ſheet of ſtamped paper, that he brought to make the regiſter upon. Mr. Spearing ſaid, it would not do, it muſt be a book, and that the lady muſt be at the making of it. Then I went to the cloſet, and told the lady. Then the lady came to Mr. Spearing, and Mr. Spearing told the lady a ſheet of ſtamped paper would not do, it muſt be a book. Then the lady deſired Mr. Spearing to go and buy one. Mr. Spearing went and bought one, and, when brought, the regiſter was made. Then Mr. Amis delivered it to the lady. The lady thanked him, and ſaid it might be an hundred thouſand pounds in her way: at the ſame time ſhe added, that ſhe had had a child by Mr. Hervey, and that it was a boy, but that it was dead; and that ſhe had borrowed an hundred pounds of her aunt Hanmer to buy baby things. Before Mr. Merrill and the lady left my houſe, the lady ſealed up the regiſter, and gave it to me, and deſired I would take care of it until Mr. Amis's death, and then deliver it to Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Dunning. Did it accordingly remain in your hands until your huſband's death, and then deliver it to Mr. Merrill?

Mrs. Phillips. I did.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect, whether Mr. Merrill accompanied the lady from the time you firſt ſaw her in Wincheſter to your huſband's houſe, or did Mr. Merrill join them afterwards when they were there?

Mrs. Phillips. He joined them afterwards.

Mr. Dunning. Do you remember, whether any other entry was then made in this regiſter-book, beſides the entry of this marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't remember any.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect to have ſeen any thing of the lady at the bar ſince your huſband's death?

Mrs. Phillips. Many times.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect any converſation that has paſſed between you at any of thoſe times?

Mrs. Phillips. After I had delivered the regiſter to Mr. Merrill, I waited upon the lady at her houſe at Knightſbridge, and found her in the garden. I told her, I had delivered the regiſter to Mr. Merrill. She thanked me for it; and deſired I would take no notice of it: at the ſame time ſhe ſaid Mr. Swino was in the garden, and hoped I would take no notice to him of the affair.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect any further converſation about this book, after Mr. Merrill's death, with the lady?

Mrs. Phillips. I was once a-fiſhing with the lady, and ſhe told me ſome things that had paſſed in the family. She told me, that Mrs. Bathurſt had uſed her very ill, for ſhe had got all the papers Mr. Merrill had of her's at the time of his death. Upon which I aſked her, what was become of the regiſter? She told me the miniſter of the pariſh had it.

Mr. Dunning. Was, or was not, the Mrs. Bathurſt you have ſpoken of, the daughter of that Mr. Merrill?

Mrs. Phillips. She was.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect any other converſation with the lady at the bar, after her marriage with the duke of Kingſton?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes; I waited upon her in Arlington-ſtreet, after her marriage with the duke of Kingſton. She ſaid to me, Was it not very good-natured of the duke to marry an old maid? I looked her in the face and ſmiled, but ſaid nothing then. She aſked me, if Mr. Hervey had ſent to me at the time of her trial? I ſaid he had not ſent to me.

(The book ſhewn to the witneſs.)

Mr. Dunning. Can you be ſure, whether that is the book you have been ſpeaking of?

Mrs. Phillips. I am very ſure.

Mr. Dunning. I believe there are the veſtiges of the ſeals about it ſtill?

Mrs. Phillips. There are.

Mr. Dunning. Where it was ſealed up?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. Look at the entries in the book; are they not your huſband's writing? and were they not made in your preſence?

Mrs. Phillips. They are my huſband's hand-writing, and they were made in my preſence.

Mr. Dunning. They were made likewiſe in the preſence of the lady at the bar, were they not?

Mrs. Phillips. They were.

Clerk reads.

'Marriages, births, and burials in the pariſh of Lainſton. 2d of Au-
'guſt, Mrs. Suſannah Merrill, relict of John Merrill, eſq; buried.
'4th of Auguſt 1744, Married the honourable Auguſtus Hervey, eſq;
'in the pariſh church of Lainſton, to Miſs Elizabeth Chudleigh, daugh-
'ter of colonel Thomas Chudleigh, late of Chelſea College, deceaſed.
'By me Thomas Amis.'

Mr. Dunning. My lords, I have done with this witneſs.

Lord High Steward. Would the counſel for the priſoner aſk this witneſs any queſtions?

Mr. Manſfield. I ſhould be glad firſt to ſee the book.——I would wiſh to know by what means you now ſubſiſt? what ſupport you have?

Mrs. Phillips. Upon my own private fortune.

Mr. Manſfield. Where do you live?

Mrs. Phillips. At Briſtol.

Mr. Manſfield. Is your huſband living or dead?

Mrs. Phillips. Alive.

Mr. Manſfield. What employment was he in, before he lived at Briſtol upon his fortune?

Mrs. Phillips. He was ſteward to the duke of Kingſton, and a graſier.

Mr. Manſfield. Was he not turned out of the ſervice of the duke of Kingſton?

Mrs. Phillips. I believe he was not turned out.

Mr. Manſfield. Do not you know, whether he was or not?

Mrs. Phillips. He wrote a letter to the duke, and deſired to leave him.

Mr. Manſfield. Do you know then, that he was not turned out?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Manſfield. Had he been threatened to be turned out, before he ſent that letter?

Mrs. Phillips. Not that ever I heard of.

Mr. Manſfield. Had your huſband had any differences or diſputes with the duke of Kingſton?

Mrs. Phillips. No, not that I know.

Mr. Manſfield. Was his reaſon then for quitting the ſervice of the duke of Kingſton merely his own inclination, without any particular reaſon or cauſe?

Mrs. Phillips. He thought the duke looked cool upon him: for what reaſon he could not tell.

Mr. Manſfield. Had the duke ever expreſſed any cauſe of diſlike to him?

Mrs. Phillips. Not that I know of.

Mr. Manſfield. How long have you left Briſtol?

Mrs. Phillips. About four months.

Mr. Manſfield. Where have you lived?

Mrs. Phillips. Sometimes in one place, ſometimes in another.

Mr. Manſfield. In what places?

Mrs. Phillips. Sometimes at the Turf coffee-houſe, ſometimes in St. Mary Axe.

Mr. Manſfield. How much of the time at the Turf coffee-houſe?

Mrs. Phillips. I really cannot ſay exactly.

Mr. Manſfield. You are not aſked as to a week. Have you lived there the greater part?

Mrs. Phillips. The greater part.

Mr. Manſfield. Who has ſupported you at the Turf coffee-houſe?

Mrs. Phillips. Ourſelves.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you paid the expences of your ſupport there?

Mrs. Phillips. That I do not know any thing of.

Mr. Manſfield. Do you not know, that the whole of your expence at the Turf coffee-houſe is to be defrayed by the proſecutor, Mr. Evelyn Meadows?

Mrs. Phillips. I do not know it is.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you not underſtood ſo?

Mrs. Phillips. I have not.

Mr. Manſfield. Nor do you believe it?

Mrs. Phillips. I cannot tell what to believe, or what is to be done.

Mr. Manſfield. Cannot you tell, whether you believe that your expences at the Turf coffee-houſe are to be defrayed by Mr. Meadows?

Mrs. Phillips. No, I do not. I do not know any thing of that.

Mr. Manſfield. Do you not know, by whom you expect the expence of your ſupport at the Turf coffee-houſe is to be paid?

Mrs. Phillips. I do not know by whom it is to be paid.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you ſeen Mr. Evelyn Meadows at the Turf coffee-houſe?

Mrs. Phillips. I have.

Mr. Manſfield. How often may you have ſeen that gentleman there?

Mrs. Phillips. I cannot tell.

Mr. Manſfield. Many times, or only once or twice?

Mrs. Phillips. I may have ſeen him twice or three times.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you not ſeen him oftener than that, there?

Mrs. Phillips. I have ſeen him frequently in the yard.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you not had frequent converſations with him?

Mrs. Phillips. Not frequent.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you not converſed with him ſometimes at the Turf coffee-houſe, ſometimes at other places?

Mrs. Phillips. No where, but at the Turf coffee-houſe?

Mr. Manſfield. Who has been preſent at ſuch converſations?

Mrs. Phillips. My huſband.

Mr. Manſfield. Who elſe?

Mrs. Phillips. No one elſe.

Mr. Manſfield. Has not Mr. Fozard been preſent at ſome of theſe converſations?

Mrs. Phillips. Never.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you not been at Mr. Fozard's houſe with Mr. Meadows?

Mrs. Phillips. Never; by accident on Chriſtmas-day I called at his door, and he was there.

Mr. Manſfield. Was you in company with Mr. Meadows at Mr. Fozard's?

Mrs. Phillips. I was.

Mr. Manſfield. Does Mr. Fozard aſſiſt Mr. Meadows in the courſe of this proſecution?

Mrs. Phillips. I know nothing of that.

Mr. Manſfield. Do not you know, that Mr. Fozard has aſſiſted Mr. Meadows in looking out for witneſſes?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't know any thing about it.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you not yourſelf been preſent at converſations with Mr. Fozard about this proſecution?

Mrs. Phillips. Nothing, but what was merely accidental.

Mr. Manſfield. How often has that accident happened, that you have been preſent at converſations with Mr. Fozard about this proſecution?

Mrs. Phillips. I never was at Mr. Fozard's but twice.

Mr. Manſfield. Has Mr. Fozard been at the Turf coffee-houſe with you?

Mrs. Phillips. He came to ſee Mr. Phillips, when he had the gout.

Mr. Manſfield. How often might Mr. Fozard viſit you at the Turf coffee-houſe?

Mrs. Phillips. He came to ſee Mr. Phillips, but not me.

Mr. Manſfield. How often might he viſit Mr. Phillips there?

Mrs. Phillips. About three times.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you ever met Mr. Fozard at any other places beſides the Turf coffee-houſe and his own houſe?

Mrs. Phillips. Never.

Mr. Manſfield. Do you know of any promiſe made to you or your huſband of any benefit or advantage depending upon the event of this proſecution?

Mrs. Phillips. None in the world.

Mr. Manſfield. Did you never hear of any ſuch promiſe being made to you or your huſband?

Mrs. Phillips. Never.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you never ſaid, that any ſuch promiſe or offer was made?

Mrs. Phillips. Never, nor it never was.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you never ſaid any thing to that purpoſe?

Mrs. Phillips. No, never to any body.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you never made any mention of any kind of benefit or advantage you was to receive from the evidence you ſhould give on this proſecution?

Mrs. Phillips. Not in the leaſt; I don't want it, nor wiſh it.

Mr. Manſfield. Did I underſtand you right, when you ſaid, that at the time of the entry of the marriage in this regiſter no other entry was made?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't remember that; I remember very well ſtanding at the bed's feet when the regiſter was made.

Mr. Manſfield. Do not you know whether any other entry was made at that time?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't, for I was backwards and forwards in the room.

Mr. Manſfield. How come you then to know, that the regiſter of this marriage was made in the book at that time?

Mrs. Phillips. I ſaw it.

Mr. Manſfield. Did you read it at that time?

Mrs. Phillips. I heard Mr. Amis read it.

Mr. Manſfield. Did you hear him read any thing elſe beſides the entry of the marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. Nothing but that, for I was going backwards and forwards in the room.

Mr. Manſfield. Do you know nothing at all, whether any thing elſe was entered beſides that at the time of the marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. I did not ſee any thing but that; though it might, as I was going backwards and forwards.

Mr. Manſfield. Did you ſee the entry of the marriage in the book?

Mrs. Phillips. I did.

Mr. Manſfield. If you ſaw that, muſt not you have ſeen whether there were any other entries made on the ſame leaf?

Mrs. Phillips. I heard it read; I never ſaw it afterwards but when the lady ſealed it up.

Mr. Manſfield. Did not you take notice that there were other entries?

Mrs. Phillips. I did not.

Mr. Manſfield. You took notice of nothing upon the paper but the entry of this marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. Of nothing elſe.

Mr. Manſfield. Did you keep the paper long enough before you, or did the lady at the bar keep the book long enough before her, for her to ſee whether what ſhe heard read was written on the paper?

Mrs. Phillips. She held it in this manner (deſcribing the manner) open, and I ſaw it as I ſtood by her: I did not read it, but heard it read.

Mr. Manſfield. Did all the perſons, who were preſent, hear what was ſaid about the hundred pounds lent by Mrs. Hanmer?

Mrs. Phillips. No, they did not; the lady ſaid ſhe had borrowed an hundred pounds of her aunt Mrs. Hanmer to buy baby things.

Mr. Manſfield. Who did the lady tell that to?

Mrs. Phillips. To Mr. Amis and to me.

Mr. Manſfield. Did ſhe ſpeak it loudly or ſoftly, or how?

Mrs. Phillips. She ſpoke it as ſhe was ſitting by the bed-ſide talking to Mr. Amis.

Mr. Manſfield. When did you tell any body of ſuch regiſter?

Mrs. Phillips. I really cannot ſay exactly when, but I have ſaid, I had it in my poſſeſſion.

Mr. Manſfield. When did you firſt mention it?

Mrs. Phillips. I cannot tell.

Mr. Manſfield. Was Mr. Merrill preſent at the time when this entry was made in the regiſter?

Mrs. Phillips. He was.

Mr. Manſfield. Was he in the room the whole time that this converſation paſſed, that you have mentioned, of lending an hundred pounds by Mrs. Hanmer?

Mrs. Phillips. No, he was not.

Mr. Manſfield. Did Mr. Merrill come with the lady, or the lady before him, or without him?

Mrs. Phillips. The lady before him, for Mr. Merrill was gone to Lainſton to his ſeat.

Mr. Manſfield. When Mr. Merrill came, did not the lady repeat the converſation that had been about the child and the hundred pounds?

Mrs. Phillips. There was nothing of that ſaid before Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Manſfield. Was any thing ſaid about making any other entry in the regiſter, beſides that of the marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. Nothing that I heard.

Mr. Manſfield. When did Mr. Merrill come into the room; before the entry was made in the book, or after?

Mrs. Phillips. Before.

Mr. Manſfield. Was Mr. Merrill in the room at the time that it was made?

Mrs. Phillips. He was.

Mr. Manſfield. Who was it brought the ſtamp paper?

Mrs. Phillips. Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Manſfield. Was Mr. Merrill in the room when the lady concealed herſelf, as you have ſaid?

Mrs. Phillips. He was.

Mr. Manſfield. Who elſe was in the room?

Mrs. Phillips. No one except myſelf.

Mr. Manſfield. Now look at the book.

Mrs. Phillips. I know the hand perfectly well.

Mr. Manſfield. Is the whole of that, which is written on that leaf, the writing of your huſband?

Mrs. Phillips. It is.

Mr. Manſfield. You have ſaid that you went to Arlington-ſtreet; can you name any perſon that you ſaw there?

Mrs. Phillips. No one was in the room, when I went, except the lady.

Mr. Manſfield. Can you name any perſon that ſaw you there?

Mrs. Phillips. Only a ſervant for ſome time, and then a milliner came.

Mr. Manſfield. Can you name thoſe perſons?

Mrs. Phillips. I can't; I don't know them.

Mr. Manſfield. Can you name neither of them?

Mrs. Phillips. The ſervant was Fozard.

Mr. Manſfield. Can you name no other ſervants that you ſaw there?

Mrs. Phillips. No; I had an inflammation in my eye, and the lady was exceedingly kind to me: ſhe ordered an egg to be boiled for me, and Fozard brought it, in order that it might be opened and laid on my eye.

Mr. Manſfield. Can you name any other ſervants whom you ſaw there?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't remember.

Lord Camden. My lords, I obſerve in the entry of the regiſter the words 'was married' are ſtruck through with a black line; I want to know of the witneſs whether ſhe can account for that ſtroke?

Mrs. Phillips. I cannot.

Mr. Dunning. It is a repetition. There is marriage written in the margin. 'Auguſt the 24th, married.' The entry then proceeds, 'The honourable Auguſtus Hervey, Eſq. was married;' which being a repetition, I ſuppoſe they ſtruck that through with a black line.

Lord Camden. I believe it is ſo.

Mr. Dunning. If your lordſhips pleaſe, the next witneſs to be called is

The Reverend Mr. STEPHEN KENCHEN, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. You ſucceeded Mr. Amis in this church at Lainſton, I believe?

Mr. Kenchen. I did.

Mr. Dunning. When did you firſt ſee that book that he has in his hand, and how did it come there?

Mr. Kenchen. The firſt time that I ſaw the book was after the death of Mrs. Hanmer, aunt to Mr. Merrill, who was buried in the vault of that little church.

Mr. Dunning. By whom was that book produced to you, and for what purpoſe?

Mr. Kenchen. In order to regiſter Mrs. Hanmer's burial.

Mr. Dunning. By whom?

Mr. Kenchen. By Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Dunning. Did you accordingly make an entry of the burial of Mrs. Hanmer?

Mr. Kenchen. I made an entry of the burial of Mrs. Hanmer.

Mr. Dunning. What then became of the book?

Mr. Kenchen. Mr. Merrill carried it back again to his own houſe.

Mr. Dunning. When did you next ſee the book?

Mr. Kenchen. At the death of Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Dunning. By whom was the book then produced to you?

Mr. Kenchen. I cannot ſay; either by Mr. or Mrs. Bathurſt, or in the preſence of them both.

Mr. Dunning. Did you then make an entry of the burial of Mr. Merrill?

Mr. Kenchen. I did.

Mr. Dunning. What then became of the book?

Mr. Kenchen. I have had it in my poſſeſſion ever ſince.

Mr. Dunning. My lords, I ſhall aſk no more queſtions of this witneſs.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, would you aſk this witneſs any queſtions?

Mr. Wallace. I have no queſtions to put to this witneſs.

Mr. Dunning. If your lordſhips pleaſe, we will now call

The Reverend Mr. JOHN DENNIS, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Look at that book. Was you acquainted with the hand-writing of the late Mr Amis? You knew Mr. Amis, I preſume?

Mr. Dennis. I knew him perfectly well.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know his hand-writing when you ſee it?

Mr. Dennis. I have ſeen his hand-writing often, as ſucceeding him in the living.

Mr. Dunning. Did you ever ſee him write?

Mr. Dennis. I have ſeen him write, but not often.

Mr. Dunning. Look at that hand-writing; tell me whether you believe the two entries in the firſt page of that book are his hand-writing?

Mr. Dennis. Yes, particularly his name, Thomas Amis, ſeems very much ſo.

Mr. Dunning. Do you believe it to be his hand-writing?

Mr. Dennis. I believe the whole to be his hand-writing.

Ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Dunning. I do not know whether, on the part of the priſoner, they mean to put us on the proving, which it is neceſſary for us to do if they require it, the marriage with the duke of Kingſton.

Mr. Wallace. We are ready to admit that fact. There is no doubt of her being married by the licence of the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Mr. Dunning. You will give us the date.

Mr. Wallace. Mention what the day is.

Mr. Dunning. The 8th of March 1769, I underſtand.

Mr. Dunning. My lords, we are now going to prove a caveat entered by the lady, upon the apprehenſion of a ſuit intended to be inſtituted by Mr. Hervey in the Spiritual Court.

Mr. JAMES, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know any thing of the caveat entered at Doctors Commons on the part of the lady at the bar?

Mr. James. Yes, the caveat is entered in this book (producing it).

Mr. Dunning. Is that the proper book, in which ſuch entries ought to be made?

Mr. James. It is.

The caveat was read by the clerk, and is as follows: 'The 18th of 'Auguſt 1768. Let no citation, intimation, or other proceſs, or 'any letters of requeſt for the ſame, to any other judge or juriſ'diction whatſoever, iſſue under the ſeal of this court at the ſuit 'or inſtance of the honourable Auguſtus John Hervey, or his 'brother, againſt the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, of 'any cauſe or ſuit matrimonial, without due notice being given to 'Mr. Nathaniel Biſhop, proctor for the ſaid honourable Elizabeth 'Chudleigh, who, on his being warned thereto before the judge 'of this court, or his lawful ſurrogate, will be ready by himſelf 'or counſel to ſhew juſt cauſe of this ſame caveat, and why no 'ſuch proceſs or letters of requeſt ſhould iſſue thereupon.'

Mr. Wallace. The witneſs merely produces the book; he knows nothing of the fact of the entry being made.

Mr. James. I know Mr. Biſhop's clerk's hand; this is his hand-writing.

Mr. Dunning. Perhaps the witneſs may know, that Mr. Biſhop was the proctor employed by the lady in the courſe of that ſuit?

Mr. James. I have heard ſo.

Mr. Attorney General. That appears on the record they have put in.

Mr. Dunning. I underſtand, that it is the pleaſure of ſome of your lordſhips, that we ſhould go into the proof of the marriage of the duke of Kingſton?

Mr. Wallace It is admitted on the part of the priſoner.

Mr. Dunning. But as ſome of the lords wiſh for the proof, we will examine it.

The Reverend Mr. JAMES TREBECK, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Be ſo good as find the regiſter of the marriage of the duke of Kingſton.

Points it out; clerk reads. 'Nº 92. Marriages in March 1769. 'Nº 92. The moſt noble Evelyn Pierrepont, duke of Kingſton, a 'batchelor, and the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh of Knightſbridge, in St. Margaret's Weſtminſter, a ſpinſter, were married 'by ſpecial licence of the archbiſhop of Canterbury this 8th of 'March 1769, by me Samuel Harpur, of the Britiſh Muſeum. This 'marriage was ſolemnized between us,

'KINGSTON,
'ELIZABETH CHUDLEIGH,'
In the preſence of
'MASHAM,
'WILLIAM YEO,
'A. K. F. GILBERT,
'JAMES LAROCHE jun.
'ALICE YEO,
J. ROSS MACKYE,
E. R. A. LAROCHE,
ARTHUR COLLIER,
C. MASHAM.'

Mr. Dunning. I am deſired to apprize your lordſhips of a fact, which may or may not be proved, if thought neceſſary. Your lordſhips have heard in the evidence of the laſt woman an account of a certain Mr. Spearing, who was preſent. That Mr. Spearing could not be found. He, though mayor of Wincheſter, is now found to be amuſing himſelf ſome where or other beyond ſea, God knows where. We have witneſſes to give your lordſhips that account, if your lordſhips think it neceſſary.—— Will your lordſhips now pleaſe to hear the reverend Mr. Harpur?

The Reverend Mr. HARPUR, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Did you perform the marriage ceremony between theſe parties?

Mr. Harpur. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. At the time mentioned in the regiſter?

Mr. Harpur. Yes.

Lord High Steward. Have you any more witneſſes to produce?

Mr. Dunning. We don't judge it neceſſary to offer to your lordſhips any more evidence in this ſtage of the buſineſs. If it ſhould become ſo, we reſerve to ourſelves the right of examining them hereafter.

Mr. Wallace. I beg Mrs. Phillips may be called to the bar, that a letter may be produced to her, and that ſhe may ſay whether it is her hand-writing.

Mrs. PHILLIPS called.

Mr. Wallace. Is that your hand-writing?

Mrs. Phillips. The name is my hand-writing.

Mr. Wallace. Is that your letter?

Mrs. Phillips. It is my letter.

A letter from JUDITH PHILLIPS to her grace the ducheſs of Kingſton read.

'MY LADY DUCHESS,

'I write your grace this letter.—My heart has ever been firmly attached 'to your grace's intereſt and pleaſure, and my utmoſt wiſh to deſerve 'your favour and countenance. Suffer me not then in my declining 'years to think I have forfeited that favour and protection, without in'tentionally giving the moſt diſtant cauſe.

'May I intreat your grace to accept this as a ſincere and humble ſubmiſſion for any failure of reſpect and duty to your grace; and permit 'me moſt humbly to intreat your grace's kind interceſſion with my lord 'duke to continue Mr. Phillips his ſteward, whoſe happineſs conſiſts only 'in acting and diſcharging his duty to his grace's pleaſure. This addi'tional mark of your grace's goodneſs we hope to be happy in; and in 'return, the remainder of our lives ſhall be paſſed in gratitude and duty. 'The perſon who carries this will wait to receive your grace's pleaſure 'and commands to her, who remains, with the greateſt reſpect,

'My lady ducheſs,
'Your grace's moſt dutiful ſervant,
'J. PHILLIPS.'

'November 7, 1771.

Mr. Attorney General. The evidence, your lordſhips will recollect, given by the witneſs was in anſwer to a queſtion, whether her huſband had or had not been turned out of his place? pointing the queſtion ſo as to give your lordſhips, and to give the witneſs to underſtand, that they meant the circumſtance of being turned out of his place ſhould go perſonally to the diſcredit of her huſband, and alſo imply ſome memory of that in the mind of the wife. The witneſs, in anſwer to that, told your lordſhips, with reſpect to ſuch part of it as might be deemed to relate to her huſband's credit in the buſineſs, that he had reſigned his place under the duke. The letters which I have in my hand, and will juſt ſtate to your lordſhips, if it be thought neceſſary before the calling of the witneſs, is that very correſpondence, by which it appears that he did ſo reſign his employment under his grace into his grace's hands. He wrote to his grace at Newmarket from Holm Pierrepont. The letter is dated the '17th of October 1771.' And he writes thus:

'I Have ever done my duty with the ſtricteſt regard to your grace's in'tereſt, and with the moſt perfect reſpect. I have declined accepting a 'good ſettlement, to act conformable to your grace's pleaſure, which 'her grace was pleaſed to promiſe ſhould be made up to me, which muſt 'have eſcaped her grace's memory, as I have ſince had my rent conſi'derably raiſed, and am much concerned to obſerve lately your grace's 'diſpleaſure; and being conſcious of a faithful diſcharge of my duty, I 'muſt be unjuſtly repreſented to your grace. I hope your grace will be 'pleaſed to permit my delivering up the charge of your grace's affairs, 'which, as an honeſt man, I can only properly keep, while ſatisfied my'ſelf, and honoured with your grace's approbation, &c.'

In anſwer to which he received this letter:

'Mr. Phillips,

'Your letter came to me at Newmarket. After what has paſſed, there 'is no occaſion for many words. Sherin will be at Holm Pierrepont ſome 'time next week, with my orders about ſettling your buſineſs, which I 'flatter myſelf you will readily comply with.

'I am yours, &c. &c.'

I believe I may refer to your lordſhips memory, that Mrs. Phillips mentioned his grace's having looked cooly on her huſband, which occaſioned his reſignation.

A Peer. What is that, Mr. Attorney General, that you have been reading?

Mr. Attorney General. The firſt is a copy of a letter to the duke; the other, the duke's original anſwer. If it is thought material enough to trouble your lordſhips with it, we can eaſily prove that this is his grace's hand-writing, and this the copy of his grace's letter, which was all that was neceſſary.

Adjourned to Monday.

Monday, April 22. The fifth and laſt day.

THE lords and others came from the chamber of parliament in the cuſtomary order. Proclamation for ſilence being made as uſual, the ducheſs of Kingſton was conducted to the bar, when her grace addreſſed the lords in the following terms:

My lords,

This my reſpectful addreſs will, I flatter myſelf, be favourably accepted by your lordſhips: my words will flow freely from my heart, adorned ſimply with innocence and truth. My lords, I have ſuffered unheard-of perſecutions; my honour and fame have been ſeverely attacked; I have been loaded with reproaches; and ſuch indignities and hardſhips have rendered me the leſs able to make my defence before this auguſt aſſembly againſt a proſecution of ſo extraordinary a nature, and ſo undeſerved.

My lords, with tenderneſs conſider how difficult is the taſk of myſelf to ſpeak, nor ſay too little nor too much. Degraded as I am by adverſaries; my family deſpiſed; the honourable titles on which I ſet an ineſtimable value, as received from my moſt noble and late dear huſband, attempted to be torn from me; your lordſhips will judge how greatly I ſtand in need of your protection and indulgence.

My lords, were I here to plead for life, for fortune, no words from me ſhould beat the air: the loſs I ſuſtain in my moſt kind companion and affectionate huſband, makes the former more than indifferent to me; and, when it ſhall pleaſe Almighty God to call me, I ſhall willingly lay that burthen down. I plead before your lordſhips for my fame and honour.

My lords, logic is properly defined, and well repreſented in this high court. It is a talent of the human mind, and not of the body, and holds a key which ſignifies, that logic is not a ſcience itſelf, but the key to ſcience. That key is your lordſhips judicial capacity and wiſdom. On the left hand is repreſented a hammer, and before it a piece of falſe, and another of pure gold. The hammer is your penetrating judgment, which, by the mercy of God, will ſtrike hard at falſe witneſſes who have given evidence againſt me, and prove my intention in this pending cauſe as pure as the fineſt gold, and as juſtly diſtinguiſhed from the ſophiſtry of falſhood.

My lords, your unhappy priſoner is born of an ancient, not ignoble family; the women diſtinguiſhed for their virtue, the men for their valour; deſcended in an honourable and uninterrupted line for three centuries and a half. Sir John Chudleigh, the laſt of my family, loſt his life at the ſiege of Oſtend, at eighteen years of age, glorioufly preferring to die with his colours in his boſom, rather than accept of quarter from a gallant French officer, who, in compaſſion to his youth, three times offered him his life for that enſign, which was ſhot through his heart. A happy death! that ſaves the bluſh he would now feel for the unheard-of injuries and diſhonour thrown on his unfortunate kinſwoman, who is now at the bar of this right honourable houſe.

His grace the late duke of Kingſton's fortune, of which I now ſtand poſſeſſed, is valuable to me, as it is a teſtimony to all the world how high I was in his eſteem. As it is my pride to have been the object of affection of that virtuous man, ſo ſhall it be my honour to beſtow that fortune to the honour of him who gave it to me; well knowing, that the wiſe diſpoſer of all things would not have put it in his heart to prefer me to all others, but that I ſhould be as faithful a ſteward, as I was a faithful wife; and that I ſhould ſuffer others, more worthy than myſelf, to ſhare theſe his great benefits of fortune.

My lords, I now appeal to the feelings of your own hearts, whether it is not cruel, that I ſhould be brought as a criminal to a public trial for an act committed under the ſanction of the laws;—an act that was honoured with his majeſty's moſt gracious approbation; and previouſly known and approved of by my royal miſtreſs, the late princeſs-dowager of Wales; and likewiſe authorized by the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction. Your lordſhips will not diſcredit ſo reſpectable a court, and diſgrace thoſe judges who there ſo legally and honourably preſide. The judges of the Eccleſiaſtical Court do not receive their patents from the crown, but from the archbiſhops or biſhops. Their juriſdiction is competent in eccleſiaſtical caſes, and their proceedings are conformable to the laws and cuſtoms of the land, according to the teſtimony of the learned judge Blackſtone[*] (whoſe works are as entertaining as they are inſtructive), who ſays, 'It muſt be acknowledged, to the honour of the ſpiritual courts, that though they continue to this day to decide many queſtions which are properly of temporal cognizance, yet juſtice is in general ſo ably and impartially adminiſtered in thoſe tribunals (eſpecially of the ſuperior kind), and the boundaries of their power are now ſo well known and eſtabliſhed, that no material inconvenience at preſent ariſes from their juriſdiction. And ſhould an alteration be attempted, great confuſion would probably ariſe, in overturning long eſtabliſhed forms, new modelling a courſe of proceedings that has now prevailed for ſeven centuries.'—And I muſt here preſume to add, as founded on truth, that that court (of whioh his majeſty is the head) cannot be ſtopped by any authority whatſoever, while they act in their own juriſdiction.——Lord Chief Juſtice Hale ſays, 'Where there has been a ſentence of divorce (which is a criminal caſe), if that ſentence is ſuſpended by an appeal to the court of Arches (as a ſuperior court), and while that appeal is depending one of the parties marries again, the ſentence will be a juſtification within the exception of the act of parliament, notwithſtanding that the ſentence has been appealed from, and conſequently may be reverſed by a ſuperior court.' And, my lords, how much more reaſon is there for its coming within the exception of the act in my caſe, ſince no appeal had been made?

My lords, I earneſtly look up to your lordſhips for protection, as being now a ſufferer for having given credit to the Eccleſiaſtical Court. I reſpectfully call upon you, my lords, to protect the ſpiritual juriſdiction, and all the benefit of religious laws, and me, an unhappy priſoner, who inſtituted a ſuit of jactitation upon the advice of a learned civilian, who carried on the proſecution, from which I obtained the ſentence that authorized your priſoner's marriage with the moſt noble Evelyn duke of Kingſton; that ſentence ſolemnly pronounced by John Betteſworth, doctor of laws, vicar-general of the right reverend father in God Richard by divine permiſſion lord biſhop of London, and official principal of the Conſiſtorial Court of London: the judge thereof, calling on God, and ſetting him alone before his eyes, and hearing counſel in that cauſe, did pronounce, that your priſoner, then the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, now Elizabeth dowager ducheſs of Kingſton, was free from all matrimonial contracts or eſpouſals, as far as to him at that time appeared, more eſpecially with the ſaid right honourable Auguſtus John Hervey.

My lords, had this proſecution been ſet on foot merely for the love of juſtice, or good example to the community, why did they not inſtitute their proſecution during the five years your priſoner was received and acknowledged the undoubted and unmoleſted wife of the late duke of Kingſton?

My lords, the preamble of the very act on which I am indicted, plainly and intirely precludes your priſoner: it runs thus: 'Foraſmuch as divers evil-diſpoſed perſons, being married, run out of one county into another, or into places where they are not known, and there become to be married, having another wife or huſband living, to the great diſhonour of God, and utter undoing of divers honeſt mens children, and others, &c.' And as the preamble has not been conſidered to be ſufficient in my favour to impede the trial, I beg leave to obſerve how much your priſoner ſuffers by being produced before this noble houſe, on the penalty of an act of parliament, without benefiting by the preamble, which is ſuppoſed to contain the whole ſubſtance, extent, and meaning of the act.

My lords, upon your wiſe reſult on my unhappy caſe, you will bear in your willing remembrance, that the orphan and widow is your peculiar care; and that you will be tender of the honour of your late brother peer, and ſee in me his widow and repreſentative, recollecting how eaſy it may be for a next of kin to proſecute the widows or the daughters, not only of every peer, but of every ſubject of Great-Britain, if it can be effected by the oath of one ſuperannuated and intereſted old woman, who declared ſeven years ago that ſhe was incapable of giving evidence thereon, as will appear in proof before your lordſhips. And I may further obſerve to your lordſhips, that my caſe is clearly within the proviſo of the ſtatute on which I am indicted. In the third clauſe, it is 'provided that this act ſhall not extend to any perſon, where the former marriage hath been, or hereafter ſhall be, declared by ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court to be void, and of no effect.'

If there is ſuppoſed to have been a former marriage, the ſame muſt have been a true marriage, or a falſe one. If a true one, it cannot be declared void; and if a falſe one, or the ſemblance of one only, then only, and no otherwiſe, is it that it can be declared void.——Therefore muſt this proviſo have reſpect to pretended marriages only, and to none other: and ſuch only it is, that can be the objects of cauſes of jactitation, the ſentence in which is a more effectual divorce and ſeparation of the parties, than many divorces which have been determined to fall within this proviſo ——The crime charged in the indictment was not a felony, or even a temporal offence, until the act of James the firſt: till then, it was only cognizable in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and though an indictment could lie for a ſlight blow, yet the common law did not allow of a criminal proſecution for polygamy until that period: ſo that if the caſe comes within the exception of the only ſtatute upon that ſubject, it is no offence at all; and Dr. Sherlock, biſhop of London, has ſaid, in ſuch caſes the law of the land is the law of God.

My lords, I have obſerved, that I had greatly ſuffered in fame and fortune by the reports of Mr. Hervey; and I beg leave to mention in what manner. Your priſoner was at that time poſſeſſed of a ſmall eſtate in the county of Devon, where ſir George Chudleigh, her father's eldeſt brother, had large poſſeſſions. The purchaſe of that eſtate was much ſolicited in that county; and having frequent opportunities to diſpoſe of it, it was ever made an inſuperable objection by the intended purchaſer, that I could not make a clear title to the eſtate on account of Mr. Hervey's claim to your priſoner as his wife.

And your priſoner being alſo poſſeſſed of building lands for a great number of years, for the ſame reaſons ſhe never had the ground covered (valued at 1,200*l. per annum*). And as your priſoner's health declined, and made it neceſſary for her to ſeek relief in foreign climes (which increaſed her expences beyond what her circumſtances could ſupport), and her little fortune daily decreaſed by money taken up on mortgage and bond, as will appear by the evidence of Mr. Drummond; her royal miſtreſs likewiſe in the decline of life, whoſe death would probably have deprived her of 400*l.* a-year; the perſecutions threatened on Mr. Hervey's ſide preſented but a gloomy proſpect for her declining life; your priſoner was induced, as ſhe before obſerved to your lordſhips, to follow the advice of Dr. Collier, and inſtituted the ſuit of jactitation, your priſoner ſubſcribing entirely to his opinion, and following his advice and inſtructions, which ſhe preſumes alone is a full defence againſt the charge of felony; for your lordſhips in your great candour cannot think, that a lady can know more of the civil law, than her learned civilians could point out to her.

And as a criminal and felonious intent is neceſſary to conſtitute the offence with which I ſtand charged, certainly I cannot be guilty in following the advice I received, and in doing what in my conſcience I thought an authorized and innocent act.

My lords, though I am aware, that any perſon can proſecute for the crown for an offence againſt an act of parliament, yet I will venture to ſay, that few inſtances, if any, have been carried into execution without the conſent of the party injured: and with great deference to your lordſhips judgment I venture to declare, that in the preſent caſe no perſon whatever has been injured, unleſs your lordſhips candour will permit me to ſay that I am injured, being now the object of the undeſerved reſentment of my enemies. It is plain to all the world, that his grace the duke of Kingſton did not think himſelf injured, when in the ſhort ſpace of five years his grace made three wills, each ſucceeding one more favourable to your priſoner than the other, giving the moſt generous and inconteſtable proof of his affection and ſolicitude for my comfort and dignity. And it is more than probable, my lords, from the well-known mutual friendſhip ſubſiſting between us, that had I been intereſted, I might have obtained the bulk of his fortune for my own family. But I reſpected his honour, I loved his virtues, and had rather have forfeited my life than have uſed any undue influence to injure the family. And though it has been induſtriouſly and cruelly circulated, with a view to prejudice me, that the firſt-born of the late duke's ſiſter was deprived of the ſucceſſion to his grace's fortune by my influence, the wills, my lords, made in three diſtant periods, each excluding him, demonſtrate the calumny of theſe reports.

I muſt further obſerve to your lordſhips, in oppoſition to the charge againſt me of intereſtedneſs, that had I poſſeſſed or exerciſed that undue influence with which I am charged by the proſecutor, I might have obtained more than a life-intereſt in the duke's fortune. And though from the affection I bear to the memory of my late much-honoured huſband, I have forborne to mention the reaſon of his diſinheriting his eldeſt nephew, yet Charles, the ſecond ſon, with his heirs, appear immediately after me in ſucceſſion; William and his heirs follow next; after him Edward and his heirs; and the unfortunate Thomas, lady Frances's youngeſt ſon, is not excluded, though labouring under the infirmities of childhood at the age of manhood, and not able to ſupport himſelf. For the late noble duke of Kingſton repeatedly mentioned to your priſoner, 'I have not excluded him, for he has never offended; and who can ſay God cannot reſtore him? Who can ſay that God will not reſtore him to health?' My lords, that good man did honour to the peerage, honour to his country, honour to human nature.

His grace the moſt noble duke of Newcaſtle appeared with the will, which had been intruſted to his grace for four years by his late dear friend. In honour to the lady Frances Meadows, the proſecutor was requeſted to attend at the opening of the will. He retired with diſpleaſure, diſappointed that his eldeſt ſon was diſinherited, and unthankful, though the duke's fortune ſtill centered in his four youngeſt ſons and their poſterity.

[*] Vol. III. chap. vii. p. 98.

My lords, worn down by ſorrow, and in a wretched ſtate of health, I quitted England without a wiſh for that life which I was obliged by the laws of God and nature to endeavour to preſerve; for your priſoner can with great truth ſay, that ſorrow had bent her mind to a perfect reſignation to the will of Providence. And, my lords, while your unhappy priſoner was endeavouring to re-eſtabliſh her greatly-impaired health abroad, my proſecutor filed a bill in Chancery upon the moſt unjuſt and diſhonourable motives. Your priſoner does not complain of his endeavouring to eſtabliſh a right to himſelf; but ſhe does complain of his forming a plea on diſhonourable and unjuſt opinions of his late noble relation and generous benefactor, to the prejudice and diſcredit of his much-afflicted widow: and not ſatisfied with this proſecution, as a bulwark for his ſuit in Chancery, he cruelly inſtituted a criminal proſecution, in hopes, by a conviction in a criminal cauſe, to eſtabliſh a civil claim; a proceeding diſcountenanced by the opinion of the late lord Northington.

My lords, I have heretoſore forborne, from the great love and affection to my late noble lord, to mention what were the real motives that induced his grace to diſinherit his eldeſt nephew; and when my plea and anſwer in Chancery were to be argued, I particularly requeſted of the counſel to abſtain from any reflections upon my adverſaries, which the nature of their proſecutions too much deſerved; and grieved I am now, that I muſt no longer conceal them. For as ſelf-preſervation is the firſt law of nature, and as I am more and more perſecuted in my fortune and my fame, and my enemies hand about pocket-evidence to injure me in every company, and with double tongues they ſting me to the heart, I am reduced to the ſad neceſſity of ſaying, that the late duke of Kingſton was made acquainted with the fatal cruelty with which Mr. Evelyn Meadows treated an unfortunate lady, who was as amiable as ſhe was virtuous and beautiful; to cover which offence, he moſt ungratefully and falſely declared, that he broke his engagements with her for fear of diſobliging the duke, which he has often been heard to ſay. This, with his cruelty to his ſiſter and mother, and an attempt to quit actual ſervice in the late war, highly offended the duke; and it would be difficult for him, or his father, to boaſt of the leaſt friendly intercourſe with his grace for upwards of eighteen years.

My lords, in a dangerous ſtate of health, when my life was deſpaired of, I received a letter from my ſolicitor, acquainting me, that if I did not return to England to put in an anſwer to the bill in Chancery within twenty-one days, I ſhould have receivers put into my eſtates; and alſo, that if in contempt of the indictment I did not return, I ſhould be outlawed. It clearly appeared to me, my lords, as I make no doubt it does to your lordſhips, that if in the inclemency of the weather I riſqued to paſs the Alps, my life would probably be endangered, and the family would immediately enter into poſſeſſion of the real eſtates, and if female fears ſhould prevail, that I ſhould be outlawed. Thus was I to be deprived of life and fortune under colour of law. And that I might not return to theſe perſecuting ſummonſes, by ſome undue and cruel proceedings my credit was ſtopped by my banker for £.4,000, when there remained an open account of £.75,000, and at that inſtant upwards of £.6,000 was in his hands, my revenues being conſtantly paid into his ſhop to my credit. Thus was I commanded to return home at the manifeſt riſque of my life, and at the ſame time every art uſed to deprive me of the means of returning for my juſtification. Conſcious of the perfect innocence of my intention, and convinced that the laws of this country could not be ſo inconſiſtent as to authorize an act, and then defame and degrade me for having obeyed it, I left Italy at the hazard of my life. It was not for property I returned, but to prove myſelf an honourable woman. Grant me, my lords, but your good opinion, and that I ſtand juſtified in the innocence of my intention, and you can deprive me of nothing that I value, even if you ſhould take from me all my worldly poſſeſſions; for I have reſted on that ſeat where the poor blind Beliſarius is ſaid to have aſked charity of every paſſenger, after having conquered the Goths and Vandals, Africans and Perſians; and would do the ſame without murmuring, if you would pronounce me, what I hope your lordſhips will cheatfully ſubſcribe to—that I am an honourable woman.

My lords, your late brother, the truly honourable duke of Kingſton, whoſe life was adorned by every virtue and every grace, does not his moſt reſpectable character plead my cauſe and prove my innocence?

My lords, the evidence of the fact of a ſuppoſed clandeſtine marriage with Mr. Hervey depends entirely upon the teſtimony of Ann Cradock.

I am perſuaded your lordſhips, from the manner in which ſhe gave her evidence, already entertain great ſuſpicions of the veracity of her teſtimony. She pretends to ſpeak to a marriage ceremony being performed, at which ſhe was not aſked to be preſent, nor can ſhe aſſign any reaſon for her being there.—She relates a conduct in Mrs. Hanmer, who ſhe pretends was preſent at the ceremony, inconſiſtent with a real marriage. She acknowledges that ſhe was in or about London during the jactitation ſuit, and that Mr. Hervey applied to her on that occaſion; and ſwears that ſhe then and ever had a perfect remembrance of the marriage, and was ready to have proved it, had ſhe been called upon, and never declared to any perſon that ſhe had not a perfect memory of the marriage, and that ſhe never was deſired either to give or with-hold her evidence; and from Mr. Hervey's not calling on this woman, it is inſinuated he abſtained from the proof by colluſion with me. She alſo ſwears, that I offered to make her an allowance of twenty guineas a-year, provided ſhe would reſide in either of the three counties ſhe has mentioned, but acknowledges ſhe has received no allowance from me. Can your lordſhips believe, that if I could have been weak enough to have inſtituted the ſuit, with a conviction in my own mind of a real lawful marriage between Mr. Hervey and myſelf, that I would not, at any expence, have taken care to have put that woman out of the way? But, my lords, I truſt that your lordſhips will be perfectly ſatisfied, that great part of the evidence of this woman is made for the purpoſe of the proſecution. Though ſhe has denied ſhe has any expectation from the event, or ever declared ſo, yet it will be proved to your lordſhips, that her future proviſion (as ſhe has declared) depends upon it: and notwithſtanding ſhe has now brought herſelf up to ſwear that ſhe heard the ceremony of marriage performed, yet it will be proved that ſhe has declared ſhe did not hear it. And it will be further proved to your lordſhips, that Mr. Hervey was extremely ſolicitous to have eſtabliſhed a legal marriage with me for the purpoſe mentioned by Mr. Hawkins, and that this woman was actually applied to, and declared to Mr. Hervey's ſolicitor, that her memory was impaired, and that ſhe had not any recollection of it, which was the reaſon why ſhe was not called as a witneſs.

My lords, if ſhe is thus contradicted in theſe particulars, and appears under the influence of expectations from this event of the proſecution, your lordſhips will not credit her evidence, that the complete ceremony of marriage was performed, or any other particulars which reſt upon her evidence.

My lords, with reſpect to what your lordſhips have heard from the witneſſes, of my deſire at times to be conſidered as the wife of Mr. Hervey, your lordſhips in your candour will naturally account for that circumſtance, after the unfortunate connection that had ſubſiſted between us.

My lords, I call God Almighty, the ſearcher of hearts, to witneſs, that at the time of my marriage with the duke of Kingſton, I had, myſelf, the moſt perfect conviction that it was lawful. That noble duke, to whom every paſſage of my life had been diſcloſed, and whoſe affection for me, as well as regard for his own honour, would never have ſuffered him to have married me, had he not as well as myſelf received the moſt ſolemn aſſurances from doctor Collier, that the ſentence, which had been pronounced in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, was abſolutely final and concluſive, and that I was perfectly at liberty to marry any another perſon. If therefore I have offended againſt the letter of the act, I have ſo offended without criminal intention. Where ſuch intention does not exiſt, your lordſhips juſtice and humanity will tell you there can be no crime; and your lordſhips, looking on my diſtreſſed ſituation with an indulgent eye, will pity me as an unfortunate woman, deceived and miſled by erroneous notions of law, of the propriety of which it was impoſſible for me to judge.

My lords, before I take my leave, permit me to expreſs my warm and grateful ſenſe of the candour and indulgence of your lordſhips, which have given me the firmeſt confidence that I ſhall not be deemed criminal by your lordſhips for an act, in which I had not the leaſt ſuſpicion that there was any thing illegal or immoral.

My lords, I have loſt, or miſlaid, a paper, where I had put together my ideas to preſent to your lordſhips. The purport was to tell your lordſhips, that my advocate doctor Collier, who inſtituted this ſuit of jactitation, is now in a dangerous ſtate of health. He has had two phyſicians to attend him, by my order, yeſterday, to inſiſt and order his attendance to acquaint your lordſhips, that I acted entirely under his directions; that it was by his advice I married his grace the duke of Kingſton, aſſuring me that it was lawful; that he had the honour of going to his grace the archbiſhop of Canterbury to obtain a licence, and to explain every part that regarded the cauſe; that his grace was ſo juſt, ſo pious, and ſo good, as to take time to conſider whether he would grant us a ſpecial licence for the marriage. After mature conſideration and conſultation with great and honourable perſons in the law, he returned the licence to doctor Collier, with full permiſſion for our marriage. Doctor Collier was preſent at the marriage; doctor Collier ſigned the regiſter of St. George's church. Mr. La Roche has frequently attended the duke of Kingſton to doctor Collier, where he heard him conſult the doctor if the marriage would be lawful: he ſaid it would, and never could be controverted.

Under theſe circumſtances, I wiſhed to bring my advocate forth to protect me. He, my lords, is willing to make an affidavit, to be examined by the enemy's counſel, to ſubmit to any thing that your lordſhips can command, willing to juſtify his conduct; but he has had the misfortune, my lords, ever ſince the latter end of Auguſt, or the firſt week in September, I do not well remember which, never to have been in bed. I apprehended, from ſeeing him yeſterday, with your lordſhips indulgence, that he had the ſaint Anthony's fire: but my phyſicians, who have been with him, can give a better account, if you will permit them, of the ſtate of his health, that your lordſhips may not imagine that he keeps back, or that I am afraid to produce him. If it is not to avail me in law, I aſk no favour: but I petition your lordſhips, and would upon my knees, that you will hear the evidence that he will give to the juſtification of my honour, though it does not avail me in law.

My lords, I do requeſt that doctor Collier may be examined in the ſtricteſt manner, and by every enemy that I have in the world. My phyſicians ſaw him laſt night; and they can, previous to his examination, inform your lordſhips in what ſtate they apprehend him to be.

Lord Ravenſworth. After what I have juſt heard from the priſoner at the bar, it is impoſſible not to feel equally with the reſt of your lordſhips: and, my lords, what came laſt from the priſoner at the bar I own ſtrikes me with the neceſſity of permiſſion being given, if it could be done, to have doctor Collier examined.

Lord Camden. I am really, my lords, at ſome loſs to know, upon what ground it is your lordſhips ſtand at this moment with reſpect to the evidence of doctor Collier. I do not underſtand yet, that doctor Collier is called by the priſoner or by her counſel. I do not yet underſtand, that in conſideration of the infirm ſtate of his health, the priſoner or her counſel do require from your lordſhips any ſpecific particular mode of examination, by which your lordſhips might be appriſed of the ſubſtance of his evidence. I underſtand neither of theſe things to be moved to your lordſhips: if they were, matter of debate on either one or the other might probably ariſe; and then this is not the place for your lordſhips to enter into a conſideration of it. With regard to the caſe itſelf, which the noble priſoner has made for one of her moſt material witneſſes, it is undoubtedly ſuch as would touch your lordſhips with a proper degree of compaſſion, as far as the juſtice of the court can go, and your feelings are able to indulge; beyond that it is impoſſible, let your lordſhips deſire be what it may: for you to tranſgreſs the law of the land, or to go beyond the rules preſcribed by thoſe laws, is impoſſible. A witneſs ſo infirm that he is totally incapable of attendance! Your lordſhips, if you are to loſe his evidence, will lament the want of it: juſtice cannot be ſo perfect and complete without the examination of a neceſſary and material witneſs, as if you had it. But if a greater evil than that ſhould happen (and it has frequently happened in the courſe of cauſes), which is death itſelf, which ſhuts up the mouth in everlaſting ſilence, if this ſhould arreſt the witneſs before he could be produced, his evidence is loſt for ever. If this witneſs ſhould by his infirmity be totally unable to attend whilſt this cauſe laſts, I am ſorry to ſay your lordſhips muſt go on without him; it is impoſſible to wait until that witneſs can be produced. While the cauſe laſts (and your lordſhips will precipitate nothing in the courſe of juſtice) if he can be brought, you will make every accommodation to receive him, you will take every means in your power to make the attendance ſafe and convenient for him, you will receive him in any part of the cauſe, even at the laſt moment before it is concluded. So far your lordſhips may go; beyond that, I doubt, you cannot. But, my lords, I have now been ſpeaking without a queſtion, without a motion, without any thing demanded of your lordſhips by the priſoner or by her counſel.

Lord Ravenſworth. I would beg leave to put it to thoſe noble lords who ſit upon the bench, whether there ever was an inſtance in a criminal cauſe of a witneſs being examined otherwiſe than in open court?

Lord Camden. The noble lord is pleaſed to put a queſtion particularly pointed to ſuch of your lordſhips as have been educated in the profeſſion of the law, to know 'whether any inſtance can be produced where a witneſs, 'not attending at your bar to be examined viva voce, has been permitted 'by commiſſion, by delegation, or any other manner whatever, to give his 'evidence out of court, ſo that that evidence, ſo given out of court, 'might be reported into the court, and ſtand as evidence on the trial?' I preſume that is the point, in which the noble lord deſires to know if any precedent can be produced. When that queſtion is aſked, and the anſwer is to be a negative, your lordſhips eaſily conceive how much the modeſty of the anſwerer is to be affected, if he gives a full, a poſitive, and a round negative to that queſtion. I therefore beg to be underſtood as confining the anſwer to my own knowledge. Within the courſe of my own practice and experience, I never did know of ſuch an inſtance; I never have, to the beſt of my memory, read of ſuch an inſtance; I never heard of ſuch an inſtance: I ſpeak in the preſence of thoſe who are better verſed in this kind of knowledge than myſelf; I ſpeak before the law of the land, which is now upon your lordſhips wool-ſacks. My lords, if any ſuch caſe occurs to them, it will be eaſy for your lordſhips to apply to them; I know of no ſuch; and if I might add briefly one word on the ſubject, I hope I ſhall never ſee ſuch an inſtance ſo long as I live in this world. What, my lords! to give up, and to part with, that noble privilege in the mode of open trial, of examinations of witneſſes viva voce at your bar, with a croſs examination to confront them in the eye of the world, and to transfer that to a private chamber on a few written interrogatories! I go too far in arguing the point: I never knew an inſtance. I am in the judgment of the houſe, and of the learned judges that hear me; if there ever was an inſtance, let it be produced, and in God's name let juſtice be done.

The lords then proceeded to hear the witneſſes.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, you may proceed to call your witneſſes.

Mr. Wallace. The firſt witneſs I would call is

Mr. BERKLEY, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Berkley. My lords, what knowledge I had of this buſineſs aroſe from my being attorney to lord Briſtol; and I muſt leave it to your lordſhips, whether I ought to be examined as being attorney for lord Briſtol, conſiſtent with honour to myſelf and the duty I owe to him.

Mr. Wallace. I know the delicacy of the ſituation of an attorney: I merely call Mr. Berkley to what paſſed between him and Mrs. Cradock, being ſent to get her to attend and prove the marriage.

Lord Manſfield. With regard to the demurrer put in by Mr. Berkley to the queſtion that is aſked him, when they make him a witneſs, they ſubject him to croſs examinations; but the point is, whether he, as being concerned as ſolicitor for my lord Briſtol, can demur to the queſtion put to him to know, what this woman ſaid when he went to deſire her to come to give evidence? And as to that, there ſeems to be no colour to the demurrer; for the protection of attorneys is as to what is revealed to them by their client, in order to take their advice or inſtruction with regard to their defence. This is no ſecret of the client, but is to a collateral fact, what a party ſaid to him upon ſuch an application; and it has been often determined, that as to fact an attorney or counſel has no privilege to with-hold his evidence, if there is a doubt: even if he ſwears to an anſwer in Chancery, he cannot protect himſelf from ſwearing, whether that is his client's hand or not, or to his having ſworn it, or the execution of a deed: it does not come within the objection to an attorney revealing the ſecrets of his client. I ſuppoſe it is only mentioned to your lordſhips for a juſtification. If none of your lordſhips are of a different opinion, it will ſave time, and the witneſs will underſtand it to be the opinion of all your lordſhips.

Mr. Wallace. I beg to know, whether you ever made any application to Mrs. Cradock relative to her being a witneſs to the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I did.

Mr. Wallace. At what time?

Mr. Berkley. It was after my lord Briſtol was ſerved with a citation to Doctors Commons.

Mr. Wallace. For what purpoſe did you apply to her?

Mr. Berkley. To know, what ſhe knew relative to the marriage between lord Briſtol and Miſs Chudleigh.

Mr. Wallace. What anſwer did Mrs. Cradock give to that?

Mr. Berkley. My lord Briſtol was preſent. She ſaid ſhe was very old, very infirm, and the tranſaction happened many years ago, and ſhe could not at that diſtance of time remember any thing of the matter: upon which my lord Briſtol ſeemed vaſtly ſurprized, and ſaid, How can you ſay ſo? or to that effect.

Mr. Wallace. Did ſhe perſiſt in not remembering any thing of the tranſaction?

Mr. Berkley. She did, and ſaid ſhe remembered nothing of the matter; and that was the only time I ever ſaw her.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I ſhall aſk Mr. Berkley no more queſtions.

Mr. Attorney General. Was you ſent to her as a perſon that was preſent at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I was employed in order to collect evidence from different people, whom my lord Briſtol directed me to go to, and other people, with reſpect to the marriage, as his lordſhip wanted to have a divorce; and in that way I ſaw Mrs. Cradock.

Mr. Attorney General. Did lord Briſtol explain his want of a divorce at the time he ſent you to the witneſs?

Mr. Berkley. The direction I had from my lord was in May 1768.

Mr. Attorney General. Was it at that time that my lord Briſtol told you he wanted a divorce?

Mr. Berkley. It was.

Mr. Attorney General. What you have ſaid was after the citation?

Mr. Berkley. When I ſaw the witneſs, as well as I remember, it was after the citation.

Mr. Attorney General. Did lord Briſtol deſcribe the witneſs to you as preſent at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. He did. My lord ſaid, that ſhe could prove the marriage.

Mr. Attorney General. When lord Briſtol expreſſed himſelf ſurprized at that diſappointment, did he then expreſs to you, that ſhe was one of thoſe preſent at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I do not know that my lord did.

Mr. Attorney General. Was ſhe never repreſented to you as a perſon preſent at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I underſtood, as ſhe was repreſented to me, that ſhe was preſent at the marriage.

Mr. Attorney General. Was her huſband, Mr. Cradock, ever repreſented as being preſent at that marriage?

Mr. Berkley. Mr. Cradock has often told me, that he was not.

Mr. Attorney General. The queſtion that I mean to put upon that is, why was the huſband called who was not preſent at the marriage, and the wife not called who was repreſented to be preſent at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I know nothing of that; it went out of my hands afterwards to Doctors Commons.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you decline that part of the buſineſs in reſpect to Doctors Commons?

Mr. Berkley. I apprehend, I could not act there.

Mr. Wallace. Are you an attorney or a proctor?

Mr. Berkley. An attorney, not a proctor.

Ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Manſfield. My lords, we are now going to call Mrs. Ann Pritchard to contradict part of the evidence of Ann Cradock. We beg the clerk may read the part alluded to.

> The clerk of the parliament was ordered to read that part of the evidence; but not having taken it down, Mr. Gurney was ordered to produce his notes. When they were produced, the part alluded to could not be found; and

Mr. Manſfield addreſſed himſelf to the lords thus: This witneſs, Ann Pritchard, is called to contradict Mrs. Cradock. In the firſt place, to prove that ſhe has told this Mrs. Pritchard, that ſhe had ſome expectations of advantage from this proſecution; and likewiſe, that ſhe did tell this witneſs, that ſhe did not hear any part of the ceremony read at the time when ſhe ſaid the lady at the bar and lord Briſtol were married, though ſhe has repeatedly told your lordſhips that ſhe had no view of advantage from this cauſe, and that ſhe had heard the whole of the ceremony read.

ANN PRITCHARD, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Manſfield. Do you know Mrs. Cradock?

Ann Pritchard. Yes.

Mr. Manſfield. Have you ever had any converſation with Mrs. Cradock concerning the reading the marriage ceremony between the lady at the bar and lord Briſtol?

Ann Pritchard. No, I never had.

Mr. Manſfield. Did you ever hear Mrs. Cradock ſay any thing concerning that ceremony, or her having heard it, or not heard it?

Ann Pritchard. Never, before ſhe was examined.

Mr. Manſfield. What do you mean, before ſhe was examined?

Ann Pritchard. Before a maſter in Chancery.

Mr. Manſfield. When was that?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot particularly ſay the time; it was about a month after I was examined, to the beſt of my knowledge.

Mr. Manſfield. When was you examined?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot particularly ſay the time when ſhe was examined.

Mr. Manſfield. Can you recollect how many months ago?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot indeed; it might be a year and an half ago.

Mr. Manſfield. What did Mrs. Cradock ſay to you in that converſation, which ſhe had with you, about her having heard or not having heard the marriage ceremony?

Ann Pritchard. She related her examination before the maſter in Chancery concerning her grace's marriage.

Mr. Mansfield. In that converſation, did Mrs. Cradock ſay whether ſhe had or had not heard the marriage ceremony read?

Ann Pritchard. I never heard her relate any thing concerning the marriage ceremony. I underſtand the queſtion now: I did not before. She told me, ſhe did not hear the marriage ceremony.

Lord High Steward. Let the laſt queſtion be aſked over again.

Mr. Mansfield. Whether Mrs. Cradock did or did not ſay to you, Mrs. Pritchard, that ſhe did or did not hear the marriage ceremony read?

Ann Pritchard. She told me, ſhe did not hear the marriage ceremony read.

Mr. Mansfield. Had you any converſation with Mrs. Cradock about any advantage which ſhe expected from this proſecution?

Ann Pritchard. I had.

Mr. Mansfield. What did Mrs. Cradock ſay to you in that converſation?

Ann Pritchard. She told me ſhe was to be provided for, but in what manner ſhe could not ſay, till after the affair was over, leſt it ſhould be deemed bribery.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you hear any thing more ſaid by Mrs. Cradock relating to that ſubject?

Ann Pritchard. Not at that time, but at another time I have.

Mr. Mansfield. What did you hear from her at the other time?

Ann Pritchard. I gave her an invitation to come to ſee me. She told me, it would not ſuit her until this affair was over; and then if ſhe ſhould get a good fortune, ſhe might come and live with me.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you hear from Mrs. Cradock any thing ſaid of any particular proviſion to be made for her, or any place to be got?

Ann Pritchard. Her brother applied to my huſband at the Cuſtom-Houſe, deſiring him in caſe he heard of a vacancy to let him know.

Mr. Attorney General. This is not evidence in the queſtion now propoſed. I know nothing of what will be brought; but this is not evidence.

Mr. Mansfield. Nothing that paſſes, unleſs it comes home to Mrs. Cradock, will be evidence, to be ſure. The witneſs muſt relate it in her own manner.

Mr. Attorney General. I object to the witneſs relating either in her own or in any other manner whatever, a converſation to which Mrs. Cradock is not a party.

Mr. Mansfield. It is under an apprehenſion that it will come to Mrs. Cradock, or it would not be aſked.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you tell to Mrs. Cradock what you heard from her huſband?

Ann Pritchard. I told her myſelf, that her brother had been at the Cuſtom-Houſe to deſire my huſband, when there was a vacancy in the houſe, to let him know of it, as Mr. Meadows had promiſed to get him a place.

Mr. Mansfield. What did Mrs. Cradock ſay to you upon your telling her this?

Ann Pritchard. She had never heard any thing about it.

Mr. Mansfield. Did Mrs. Cradock ſay any thing more to you about this place?

Ann Pritchard. Her anſwer was, it was more than ſhe knew, but that it would be equally the ſame.

Mr. Mansfield. What was meant by being equally the ſame?

Ann Pritchard. She thought her brother was to provide for her out of it, or at leaſt allow her ſomething.

Mr. Attorney General. How long have you been acquainted with Mrs. Cradock?

Ann Pritchard. Five years.

Mr. Attorney General. How long with the priſoner?

Ann Pritchard. From the 2d of February laſt.

Mr. Attorney General. I wiſh to know whether any body was preſent at any of the converſations which you had with Mrs. Cradock, but yourſelf?

Ann Pritchard. No.

Mr. Attorney General. I wiſh you would tell where they were?

Ann Pritchard. Once at my own houſe at Mile-End.

Mr. Attorney-General. At what time was that converſation held at your houſe at Mile-End?

Ann Pritchard. It was on a Sunday, but I cannot particularly tell the month.

Mr. Attorney-General. How long ago was that Sunday?

Ann Pritchard. It was a very little time after ſhe had been ſubpœnaed.

Mr. Attorney-General. Do you know if it was a week, or more time, or leſs, after ſhe had been ſubpœnaed?

Ann Pritchard. It might be more than a week, I cannot tell particularly.

Mr. Attorney-General. What reaſon have you to know, that it was within ſome ſhort time after ſhe had been ſubpœnaed?

Ann Pritchard. As we were very intimate acquaintances, ſhe came to dine with me. She told me, ſhe longed to tell me what had happened ſince the laſt time ſhe ſaw me.

Mr. Attorney-General. But how long was that laſt time ſhe ſaw you before that laſt time that ſhe came to you again?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot particularly ſay.

Mr. Attorney-General. As near as you can go; was it a fortnight?

Ann Pritchard. It might be a quarter of a year.

Mr. Attorney-General. Have you any means of recollecting within a week or a fortnight of the time of her having been examined upon the ſubpœna?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot poſſibly recollect, as not expecting ever to be called upon.

Mr. Attorney-General. Does your intimacy continue with Mrs. Cradock?

Ann Pritchard. It always did, until ſhe has been confined at Mr. Beauwater's.

Mr. Attorney-General. Did you ever mention this converſation to Mrs. Cradock, ſince the time it happened?

Ann Pritchard. No, never.

Mr. Attorney-General. Will you give an account to their lordſhips of the whole converſation which Mrs. Cradock held upon the ſubject of that marriage; whether ſhe told you the whole ſtory of the marriage?

Ann Pritchard. She told me a great deal of it. I do not know the particulars.

Mr. Attorney-General. It is important, that you ſhould recollect as many particulars as you can, that Mrs. Cradock told you of that marriage. What particulars did Mrs. Cradock tell you of that marriage?

Ann Pritchard. She told me that ſhe had been examined by a maſter in Chancery, who aſked her if ſhe knew of the marriage between Auguſtus John Hervey and Miſs Chudleigh? They aſked her if ſhe was in the church? She anſwered, ſhe was. They aſked her who was in the church? She told them, herſelf, Mr. Merrill and Mrs. Hanmer. They aſked her, if ſhe heard the ceremony? She told him, ſhe did not. That was all the particulars I heard her relate.

Mr. Attorney-General. Had not you the curioſity yourſelf to enquire after ſome more particulars?

Ann Pritchard. I had not.

Mr. Attorney-General. Did ſhe ever tell you at what time of night it was?

Ann Pritchard. Never.

Mr. Attorney-General. Was any body preſent at the converſation about the reward that the witneſs expected?

Ann Pritchard. No.

Mr. Attorney-General. At what time was that converſation had?

Ann Pritchard. It was after dinner, it might be at two o'clock on the Sunday; it was ſummer-time I know, but I cannot particularly ſay the month.

Mr. Attorney-General. Was it the ſame Sunday that the former converſation paſſed?

Ann Pritchard. No.

Mr. Attorney-General. Whether, when the witneſs propoſed, on her having a great fortune coming to her, that ſhe ſhould live with Mrs. Cradock, or Mrs. Cradock live with her?

Ann Pritchard. Mrs. Cradock live with me.

Mr. Attorney-General. What are you?

Ann Pritchard. In a very creditable ſituation, and a pretty fortune. I live at Mile-End.

Mr. Attorney-General. Do you carry on any buſineſs at Mile-End?

Ann Pritchard. No.

Mr. Attorney-General. Are you married?

Ann Pritchard. Yes.

Mr. Attorney-General. Has your huſband any buſineſs?

Ann Pritchard. Yes; a place in the Cuſtom-Houſe.

Lord Groſvenor. What do you mean by Mrs. Cradock's being confined at Mr. Beauwater's?

Ann Pritchard. I went to enquire for her: I was not permitted to ſee her.

Lord Denbigh. I beg to know upon what account you ſaw the priſoner in February laſt?

Ann Pritchard. By an invitation to her houſe-keeper.

Lord Denbigh. Did you ſee the priſoner herſelf at that time?

Ann Pritchard. I did.

Lord Denbigh. What paſſed between you and the priſoner?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot particularly relate it; nothing material.

Lord Denbigh. Did nothing paſs relative to this trial?

Ann Pritchard. Nothing.

Lord Denbigh. Did nothing paſs relative to the converſations between you and Mrs. Cradock?

Ann Pritchard. I do not recollect there was.

Lord Weymouth. I think the witneſs has ſaid, that Mrs. Cradock told her that ſhe did not hear the ceremony read, and Mrs. Cradock has likewiſe told your lordſhips, that ſhe was preſent when the ceremony was read: I ſhould be glad to aſk whether Mrs. Cradock gave any reaſon for not having heard the ceremony? whether, that ſhe was at a diſtance in the church, or the clergyman did not ſpeak loud enough?

Ann Pritchard. She was at too great a diſtance in the church.

Duke of Richmond. Did Mrs. Cradock tell you, that ſhe had in her examination before the maſter in Chancery ſaid, that ſhe did not hear the ceremony read?

Ann Pritchard. She told me, ſhe did.

A Lord. The counſel may produce that examination.

Lord Camden. I have been aſking the ſame queſtion, conceiving it would give light to your lordſhips, if it could be produced. I find that it is an examination de bene eſſe. Publication is not made, and the examinations are ſealed up.

Ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I ſhall call witneſſes now to prove the conſultation of Dr. Collier; and I ſhall follow that, my lords, with a proof of what advice he gave to the noble lady at the bar and the duke of Kingſton in the preſence of a witneſs I have to produce. My lords, we have ſent, but find there is no poſſibility of bringing Dr. Collier, or he ſhould have been here.—We will now call

Dr. WARREN, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Wallace. I wiſh Dr. Warren would inform your lordſhips, whether he has lately ſeen Dr. Collier.

Dr. Warren. I viſited Dr. Collier yeſterday, about eight o'clock in the afternoon, and found him very ill under a variety of complaints, particularly a St. Anthony's fire in his head and face, by which one ſide of it was ſo much ſwelled, that the eye was almoſt cloſed up. It appeared to me that he could not venture out without great hazard.

Mr. Attorney-General. I beg Dr. Warren may be aſked, whether he thinks Dr. Collier's condition ſuch, that he could not ſtir out without danger?

Dr. Warren. I ſaid ſo, my lords.

Mr. Attorney-General. What ſort of danger do you mean, when you ſpeak of the danger under which he would come out?

Dr. Warren. I think that he is in danger. I cannot ſay that it would certainly kill him, but it would be very imprudent in me to adviſe him to come out.

Ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Mansfield. The witneſs now intended to be produced to your lordſhips is Mr. Laroche. The purpoſe for which he is to be produced, is to tell your lordſhips, that he ſaw Dr. Collier frequently with the lady at the bar and the late duke of Kingſton, during the ſuit in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; that he has himſelf heard Dr. Collier aſſure both the parties, the late duke of Kingſton and the lady at the bar, after that ſentence in the Spiritual Court, that they were perfectly free to marry, and might marry any one they pleaſed.

Mr. LAROCHE, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Laroche. My lords, I did not know, until within theſe few minutes, that it would be neceſſary to call me. I will endeavour to recollect to the beſt of my knowledge. I have got ſome memorandums in my pocket, and I hope I may be at liberty to refer to them.

Lord High Steward. Are they in your own writing?

Mr. Laroche. A copy of it, and it has been in my poſſeſſion ever ſince it was copied.

A Lord. Copied by his deſire?

Mr. Laroche. Yes, from my own notes, and in my preſence, and has been in my own cuſtody ever ſince.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you know the late duke of Kingſton? and do you know Dr. Collier?

Mr. Laroche. Yes, I both knew his grace the duke of Kingſton and Dr. Collier.

Mr. Mansfield. Was you preſent at the marriage of the lady at the bar and the duke of Kingſton?

Mr. Laroche. I was.

Mr. Mansfield. Was Dr. Collier preſent alſo at the marriage?

Mr. Laroche. He was.

Mr. Mansfield. Do you know, that Dr. Collier was conſulted by the lady at the bar and the duke of Kingſton, while the ſuit was depending in the Spiritual Court?

Mr. Laroche. I do know, that I have frequently walked with his grace the duke of Kingſton to Doctors Commons in a morning to Dr. Collier. I have gone alſo with the ducheſs in her coach, and the duke likewiſe, to Dr. Collier.

Mr. Mansfield. Has this happened frequently?

Mr. Laroche. Many times.

Mr. Mansfield. Was you ever preſent with Dr. Collier and the duke of Kingſton and the lady at the bar, after that ſentence had been given in that court?

Mr. Laroche. I was ſeveral times at Dr. Collier's chambers after the ſuit had been determined.

Mr. Mansfield. Was you preſent when Dr. Collier gave to the lady at the bar, or the late duke of Kingſton, or both of them, any opinion concerning the effect of that ſentence?

Mr. Laroche. I was many times at Dr. Collier's chambers, and in converſation I have heard Dr. Collier tell the duke, that he might with ſafety marry the ducheſs of Kingſton, Miſs Chudleigh as ſhe then was.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you heard that opinion, or to that effect, given more than once?

Mr. Laroche. I cannot be exact: I have heard it ſaid from Dr. Collier to the duke.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you heard that ſaid alſo in the preſence of the lady at the bar by Dr. Collier?

Mr. Laroche. I think I have, to the beſt of my recollection. I went with the duke of Kingſton, I breakfaſted with him, as well as I can recollect, the morning that he was married: we then agreed to dine together at the Thatched-Houſe Tavern. I went into the city with his grace firſt of all to Dr. Collier's to get the licence. Dr. Collier, when we came there, was not at home, but was gone to his grace's houſe with the licence in his pocket.

Mr. Mansfield. My lords, theſe are all the queſtions I have to aſk Mr. Laroche.

Mr. Dunning. My lords, I ſhould be glad to aſk Mr. Laroche, what the occaſion was of taking theſe opinions of Dr. Collier? whether it aroſe about any doubt entertained by the duke or the lady, or both, whether they were at liberty to marry?

Mr. Laroche. The duke certainly had a doubt upon his breaſt, until the ſuit of jactitation was over. In conſequence of that ſentence, at the decree of which I was preſent, and which declared her a ſingle woman, he applied to Dr. Collier to know whether there was any thing further to go on that might impede his marriage? He was told, No, that ſhe was a ſingle woman, and he might marry her.

Mr. Dunning. Were theſe converſations pending the ſuit, or after the ſuit was determined?

Mr. Laroche. The laſt converſation was after the ſuit was over. During the time of the ſuit, I have frequently, I ſuppoſe when I was in town I walked five days out of ſix into the city with the duke, and then we called there to know how the ſuit went on.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect how long the ſuit had been determined before the marriage with the duke of Kingſton?

Mr. Laroche. I ſhould think, to the beſt of my recollection—I believe within three weeks. There were fourteen days to put in an appeal; the appeal was revoked, and I believe they married the week after.

Mr. Dunning. Did the duke's doubt continue until the day of the marriage?

Mr. Laroche. He had no doubt after he had applied for the licence, and the licence had been granted.

Mr. Dunning. What was the occaſion of the converſation that paſſed upon the morning of the marriage between the duke and Dr. Collier?

Mr. Laroche. There was no converſation upon it, as I remember, between them upon the morning of the marriage?

Mr. Dunning. When did Dr. Collier inform the duke, that he might marry?

Mr. Laroche. It was, I believe, after the revocation of the appeal---but it was after the ſentence was obtained.

Mr. Dunning. Will you be ſo good as to fix the time as nearly as you can, when both theſe converſations paſſed between Dr. Collier and the duke, and Dr. Collier and the ducheſs?

Mr. Laroche. As for aſcertaining a time, I cannot; but it was from the meeting of the parliament in the month of October 1768. If I remember right, it was the beginning of the ſeſſions of parliament before laſt; and during that time I uſed often to walk with the duke to Dr. Collier's.

Mr. Dunning. How many days was it before the marriage, if I am miſtaken in ſuppoſing you ſaid the day of the marriage?

Mr. Laroche. It might be three or four days, or within a week.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know that Dr. Collier had been in fact informed, that there had been a marriage between the lady and Mr. Hervey?

Mr. Laroche. I know nothing at all of that.

Mr. Dunning. Was you yourſelf informed at this time that there had been in fact a marriage between the lady and Mr. Hervey?

Mr. Laroche. I never knew that there had been a marriag

Mr. Dunning. Had you been ſo informed, was my queſtion?

Mr. Laroche. From hear-ſay, and nothing elſe. I heard there was a ſuſpicion of a marriage, and that ſhe had put him upon the proof of that marriage, and that he had failed in his proof.

Mr. Dunning. Had you, or had you not, been informed of the marriage by the lady herſelf?

Mr. Laroche. Never.

Mr. Dunning. Can you enable their lordſhips to judge, what was the occaſion that drew the duke and ducheſs to make this application to Dr. Collier ſo recently before the marriage, and ſo long after the ſentence?

Mr. Laroche. I ſuppoſe, the meaning of the duke's going there was to aſk Dr. Collier, who had the whole management of the affair, whether he could with ſafety marry the ducheſs.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know whether any body had or had not ſuggeſted a doubt upon the ſubject?

Mr. Laroche. There had been a doubt before the ſentence, but after the ſentence there was no doubt; but ſtill he thought proper to aſk him, becauſe there was an appeal: that appeal was revoked, and after that appeal he married.

Mr. Mansfield. If your lordſhips will permit me, I will aſk one queſtion of Mr. Laroche. Whether in the opinion that Dr. Collier gave to the duke of Kingſton in his hearing, Dr. Collier founded his opinion upon the effect of that ſentence which had paſſed?

Mr. Laroche. He certainly did, in my conception of the matter.

Mr. Dunning. I ſhould be glad to know, whether the witneſs meant to have it underſtood upon what Dr. Collier founded his opinion, that ſuch a marriage, if it had been lawful, could be ſet aſide by thoſe proceedings?

Mr. Laroche. The words I heard were theſe: You may ſafely marry Miſs Chudleigh, my lord, for you neither offend againſt the laws of God or man.

Lord Fauconbridge. After this had they any doubt that they might lawfully marry?

Mr. Laroche. After the ſentence pronounced in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, I am firmly of opinion, that neither of them had a doubt as to the legality of the marriage.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I have many witneſſes to prove facts, which I believe will be admitted by the gentlemen on the other ſide, becauſe they have already been proved in another place: they are ſuch, as the lady at the bar living continually in the ſtate of a ſingle woman, and tranſacting in that character matters of conſequence relative to property: they are already contained in depoſitions in another place, and I ſhall offer to your lordſhips now that ſentence which has been pronounced in Doctors Commons: the officer ſwears he brought it from Doctors Commons. Your lordſhips are in poſſeſſion of it.

Mr. Attorney General. I have already ſtated to your lordſhips the meaſure which was obſerved in giving evidence in that caſe in Doctors Commons, both upon one ſide and the other; and I ſtated the meaſure obſerved upon the part of the priſoner in Doctors Commons to be that of her having given evidence, that ſhe acted as a ſingle woman in a great many tranſactions.

Mr. Wallace. Then, my lords, I call no more witneſſes.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Solicitor General, you will pleaſe to reply.

Mr. Solicitor General. My lords, the cuſtom which has prevailed in trials at your lordſhips bar, authorizes the counſel on the part of the proſecution to obſerve upon the evidence that has been laid before your lordſhips, and to apply that evidence to the charge. In the preſent caſe, wiſhing to diſcharge my duty as counſel in a public proſecution without the leaſt degree of unneceſſary ſeverity, or occaſioning a momentary reflection of pain to the adverſe party who ſtands at your lordſhips bar; reflecting on the whole courſe of the evidence that has been given; being in my own mind ſo clearly convinced as I am, that the evidence offered in ſupport of the proſecution has not in the leaſt degree been anſwered by any evidence that has been offered in defence; but, on the contrary, that the nature of the defence attempted ſupports, confirms, and gives credit to the charge; I find nothing on which I could with propriety obſerve in this period of the buſineſs at your lordſhips bar, but the ſpeech which has been made by the priſoner in defence. And I truſt, your lordſhips will think that it is in no degree abandoning the duty I owe unto the credit and weight of a public proſecution, if I decline entering into obſervations, in reply to a mere argumentative defence, offered to your lordſhips by a priſoner in perſon. I therefore hope that your lordſhips will think, that I have not failed in my duty, in declining to trouble your lordſhips any farther upon this matter.

Mr. Solicitor General having finiſhed his replication on the part of the proſecution, the ducheſs of Kingſton was ordered from the bar.

The houſe was then adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The lords, and others, returned to the chamber of parliament in the cuſtomary order, and after ſome time, the houſe was adjourned again into Weſtminſter-Hall.

The peers being ſeated, the lord high ſteward in his chair, and the houſe reſumed, the ſerjeant at arms made proclamation for ſilence, as uſual.

Lord High Steward. Your lordſhips have heard the evidence, and every thing that has been alledged on both ſides; and you have alſo heard the opinion of the learned and reverend judges upon the queſtions ſtated to them; and the ſolemnity of your proceedings requires that your lordſhips opinions on the queſtion of Guilty, or Not Guilty, ſhould be delivered ſeverally in the abſence of the priſoner, beginning with the junior baron; and that the priſoner ſhould afterwards be acquainted with the reſult of thoſe opinions by me. Is it your lordſhips pleaſure to proceed now to give your opinions upon the queſtion of Guilty or Not Guilty?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then the lord high ſteward ſtood up uncovered, and beginning with the youngeſt peer ſaid,

John Lord Sundridge (Duke of Argyle in Scotland), what ſays your lordſhip? Is the priſoner Guilty of the felony whereof ſhe ſtands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Whereupon John Lord Sundridge, ſtanding up in his place uncovered, and laying his right hand upon his breaſt, anſwered, GUILTY, upon my honour.

In like manner the ſeveral lords aftermentioned, being all that were preſent, anſwered as followeth:

Henry Lord Digby. Guilty, upon my honour.
Charles Lord Camden. Guilty, upon my honour.
George Venables Lord Vernon. Guilty, upon my honour.
Edward Lord Beaulieu. Guilty, upon my honour.

Granville Leveſon Earl Gower, Lord Preſident of the Council. Guilty, upon my honour.
His Royal Highneſs Henry Frederick Duke of Cumberland and Strathern. Guilty, upon my honour.

Then the lord high ſteward, ſtanding uncovered at the chair, laying his hand upon his breaſt, ſaid,

Lord High Steward. My lords, I am of opinion that the priſoner is Guilty, upon my honour.

Lord High Steward. My lords, all your lordſhips have found the priſoner guilty of the felony whereof ſhe ſtands indicted, one lord only excepted; who ſaid, that ſhe was guilty—'erroneouſly, but not intentionally:' is it your lordſhips pleaſure that ſhe ſhould be called in and acquainted therewith?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Proclamation was then made for the deputy-uſher of the black rod to bring her grace the ducheſs of Kingſton to the bar; which was done. Afterwards proclamation was made for ſilence, as uſual.

Lord High Steward. Madam, the lords have conſidered the charge and evidence brought againſt you, and have likewiſe conſidered of every thing which you have alledged in your defence; and, upon the whole matter, their lordſhips have found you guilty of the felony whereof you ſtand indicted. What have you to alledge againſt judgment being pronounced upon you?

The ducheſs of Kingſton delivered a paper, wherein her grace prayed the benefit of the peerage according to the ſtatutes.

Then his grace the lord high ſteward aſked the counſel for the proſecution, whether they had any objection to the ducheſs's claim of the benefit of the peerage?

Mr. Attorney General. My lords, not expecting to be called upon, I did not attend to the form of words uſed by the priſoner.——However, I underſtand, that ſhe claims the benefit of the ſtatutes; not confining herſelf, I ſuppoſe, in the form of her claim, to one ſtatute; but, alledgi herſelf to be a peereſs, claims the benefit of both; meaning to inſiſt, that the act, which exempts women from judgment of death, is to be conſtrued with reference to that, which allows clergy to lords of parliament.

My lords, upon this claim I ſuppoſe two queſtions will naturally ariſe; one, whether it be competent in her ſituation to claim that judgment, or an analogous judgment to that, which would have been pronounced upon a lord in parliament convicted of the like offence; the other, what would be the extent, or poſſible extent of that judgment upon a lord of parliament, ſo convicted.

My lords, I ſpeak to both theſe queſtions; becauſe I conceive, that, without aggravating the offence, I may fairly aſſume, that all the qualifications, which were put upon it, have been fully and effectually proved; the marriage; the iſſue of that marriage; the fraud upon public juſtice; the additional aggravation, that it was no leſs a ſurprize upon the duke of Kingſton, than a ſcandal to the reſt of the world.

This being the true ſtate of the caſe, it muſt occur to every noble lord's mind, that the laws of this country would be conſiderably diſgraced, if it were poſſible to ſtate to ſuch a court ſuch a crime, attended with all its circumſtances and qualifications, as an object of perfect impunity.

In this point of view, I ſhall take it for certain, that, if I can eſtabliſh in the judgment of your lordſhips my own firm perſuaſion, that this claim to avoid judgment of death cannot be made under the ſtatute of Edward VI. or with any reference to it, but muſt reſort to the act of William and Mary, I ſhall then have laid before your lordſhips that opportunity, which juſtice, undoubtedly, will be deſirous to lay hold on, of pronouncing a judgment ſomewhat more adequate to the offence; though perhaps, in the opinion of many, far enough from adequate. Or, if, contrary to my preſent thoughts, ſhe may claim any benefit from the firſt ſtatute, yet the act of Elizabeth will enable your lordſhips to make ſome ſlight ſatisfaction to the law for ſo enormous a violation of it.

My lords, this I take to be a clear propoſition, that, from the beginning of time to this hour, clergy was never demandable by women. By the ancient law of the land this privilege was ſo favourably uſed, that reading was ſufficient proof of clergy: and all were taken to be clerks, who lay under no indiſpenſable impediment to receive orders. This rule is laid down in all the books. Several ſtatutes, nay the Provincial Conſtitution of 1531, adopt the diſtinction thus made between perſons in holy orders, and other clerks, or lay clerks. But women were under this indiſpenſable impediment. They might be profeſſed, and become religious; but even a nun could not claim this privilege. This is proved by the ſame books: and lord Hale puts the caſe of manſlaughter, where the huſband ſhall have his clergy, and the wife no privilege. The ſtatutes, which exempt women from judgment of death, expreſly recite, that they were not intitled to clergy; and diſtinctly provide a new and different ſpecies of exemption.

Having reminded your lordſhips of this clear rule in the law, I ſhall take up the ſtatutes, which are material to this argument, in their order of time. This will lead me to conſider; firſt, what is the true nature and extent of that exemption from capital puniſhment, which his clergy gives to a lord of parliament, by the firſt of Edward the ſixth, and the eighteenth of Elizabeth; ſecondly, whether the twenty-firſt of James, or the third and fourth of William and Mary, contain any reference to thoſe other laws.

In order to explain the true effect of the ſtatute of Edward the ſixth, I ſhall conſider the ſituation, in which the peerage ſtood with reſpect to clergy, at the time of making it. I ſay, the ſituation of the peerage as to clergy; becauſe it will not be doubted, I ſuppoſe, that they were intitled to this valuable privilege in common with others. So peculiar and cruel a diſtinction could not have remained in perfect ſilence for ſuch a number of years. Nor, if they had been intitled to claim it upon peculiar terms, would thoſe have been unnoticed. Beſides, if there be no evidence of ſuch a privilege at any time, how can it be claimed now?

Although the allowance of clergy was ſetting aſide the conviction as to the perſon of the offender, his goods remained forfeit, and the king ſeized his lands under the record. By the 4th of Hen. VII. c. 13, it was to be allowed but once; and the convict was to be branded in open court, before the judge. And in the very year of the ſtatute now under conſideration, a long liſt of offences was deprived of it; and, even where it remained, ſlavery, with an iron yoke, was inflicted on the convict, as a vagabond.

It was thought too much to leave the lords of parliament expoſed to thoſe cruel and ſhameful ſtigmata; eſpecially in caſes, where they might make purgation, and ſo be reſtored to the exerciſe of their high functions. Nay, in ſuch inſtances even forfeiture was thought too much. It was alſo conceived by their lordſhips, that, in their caſe, capital puniſhment had extended too far. It was alſo thought proper to deliver a lord of parliament from the neceſſity of proving his title to clergy in the ordinary way. Therefore by the 1 E. VI. c. 12, ſ. 14, it was enacted, ‘ That in ‘ all and every caſe and caſes, where any of the king's majeſty's ſubjects ‘ ſhall and may, upon his prayer, have the privilege of clergy, as a clerk ‘ convict, that may make purgation; in all thoſe caſes and every of them, ‘ and alſo in all and every caſe and caſes of felony, wherein the privilege ‘ and benefit of clergy is reſtrained, excepted, or taken away by this ſtatute or act (wilful murder and poiſoning of malice prepenſed only excepted) the lord and lords of the parliament, and peer and peers of the ‘ realm, having place and voice in parliament, ſhall, by virtue of this ‘ preſent act, of common grace, upon his or their requeſt or prayer, alledging that he is a lord or peer of this realm, and claiming the benefit ‘ of this act, though he cannot read, without any burning in the hand, ‘ loſs of inheritance, or corruption of his blood, be adjudged, deemed, ‘ taken, and uſed, for the firſt time only, to all intents, conſtructions, and ‘ purpoſes, as a clerk convict, and ſhall be in caſe of a clerk convict, ‘ which may make purgation, without any further or other benefit or privilege of clergy to any ſuch lord or peer from thenceforth at any time ‘ after for any cauſe to be allowed, adjudged, or admitted; any law, ‘ ſtatute, uſage, cuſtom, or any other thing to the contrary in any-wiſe ‘ notwithſtanding.’ More ſhortly thus--At preſent, men prove their clergy by reading; and muſt forfeit, and be branded, before it may be obtained. For the future, in all caſes, where any of the king's ſubjects may now obtain privilege, as a clerk convict, who may make purgation, a lord of parliament, without reading, burning, or forfeiture, ſhall be adjudged and uſed as a clerk convict, who may make purgation. All that was harſh in the law, was taken off the peerage: all that was left, was privilege. The trial by the biſhop and his clerks (which differed from trial by peers, no more in the caſe of a lord than of a commoner) was not ſubſtituted in the place of legal trial, but ſuperadded to it, for his advantage. This was the only way, which had then been thought of, in any caſe, to avoid judgment of death. The reaſon of the thing, and the expreſs letter of the ſtatute unite to prove, that, till the eighteenth of Elizabeth, a lord of parliament, convicted of a clergyable crime, and being capable of purgation, muſt have been deemed and treated as a clerk convict, who might make purgation, and delivered over to the ordinary for that purpoſe.

The learned and laborious Staunford, our ableſt writer, at leaſt on this branch of the law, treats it as a thing without queſtion. Fol. 130. A lord ſhall have privilege of clergy, where a common perſon ſhall not have it. He ought to make purgation; and if ſo, he muſt be delivered to the ordinary, to be kept, till he has made his purgation. If he confeſſes, abjures, or is outlawed, he cannot have the benefit of this ſtatute; becauſe he cannot make purgation. Staunford flouriſhed when this ſtatute was made; wrote a few years after; and died before the eighteenth of Elizabeth. His therefore is a contemporary expoſition of it, unentangled with the caſual phraſe of any ſubſequent act.

Hale, in his ſecond volume, fol. 376, where he ſeems to differ from Staunford, as to the extent of the ſtatute, agrees with him as to the nature of the privilege; which he calls The Clergy of Noblemen. At one time, judges would not deliver clerks to the ordinary, who had become incapable of purgation, by confeſſion or otherwiſe. The church alledged, that nothing done before an unlawful judge was ſufficient to ſuſtain their proceſs, or ſentence. Whereupon the articuli cleri provided, that all clerks ſhall be delivered to their ordinaries. But they were delivered, in the inſtances mentioned by Staunford, abſque purgatione faciendâ. Now the caſe put in the ſtatute is, where any man may have the privilege of clergy, as a clerk convict that may make purgation. And a lord of parliament, being in the ſame predicament, was put in the caſe of a clerk convict that may make purgation, without reading or undergoing the pains which attended a commoner under thoſe circumſtances. Staunford therefore thought, that theſe exemptions did not reach to the caſe, where, before the ſtatute, there could be no purgation for any man. And the opinion was ſo probable, at leaſt, that a very eminent lawyer, of unexceptionable character, in the time of the great rebellion, actually burnt a peer, who confeſſed. Hale doubts; eſpecially at this day, when delivery to the ordinary and purgation are both taken away by the eighteenth of Elizabeth. It is not obvious what difference that makes. I think, ſays he, it was never meant, that a peer of the realm ſhould be put to read, or be burnt, where a common perſon ſhould be put to his clergy. Both agree, that the peer ſhould have had his clergy, and have been delivered to the ordinary, and have made purgation, exempt from the concomitant penalties; in ſome caſes, ſays Staunford; in all, ſays Hale. But even Hale makes no doubt of peers being liable to impriſonment.

In the trial of lord Warwick, the chief juſtice lays it down, That the ſtatute of Edward VI. exempted peers from the penalty of burning, and repealed the ſtatute of Henry VII. as to ſo much. Then a peer was liable to burning before; and by the act of Henry VII. which, in terms, puts it upon perſons admitted to their clergy. But how could it be ſeriouſly argued, that a thing ſo anxiouſly repealed never exiſted? I have conſulted on this occaſion as many books, as I could think of referring to; and I do not recollect one, which ſuppoſes a time when a peer had not the benefit of his clergy.

Nothing, it muſt be confeſſed, could be more unprincipled, and incongruous, than to ſuffer the truth or juſtice of a conviction at common law to be queſtioned in the Eccleſiaſtical Court. But the church had not then loſt its hold upon men's minds; nor would, probably, for ſome ages, but for its own glaring miſconduct.

The trial called purgation, as it was had in the Biſhop's Court, was a ridiculous mockery of juſtice; or became ſerious, only by the perjury which it produced. It was therefore aboliſhed. But ſimply to aboliſh it would alſo have cut off that impriſonment, which followed a conviction in the Biſhop's Court, and which (it ſhould have been preſumed) would always follow actual guilt. To remedy which, it was thought fit to give the court authority to puniſh by impriſonment for any time leſs than a year. This was proper in all caſes; but particularly ſo in the caſes of peers, and perſons in holy orders, who were not liable to burning in the hand. It was therefore enacted by the eighteenth of Elizabeth, c. 7. ſ. 2, and 3, ‘ That every perſon and perſons, which at any time, after this preſent ‘ ſeſſion of parliament, ſhall be admitted and allowed to have the benefit ‘ or privilege of his or their clergy, ſhall not thereupon be delivered to the ‘ ordinary, as hath been accuſtomed; but, after ſuch clergy allowed, and ‘ burning in the hand according to the ſtatute in that behalf provided, ‘ ſhall forthwith be enlarged, and delivered out of priſon, by the juſtices, ‘ before whom ſuch clergy ſhall be granted, that cauſe notwithſtanding.

‘ Provided, neverthleſs, and be it alſo enacted, that the juſtices, before ‘ whom ſuch allowance of clergy ſhall be had, ſhall and may, for the further correction of ſuch perſons, to whom ſuch clergy ſhall be allowed, ‘ detain and keep them in priſon, for ſuch convenient time, as the ſame ‘ juſtices in their diſcretion ſhall think convenient; ſo as the ſame do not ‘ exceed one year's impriſonment; any law or uſage, heretofore had or ‘ uſed, to the contrary notwithſtanding.’

The effect of theſe words, ſhall for hwith be enlarged and delivered out of priſon, that cauſe notwithſtanding, is to give the perſon ſo enlarged exactly the ſame ſtate and condition which he would have obtained, under the former diſpenſation of law, by going through the proceſs of purgation, and ſo being delivered from the offence. This part of the act carries a great effect upon the conſtruction of the whole. In converſation, I have heard the words, after burning in the hand, ſuppoſed to be the phraſe, upon which ſome doubt might turn, whether peers are included in the act. But, in the conſtruction of ſuch a ſtatute, it is not enough to find a phraſe, upon which ſome doubt might turn. It would be fitter for thoſe who conceive the doubt, to proceed at leaſt one ſtep further; and ſtate, to what extent their doubt goes. Is it doubted, whether purgation be taken away in the caſe of a peer, and the peer be reſtored to his law without it? Will any gentleman argue, that, at this day, a peer convicted of a clergyable crime, ſhall not be forthwith enlarged; but muſt be delivered to the ordinary to make his purgation? This point, I believe, never has, nor ever will be argued. If he is not to undergo purgation, quo jure is he exempt? Does any other ſtatute exempt a peer from his purgation, or diſcharge him from his attainder, but this general ſtatute of the eighteenth of Elizabeth; which, in its large phraſe, comprehends every body? I proteſt I know of none. Or, does this ſtatute exempt any, but thoſe, who ſhall be thereafter admitted to Clergy? The words, after burning in the hand, do not make an eſſential or neceſſary article in the deſcription of the perſons to be diſcharged; nor create any term, or condition, upon which the diſcharge is to obtain. The deſcription of the perſons to be diſcharged is abſolved in theſe words, all perſons who ſhall be allowed the benefit of their clergy. They are to be diſcharged abſolutely. But when? and in what manner? Why, after the allowance of clergy, and burning in the hand according to the ſtatute; which is to ſay, in the caſes provided by the ſtatute; of which the caſe of a peer is not one.

The whole conſequence is no more than this, that, in a caſe circumſtanced like the preſent, where the honour of the law and the purity of manners require ſome example to be made, your lordſhips may follow the bent of your diſcretion, by reſorting to the laſt clauſe in the eighteenth of Elizabeth. This I ſay, upon a ſuppoſition, that ſome peer ſtood convicted of the like offence, with ſimilar aggravation; or that, upon the reſt of the argument, it will be poſſible to give any woman the benefit of any ſtatute, pari ratione, as peers have the benefit of clergy, under the firſt of Edward VI. But I hope to prove ſoon, that it is impoſſible to conſtrue the ſubſequent ſtatute in that manner. Conſequently there will be due to this crime a very different ſort of puniſhment than that which I have alluded to.

It will hardly be ſaid, that theſe ſtatutes relate to women of any condition. The expreſſion excludes them diſtinctly enough. If that had been more general, the ſubject matter excludes them abſolutely. They are no more clerks, than lords of parliament. They never underwent purgation; nor were delivered to the ordinary; they were therefore incapable of receiving theſe privileges: for theſe acts were merely to regulate an old right, not to give a new one. Both the ſtatutes, which give them their exemption, recite it as a general propoſition, that women were not entitled to clergy. Nor have I even ſeen any ſtatute, caſe, or book, wherein any condition of women is ſuppoſed exempt, but by virtue of the laws I ſhall ſtate preſently. It remains then to be conſidered, whether the exemption provided by thoſe laws, has any reference to the ſtatute of Edward VI.

The firſt ſtatute, which exempts women from capital puniſhment in any caſe of felony, is the twenty-firſt of James I. c. 6, which runs thus:—
‘ Whereas, by the laws of this realm, the benefit of clergy is not allowed
‘ to women convicted of felony; by reaſon whereof many women do
‘ ſuffer death for ſmall cauſes; be it enacted by the authority of this ‘ preſent parliament, that any woman, being lawfully convicted by her ‘ confeſſion, or by the verdict of twelve men, of, or for the felonious taking
‘ of any money, goods, or chattels above the value of twelve-pence, and ‘ under the value of ten ſhillings; or as acceſſary to any ſuch offence;
‘ the ſaid offence being no burglary, nor robbery in or near the highway,
‘ nor the felonious taking of any money, goods, or chattels, from the perſon
‘ of any man or woman privily, without his or their knowledge, but only
‘ ſuch an offence as in the like caſe a man might have his clergy, ſhall,
‘ for the firſt offence, be branded, and marked in the hand, upon the brawn
‘ of the left thumb, with a hot burning iron, having a roman T upon the ‘ ſaid iron; the ſaid mark to be made by the gaoler, openly, in the court,
‘ before the judge; and alſo to be further puniſhed by impriſonment,
‘ whipping, ſtocking, or ſending to the houſe of correction, in ſuch ſort, ‘ manner, and form, and for ſo long time (not exceeding the ſpace of one ‘ whole year) as the judge, judges, or other juſtices, before whom ſhe ſhall ‘ be ſo convicted, or which ſhall have authority in the cauſe, ſhall, in ‘ their diſcretion, think meet, according to the quality of the offence,
‘ and then to be delivered out of priſon for that offence; any law, cuſtom,
‘ or uſage to the contrary notwithſtanding.’

This ſtatute, at leaſt, excludes all colour of reference to the firſt of Edward VI. Any woman convicted of grand larceny (if it be but a ſimple felony, clergyable in a man) ſhall be burnt. She was not put to demand benefit of the ſtatute; to pray her clergy would have been too abſurd; but, the larceny being ſtated in the record to be committed by a woman, judgment was forthwith entered of burning, and ſo forth. The ſtatute is, moreover, confined to ſuch larcenies, where, in the like caſe, a man might have his clergy. I take notice of theſe words at preſent, only for the ſake of remarking that, in this ſtatute, at leaſt, they muſt relate to the quality of the offence, not to the condition of the offender.

My lords, the only ſtatute, of which the priſoner can claim the benefits againſt judgment of death, is the third and fourth of William and Mary, c. 9. ſ. 6. which runs in theſe words: ‘ And whereas, by the laws of this ‘ realm, women convicted of felony, for ſtealing of goods and chattels of ‘ the value of ten ſhillings, and upwards, and for other felonies, where a ‘ man is to have the benefit of his clergy, are to ſuffer death; be it therefore ‘ enacted and declared by the authority aforeſaid, that, where a man, ‘ being convicted of any felony, for which he may demand the benefit of ‘ his clergy, if a woman be convicted for the ſame or like offence, upon her ‘ prayer to have the benefit of this ſtatute, judgment of death ſhall not be ‘ given againſt her upon ſuch conviction; or execution awarded upon any ‘ outlawry for ſuch offence; but ſhall ſuffer the ſame puniſhment as a ‘ man ſhould ſuffer that has the benefit of his clergy allowed him in the ‘ like caſe; that is to ſay, ſhall be burnt in the hand by the gaoler, in ‘ open court, and be further kept in priſon for ſuch time as the juſtices in ‘ their diſcretion ſhall think fit, ſo as the ſame do not exceed one year's ‘ impriſonment.’ Under this act, to avoid judgment of death, the priſoner muſt pray the benefit of this ſtatute.

I collect from converſation, perhaps too idle to be referred to, that the argument will be laid thus. A woman convict of a felony which would be clergyable in a man, ſhall ſuffer the ſame puniſhment as a man would do in the like caſe, that is, as a man of the ſame condition with herſelf: but a peer would ſuffer no puniſhment: therefore a woman of that condition ſhall ſuffer none.

The words, in the like caſe, muſt mean the ſame here, as in the twenty-firſt of James, convicted of the like offence. And the words of the ſame condition muſt be wholly ſuperadded, if they are admitted at all. But it is impoſſible to conceive, that, if the legiſlature had meant to create ſo important a diſtinction between different orders of women, it would have uſed no words for that purpoſe. Nor, indeed, can ſuch a diſtinction be ſo created by any operation of law.

If, in favour of the priſoner, the ſlighteſt degree of puniſhment, which any man can ſuffer in the like caſe, is to be intended, every woman would claim exemption from burning, becauſe inferior eccleſiaſticks are not burnt; and from forfeiture, becauſe lords of parliament are neither burnt nor forfeit. But this abſurd conſtruction happens to be thrown out by the act itſelf, which appoints the puniſhment, it means, to be burning and impriſonment. The ſtatute therefore will not ſuffer it to be underſtood, that any woman, convicted of any felony, ſhall ſuffer no other puniſhment, than thoſe who, it is now contended, are to ſuffer no puniſhment at all.

Upon theſe grounds I ſubmit to your lordſhips, that the judgment to be pronounced upon every woman, of whatever quality or denomination, is that, which is preſcribed by the third and fourth of William and Mary; and that there is no ground or warrant of law to inſiſt, that a peereſs can avoid judgment of death upon any other terms.

My lords, the whole queſtion is upon burning. The impriſonment is the ſame either way. Now, if there be prudence or propriety of any ſort in eſtabliſhing ſuch an exemption for peereſſes, let that prudence or propriety be ſtated, where by the conſtitution of this country ſuch an application ought to be made to parliament. If the parliament ſhould think fit to create new privileges, or add new diſtinctions to any order of men, or women, they are competent to do it. But it would be aſſuming too much for any court of juſtice. Your lordſhips ſit here merely as a court of juſtice, not as a houſe of legiſlature. To do that by forced and arbitrary interpretation of law, which ought only to be done by act of legiſlature, is too much enhancing the prerogative of the judge; and too much confounding thoſe authorities, which ought to have plainer marks and broader limits ſet between them.

Mr. Wallace.

My lords, I did not ſuppoſe it would have fallen to my ſhare to give your lordſhips any trouble upon this ſubject; and therefore I have not very lately looked into the ſtatutes which have been mentioned; but I will ſtate to your lordſhips in general, what I underſtand to be the privilege of peereſſes at this day.

By the 20th Hen. VIth, chap. 9. to obviate doubts which had ariſen upon Magna Charta, peereſſes are put upon a footing with peers with reſpect to trial and puniſhment; and by an equitable conſtruction, peereſſes by titles ſince created, as marchioneſſes and viſcounteſſes, are within the act.

At the time of paſſing the act of Edward the VIth, the lords of parliament are mentioned, which at that time of day comprehended the whole peerage. In this ſituation were peers at the time of paſſing the ſtatute of the 18th of Elizabeth, which ſtatute cannot relate to them. Every perſon, who is to be admitted or allowed to have the benefit or privilege of clergy, ſhould not after burning in the hand be delivered to the ordinary, as has been cuſtomary, but may be detained in priſon. This proviſion clearly refers to the ſituation of commoners, and not of peers: it refers to thoſe who were at the time of making the act liable; whereas peers were not in that condition; they were not to pray their clergy, but the benefit of that act, and to be delivered out without burning in the hand. The direction given by the act is to juſtices: an expreſſion never applied, I believe, in any act to the lords in parliament ſitting in their judicial capacity as a criminal court: the juſtices are to keep ſuch perſons in priſon after they are burnt in the hand; which is a demonſtration that inferior courts are alluded to; and it is under this ſtatute impriſonment is inflicted upon perſons intitled to their clergy.

At the time of paſſing the ſtatute of the 3d and 4th of William and Mary, peers were exempt from burning in the hand and impriſonment in clergyable caſes, which commoners were ſubject to. By this law women are put on the ſame footing with men, and the courts before whom they are tried are to inflict the ſame puniſhment as they are authorized to do upon men. Theſe proviſions make it, in my apprehenſion, extremely clear, that the peereſſes were intended to be placed in the ſame condition with peers, as they were by Magna Charta, explained by the ſtatute of Edward the VIth. Would it not be the moſt harſh and cruel interpretation, if the act was even doubtful, to ſubject a peereſs to a puniſhment for the ſame crime which her huſband is exempt from? The conditions of perſons create diſtinctions in the conſtruction of laws; but the attempt now made is to confound all ranks, and by ſuppoſed literal interpretation to involve one of your lordſhips own ſituation in the puniſhment, which the legiſlature has been ſo anxious to extricate you from.

Mr. Mansfield.

It is not till this moment, that I had any apprehenſion myſelf, that any queſtion of this ſort would be agitated before your lordſhips; and therefore I can only ſpeak of the ſeveral ſtatutes referred to from my general memory of them; but I apprehend that the conſtruction of theſe ſtatutes will not, cannot be ſuch as is now contended for on the part of the proſecutor. The object of the conſtruction wiſhed by the proſecutor is this: that the laws of this country are to make a difference between one ſex and the other; that they are now at this time of day to be ſo determined as to inflict a more ſevere, a more cruel puniſhment upon a woman than on a man, though the offence committed be the ſame. Now, ſuch a conſtruction your lordſhips would never ſuffer, nor any court of juſtice in this country would ſuffer to take place, unleſs there ſhould ſomething be found in the law which neceſſarily requires it: and taking the ſeveral ſtatutes together relating to this ſubject, I apprehend your lordſhips will be of opinion, that theſe ſtatutes do not only not require, but that they exclude, ſuch abſurdity, ſuch inhumanity.

My lords, the ſtatute upon which the whole muſt be founded, as I conceive, is that of the 20th of king Henry the VIth, which, as well as I recollect from my memory, is chap. 11. which firſt provides expreſsly, though I believe it is conſidered only as a declaration of the common law, but provides, that peereſſes ſhould be tried, and, if I recollect the words rightly, ſhould not only be tried, but ſhould be judged in the ſame manner as peers: and remembering what has happened upon that ſtatute, I muſt put your lordſhips in mind, that ſuch has been the benignity of the conſtruction upon it, that though only three ranks of peereſſes are named, it has been clearly held in conſtruction to extend to all. The three that are mentioned, I think, are ducheſſes, counteſſes, and baroneſſes. The conſtruction is, that it extends to marchioneſſes and viſcounteſſes, becauſe they are intitled in the ſpirit and meaning of the law to the ſame privilege which is given to the other ladies by name. The clear reſult and effect of this ſtatute is, to ſay in general terms, that women of that high rank ſhould be tried and ſhould be judged in the ſame manner as men. The terms uſed in the act are general. Whoever reads that law, will be aſtoniſhed to hear any man contending, that in impoſing judgment upon a peereſs, your lordſhips are to be guided by a different rule from that which you would follow if you were paſſing judgment upon a peer. The next ſtatute to be conſidered after this, as a general ſtatute upon the ſubject, is that of the 3d and 4th of king William the third. Did that ſtatute mean,—were the legiſlators that made it ſo forgetful of what was due to humanity, and to themſelves and their own characters, as to mean, that a diſtinction in puniſhment ſhould prevail between one ſex and the other, to the prejudice of that which is intitled to the greater indulgence and compaſſion? Moſt certainly not; becauſe the expreſs proviſion of that ſtatute is, that women convicted of offences intitled to the benefit of clergy ſhould ſuffer in the ſame manner as men would ſuffer convicted of the ſame offences.

My lords, no man, who can read that ſtatute, and reaſon upon it, can help concluding that it was the object of that law to ſay, that where women were convicted of clergyable offences, they ſhould be in as good a ſituation as men who were convicted of the like.

My lords, taking theſe two ſtatutes of the 20th of Henry the ſixth providing for the trial and judgment of peereſſes, and the general ſtatute of the 3d and 4th of William the third giving the benefit of clergy to women, I ſhould think it impoſſible to ſay, that peereſſes convicted of a clergyable offence were not to have preciſely the ſame privileges as peers convicted of ſuch offences.

My lords, if there be any rule of conſtruction in the law, which is indiſputable, for expounding ſtatutes, it is this; that ſtatutes, as we ſay, in pari materiâ, relating to one ſubject, are to be conſidered as one law, taken and interpreted together as throwing light one upon the other: no rule of conſtruction is better eſtabliſhed. Follow that rule of conſtruction here. Take firſt the general law for the trial of peereſſes and the judgment of peereſſes in the ſame manner as of peers; then take the general law, giving the benefit of clergy to women in the ſame manner as to men; and who will not ſay, that that rule of conſtruction does not neceſſarily tend to put both, upon the rank of men and women, in the ſame condition, when convicted of the ſame ſpecies of offence? But what are the particular acts of parliament, which have been referred to as requiring a different conſtruction? By the firſt of Edward the ſixth, it is extremely clear, that peers are not to undergo the ignominious puniſhment of burning. The ſtatute that follows that of Edward the ſixth, is the 18th of Elizabeth, which takes away the delivery to the ordinary, ſubſtitutes burning in its place, and then gives a power to impriſon. Whoever reads that act, will ſee that it certainly was confined to caſes, where puniſhment was to be inflicted by juſtices upon perſons of an ordinary deſcription, not perſons of the rank of peers; and the ſtatute ſtrictly and clearly relates only to perſons ſo having clergy allowed, as is preſcribed by that ſtatute: and if the 18th of Elizabeth is to have the conſtruction which is contended for, I underſtand it muſt have effect alſo to inflict the puniſhment of burning upon peers. So much, my lords, for the ſtatute of the 18th of Elizabeth. The 21ſt of king James was mentioned as firſt in part giving clergy to women: the 3d and 4th of king William the third is mentioned as alluding to it. It does ſo, but the proviſions of the 3d and 4th of king William the third are general, that is, a general law extending the benefit of clergy to women in all caſes. Now it is ſaid there, that they ſhall have the ſame puniſhment as men; they are to be in the like ſituation as men. Then the act goes on to ſay, that is to ſay, burning and impriſoning.

My lords, what is the fair conſtruction of this law? Why, that women ſhall be in the ſame ſituation as men; and where men are of ſuch condition, that they would be burnt in the hand, that they would be liable to be impriſoned, women in like manner ſhould be ſubject to burning in the hand, and ſhould be ſubject to impriſonment: but no one ever heard, that the ſevere part of a law inflicting a puniſhment ſhould be extended ſo by conſtruction, where it was not ſo expreſs. Now you muſt act againſt the clear proviſion of that law, that women ſhould be in the ſame ſituation as men, if you were to ſay, that a peereſs convicted of a clergyable offence ſhould either undergo the puniſhment of burning, or the puniſhment of impriſonment. No one can ſay upon the ſtatute of Edward the ſixth, that they are ſubject to either. The object of the ſtatute of William the third was to make the puniſhment of ſuch offenders preciſely the ſame with regard to one ſex as the other; and the true ſpirit and great object of that law muſt be directly acted againſt, if a peereſs was to be put in a different ſituation than a peer, and to have a more ſevere and cruel puniſhment inflicted upon her, than would be upon him. Theſe are the only general obſervations that occur to me now in taking the whole ſcope of the law: I therefore ſubmit to your lordſhips, that the noble lady at the bar is intitled to the benefit of theſe ſtatutes.

Mr. Attorney General.

My lords, concerning the point which is now depending before the houſe, I fairly confeſs, that, when your lordſhips firſt called upon me to give my reaſons why judgment of death ſhould not be ſuſpended upon the prayer of the priſoner, made in the manner in which that prayer was conceived; and upon the effects and conſequences of allowing her the benefit of the ſtatute in a more regular courſe; I would rather, if I might, have been excuſed from laying my thoughts before your lordſhips. I had heard a rumour, that men, whoſe learning and authority I greatly reverence, held a different opinion. This would not fail to raiſe much diſtruſt of my own concluſions; although I had thoroughly conſidered the ſubject; and although I never read any propoſition with more perfect conviction of the truth of it, ſince I learnt to read.

My lords, that idea, the only one I have been able to form, or adopt, is now very much ſtrengthened. That cloud, which came over it from the rumoured prevalence of contrary notion, is very much removed. Becauſe, if there be no opinion to the contrary, but what is to be founded on the argument I have heard to-day from thoſe who are beſt able to ſuſtain the contrary opinion, I am perfectly ſatisfied, it is impoſſible this ſhould paſs as a point of law, or receive the ſanction of your lordſhips concurrence.

My lords, what are the arguments? Firſt, it is utterly inconceivable, that the law ſhould put ſuch difference between the two ſexes. My lords, if the ſubject was laid by for a moment, only to make a handſome compliment to a very reſpectable part of this aſſembly, which well deſerves all the attention it commands, it is impoſſible to quarrel with a turn of gallantry. But, reſuming the ſubject, we are all agreed, that the law did actually put that very difference between the ſexes for many centuries. And this uncourtly ſtatute of Edward the ſixth, proceeding upon the law as it found it, did not think of aboliſhing the diſtinction. It was quite beſide the purpoſe of that act, which did not mean to qualify the ſeverity of the criminal law in general, much leſs to make an equal diſtribution of it among the ſubjects at large. But, taking the law as it ſtood, it was found inconvenient, incompatible, and ſhocking to reaſon, that lords of parliament, who were to give their voices upon the moſt arduous affairs of a great empire, ſhould do ſo under apparent ſtigmata and circumſtances of open infamy. I don't rely on the gender of the words, but on the purpoſe of the act. Women are excluded by both. They were neither liable to the ſtigmata, nor held the high office which made them intolerable. Therefore biſhops, whom the twenty-eighth and thirty-ſecond of Henry the eighth had, at that time, made liable to the whole caſe of other clerks convict, were included: women certainly not. The privilege was given, not to the peerage, but to the houſe of parliament, to be claimed by the members as ſuch. It was not ſubſtantive; but an ingraftment on the right to clergy, which women never had. In truth, I have not heard a hint from the counſel on the other ſide to queſtion the exiſtence of this difference down to the third and fourth of William and Mary, upon which act they have chiefly relied in argument. They lay it down, that peers convict of clergyable crimes are exempt from all puniſhment, not being within the eighteenth of Elizabeth; that peereſſes are to be tried and judged like peers; that the third and fourth of William and Mary puts women convict in the ſame condition as men; and that by ſome tacit reference to the former ſtatutes, peereſſes convict are not to be puniſhed at all.

I have troubled your lordſhips already with my reaſons for thinking, that, in old time, peers enjoyed the benefit of clergy in common with other men, and upon the ſame terms; that in the fourth of Henry the ſeventh, burning was inflicted upon them as lay-clerks; that the ſtatute of Edward the ſixth, in the very moment of exempting them from the penalties incurred at law by conviction, adjudges them clerks, and delivers them for purgation in the Biſhop's Court; that the ſtatute of Elizabeth delivers all, who ſhall thereafter be admitted to clergy, from purgation, and diſcharges them, ſubject to ſuch correction by impriſonment for leſs than a year, as the court ſhall think fit.

It is not denied, that theſe words, in their plain and natural ſenſe, embrace the caſe of peers. But, in this context, it is ſuppoſed they do not, becauſe the clerks convict are to be diſcharged after allowance of their clergy, and after burning in the hand according to the ſtatute. This laſt proviſion, they ſay, cannot refer to peers. Nay, one learned gentleman thought, that, if it ſhould be conſtrued to include peers, they muſt, by force of theſe words, be burnt in the hand.

I cannot follow this idea. I have no way of conceiving, how an act which inflicts, or rather reſerves a penalty, according to the law as it then ſtood, can be interpreted to create a new penalty; or, by what chain of reaſoning it is concluded, that where all convicts are to be diſcharged upon the allowance of clergy, and ſuch burning as the law directs, thoſe are not to be diſcharged at all, for whom the law has not directed burning. Suppoſe the king ſhould pardon the burning: it was thought, in lord Warwick's caſe, that would be a perfect diſcharge. Burning was not ſubſtituted in the place of purgation: that was a mere ſlip: it is contrary to the hiſtory: burning exiſted before the eighteenth of Elizabeth, in juſt the ſame extent as after. Impriſonment, at the diſcretion of the temporal judge, was the ſubſtitute for purgation; and is extended expreſsly to all, who are diſcharged from purgation. But it ſeems too late to argue this. Was it not expreſsly decided in the caſe of Searl and Williams, when prohibition went to ſtay the deprivation of a parſon, who had been convicted of manſlaughter, and diſcharged under the eighteenth of Elizabeth, although he could not be burnt? ‘ For when ‘ the ſtatute ſays after burning, it imports, where burning ought to be; ‘ otherwiſe the ſtatute would do no good to clerks, for whom it was moſt ‘ intended.’ The caſe is reported in Hobart. The ſtatute ſpeaks univerſally of every body, thoſe who were, and thoſe who were not liable to burning; and diſcharges them all, after allowance of clergy, and burning according to law, as it had ſtood before; that is, reddendo ſingula ſingulis.

The next objection is, that the word juſtices will not apply to your lordſhips, even while you are ſitting merely in the characters of judges. Therefore a ſtatute, which is to be executed by juſtices, cannot relate to a peer, who is not triable by juſtices.

Is it then ſeriouſly contended, that your lordſhips, exerciſing your juriſdiction in the trial of a peer, will not do all the ſame acts of juſtice, which judges muſt do in the trial of a commoner? Upon reading many acts of parliament, your lordſhips will find, either, that you have no juriſdiction at all, or that you muſt exerciſe it under the character and denomination of juſtices. The ſame objection might have been made to lord Ferrers's execution; the ſame to the burning a peer under the ſtatute of Henry the ſeventh. By the word juſtices I underſtand, in our law, all manner of officers who are intruſted with the adminiſtration of juſtice. So Spelman defines the word. In high antiquity, the name went to the greateſt ſubject in this country; for I take the Juſtitia totius Angliæ to have been above the Seneſchallus Regis. Your lordſhips therefore will not diſdain the name; for you ſit here in no higher character than that, which, by juſt and natural conſtruction, is attributed to the word juſtices. Therefore, if no better objections can be raiſed than theſe, I apprehend the words of the ſtatute ſufficiently comprize the peerage. This alſo was laid down in the trial of lord Warwick.

But, my lords, if theſe are objections, whither do they go? Not only to ſubvert the ſtatute of Elizabeth, in this moſt reaſonable particular of giving ſome convenient correction, as the ſtatute calls it, to a criminal found ſo upon record; but to reſtore a law, which has now for many ages been underſtood to be at an end; and I flatter myſelf, conſidering the account which the books all give of it, that purgation is at an end.

But I am called upon to look at the 20th of H. VI. c. 9. This was a mere declaratory law; reciting the 29th chapter of Magna Charta, nullus liber homo, and ſo forth, and a very abſurd doubt, whether homo included both genders; and declaring, that ‘ ladies ſhall be put to an- ‘ ſwer, and judged before ſuch judges and peers’ (here by the way judges and peers are ſynonimous) ‘ as peers ſhould be.’ But though, by Magna Charta, peereſſes were to be tried by their peers, as other women were by theirs, there the privilege ends. All were, upon conviction, to receive the like judgment and execution: and, in the exemption from death, the difference was not between the ranks, but the ſexes, of the convicts. And ſo the law undoubtedly continued, notwithſtanding this ſtatute.

But it was ſaid, that, by the equity of this ſtatute, marchioneſſes and viſcounteſſes were included, though not named. This was to give countenance to the rule, that all ſtatutes in pari materiâ ſhall be conſtrued alike. There is great good ſenſe in the rule. Marchioneſſes and viſcounteſſes were clearly within the law declared; and conſequently within the reaſon of declaring it: therefore ducheſſes, counteſſes, and baroneſſes were, by a ſort of ſynechdoche, put for all peereſſes. So where a privilege is ſaved to certain denominations of people, all others, who were before within the ſame privilege, will be within the ſaving, if there be nothing in the context to raiſe a diſtinction againſt them; particularly, if the ſaving be only declaratory, and not a poſitive exception. Nay, in a new law, things, equally within the reaſon of it, have been comprized in it by conſtruction. But this borders upon arbitrary: parliament ſeems the propereſt judge of this reaſon. If peers, diſqualified to vote, ſhould claim the benefit of the firſt of Edward the ſixth, it might be argued with ſome plauſibility, that they are within the reaſon of the act. They are ſo certainly, in every point, except that of voting; and yet I ſhould think it too much to overlook ſo material a diſtinction made by the ſtatute itſelf. But if women, who were not concerned in any part of the ſubject matter, make the ſame claim, it would be making a perfectly new law to include them. Where then is the paritas materiæ between the act of William and Mary, for exempting women from capital puniſhment, and the twentieth of Henry the ſixth, which had nothing to do with puniſhment; or the firſt of Edward the ſixth, which had nothing to do with women?

I did propoſe two ſtatutes to be conſidered in pari materiâ, the acts of James and of William and Mary; the only two, which confer upon any woman any exemption from capital puniſhment. I have not heard it denied, that if a peereſs had ſtood convicted of the crimes mentioned in the firſt act, the puniſhment there ſpecified muſt have enſued. This fixes the ſenſe of theſe words, in the like caſe. I am poſſeſſed therefore of this ground, that the act of Edward the ſixth did not touch the difference put by the law of clergy between the ſexes; nor that of James make any difference as to the quality of the offender. We go intirely upon the act of William and Mary. It is inaccurate to ſay, this acts puts women into the ſame condition with men; and ſtill more, with men of the ſame quality reſpectively. There is nothing in it about the condition of the perſon. Where a man, convict of any felony, has clergy, a woman, convict of the like offence, ſhall not have judgment of death, but ſuffer the ſame puniſhment as a man would ſuffer, with clergy, in the like caſe. Theſe words refer altogether to the quality of the offence. That very crime, which in one record, applied to a man, infers judgment of death, avoidable by his claim of clergy, applied in another to a woman, infers the ſpecifick judgment preſcribed by the act. Nor are the two ſexes put into the ſame condition, even as to puniſhment. All women avoided judgment of death; not ſo of all men. Some were indiſpenſably incapable of holy orders: ſuch cannot have their clergy at this day; nor had any other exemption from death before the fifth of Anne. Some could not prove their title to clergy by reading. Men could have their clergy but once; women the benefit of this ſtatute toties quoties, till a ſubſequent act altered the law in this reſpect.

Still leſs can the words be twiſted to create a difference as to rank of the offender. It is hard, ſays a learned gentleman, to put the ſevereſt conſtruction upon an act of this ſort. The act is not penal. But the ſhorter anſwer is, there are not two conſtructions to chuſe between. If the phraſe had been left general, the ſame puniſhment as a man ſhould ſuffer that had his clergy in the like caſe, it might have been thought uncertain what that puniſhment ſhould be; becauſe different orders of men were liable to different meaſure of puniſhment in the like caſe; the bulk of men to forfeiture, burning, and diſcretionary impriſonment; inferior eccleſiaſticks to forfeiture and impriſonment; lords of parliament to impriſonment only. In ſuch a text there might have been room to contend for a favourable conſtruction; and yet, even then, I ſhould have thought that the meaſure of puniſhment allotted to the bulk of mankind, undiſtinguiſhed by peculiar privileges, muſt have been deemed the meaning of the legiſlature. But whatever might have been the conſtruction of ſuch a text, it muſt have applied equally to all women. They could not have been claſſed in caſts, according to the condition of their reſpective huſbands; the wife of a lord of parliament to be impriſoned; of an inferior eccleſiaſtick to be impriſoned and to forfeit; of other men to be impriſoned, to forfeit, and be burnt. The ſtatute however has put an end to all queſtion, by ſtating expreſsly the very meaſure of puniſhment allotted to all women.

Burnt in the hand in open court, it is ſaid, ſhall not apply to peereſſes, becauſe they were never liable to be burnt at all. The poſition is true, not of peereſſes alone, but of all women. But they were liable to judgment of death; for which this ſlighter puniſhment was a deſirable commutation.

My lords, if there be any thing in the nature of the puniſhment unreaſonable, or improper to be applied to women in general, or to noblewomen in particular, let the matter come before parliament. It is a legiſlative conſideration, and parliament will entertain it according to the extent of the principle, which certainly will apply to many noblewomen of much higher rank than ſome peereſſes, who, as the law now ſtands, are liable to that puniſhment. So, I think, they ought to remain. Guilt levels rank. A noble-woman, covered with the ignominy of ſuch a conviction, cannot forfeit leſs than her eſtimation.

My lords, the only queſtion is this: has any poſitive law granted the exemption now demanded, to wind up ſuch a record as this with perfect impunity, a ridiculous diſgrace to publick juſtice? Has this been done in expreſs terms; or in terms, whoſe neceſſary conſtruction amounts to expreſs?

My lords, when I have qualified the queſtion in that manner, I have gone to the verge of judicial authority. And I do deſire to preſs this upon your lordſhips as an univerſal maxim: No more dangerous idea can creep into the mind of a judge, than the imagination, that he is wiſer than the law. I confine this to no judge, whatever be his denomination, but extend it to all. And, ſpeaking at the bar of an Engliſh court of juſtice, I make ſure of your lordſhips approbation, when I comprize even your lordſhips, ſitting in Weſtminſter-Hall. It is a grievous example to other judges. If your lordſhips aſſume this, ſitting in judgment, why not the King's-Bench? why not commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer? If they do ſo, why not the Quarter Seſſions? Ingenious men may ſtrain the law very far——but, to pervert it----to new-model it---the genius of our conſtitution ſays, judges have no ſuch authority, nor ſhall preſume to exerciſe it.

The lords then adjourned to the chamber of parliament; and, after ſome time paſſed there,

See the Appendix,

the houſe adjourned again into Weſtminſter-Hall; when, after the uſual proclamation for ſilence, his grace the lord high ſteward addreſſed the ducheſs of Kingſton to the following effect:

Lord High Steward. Madam, the lords have conſidered of the prayer you have made, to have the benefit of the ſtatutes, and the lords allow it you.

But, madam, let me add, that although very little puniſhment, or none, can now be inflicted, the feelings of your own conſcience will ſupply that defect. And let me give you this information likewiſe, that you can never have the like benefit a ſecond time, but another offence of the ſame kind will be capital.

Madam, you are diſcharged, paying your fees.

Lord High Steward. My lords, this trial being at an end, nothing remains to be done here, but to determine the commiſſion.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. Let proclamation be made for diſſolving the commiſſion of high ſteward.

Serjeant at Arms. Oyez! oyez! oyez! Our ſovereign lord the king does ſtrictly charge and command all manner of perſons here preſent, and that have here attended, to depart hence in the peace of God, and of our ſaid ſovereign lord the king, for his grace my lord high ſteward of Great Britain intends now to diſſolve his commiſſion.

Then the white ſtaff being delivered to the lord high ſteward by the gentleman uſher of the black rod on his knee, his grace ſtood up uncovered, and holding the ſtaff in both his hands, broke it in two, and declared the commiſſion to be diſſolved; and then, leaving the chair, came down to the woolpack, and ſaid, Is it your lordſhips pleaſure to adjourn to the chamber of parliament?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. This houſe is adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

Then the peers, and others, returned back to the chamber of parliament in the ſame order they came down, except that his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland walked after the lord chancellor.

APPENDIX.

Die Veneris, 19 Aprilis 1776.

ORDERED by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that the following queſtions be put to the judges, viz.

I. Whether a ſentence of the Spiritual Court againſt a marriage in a ſuit for jactitation of marriage is concluſive evidence ſo as to ſtop the counſel for the crown from proving the ſaid marriage in an indictment for polygamy?

II. Whether admitting ſuch ſentence to be concluſive upon ſuch indictment, the counſel for the crown may be admitted to avoid the effect of ſuch ſentence, by proving the ſame to have been obtained by fraud or colluſion?

Whereupon, the lord chief juſtice of the court of Common Pleas, having conferred with the reſt of the judges preſent, delivered their unanimous opinion upon the ſaid queſtions, with his reaſons, as follow, viz.

My lords,

My lord chief baron, and the reſt of my brethren, have deſired me to deliver their anſwer to the queſtions your lordſhips have been pleaſed to propound to us.

That our opinion may be the better underſtood, it is neceſſary to make ſome obſervations on what has paſſed in argument upon the ſubject.

What has been ſaid at the bar is certainly true, as a general principle, that a tranſaction between two parties, in judicial proceedings, ought not to be binding upon a third; for it would be unjuſt to bind any perſon who could not be admitted to make a defence, or to examine witneſſes, or to appeal from a judgment he might think erroneous; and therefore the depoſitions of witneſſes in another cauſe in proof of a fact, the verdict of a jury finding the fact, and the judgment of the court upon facts found, although evidence againſt the parties, and all claiming under them, are not, in general, to be uſed to the prejudice of ſtrangers. There are ſome exceptions to this general rule, founded upon particular reaſons, but not being applicable to the preſent ſubject, it is unneceſſary to ſtate them.

From the variety of caſes relative to judgments being given in evidence in civil ſuits, theſe two deductions ſeem to follow as generally true: firſt, that the judgment of a court of concurrent juriſdiction, directly upon the point, is as a plea, a bar, or as evidence, concluſive, between the ſame parties, upon the ſame matter, directly in queſtion in another court: ſecondly, that the judgment of a court of excluſive juriſdiction, directly upon the point, is, in like manner, concluſive upon the ſame matter, between the ſame parties, coming incidentally in queſtion in another court, for a different purpoſe. But neither the judgment of a concurrent or excluſive juriſdiction is evidence, of any matter which came collaterally in queſtion, though within their juriſdiction; nor of any matter incidentally cognizable; nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment.

Upon the ſubject of marriage, the Spiritual Court has the ſole and excluſive cognizance of queſtioning and deciding, directly, the legality of marriage; and of enforcing, ſpecifically, the rights and obligations reſpecting perſons depending upon it; but the temporal courts have the ſole cognizance of examining and deciding upon all temporal rights of property; and, ſo far as ſuch rights are concerned, they have the inherent power of deciding incidentally, either upon the fact, or the legality of marriage, where they lie in the way to the deciſion of the proper objects of their juriſdiction: they do not want or require the aid of the ſpiritual courts; nor has the law provided any legal means of ſending to them for their opinion; except where, in the caſe of marriage, an iſſue is joined upon the record in certain real writs, upon the legality of a marriage, or its immediate conſequence, ‘general baſtardy;’ or, in like manner, in ſome other particular inſtances, lying peculiarly in the knowledge of their courts, as profeſſion, deprivation, and ſome others; in theſe caſes, upon the iſſue ſo formed, the mode of trying the queſtion is by reference to the ordinary, and his certificate, when returned, received, and entered upon the record in the temporal courts, is a perpetual and concluſive evidence againſt all the world upon that point; which exceptionable extent, on whatever reaſons founded, was the occaſion of the ſtatute of the 9th of Henry VI. requiring certain public proclamations to be made for perſons intereſted to come in, and be parties to the proceeding. But, even in theſe caſes, if the ordinary ſhould return no certificate, or an inſufficient one; or, if the iſſue is accompanied with any ſpecial circumſtances, as if a ſecond iſſue, triable by a jury, is formed upon the ſame record; or, if the effect of the ſame iſſue is put into another form, a jury is to decide, and not the ordinary to certify, the truth; and to this purpoſe ſir William Staunford mentions a remarkable inſtance. Bigamy was triable by the biſhop's certificate; but if the priſoner, to avoid the charge, pleads that the ſecond eſpouſals were null and void, becauſe he had a former wife living, this ſpecial bigamy was not to be tried by the biſhop's certificate.

So that the trial of marriage, either as to legality, or fact, was not abſolutely, and from its nature, an object alieni fori.

There was a time, when the ſpiritual courts wiſhed that their determinations might in all caſes be received as authentic in the temporal courts; and in that ſolemn aſſembly of the king, the peers, the biſhops, and judges, convened for the purpoſe of ſettling the demands of the church, by Edward the ſecond, one of the claims was expreſſed in theſe words: ‘Si aliqua cauſa, vel negotium, cujus cognitio ſpectat ad forum eccleſiaſticum, et coram eccleſiaſtico judice fuerit ſententialiter terminatum, et tranſierit in rem judicatam, nec per appellationem fuerit ſuſpenſum; et poſtmodum, coram judice ſeculari, ſuper eadem re inter eaſdem perſonas queſtio moveatur, et provetur per teſtes vel inſtrumenta, talis exceptio in foro ſeculari non admittatur.’ The anſwer to which demand was expreſſed in this manner: ‘Quando eadem cauſa, diverſis rationibus coram judicibus eccleſiaſticis, et ſecularibus, ventilatur, dicunt quod (non obſtante eccleſiaſtico judicio) curia regis ipſum tractet negotium, ut ſibi expedire videtur.’ For which lord Coke gives this reaſon, ſecond Inſtitute, c. 22. ‘For the ſpiritual judges proceedings are for the correction of the ſpiritual inner man, and pro ſalute animæ, to enjoin him penance; and the judges of the common law proceed to give damages and recompence for the wrong and injury done;’ and then adds, ‘and ſo this article was deſervedly rejected.’

And the ſame demand was made, and received the ſame anſwer, in the third year of king James the firſt.

It is to be obſerved, that this demand related only to civil ſuits between the ſame parties; and that the ſentence ſhould be received as a plea in bar. But this attempt and miſcarriage did not prevent the temporal courts from ſhewing the ſame reſpect to their proceedings, as they did to thoſe in other courts. And therefore where, in civil cauſes, they found the queſtion of marriage directly determined by the eccleſiaſtical courts, they received the ſentence, though not as a plea, yet as proof of the fact; it being an authority accredited in a judicial proceeding by a court of competent juriſdiction; but ſtill they received it upon the ſame principles, and ſubject to the ſame rules, by which they admit the acts of other courts.

Hence a ſentence of nullity, and a ſentence in affirmance of a marriage, have been received as concluſive evidence on a queſtion of legitimacy ariſing incidentally upon a claim to a real eſtate.

A ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation has been received upon a title in ejectment, as evidence againſt a marriage, and, in like manner in perſonal actions, immediately founded on a ſuppoſed marriage.

So a direct ſentence, in a ſuit upon a promiſe of marriage, againſt the contract, has been admitted as evidence againſt ſuch contract, in an action brought upon the ſame promiſe for damages, it being a direct ſentence of a competent court, diſproving the ground of the action.

So a ſentence of nullity is equally evidence in a perſonal action againſt a defence founded upon a ſuppoſed coverture.

But in all theſe caſes, the parties to the ſuits, or at leaſt the parties againſt whom the evidence was received, were parties to the ſentence, and had acquieſced under it; or claimed under thoſe who were parties, and had acquieſced.

But although the law ſtands thus with regard to civil ſuits, proceedings in matters of crime, and eſpecially of felony, fall under a different conſideration: firſt, becauſe the parties are not the ſame; for the king, in whom the truſt of proſecuting public offences is veſted, and which is executed by his immediate orders, or in his name by ſome proſecutor, is no party to ſuch proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and cannot be admitted to defend, examine witneſſes, in any manner intervene, or appeal: ſecondly, ſuch doctrines would tend to give the ſpiritual courts, which are not permitted to exerciſe any judicial cognizance in matters of crime, an immediate influence in trials for offences, and to draw the deciſion from the courſe of the common law, to which it ſolely and peculiarly belongs.

The ground of the judicial powers given to eccleſiaſtical courts is, merely, of a ſpiritual conſideration, pro correctione morum, et pro ſalute animæ. They are therefore addreſſed to the conſcience of the party. But one great object of temporal juriſdiction is the public peace; and crimes againſt the public peace are wholly, and in all their parts, of temporal cognizance alone. A felony by common law was alſo ſo. A felony by ſtatute becomes ſo at the moment of its inſtitution. The temporal courts alone can expound the law, and judge of the crime, and its proofs; in doing ſo, they muſt ſee with their own eyes, and try by their own rules, that is, by the common law of the land; it is the truſt and ſworn duty of their office.

When the acts of Henry the eighth firſt declared what marriages ſhould be lawful, and what inceſtuous, the temporal courts, though they had before no juriſdiction, and the acts did not by expreſs words give them any upon the point, decided, incidentally, upon the conſtruction, declared what marriages came within the Levitical degrees, and prohibited the ſpiritual courts from giving or proceeding upon any other conſtruction.

Whilſt an ancient ſtatute ſubſiſted (2 H. IV. 15.) by which perſonal puniſhment was incurred on holding heretical doctrines, the temporal courts took notice, incidentally, whether the tenet was heretical or not; for ‘the king's courts will examine all things ordained by ſtatute.’

When the ſtatute of W. III. made certain blaſphemous doctrines a temporal crime, the temporal courts alone could determine, whether the doctrine complained of was blaſphemous ſo as to conſtitute the crime.

If a man ſhould be indicted for taking a woman by force and marrying her; or for marrying a child without her father's conſent; or for a rape, where the defence is, that ‘the woman is his wife;’ in all theſe caſes, the temporal courts are bound to try the priſoner by the rules and courſe of the common law, and incidentally to determine what is heretical, and what is blaſphemous; and whether it was a marriage within the ſtatute; a marriage without conſent; and whether, in the laſt caſe, the woman was his wife: but if they ſhould happen to find, that ſentences, in the reſpective caſes, had been given in the Spiritual Court upon the hereſy, the blaſphemous doctrines, the marriage by force, the marriage without conſent, and the marriage on the rape; and the court muſt receive ſuch ſentences as concluſive evidence, in the firſt inſtance, without looking into the caſe, it would veſt the ſubſtantial and effective deciſion, though not the cognizance of the crimes, in the Spiritual Court, and leave to the jury, and the temporal courts, nothing but a nominal form of proceeding, upon what would amount to a pre-determined conviction or acquittal; which muſt have the effect of a real prohibition, ſince it would be in vain to prefer an indictment, where an act of a foreign court ſhall at once ſeal up the lips of the witneſſes, the jury, and the court, and put an entire ſtop to the proceeding.

And yet it is true, that the ſpiritual courts have no juriſdiction, directly or indirectly, in any matter not altogether ſpiritual; and it is equally true, that the temporal courts have the ſole and entire cognizance of crimes, which are wholly and altogether temporal in their nature.

And if the rule of evidence muſt be, as it is often declared to be, reciprocal; and that in all caſes, in which ſentences favourable to the priſoner, are to be admitted as concluſive evidence for him; the ſentences, if unfavourable to the priſoner, are in like manner concluſive evidence againſt him; in what ſituation muſt the priſoners be, whoſe life, or liberty, or property, or fame reſts on the judgments of courts, which have no juriſdiction over them in the predicament in which they ſtand? and in what ſituation are the judges of the common law, who muſt condemn, on the word of an eccleſiaſtical judge, without exerciſing any judgment of their own?

The Spiritual Court alone can deprive a clergyman. Felony is a good cauſe of deprivation: yet in lord Hobart's Reports it is held, that they cannot proceed to deprive for felony, before the felony has been tried at law; and although, after conviction, they may act upon that, and make the conviction a ground of deprivation, neither ſide can prove or diſprove any thing againſt the verdict; becauſe, as that very learned judge declares, ‘ it would be to determine, though not capitally, upon a capital crime, ‘ and thereby judge of the nature of the crime and the validity of the ‘ proofs; neither of which belongs to them to do.’

If therefore ſuch a ſentence, even upon a matter within their juriſdiction, and before a felony committed, ſhould be concluſive evidence on a trial for a felony committed after, the opinion of a judge, incompetent to the purpoſe, reſulting (for aught appears) from incompetent proofs (as ſuppoſe the ſuppletory oath) will direct, or rule, a jury and a court of competent juriſdiction, without confronting any witneſſes, or hearing any proofs: for the queſtion ſuppoſes, and the truth is, that the temporal court does not and cannot examine, whether the ſentence is a juſt concluſion from the caſe, either in law or fact; and the difficulty will not be removed by preſuming, that every court determines rightly, becauſe it muſt be preſumed too, that the parties did right in bringing the full and true caſe before the court; and if they did, ſtill the court will have determined rightly by eccleſiaſtical laws and rules, and not by thoſe laws and rules by which criminals are to ſtand or fall in this country.

If the reaſon for receiving ſuch ſentence is, becauſe it is the judgment of a court competent to the enquiry then before them; from the ſame reaſon, the determination of two juſtices of the peace upon the fact or validity of a marriage, in adjudging a place of ſettlement, may hereafter be offered as evidence, and give the law to the higheſt court of criminal juriſdiction.

But if a direct ſentence upon the identical queſtion, in a matrimonial cauſe, ſhould be admitted as evidence (though ſuch ſentence againſt the marriage has not the force of a final deciſion, that there was none) yet a cauſe of jactitation is of a different nature; it is ranked as a cauſe of defamation only, and not as a matrimonial cauſe, unleſs where the defendant pleads a marriage; and whether it continues a matrimonial cauſe throughout, as ſome ſay, or ceaſes to be ſo on failure of proving a marriage, as others have ſaid, ſtill the ſentence has only a negative and qualified effect, viz. ‘ that the party has failed in his proof, and that the libel‘ lant is free from all matrimonial contract, as far as yet appears;’ leaving it open to new proofs of the ſame marriage in the ſame cauſe, or to any proofs of that or any other marriage in another cauſe: and if ſuch ſentence is no plea to a new ſuit there, and does not conclude the court which pronounces, it cannot conclude a court, which receives the ſentence, from going into new proofs to make out that or any other marriage.

So that admitting the ſentence in its full extent and import, it only proves, that it did not yet appear that they were married, and not that they were not married at all: and, by the rule laid down by lord chief juſtice Holt, ſuch ſentence can be no proof of any thing to be inferred by argument from it; and therefore it is not to be inferred, that there was no marriage at any time or place, becauſe the court had not then ſufficient evidence to prove a marriage at a particular time and place. That ſentence, and this judgment, may ſtand well together, and both propoſitions be equally true: it may be true, that the Spiritual Court had not then ſufficient proof of the marriage ſpecified, and that your lordſhips may now, unfortunately, find ſufficient proof of ſome marriage.

But if it was a direct and deciſive ſentence upon the point, and, as it ſtands, to be admitted as concluſive evidence upon the court, and not to be impeached from within; yet, like all other acts of the higheſt judicial authority, it is impeachable from without: although it is not permitted to ſhew that the court was miſtaken, it may be ſhewn that they were miſled.

Fraud is an extrinſic, collateral act, which vitiates the moſt ſolemn proceedings of courts of juſtice. Lord Coke ſays, it avoids all judicial acts, eccleſiaſtical or temporal.

In civil ſuits all ſtrangers may falſify, for covin, either fines, or real or feigned recoveries; and even a recovery by a juſt title, if colluſion was practiſed to prevent a fair defence; and this, whether the covin is apparent upon the record, as not eſſoining, or not demanding the view, or by ſuffering judgment by confeſſion or default; or extrinſic, as not pleading a releaſe, collateral warranty, or other advantageous pleas.

In criminal proceedings if an offender is convicted of felony on confeſſion, or is outlawed, not only the time of the felony, but the felony itſelf may be traverſed by a purchaſer, whoſe conveyance would be affected as it ſtands; and, even after a conviction by verdict, he may traverſe the time.

In the proceedings of the Eccleſiaſtical Court the ſame rule holds. In Dyer there is an inſtance of a ſecond adminiſtration, fraudulently obtained, to defeat an execution at law againſt the firſt; and the fact being admitted by demurrer, the court pronounced againſt the fraudulent adminiſtration. In another inſtance, an adminiſtration had been fraudulently revoked; and the fact being denied, iſſue was joined upon it; and the colluſion being found by a jury, the court gave judgment againſt it.

In the more modern caſes, the queſtion ſeems to have been, whether the parties ſhould be permitted to prove colluſion; and not ſeeming to doubt but that ſtrangers might.

So that colluſion, being a matter extrinſic of the cauſe, may be imputed by a ſtranger, and tried by a jury, and determined by the courts of temporal juriſdiction.

And if fraud will vitiate the judicial acts of the temporal courts, there ſeems as much reaſon to prevent the miſchiefs ariſing from colluſion in the eccleſiaſtical courts, which, from the nature of their proceedings, are at leaſt as much expoſed, and which we find have been, in fact, as much expoſed, to be practiſed upon for ſiniſter purpoſes, as the courts in Weſtminſter-hall.

We are therefore unanimouſly of opinion:

Firſt, That a ſentence in the Spiritual Court againſt a marriage in a ſuit of jactitation of marriage is not concluſive evidence, ſo as to ſtop the counſel for the crown from proving the marriage in an indictment for polygamy.

But ſecondly, Admitting ſuch ſentence to be concluſive upon ſuch indictment, the counſel for the crown may be admitted to avoid the effect of ſuch ſentence, by proving the ſame to have been obtained by fraud or colluſion.

Die Sabbati, 20° Aprilis 1776.

ORDERED by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that the lord chief juſtice of the court of Common-Pleas be, and he is hereby deſired to, favour this houſe with a copy of his argument upon the queſtions propoſed to the judges by this houſe yeſterday.

Die Lunæ, 22° Aprilis 1776.

ORDERED by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that the following queſtion be put to the judges, viz.

> Whether a peereſs convicted by her peers of a clergyable felony, is by law intitled to the benefit of the ſtatutes, ſo as to excuſe her from capital puniſhment, without being burnt in the hand, or being liable to any impriſonment?

Whereupon the lord chief baron of the court of Exchequer, having conferred with the reſt of the judges preſent, delivered their unanimous opinion upon the ſaid queſtion, with his reaſons, as follow, viz.

My lords,

THE queſtion propoſed by your lordſhips for our opinion is,

> Whether a peereſs convicted by her peers of a clergyable felony, is by law intitled to the benefit of the ſtatutes, ſo as to excuſe her from capital puniſhment, without being burnt in the hand, or being liable to any impriſonment?

My lords, your lordſhips would probably expect, that on a queſtion of this importance the judges would have deſired time to have conſidered of it; but, as it was eaſy to foreſee from the firſt appointment of this trial, that a queſtion of this ſort would probably ariſe, we have all looked into the ſeveral ſtatutes, from which any light could be expected: and as on ſuch a conſideration we have been able to form an opinion, in which we all concur, we thought it our duty to deliver it immediately, and not obſtruct the public buſineſs by unneceſſarily protracting this trial, which has already taken up ſo much of your lordſhips time.

I am therefore authorized by my brothers to ſay, we all concur in opinion, that a peereſs convicted by her peers of a clergyable felony is by law intitled to the benefit of the ſtatutes, ſo as to excuſe her from capital puniſhment, without being burnt in the hand, or being liable to any impriſonment.

My lords, the queſtion depends on ſeveral acts of parliament. The firſt I ſhall trouble your lordſhips with, is the 29 Hen. VIII. c. 9. which recites, ‘ that by Magna Charta no freeman ſhall be taken, or impriſoned, ‘ or diſſeiſed of his freehold, or his liberties or free cuſtoms, or ſhall be ‘ outlawed, or in any wiſe deſtroyed, that is, forejudged of life or limb, ‘ or put to death, or ſhall be condemned at the king's ſuit, either before ‘ the king in his bench, that is, the King's Bench, or before any other ‘ commiſſioner or judge whatſoever, but by the lawful judgment of his ‘ peers, or by the law of the land; in which ſtatute, that is, Magna ‘ Charta, no mention is made how women, ladies of great eſtate in re‘ ſpect of their huſbands peers of the land, married or ſole, that is to ſay, ‘ ducheſſes, counteſſes, or baroneſſes, ſhall be put to anſwer, or before ‘ what judges that they ſhall be judged upon indictments of treaſons or ‘ felonies by them committed or done; in regard whereof it is a doubt ‘ in the law of England, before whom and by whom ſuch ladies ſo in‘ dicted ſhall be put to anſwer and be judged: our ſaid lord the king, ‘ willing to put out ſuch ambiguities and doubts, hath declared by au‘ thority aforeſaid, that ſuch ladies ſo indicted, or hereafter to be indicted, ‘ of any treaſon or felony by them done or hereafter to be done, whether ‘ they be married or ſole, that they thereof ſhall be brought to anſwer, ‘ and put to anſwer and judged before ſuch judges and peers of the realm, ‘ as peers of the realm ſhould be, if they were indicted or impeached of ‘ ſuch treaſons or felonies done or hereafter to be done, and in like (autiel) manner and form, and none otherwiſe.’

Your lordſhips will obſerve, that this ſtatute does not introduce a new law, but is a declarative law, explaining what the true meaning of Magna Charta was. Peers in that ſtatute means equals; and therefore any of the nobility muſt by Magna Charta be tried by the nobility who are their peers; for all nobility, whether barons the loweſt, or dukes the higheſt, degree of nobility, are all equals in this reſpect: and lord Coke, 2d Inſt. 45, ſays, ‘ though ducheſſes, counteſſes, and baroneſſes are only named in this declaratory ſtatute, and marchioneſſes and viſcounteſſes are omitted, notwithſtanding, they are alſo comprehended in this 29th chapter of Magna Charta.’

Peers, though originally meaning only equals, is now by common uſe applied to a particular part of the nation, diſtinguiſhed from the reſt by ſuperior rank and privileges, which they derive from the king originally by writ or letters patents granted to them or their anceſtors; and in caſes of ſuch ladies as are not ſo ennobled, they obtain that nobility by marriage to thoſe who are ſo ennobled.

As the next ſtatute, 1 E. VI. c. 12, ſ. 14, ſpeaks of the benefit of clergy, it will be neceſſary to ſay ſomething upon that ſubject. Lord Hale, in his ſecond volume of his Hiſtory of Pleas of the Crown, page 323, ſays, that ‘ anciently princes and ſtates converted to Chriſtianity granted the clergy exemptions of places conſecrated to religious duties from arreſts for crimes, which was the original of ſanctuaries; and ſecond, exemptions of their perſons from criminal proceedings in ſome caſes capital before ſecular judges, which was the true original of this privilegium clericale. The clergy increaſing in wealth, power, honour, number, and intereſt, claimed as a right what they at firſt obtained by the favour of princes and ſtates, and by degrees extended theſe exemptions to all that had any kind of ſubordinate miniſtration relative to the church.’

Theſe exemptions never roſe to ſo great an height in this kingdom as in other places; and therefore the clergy were not exempted here from civil ſuits, nor was this privilegium clericale allowed in the loweſt crimes not capital, nor wherein they were not to loſe life or limb, nor in high treaſon touching the king himſelf, or his royal majeſty: but by 25 E III. c. 4, de Clero, in all other felonies the ordinary might demand the priſoner as a clerk, or the priſoner himſelf might demand the benefit of the clergy. The canon law gave the privilege only to men in holy orders: our law, in favour to learning and the deſire of the Engliſh biſhops, extended to lay clerks, i. e. any layman, that by reaſon of his ability to read was in a poſſibility of being made a prieſt. C. J. Treby, State Trials, Vol. V. 171. The means of trying, whether he was intitled to it, was by reading. If he could read, he was delivered to the ordinary, that is, the biſhop, or the perſon who had ordinary juriſdiction there: but the ordinary was ſo much the miniſter of the temporal courts, and ſo ſubordinate to them, that if the ordinary refuſed to let the priſoner read, the temporal court could controul, and order a book to be delivered to him; and if the ordinary ſaid he could read when he could not, or vice verſâ, that he could not read when in reality he could, the temporal courts gave judgment according to the truth of the caſe; and thoſe courts likewiſe directed, whether the priſoner ſhould be delivered to the ordinary with purgation, or without purgation: in the laſt caſe they were to be kept in the ordinary's priſon for life. If delivered with purgation, then the ordinary tried him for the fact whereof he was accuſed, by a jury of twelve clerks; and if he was acquitted, as was generally the caſe, he was diſcharged out of priſon. Purgation was the convict's clearing himſelf of the crime by his own oath, and the oaths or verdict of an inqueſt of twelve clerks as compurgators. The proceeding was before the ordinary; and old books ſpeak of their making proclamation for perſons to come in againſt his purgation, and of their enquiring into his life, converſation, and fame, and of other formalities; in all which, ſeveral ſtatutes ſay, there were great abuſes.

The ſtatute 4 H. VII. c. 13, reciting that ‘ upon truſt of the privilege of the church divers perſons have been the more bold to commit murder, rape, robbery, theft, and all other miſchievous deeds, becauſe they have been continually admitted to the benefit of the clergy, as oft as they offended:’ it enacts, that ‘ every perſon not being within orders, which hath once been admitted to the benefit of his clergy, being again arraigned of any ſuch offence, be not admitted to have the benefit or privilege of the clergy; and that every perſon ſo convicted for murder (which was then a clergyable offence) ſhould be marked with an M on the brawn of the left thumb; and if he be for any other felony, to be marked with a T in the ſame place of the thumb; and thoſe marks to be made by the gaoler openly in the court before the judge, before that ſuch perſon be delivered to the ordinary.’

This ſtatute prevented laymen having their clergy more than once; and the branding anſwered the purpoſe of diſcovering, whether they had the benefit of their clergy before, though it was neceſſary to prove it by other means, to prevent their having clergy a ſecond time.

The 1 E. VI. c. 12, will come next to be conſidered; which, after repealing ſeveral new-created treaſons and felonies, and taking away clergy in ſeveral other felonies, in ſec. 14, enacts, that ‘ in all and every caſe, where any of the king's majeſty's ſubjects ſhall and may, upon his prayer, have the privilege of clergy as a clerk convict that may make purgation; in all theſe caſes and every of them, and alſo in all and every caſe and caſes of felony, wherein the privilege and benefit of clergy is reſtrained, excepted, or taken away by this ſtatute (wilful murder and poiſoning of malice prepenſed only excepted) the lord and lords of the parliament, and peer and peers of the realm, having place and voice in parliament, ſhall by virtue of this preſent act, of common grace, upon his or their requeſt or prayer, alledging that he is a lord or peer of this realm, and claiming the benefit of this act, though he cannot read, without any burning in the hand, loſs of inheritance, or corruption of his blood, be adjudged, deemed, taken, and uſed, for his firſt time only, to all intents, conſtructions, and purpoſes as a clerk convict, and ſhall be in caſe of a clerk convict which may make purgation, without any further or other benefit or privilege of clergy to any ſuch lord or peer from thenceforth at any time after for any cauſe to be allowed, adjudged, or admitted; any law, ſtatute, uſage, or cuſtom, or any other thing to the contrary notwithſtanding: provided always, that if any of the ſaid lords of the parliament, or any of the peers of this realm for the time being, ſhall fortune to be indicted of any of the offences limited in this act, that then they and every of them ſhall have his or their trial by their peers, as it hath been uſed heretofore in caſes of treaſon.’

From the time of this ſtatute, whenever a peer has been convicted of any felony, for which a commoner might have the benefit of clergy, ſuch peer, on praying the benefit of this ſtatute, has always been diſcharged without burning or delivering to the ordinary: and there are a ſeries of precedents from lord Morley's caſe, 1666, till one in this reign as late as 1765; and C. J. Treby ſays, ‘ the ſtatute 1 E. VI. exempts the peers convict of clergyable felonies from burning in the hand, and virtually repeals the ſtatute, 4 H. VII. as to ſo much; and the ſtatute 18 Eliz. requires burning in the hand only according to the ſtatute in that behalf before provided: and there being no ſtatute then or now in force to ſubject peers to ſuch brand, they are in ſuch caſe (upon the allowing the benefit of the ſaid ſtatute of E. VI. which is as much as clergy without reading or burning) freed from diſcredit and other penalties of the felony, as much as commoners are by having clergy formally allowed, and being burnt. State-Trials, Vol. V. 170.’ And he ſays, ‘ a peer ſhall have this benefit without either clergy or burning, a clerk in orders upon clergy alone without burning, and a lay-clerk not without clergy and burning. Ib. 172—3.’ And I believe no body can diſpute but the law is ſo. The queſtion therefore is, whether a peereſs is not entitled to the ſame privilege? and we are of opinion that ſhe is.

Peers is a word capable of including the whole body of the peerage, females as well as males; and every perſonal privilege conferred on peers is by operation of law communicated to peereſſes, whether by blood or marriage, though only males are mentioned. As trial by peers, though only recognized in Magna Charta, as belonging to the male ſex, nec ſuper eum ibimus, nec ſuper eum mittemus, did by conſtruction of law belong to females, as appears by 20 H. VI. which is only a declaratory law; ſo any other perſonal privilege, granted or confirmed to peers generally, is communicated to females, if it is of a nature capable of being communicated to and enjoyed by them; as trial by peers, freedom from arreſt: counteſs of Rutland's caſe: Moor 769, and 2 Co. 52. And if thoſe privileges are ſo communicated, as they certainly are, why ſhould not this given by 1 E. VI. the conſequence of which is ſo reaſonable and agreeable to juſtice, that a female offender ſhall not undergo a greater puniſhment than a male of her own rank would do for a crime of the ſame ſort? But it was inſiſted at the bar, that between 1 E. VI. and 18 Eliz. a peer found guilty of a clergyable offence ſhould be delivered to the ordinary as a clerk convict: and Staunford, 130, is quoted for that purpoſe, that by the words of this ſtatute a peer ought to make his purgation; and if ſo, he ought to be delivered to the ordinary to be kept till he has made his purgation. That opinion of Staunford ſeems contrary to law in many particulars. The 1 E. VI. c. 3. had in effect ſuſpended purgation, even as to commoners: therefore the legiſlature could never mean to introduce and eſtabliſh purgation as to a peer, which Hobart ſays, 289, ‘ is no ordinance of the common law, but is a practice among themſelves, i. e. the clergy, rather overſeen and winked at than approved by the common law:’ and page 291, he ſays, ‘ the perjuries were ſundry in the witneſſes and compurgators, in the jury of clerks, and the judge himſelf was not clear, all turning the ſolemn trial of truth by oath into a ceremonious and formal lie.’ It is not probable the parliament, intending a great diſtinction in favour of peers, ſo as to diſpenſe with reading and burning in the hand, meant to leave a peer a priſoner in the cuſtody of the ordinary, and to have his credit and capacity to acquire perſonal property, and enjoy the profits of his lands, to be decided upon in ſuch a mock trial; and in fact there is no inſtance in any of the law books, where a peer convicted of a clergyable felony has ever been delivered to the ordinary, or has made purgation: and the juriſdiction of the ordinary to purge the clerk only relates to clerks in orders, or ſuch as the common law conſidered as clerks; and a peer not being a clerk, he could not make purgation, the ordinary having no juriſdiction over him; and the words here, ‘ have the privilege of clergy as a clerk convict that may make purgation, and ſhall be adjudged, deemed, taken, and uſed for his firſt time only to all intents, conſtructions, and purpoſes as a clerk convict, and ſhall be in caſe of a clerk convict which may make purgation,” do not import or direct that he ſhall make purgation; but give a peer the ſame advantage as a clerk convict who might make purgation, i. e. an abſolute diſcharge from all further puniſhment; and the ſtatute, as to him, is to be conſtrued to be a pardon: and it ſeems moſt probable, that peers never did make purgation; becauſe, as all who made purgation were to be tried by a jury of clerks, ſuch trial would be derogatory to their inherent privilege of being tried by their peers. Lord chief juſtice Hale, on this ſtatute (2 H. H. P. C. 376) ſays, I think, ‘ it was never meant that a peer of the realm ſhould be put to read, or be burnt in the hand, where a common perſon ſhould be put to his clergy;” neither is it ſaid, that he ſhall be diſcharged by his praying of the benefit of this ſtatute, where a common perſon ſhall have the privilege of clergy, and may make his purgation; but only where he may have the benefit of his clergy in the firſt clauſe of the ſtatute: the other clauſe (ſhall be in caſe of a clerk convict that may make purgation) is only for his ſpeedier diſcharge, and farther advantage, and not to reſtrain the general clauſe. But it is objected, that the ſtatute 1 E. VI. c. 12, gives this privilege only to ‘ lord and lords of the parliament, and peer and peers of the realm having place and voice in the parliament;’ and that a peereſs, not having place and voice in parliament, cannot have the benefit of this ſtatute. This expreſſion, ‘ having place and voice in parliament,’ cannot mean to exclude all peers but ſuch as ſat in parliament; but to deſcribe ſome of the incidents of peerage, or to include biſhops, who are lords of parliament though not peers: and if theſe words ſhould confine the benefit of this ſtatute to thoſe only who actually ſat in parliament, it would exclude peers minors, and papiſt peers, who, by ſtatute 30 Car. II. ſtat. 2. c. 1, are now rendered incapable of ſitting or voting in parliament: the words therefore are merely deſcriptive, and not reſtrictive. And what makes it very plain is, that, in the 4th and 5th P. and M. c. 4, which takes away clergy from acceſſaries before the fact in murder and ſeveral other offences, there is a proviſo that every lord and lords of the parliament, and peer and peers of this realm, having place and voice in parliament, upon every indictment for any of the offences aforeſaid, ſhall be tried by their peers, as hath been accuſtomed by the laws of this realm. Here are the very words uſed in 1 E. VI. c. 12; yet it could never be doubted, but notwithſtanding thoſe words, peereſſes muſt be tried by their peers for offences againſt that ſtatute; and lady Somerſet was tried by her peers for being acceſſary to the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, which was an offence againſt that very ſtatute. What gave riſe probably to this ſtatute, 1 E. VI. c. 12, was another ſtatute paſſed the ſame year, c. 3. providing for the puniſhment of vagabonds, by making them ſlaves for two years; in which act was a clauſe, that no clerk convict ſhall make his purgation, but ſhall be a ſlave for one year to him who will become bound with two ſureties to the ordinary to take him into his ſervice, and he ſhall be uſed like a vagabond; and a clerk attainted or convict, which by law cannot make his purgation, may by the ordinary be delivered to any man, who will give ſecurity to keep him as his ſlave for five years; and it ſhall be lawful to every perſon, to whom any ſhall be adjudged a ſlave, to put a ring of iron about his neck, arm, or leg. To avoid all poſſible queſtion whether a peer could be ſubject to any of theſe proviſions, this act, 1 E. VI. c. 12, provides for their immediate delivery, on praying the benefit of this ſtatute. This ſtatute 1 E. VI. c. 3, was repealed 3d and 4th E. VI. c. 16, but was in force when 1 E. VI. c. 12, was made. The next ſtatute, 18 Eliz. c. 7. provides, that every perſon which ſhall be admitted and allowed to have the benefit of privilege of his clergy, ſhall not thereupon be delivered to the ordinary, as has been accuſtomed; but, after ſuch clergy allowed and burning in the hand, according to the ſtatute in that behalf provided, ſhall forthwith be enlarged and delivered out of priſon by the juſtices, before whom ſuch clergy ſhall be granted, that cauſe notwithſtanding. Then follows the proviſo, that the juſtices, before whom any ſuch allowance of clergy ſhall be had, ſhall and may, for the further correction of ſuch perſons to whom clergy ſhall be allowed, detain and keep them in priſon for ſuch convenient time as the ſame juſtices in their diſcretions ſhall think convenient, ſo as the ſame do not exceed one year's impriſonment. This proviſo plainly relates only to thoſe perſons mentioned in the clauſe, that is, ſuch perſons as had been burnt in the hand according to the ſtatute in that caſe made and provided, meaning 4 H. VII. As peers therefore are not to be burnt in the hand, they cannot be impriſoned; for thoſe only are to be impriſoned who have been burnt in the hand; and the word, juſtices, is more properly applicable to other courts of judicature than to this houſe. The 21 Ja. I. c. 7, cannot relate to this queſtion; for it relates to common perſons, and was intended to put women on the ſame footing with men, as to ſmall larcenies; and 3d and 4th W. and M. c. 9, does the ſame in all clergyable felonies. This ſhews the juſtice of allowing to the peereſſes the ſame benefit of 1 E. VI. c. 12, as peers have; and it is natural to ſuppoſe, that when the legiſlature were putting women of inferior rank on the ſame footing as men, they would have put peereſſes on the ſame footing with peers, had it not been conceived that the ſame privileges were already extended to both.

Upon the whole therefore, by ſtat. 1 E. VI. a peer convicted of a clergyable felony is intitled to his immediate diſcharge, without reading or burning in the hand, or being liable to impriſonment by 18 Eliz.

This privilege, given by ſtatute, being ſuch as may be enjoyed by a peereſs, is by operation of law communicated to her, and puts her in the ſame ſituation as a peer; the conſequence of which is, that a peereſs, convicted of a clergyable felony, praying the benefit of this ſtatute, is not only excuſed from capital puniſhment, but ought to be immediately diſcharged, without being burnt in the hand, or liable to any impriſonment.

E. THURLOW.

Friday, July 4, 1777.

AS ſoon as the court was opened, the ſpecial jury were called over: eleven only appearing, Mr. Attorney-General prayed a tales. The box containing the names of the common jury ſtanding open upon the table, the aſſociate took out a paper, and, ſhewing it to Mr. Horne, aſked, if he had any objection to that man's being ſworn on the jury? Mr. Horne replied, ' I object to that name, and for this reaſon: I deſire that the box may be ſhut and ſhaken; and when that is done, I ' ſhall have no objection to any name.' The box was accordingly ſhut and ſhaken, and a name drawn out; but another of the ſpecial jury coming into court, the taleſman was not ſworn.

The following ſpecial jury were ſworn.

Joſeph Dalmer,	Curſitor-ſtreet,	Merchant,
Philip Bulkley,	Fleet-ſtreet,	Druggiſt,
James Brant,	Cheapſide,	Silkman,
David Buffar,	Cheapſide,	Woollen-draper,
William Watts,	Fore-ſtreet,	Goldſmith,
Nathaniel Lucas,	Fore-ſtreet,	Merchant,
William Abdy,	Out-lane,	Goldſmith,
Thomas Smith,	Milk-ſtreet,	Merchant,
Thomas Brooks,	Cateaton-ſtreet,	Linen-draper,
Matthew Stanton,	Aldermanbury,	Warehouſeman,
William Loydd,	Chriſt-church,	Woollen-draper,
Henry Morris,	Fleet-ſtreet,	Silverſmith.

Then the information was opened by Mr. Buller.

Mr. Horne. My lord, with your lordſhip's permiſſion, I believe it is proper for me, at this time, before Mr. Attorney-General proceeds, to make an objection; and to requeſt your lordſhip's deciſion concerning a point of practice in the proceeding of this trial. Have I your lordſhip's leave?

Lord Mansfield. Certainly.

Mr. Horne. Gentlemen of the jury——

Lord Mansfield. No. Not to the jury. If you make an objection to the irregularity of the proceedings, you muſt addreſs me.

Mr. Horne. I am well aware of it: and I hope that your lordſhip will, upon this and other occaſions, hear me before you ſuppoſe me to be in the wrong. I was not going to addreſs my argument nor my objection to the jury: if your lordſhip will only permit me to requeſt their attention; becauſe I have frequently obſerved upon trials, that in all caſes almoſt, when application has been made to the judge to decide upon any objection, the jury have been generally ſuppoſed to be in a manner out of court; and I therefore now addreſs myſelf to the jury, only to requeſt their attention, and for no other purpoſe.

Lord Mansfield. Very well. Go on.

Mr. Horne. Gentlemen of the jury, what I have ſaid to his lordſhip, if you heard it, may perhaps make it unneceſſary for me to addreſs you. Gentlemen, though what I am going to ſay to his lordſhip reſpects a matter of law and practice of the court, yet I meant to requeſt your attention, becauſe you may find perhaps that the deciſion may concern you to hear it.—My lord, I underſtand (and I think I ſee good reaſons why it ſhould be ſo) that it is the uſual practice and wholſome cuſtom of the court, in trials of this kind, that unleſs the defendant examines witneſſes in his defence, the defendant's anſwer cloſes the pleading: and it is not the practice, in that caſe, that the counſel for the proſecution ſhould reply. But, my lord, in the late trials of the printers, for printing and publiſhing the advertiſement now in queſtion, I obſerved that Mr. Attorney-General claimed and exerciſed the peculiar privilege of replying, notwithſtanding that no witneſſes had been called for the defendant. My lord, with your lordſhip's permiſſion, I mean to ſubmit my reaſons to your lordſhip in ſupport of my objection to this claim of Mr. Attorney-General in the preſent trial.

Lord Mansfield. You come too early for the objection; becauſe the objection, if there is any foundation in it, ſhould be when he gets up to reply.

Mr. Horne. My lord, I own I did expect that Mr. Attorney-General would urge ſomething of that kind againſt what I have ſaid. I ſtopped, expecting that anſwer from him; becauſe, my lord, he may, very likely, imagine it to be a part of the duty of his office to baffle me in any manner, and to take all advantages which he can, whether fair or unfair, againſt me, and to obtain a verdict againſt me by any means---there are reaſons why he ſhould attempt to do ſo;--and therefore, I own, I expected that the attorney-general would have urged that againſt me. But, my lord, I apprehend, with great ſubmiſſion, that this, and this only, is the proper moment——

Lord Mansfield. Mr. Horne, I will do ſo far for you. If the defence that you are to make, may in any manner be guided or governed by a knowledge, whether the attorney-general has or has not a right to reply; if Mr. Attorney-General acquieſces in it, I have no objection to your being apprized how it ſtands beforehand; becauſe otherwiſe it would come after you had made your defence: and if you mean to calculate your defence in ſome way different, upon the expectation of his having or his not having a right to reply, I will willingly (I dare ſay the attorney-general makes no objection to it) hear you upon that point now.

Mr. Attorney-General. None in the world.

Mr. Horne. Your lordſhip has hit upon one of the very reaſons that I was going to lay before you. But, my lord, I had rather that this had come as a matter of juſtice, than as an acquieſcence from the attorney-general; becauſe I ſuppoſe that every defendant, who ſhall hereafter ſtand in my ſituation, will have the ſame right; and, if it comes as a matter of favour from the attorney-general, thoſe for whom I am much more concerned than myſelf, may not perhaps meet with that genteel acquieſcence. However, I thank the attorney-general. I ſhall beg then, my lord, at preſent to make my objection. I am ſure I ſhould have been permitted to make it, becauſe the arguments which I had to uſe would have been ſuch as would more particularly have affected your lordſhip's mind. If then I am permitted, I ſuppoſe that I am now to object to the right of reply.

Lord Mansfield. You are now to object to the right of reply.

Mr. Horne. My lord, if I ſhould forget any thing upon this occaſion, ſo new to me, and make any miſtakes, I ſhall beg leave to refreſh my memory with what I have written down. My lord, I have been taught by the beſt authorities, that the eſtabliſhed practice and approved rules of the court are ſo, only becauſe they are reaſon, and reaſon approved by long experience; and they obtain as rules and practice only for that cauſe. My lord, I believe I ſhall not be contradicted by your lordſhip, when I aver, that it is the eſtabliſhed practice and approved rule of the court, in trials of this kind (where the attorney-general does not proſecute) that if the evidence brought for the proſecution is not controverted by any other evidence on the part of the defendant, but the fact, as far as it depends upon teſtimony, taken as the proſecutor's evidence left it; that then the defendant's anſwer cloſes the pleading. And this, my lord, has obtained and been eſtabliſhed as the approved rule and practice of the court, becauſe it is ſuppoſed the method beſt calculated for the obtaining of juſtice; that is, for the conviction of the guilty and the acquittal of the innocent; for both are to be regarded: and when that is done, then only, I ſuppoſe, is juſtice done. Now, my lord, the reaſon of this practice is not, like ſome others, ſo covered over by the ruſt of ages, or diſguiſed by the change of circumſtances, as that it ſhould be difficult now to diſcover it. On the contrary, it is, to my underſtanding and apprehenſion, as plain and evident now as it was the firſt day that it was introduced. But that is no part of my buſineſs to enter into: the reaſon of the practice it does not belong to me to give. It is ſufficient for me to ſay that ſuch is the practice, and being the practice, it muſt be ſuppoſed the beſt method of obtaining juſtice. Then, my lord, I humbly ſubmit it to your lordſhip, that if this is the beſt method for obtaining of juſtice, a contrary method muſt be attempted for ſome other end; and that end muſt be injuſtice, or the conviction of the accuſed by any means. My lord, the practice, and this exemption from it, which Mr. Attorney-General claims, cannot both ſtand: one or the other muſt be given up; becauſe they cannot both be the beſt method and moſt likely means for the obtaining of juſtice. Now, my lord, that the king, or that the attorney-general in his name, ſhould be permitted to purſue any other method or practice than that eſtabliſhed method which is beſt calculated for the obtaining of juſtice, ſeems to me compleatly abſurd. For the king, ſuch as the law and ſuch as reaſon conceive him, can have no other intereſt but in the obtaining of juſtice, impartial juſtice. And if it was poſſible, my lord, to conceive a king even with a leaning or an inclination on either ſide, it muſt rather be that his ſubjects ſhould be found innocent than guilty. But this claim of Mr. Attorney-General, my lord, abſurdly ſuppoſes the contrary; and that the king has an intereſt in their being convicted; and that therefore eaſier and readier means, and greater means, are to be allowed to the king for obtaining a conviction, than are allowed to any other perſon, my equal or my inferior. And yet, my lord, I muſt acknowledge that the claim which I am now objecting to, is not a new one. My lord, in the reign of James the ſecond, that man (for he never was for one moment a king) claimed the peculiar right, prerogative, and power of diſpenſing with the laws of the land. Sir Edward Herbert, the chief juſtice of thoſe days, and the other judges decided in favour of that claim. Thank God, my lord, the glorious Revolution—(and I call it ſo: it ſhall not have leſs praiſe from me becauſe it is now grown uncourtly)—the glorious Revolution put an end to that iniquity. Unfortunately for this country, the principles which produced that and many other iniquities are now again revived and foſtered; and amongſt many other moſt ſhameful doctrines, this doctrine of diſpenſing power is now revived again—under another ſhape and form indeed; but it is the ſame power. It is now a prerogative to diſpenſe with the rules and methods of proceeding; that is, my lord, to diſpenſe with the laws: for the rules and methods of proceeding (and I have heard your lordſhip ſay it in other caſes) are parts of the laws of the land. My lord, I have been told (and that by a greater authority than any almoſt that now lives) that 'the methods and forms 'of juſtice are eſſential to juſtice itſelf.' And, my lord, the forms and methods of proceeding are particularly that tender part of the laws which is calculated for the protection of innocence. My lord, the penal laws are made to bring criminals and offenders to juſtice; but the forms and methods of proceeding of the courts of juſtice are appointed ſingly to diſtinguiſh the innocent from the guilty, and to protect them againſt exorbitant power. My lord, in the caſe of this particular privilege which the attorney-general claims, I think I could ſpend a day in ſhewing how many received legal maxims and truths it violates: for truth is of ſuch a nature that it has a thouſand branches iſſuing from it; and falſhood, let it be as careful as it can, will run againſt ſome one or other of them. I do really believe I could fairly ſpend a day in ſhewing the abſurdity of this claim. But yet, to my great diſadvantage and my great ſorrow, when, in the late trial of the printers, the defendant's counſel objected to this claim of Mr. Attorney-General, your lordſhip interfered haſtily, and ſaved Mr. Attorney-General the trouble of vindicating his claim. Your lordſhip ſaved him from the embarraſſment he would then have found, and which I am confident he will now find, to produce one ſingle argument of reaſon or juſtice in behalf of his claim: and this your lordſhip did by an abſolute overbearing of the objection, without even permitting an argument. And, my lord, that is a very great diſadvantage to me, as well as it was to the defendant in whoſe cauſe he made it: for, my lord, the very ingenious counſel—(I beg the gentleman's pardon for attempting to diſtinguiſh him by that epithet; there is no want of ingenuity at the bar)—but the very honeſt counſel who made that objection, would have been able to ſupport it in a very different manner from any in which I can expect to do it. My lord, the trial may take up ſome time; therefore I will no longer hold you on this objection. I ſhall reſerve to myſelf the right, which I did exerciſe in condemning the action of the king's troops (which I did then call, and do ſtill, and will to-morrow call, becauſe contrary to law, a murder) ſo I ſhall reſerve it to myſelf, and not now take up more of the time, to ſay what I ſhall think proper by argument and reaſon on the deciſion of your lordſhip; which deciſion muſt come after your lordſhip ſhall have heard the attorney-general's anſwer, and my reply:—for I take it I have a right to reply. I ſhall then reſerve that power to myſelf to ſpeak as freely of it as I ſhould do of any other indifferent action in the world.

Lord Mansfield. There is no occaſion for Mr. Attorney-General to ſay any thing. I am moſt clear that the attorney-general has a right to reply if he thinks fit, and that I cannot deprive him of it; and there is no ſuch rule, that in no caſe a private proſecutor or private plaintiff ſhall not reply, if new matter is urged which calls for a reply; new queſtions of law, new obſervations, or any matter that makes a reply neceſſary. No authority at law has been quoted to the contrary. A party that begins has a right to reply; there is not a State Trial where the ſolicitor-general or the attorney-general have not replied; and I know of no law that ſays in any caſe the proſecutor may not reply. But, for the ſaving of time, rules by uſage of the bar are received. Two gentlemen don't examine the ſame witneſs, but yet they do very often. They don't reply when there is no evidence for a defendant, and nothing new to make it neceſſary to reply, then they don't do it; but if a queſtion of law was ſtarted, which nobody thought of in the beginning, they do it then: then they have a right to reply, and muſt reply, for the ſake of juſtice; and therefore I apprize Mr. Horne that the attorney-general certainly has a right to reply.

Mr. Horne. Your lordſhip muſt be very ſenſible how untoward is my ſituation in this caſe. This is only a repetition of what happened before; if your lordſhip will thus do the buſineſs of Mr. Attorney-General for him. My lord, you now take from me what you give to him; you take from me that right of reply which by the practice of the court I have, whilſt you give to him that right of reply which by the practice of the court he has not. I have a right to reply to the attorney-general's anſwer to my objection, but I have no right to reply upon the judge. I beg the attorney-general may do his own buſineſs. He is full of reaſon and argument. He ſmiles. Indeed he well may. My lord, he can ſurely prove the juſtice of his claim himſelf, if there is any in it. My lord—

Lord Mansfield. Sir—hear—Your proper reply to the judgment I have given is a motion to the court; I never here decide.—It is ſpeaking to no purpoſe to perſuade me where I have no doubt.—The attorney-general here will be of the ſame opinion with me. But your proper reply to me, is a motion to the court; and if the ſuffering him to reply is againſt law, it is an irregularity in the trial, for which the verdict will be ſet aſide. You will have a remedy.

Mr. Horne. O, my lord, I have already ſuffered under your lordſhip's directing me to remedies. The moſt cruel of all poiſoners are thoſe who poiſon our remedies. Has your lordſhip forgotten?---I am ſure you have not forgotten that I have, once before in my life, had the honour to be tried before your lordſhip for a pretended libel. My lord, this matter of reply I know ſo well to be the practice, not only from the intelligence I have had upon that ſubject, but from that very trial at Guildford, on the action brought againſt me by the preſent lord Onſlow. My lord, I could then have contradicted his evidence. I will juſt mention two or three particulars in this caſe.---It was the moſt ſcandalous one that ever came before a court.---(Your lordſhip cannot forget the particulars in that trial.) I was proſecuted by him for a libel. On the firſt action which he brought, I obtained a nonſuit. Upon that, a freſh action was brought. To that freſh action (in order to try it in Surrey, where the plaintiff had his influence) in that freſh action, words ſpoken a year or two before were added, words of a different nature, and upon a different ſubject. We came to trial before your lordſhip, and I do remember ſome very ſtrong caſes (which indeed I intended to have publiſhed) of your lordſhip's practice in that trial. But, my lord, however impatient I may be thought to be, I am very patient under perſonal injuries. I have never complained of the practices uſed againſt me on that trial, nor of the miſtakes (to ſpeak gently) which your lordſhip made. Your lordſhip then told me, as now, that I ſhould have a remedy—

Mr. Attorney-General. I beg leave to object to this way of proceeding in a trial. What can it be to the iſſue that is joined in this cauſe, any part of the hiſtory of what related to the trial at Guildford?

Lord Mansfield. If I remember right, you had a remedy there, for it was determined not to be actionable.

Mr. Horne. True, my lord; but it coſt me 200*l.* The remedy was almoſt as bad as the verdict would have been.

Lord Mansfield. There muſt be an end.

Mr. Horne. Not of this objection.

Lord Mansfield. No; an end of going out of the cauſe. You muſt behave decently and properly.

Mr. Horne. I will ſurely behave properly.

Lord Mansfield. This is over.---I tell you beforehand, I apprize you of it (which is going out of the way) that it is not in my power to deprive the proſecutor of replying, if he ſees cauſe to deſire it.

Mr. Horne. Now then, my lord, I entreat you to let me decently tell you of the ſituation you put me into. When I offer to prove by argument the right which I have to make my objection at this time, your lordſhip kindly ſtops me, and takes it for granted. Then, afterwards, it ſeems, it is you who apprized me. You tell me you have, out of the rule, apprized me: yet, becauſe I accepted that which I knew to be my right as an appriſal which you were willing to give me, not meaning however to preclude myſelf from the argument, your lordſhip makes uſe of my acceptance of this appriſal to defeat my objection. Firſt, your lordſhip interferes to ſave Mr. Attorney-General from attempting to give a reaſon, which you both know he cannot give; and then Mr. Attorney-General gets up to ſave your lordſhip in his turn, and to ſtop me from explaining your lordſhip's conduct. Thus between your lordſhip and Mr. Attorney-General, a defendant is in a bleſſed ſituation! (Here ſome promiſcuous altercation enſued, after which Mr Horne proceeded.) What I was ſpeaking of was merely this; that the practice ——(Here again ſome interruption) I was going to ſhew your lordſhip (in anſwer to what fell from you, and not diſtinct from this cauſe, nor from what your lordſhip had ſaid) I was going, and decently going, to ſhew your lordſhip, that it was the practice of the court that the proſecutor ſhould not reply unleſs evidence is called for the defendant. I was going to ſhew it to your lordſhip from my own particular caſe before your lordſhip at Guildford, and that I ſuffered under it conſiderably; and I mentioned the inſtance. I am ſure that is not wandering from the point, when your lordſhip has ſaid, that it was not the practice of the court. If the attorney-general had ſaid ſo, I ſhould have had a right to reply to him. But I muſt ſay, as before, if your lordſhip is to do the attorney-general's buſineſs, and ſo cut off my reply, and then Mr. Attorney-General is to get up and ſay, This has nothing to do with the cauſe; between the chief juſtice and the attorney-general, what am I to do? My lord, I beg leave to mention to your lordſhip, that if the attorney-general had ſaid truly, and that I had wandered from the caſe, it would not be wonderful if I, unuſed to theſe matters, ſhould wander a little; and your lordſhip ſhould have ſome indulgence to my ſituation. My lord, I was going to mention to your lordſhip my own caſe: all I know of law is from my own caſe, and from what I have been a witneſs of myſelf. I, in that caſe, at Guildford, did ſuffer a falſe evidence to procure (by your lordſhip's miſtaken direction) a bad, falſe verdict; becauſe I was told by my counſel (ſome of the firſt counſel in this country) that the words themſelves were not actionable; and therefore, tho' I could have proved by gentlemen in court that the words ſworn againſt me were not ſpoken by me; yet my counſel told me it was better for me to let thoſe words go as proved, than, by calling evidence, to give to the proſecutor a right of reply, which otherwiſe he would not have: therefore I ſuffered the words to be ſuppoſed to have been ſpoken, rather than to give to my adverſary a right to a reply. But now I find he had that right without my calling evidence; that is, I am told ſo by your lordſhip, though I have been told otherwiſe by all the counſel and all the trials I have ever been at. My lord, as for quoting laws for the practice, I hope your lordſhip does not expect me to quote law in a matter of practice, and indeed in hardly any other matter, except the law that I have learned from your lordſhip. I was a conſtant attender of your lordſhip ſome years ago, and I have gathered from your practice ſome things which I take to be, and ſome which I take not to be maxims of law. Now, in that caſe I mentioned at Guildford, I ſuffered words to go as proved, which I could have diſproved---and there are gentlemen in court now who know the fact, and would have been the evidences---I ſuffered words to go as proved, becauſe I would not give the proſecutor a right to reply. Your Lordſhip directed the jury to find a verdict for the words; and your lordſhip ſaid, if your direction was miſtaken (becauſe my counſel had argued that the words were not actionable) your lordſhip told my counſel--(he publiſhed a pamphlet afterwards:--he was much hurt at it) you ſaid that what he had advanced ſurprized you; that it was new law; ſuch as you had never heard before---(he was much hurt at it; he felt it: he was hurt at your lordſhip's declaration: he publiſhed a pamphlet afterwards addreſſed to your lordſhip, which I am ſure you muſt remember).---My lord, in conſequence of your lordſhip's direction, a verdict was given againſt me for 400*l.*; and you ſaid, if you were miſtaken in your directions, that I had a remedy; I need only appeal to the court: I had a remedy. What ſort of a remedy? The expence of the remedy was almoſt equal to the verdict. The verdict was ſet aſide, that is true; but your lordſhip knows that a verdict makes the defendant pay his own coſts. I ſhould have had the coſts, if the verdict had not been given againſt me. What ſort of remedies are theſe, that are worſe than the fair honeſt puniſhment that can be inflicted upon the charge? Therefore I do intreat that your lordſhip will not ſend me to remedies which I hardly know how to take; eſpecially as I have always found that ſuch kind of remedies from your lordſhip are like giving a man a wound, and then telling him where he may find a plaiſter: it is not a thing that I ſhould wiſh to do, nor would your lordſhip like to ſuffer. And as your lordſhip ſays that no law has been quoted to prevent his reply, I intreat that I may hear from Mr. Attorney-General, or from yourſelf, that law that gives him a right to reply.

Lord Mansfield (to the attorney-general). Go on with the trial.

Mr. Horne. I ſhall hear no reaſon then from either of you? Well! if ſo, I muſt ſubmit under it.

Mr. Attorney-General.

My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, there is nothing in this caſe (unleſs the behaviour of the defendant ſhould conſtitute that ſomething) that can make it at all different from the moſt ordinary caſe of a plain delinquent in a moſt groſs offence being brought before a court of juſtice. I have looked round with a degree of examination to ſee if I could ſee whether there was one amongſt the numerous byſtanders that I ſaw here, who had conceived a favourable impreſſion from ſo extraordinary an interpoſition as one has heard to-day. I certainly ſhould not riſe to take off or repel looſe ſlander ſcattered about without being pointed at any one individual particularly, much leſs ſhould I take notice of that ſort of ſlander which, affecting to point itſelf, only diſgraced itſelf in the manner of that affectation. For my own part, I ſhould think I was ſtooping exceedingly below that character and that ſituation in the world which I hope I am entitled to, if I were to ſet myſelf to defend my own peculiar part from any aſperſions that have been thrown upon me. It is the duty of my office to proſecute with integrity thoſe whom, according to the beſt of my judgment, I believe to be fair objects of proſecution. It is the duty of my office, as far as I can govern that duty, to conduct the proſecution with the utmoſt clearneſs and the fulleſt honour. And if I have taken a part in this, or in any proſecution that any man can fairly ſtand forth, in a manly ſtyle, and challenge directly and pointedly, let it be challenged, and let me be called upon to anſwer it. But to be told that I ſtand here ready to take all manner of advantages, fair or unfair, againſt the delinquents whom I call into juſtice, it is a ſort of aſperſion below refutation; and I will not ſtoop to take notice of it, unleſs it would condeſcend upon ſome particular act in my conduct that makes me an object of that ſpecies of animadverſion. Whether I am or whether I am not to reply in ſuch a cauſe as this, it is, in this moment of it, not only not ſo much irregular to advance it, as impoſſible to foreſee. When I read over the caſe, when I conſider the effect of it, I cannot foretel the ſlighteſt occaſion to trouble you by way of reply; for of all the plain and ſimple matters that ever I had occaſion to lay before a court of juſtice, there is the leaſt degree of complication in that which I am about to ſtate to you now.

This is an information brought againſt Mr. Horne for being the author and the original publiſher of this libel. The crime that I put moſt upon is that which I ſtated laſt, that he was the original publiſher of this libel. It is in that reſpect that his crime appears to me to differ moſt from thoſe that have been called into juſtice before. The circumſtance of his name being printed at the bottom of the libel was an additional aggravation in this reſpect, becauſe it ſeemed to imply a bolder inſult upon manners and decency, and the laws of the country, than a ſimple publication of a libel without that name would have been. It ſeemed to imply, becauſe, while that name lay hid behind the printer of the paper, the ſtouteſt champion for ſedition could not have defied the laws with greater ſecurity; for, though it ſtood in capitals upon the front of many thouſand pages, yet it was as inſcrutable as impoſſible for me to follow, as if the name had not appeared upon the paper at all. For the reſt of it, I put it upon the publication, chiefly becauſe that ſeems to be the whole object and drift of the compoſer of the libel: for as a compoſition it is abſolutely nothing. I do not mean to ſpeak of it by way of derogation from the parts and talents of the ingenious gentleman (whoſe parts and talents I never heard ſo much of as I have done to-day) I do not mean to ſpeak it in derogation of them; no doubt but he could have writ a better thing: but his underſtanding was induſtriouſly let down and ſuppreſſed; and the very purpoſe of this writing was to make it ribaldry and traſh. For the intention of it was (as it appears to me) the intention of it was nothing more than to defy the laws and juſtice of the country, proclaiming, as it were, thus: either puniſh this libel, or confeſs that there are no laws in the country by which a libel can be puniſhed. Others have entertained ſufficient malice againſt this country; others have been anxious enough to excite ſedition; but this is written chiefly with the purpoſe of telling mankind—‘ Thus I dare do! I dare inſult the laws ‘ without having any earthly thing to ſtate to the public, except an ‘ inſult upon the laws.’ Sometimes a libel is covered (though thinly covered enough) with the pretence of informing mankind, or of diſcuſſing public ſubjects for the uſe of mankind: here is not even the affectation of giving information: here is not even the affectation of diſcuſſion: but the writer tells you in ſo many blunt words (of no kind of meaning in the world, but to convey reproach and ſcandal) that the perſons who were employed by the government are guilty of murder; and the perſons who employed them conſequently involved in the ſame guilt. For what is the nature of the libel that is publiſhed—‘ King's ‘ Arms tavern—At a meeting held during an adjournment’ (I did not mean to make any obſervation upon the meeting during an adjournment)—‘ a gentleman propoſed that a ſubſcription ſhould be entered ‘ into’—(this I conceive to be a device—not a very rich one in point of invention—but a device to introduce that which follows) ‘ a gentleman ‘ propoſed that a ſubſcription ſhould be entered into by ſuch of the ‘ members preſent who might approve of the ſame, for the purpoſe of ‘ raiſing the ſum of 100*l.* to be applied to the relief of the widows, or‘ phans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-ſubjects, who, ‘ faithful to the character of Engliſhmen, preferring death to ſlavery, ‘ were for that reaſon only inhumanly murdered by the king's troops.’ —Murdered by the king's troops! What kind of palliation (juſtification it is abſurd and nonſenſe to talk of) but what kind of palliation can be given to the charging men with the crime of murder, by writing againſt them in a news-paper? Is it to be laid down for law, or a thing to be tolerated in a civilized country, that crimes of the moſt heinous ſort ſhall be imputed to men by a public reviler in a news-paper, who yet dares not ſtand forth as an accuſer? Is that to be tolerated in a civilized country, the writing againſt men that they are guilty of murder who are not to be accuſed of that crime? Is it to be tolerated in a country where an orderly government prevails, and while the form of government ſubſiſts, to write againſt the tranſactions of that government, as if ſtained with all the crimes under heaven, and calculated for no earthly purpoſe but of committing thoſe crimes? To ſuppreſs liberty (the only object for which government is or ought to be erected) to ſuppreſs that liberty by the means of murder, is imputed to the tranſactions of the government of the freeſt country now under heaven! and it is called liberty to do that! whereas men muſt be ſhort-ſighted indeed, a man muſt be drivelling like an idiot that does not ſee that the maintaining of regular government is the true, the only means of maintaining liberty. Is it liberty to put the characters of perſons, the properties of every individual, under the tyrannous hand of anarchy, and of every man that thinks proper to ſeize them uncontrouled by law? Is that liberty? And, is there any one byſtander of the moſt ordinary underſtanding that hears me now ſpeak, that has ſo groſs an underſtanding as to imagine that he would be more free if it were in the power of any man that thought proper to revile his character? (which is the queſtion which is now immediately ſubjected to you) or to injure him in his perſon or fortune, or in any other manner whatever? This therefore is not to be coloured, as far as I can foreſee, by any kind of argument whatever. The nature of the libel is too groſs to be commented upon; it does no honour to any body that has been concerned in making it.

I ſhall content myſelf with proving the fact of this paper having been written, of this paper having been publiſhed originally by Mr. Horne; and the concluſion to be made upon that is too obvious a one, and too broad a one, for me to foreſee at leaſt any kind of difficulty about it. It was my duty to lay it before you. I, charged with the duty of my office, have brought it here; it is your duty to judge of it. You, charged by the oath that you have taken, are to determine upon it. If you can be of opinion that this licentiouſneſs is fit to be tolerated, according to the old and eſtabliſhed laws of this country; if you are of opinion that the fact is not proved upon the defendant in the manner in which it is ſtated by the witneſſes; it will be your duty, your oaths will bind you to acquit him: but if the fact ſhould be proved, if it ſhould ſtand as clear as to my judgment and apprehenſion it now ſtands, you will be conſtrained by the ſame neceſſity of duty, and by the additional ſanction of an oath, to entertain exactly the opinion of it which I have found myſelf conſtrained to entertain. I have no wiſh (I did not know Mr. Horne) I have no wiſh to proſecute any one individual; nor have I been deſired, if I had ſuch a wiſh, to proſecute him. And I hope I may add, that no deſire could have compelled me to proſecute a man whom I myſelf had not thought guilty, notwithſtanding any thing that has been ſaid on the contrary ſide. I go upon the evidence as it is in my poſſeſſion; I go upon the evidence as it is in my power to produce. If there be any evidence on the other ſide, and if that is ſufficient to refute the imputation which the evidence that I have to produce lays upon him, I ſhall be as ready to examine that with exactly the ſame degree of candour, and, I hope, of uprightneſs, as I have done the preſent. My duty is done by laying the matter before you. Your duty, I am ſure, will be done to your own honour and the ſupport of public juſtice by the verdict you will give upon the occaſion.

Evidence for the proſecution.

THOMAS WILSON, ſworn.

Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

Mr. Solicitor General. Look at thoſe papers.

(The ſeveral manuſcripts from which the advertiſements were printed in the news-papers. The witneſs inſpects them).

Q. Do you know whoſe hand-writing thoſe papers are?

A. They look like Mr. Horne's hand-writing.

Q. Do you know Mr. Horne?

A. I have ſeen him write.

Q. Do you take theſe to be his hand-writing?

A. They are like his hand-writing. I will not upon my oath ſay that they are his hand-writing; I believe that they are.

(The manuſcripts of the two advertiſements read in court.)

HENRY SAMPSON WOODFALL, ſworn.

Examined by Mr. Wallace.

Q. What buſineſs are you?

A. A printer.

Q. Do you print any news-paper?—A. Yes.

Q. What paper?

A. The Public Advertiſer.

Mr. Wallace. Look at theſe two papers (ſhewing the witneſs the manuſcripts of the advertiſements. The witneſs inſpects the manuſcript).

Q. Have you ever ſeen theſe papers before?—A. Yes.

Q. When did you ſee the firſt of them?

A. About the 7th of June 1775, as near as I can recollect.

Q. By what means did you come by the ſight of it?

A. Mr. Horne, the defendant, gave it me.

Q. For what purpoſe?

A. To publiſh in the Public Advertiſer.

Q. Did you accordingly publiſh it?—A. I did.

Q. Had you any other directions from Mr. Horne?

A. Yes. He deſired me to ſend it to ſeveral other papers, which I did.

Q. Do you recollect the names of any of them?

A. The whole, I believe, of them; I cannot exactly recollect.

Q. Did you follow his directions?—A. I did.

Q. Was any thing paid for it?

A. Yes. Mr. Horne paid the bill.

Q. For the publication?—A. Yes.

Mr. Wallace. Look at thoſe news-papers (ſhewing the witneſs the Public Advertiſer of June the 9th, and of July 14, 1775. The witneſs inſpects news-papers).

Q. Are thoſe papers publiſhed by you?

A. I print that paper, and I ſuppoſe they are.

HENRY SAMPSON WOODFALL croſs-examined by the defendant.

Mr. Horne. I am very glad to ſee you, Mr. Woodfall. I deſire to aſk you ſome queſtions. Pray what was your motive for inſerting that advertiſement?

A. Your deſire.

Q. Had you no other motive?

A. I was paid for it, as the advertiſement is paid for.

Q. Pray was it by accident, or by my deſire, that there ſhould be witneſſes to ſee me write that advertiſement?

A. By your deſire.

Q. And did I, or did I not, formally, before that witneſs, when called in, deliver that paper as my act and deed, as if it had been a bond?

A. Yes.

Q. It is true, I did. Did I not always direct you, if called upon, to furniſh the fulleſt proof that you could give?

A. You did, ſir.

Q. Now then, ſir, if you pleaſe, ſay whether I have ever written any thing in your news-paper before?

A. Yes, frequently.

Q. How many years ago, do you think?

A. The firſt remarkable thing that I remember, was ſomething about ſir John Gibbons, about his miſtaking Eaſter for a feaſt or a faſt.

Q. How long ago is that?

A. About the year 1768, about the election time.

Q. That is about nine years ago?—A. Yes.

Q. Have I at any time deſired you to ſcreen me from the laws?

A. No.

Q. Has not the method of my tranſactions with you at all times been, that you ſhould at all times, for your own ſake, if called upon, give me up to juſtice?

A. Certainly; that has always been your deſire.

Q. Pray, ſir, was you not once called upon by the houſe of commons for ſomething that I wrote in your paper?—A. Yes, ſir.

Q. Do you remember that I did or did not, when I took care to furniſh ſuch full proof of this advertiſement, give you the reaſon for it?

A. I cannot ſay I recollect the reaſon.

Q. I will mention it. Whether was this the reaſon? That in the laſt tranſaction before the houſe of commons it was pretended they let me off, becauſe they could not get full evidence. Do you remember whether I rehearſed that or not; and ſaid, that if they now choſe to take notice of this advertiſement, they ſhould not want full evidence?

A. I do recollect that converſation.

Q. You remember that was the reaſon I gave?—A. I do.

Q. Will you pleaſe to look at theſe news-papers? (ſhewing ſeveral papers of the Public Advertiſer to the witneſs. The witneſs inſpects them.)

Q. Do you know theſe news-papers?—A. I do.

Q. Do you believe that you publiſhed them?—A. I do.

Q. Look at the dates. I will call them over to you from a liſt—May the 30th and the 31ſt; June the 6th, the 9th, the 10th, the 12th, the 15th, and the 16th, 1775.

A. I have looked at the papers: they are all my publication:—the date of one of them I cannot make out; it is June ſomething.

Q. We will go on—June the 21ſt and the 27th, 1775; then there is January the 11th, February the 8th, February the 7th, the 11th, June the 2d, and June the 30th, 1777.

A. They are likewiſe my publiſhing.

Q. Pray, Sir, do you recollect the contents of the paper of May 30, 1775?

A. No, upon my ſoul, I do not.

Q. You are upon your oath.

A. I know that indeed.

Q. Read that part (pointing a part out) read from "In provincial congreſs, April 26, 1774, down to that part (pointing it out).

Mr. Wallace. The officer ſhould read it; though not now. You will be intitled to read it when you come to your defence.

Mr. Horne. Pray do you know Mr. Arthur Lee?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever receive any account from him relative to the perſons who were killed at Lexington and Concord?

A. I really do not recollect.

[Q. Do you recollect that you ever publiſhed his name to an account?

A. I think I did; relating to his agency for ſome colony.

Q. Look at that, and ſee whether you remember that, and how you received it? (Witneſs inſpects Public Advertiſer of May 31, 1775.)

A. Yes. I think I received this from Mr. Arthur Lee.

Q. Pray who was Mr. Arthur Lee?

A. He is of the bar. I have ſeen him in Weſtminſter Hall. He was there at the trial of Mr. Wright the printer, upon this very affair. I believe he was retained there.

Q. Pray was he retained upon your cauſe when you were to be proſecuted for this advertiſement?

A. He was.

Q. And why did you retain him? Had you any particular reaſon?

A. I preſumed he knew more of the ſubject of the advertiſement than I did.

Q. Did he ever tell you any thing upon the ſubject?

A. We have had private converſation together as a matter of news.

Q. Did he ever tell you he had lodged affidavits with the lord mayor of London?—A. He did.

Q. Sir, did you ever tell me ſo?

A. I do not recollect.

Q. Pray when had you, for the firſt time, any notice of a proſecution for the publiſhing of this advertiſement?

A. About two years ago.

Q. Pray did that proſecution go on?---A. No.

Q. Do you know why?

A. Yes. I let judgment go by default.

Q. The firſt time?

A. I was never called upon till laſt January.

Q. It began two years ago; and you were never called forward upon it till laſt January?

A. I think that was about the month.

Q. As near as you can recollect?---A. Yes.

Q. When was you firſt applied to, or was you ever applied to, to be a witneſs in this cauſe?

A. I was not.

Q. You never was?---A. No.

Q. How came you to be an evidence?

A. I heard that if I could produce my author, matters might be better for me; and as you had no ſort of objection (which you told me at the time) I did of courſe produce thoſe copies that appeared there to meſſieurs Chamberlayne and White, the ſolicitors for the Treaſury.

Q. Should you at any time, if you had been called upon, have declared that I was the author of that advertiſement?

A. Moſt certainly; for you deſired it.

Q. And have given your evidence?---A. Yes.

Q. Who was the application made by?

A. It was no ſort of application at all; I heard of it.

Q. By whom?

A. My brother.

Q. You never refuſed to furniſh evidence againſt the author?

A. No.

Q. You never were applied to, to do it?

A. No; I was not.

Q. You have ſaid that I never deſired you to conceal me from the law for any thing you publiſhed from me---Did you ever receive any letter or meſſage from ſir Thomas Mills in your life?

A. A private letter I have.

Q. But did not that private letter relate to the public paper?

A. Never.

Q. Did you never receive any meſſage not to inſert any thing in your paper about lord Mansfield's earldom?

A. No.

Q. Upon your oath?

A. Upon my oath, to the beſt of my recollection, I never did.

Q. From any quarter?---A. No.

Q. Sir, was you ever ſent for by lord Bute?

A. No; I never ſaw him.

Q. Was you not ſent for for inſerting a paragraph about the king's marriage?

A. No; I am not conſulted by the higher powers, I aſſure you.

Q. If I had thought you were, I never ſhould have truſted you; I do not think you are.

A. I am much obliged to you for your good opinion.

Mr. Horne. I will give you no more trouble.

WILLIAM WOODFALL ſworn.

Examined by Mr. WALLACE.

Q. Pleaſe to look at that paper (ſhewing the witneſs the manuſcript of the advertiſement. The witneſs inſpects it).

Q. Have you ſeen that paper before?

A. I have.

Q. When did you firſt ſee it?

A. Mr. Horne delivered it into my hands in my brother's compting-houſe on the 8th of June, to be inſerted in the London Packet and Morning Chronicle; both which papers I print.

Q. Was it accordingly inſerted in thoſe papers?

A. It was.

Q. Look at thoſe papers (ſhewing the witneſs ſeveral papers of the Morning Chronicle and London Packet. The witneſs inſpects them).

Q. Are thoſe papers publiſhed by you?

A. They are.

WILLIAM WOODFALL croſs-examined by the defendant.

Mr. Horne. Mr. William Woodfall, I will not repeat all the ſame queſtions to you. Did you ever receive any application——A. No.

Q. Your anſwer is of the quickeſt. Had you not better hear the queſtion?

A. I preſume you meant to the ſame queſtion you put to my brother; as you laid an emphaſis upon the word you.

Q. Did you ever receive any letter, or meſſage, or deſire, or requeſt, of any kind, in any manner, not to inſert any thing in your paper relative to lord Mansfield's earldom? on your oath?

A. On my oath, I never received any letter.

Q. Meſſage, or requeſt, of any kind, in any manner, ſir, from ſir Thomas Mills, I aſk you?

A. No,—I think not.

Q. You muſt be a little more poſitive, becauſe my queſtion will not admit of a think.

A. I do not recollect I did.

Q. Then take a little time.

A. I don't recollect that I did. I know very well, that ſome perſon or other, once, mentioned it to me.

Q. That is an application. To mention it to you is a ſtronger application than a letter.

A. I had ſome converſation about it. I don't recollect that I was deſired not to publiſh it.

Q. Was it to requeſt you not to inſert ſquibs or any thing?

A. I recollect I did inſert it.

Q. What?

A. Lord Mansfield's promotion to an earldom.

Q. What was that application? That you would inſert paragraphs about it, or would not?

A. It was a converſation, not of the nature of buſineſs; nor no expreſs deſire to me; or ſome converſation as might be between two friends.

Q. Upon your oath, you had never any application to omit inſerting any thing of that kind?

A. Upon my oath, I don't recollect that I had.

Q. Nor you have never ſaid that you had?

A. If I don't recollect that I received any application to keep out any thing relative to it, I conſequently cannot have ſpoken of it.

Q. Did you, or did you not, ever ſpeak of it?

A. Not that I am aware of.

Q. But you will not ſwear poſitively you never did?

A. I had no direct application to me to keep out any thing.

Q. Direct? My queſtion was direct or indirect, or of any kind.

A. I mean to anſwer direct. I don't recollect that I was ever applied to, to keep out any thing; nor that I ever ſaid I was applied to, to keep out any thing.

Q. More than that you cannot recollect?

A. No.

[The aſſociate read the advertiſements in the ſeveral papers that had been proved and put into court on the part of the proſecution.]

Mr. Attorney-General.

My lord, we have done.

Mr. Horne.

Gentlemen of the jury,

I Am much happier, gentlemen, in addreſſing myſelf to you, and I hope and believe I ſhall be much more fortunate as well as happy, than in addreſſing myſelf to the judge. I have been betrayed, gentlemen, I hope, into no unſeemly warmth; but yet into ſome warmth. I have felt myſelf like a man firſt put into hot water; but I have now been long enough in it to be perfectly cool. And, gentlemen, ſome ſmall allowances might have been made for me by my judge who preſides upon this cauſe, when he conſiders the peculiar diſadvantages in which I ſtand here before him. Gentlemen, I am an abſolute novice in theſe matters; and yet oppoſed to gentlemen ſome of the moſt eminent in their profeſſion, and ſome of the moſt converſant in practice. But that is not all; I have a farther diſadvantage. I ſtand here, gentlemen, before you, a culprit as well as a pleader; perſonally and very materially intereſted in the iſſue of the cauſe which I have to defend. And every gentleman in the court muſt know—(ſome perhaps by their own experience, all by the reaſon of the thing)—how very different is the ſportful combat with foils from that which is ſeriouſly diſputed with unbated ſwords; and how frequently the fluttering of the heart, in the latter ſituation, has been known to enfeeble the ſteadieſt wriſt, and to dazzle the cleareſt and moſt quick-ſighted eye. Gentlemen, I have read even of counſel, eminent in their profeſſion, converſant in practice, approved and applauded for their ingenuity in the defence of others, who, when they came to ſtand in the ſame ſituation in which I now ſtand, have complained to the court (and met with an indulgence which I have not), they have complained to the court of the ſame diſadvantage which I now feel. Gentlemen, I have liſtened to Mr. Attorney-General's declamation with as much patience, and, I believe, with much more pleaſure, than any one in the court. That pleaſure I do acknowledge was perſonal to myſelf; ariſing from the futility of the ſupport which Mr. Attorney-General has attempted to give to the ſerious charge which he has brought againſt me; a pleaſure, however, mixed with ſome pain, when I conſider the wretched times at which we are arrived; when a gentleman of his natural ſagacity is, I own, juſtified by recent experience for ſuppoſing it poſſible to obtain from a London jury a verdict for the crown, upon a mere common-place declamation againſt ſcandal and indecency in general, without one ſingle ſyllable of reaſon, or law, or argument, applicable to that particular charge which he has brought againſt me, and which you are now upon your oaths to decide. Gentlemen, you know, as well as I do, that I am perſonally and in all reſpects an abſolute ſtranger to every one of you. I am glad of it. I do not expect or deſire from you either friendſhip, or favour, or indulgence. It is your duty to do impartial juſtice, and I only requeſt your attention. I began with requeſting it; and I requeſted your attention, that you may be able to judge for yourſelves, and that the verdict which you ſhall give—(perſonally as it reſpects myſelf it is totally indifferent to me)—but that the verdict which you ſhall give, may be really your own, as it ought to be, and not the judge's. That is the only thing I requeſt of you, and I requeſt it becauſe it is your duty and your oath.

Gentlemen, as for the charge that is brought againſt me, you cannot be ignorant that I am charged with the only unpardonable crime which can, at this time, be committed. I am accuſed of a libel.

Murder and ſodomy, you know, have in theſe our days often found ſucceſsful ſolicitors: and the laws againſt popery (though unrepealed and in full legal force) are, when reſorted to, thought, by the magiſtrate who preſides here, too rigorous to be ſuffered to have their free courſe againſt a religion ſo deſtructive of the civil rights of mankind, and ſo favourable to abſolute and arbitrary power. But whilſt that has been favoured beyond the laws, nothing beyond the laws has been thought rigorous and ſevere enough againſt the charge of libel. Murder, attended with the moſt aggravating circumſtances, has been repeatedly pardoned; and treaſon, the blackeſt treaſon, againſt the family on the throne, and (what is of much more conſequence to us than any family) againſt the free conſtitution of this country, has been not only pardoned, but taken into favour; and the eſtates of convict traitors have been reſtored to them and to their families. Whilſt mercy and forgiveneſs, gentlemen, have been thus flowing unnaturally in a full ſtream over the higheſt mountains of iniquity, has any one of you ever ſpied the ſmalleſt rivulet deſcending towards the valley of the libeller? Has any man charged with a libel (and what has not been charged as a libel?) has any man ſo charged ever yet met with mercy? Gentlemen, I do not call back again theſe things to your remembrance in order to arraign them; that is not my preſent buſineſs: I only mention them to gain from you, the only thing I wiſh, your attention. You will be pleaſed then, gentlemen, as one motive for your attention, to remember the nature of the crime charged.

Gentlemen, if the nature of the crime and the rancour with which it is purſued, if that affords a ſtrong reaſon for your particular caution and care and attention in this ſort of trials, a much ſtronger reaſon indeed will be afforded you by the nature of the proſecution. It is called an information ex officio. The term ex officio is a very gentle expreſſion for a very harſh thing. Ex officio (the gentleman well explained it to you, when he boaſted of his conſcience, and his integrity, and duty; for it is certainly ſo)—ex officio means, that which he does from a ſenſe of duty. If in this you conſider only juſt what meets the ear, there is no harm in it; it is a good thing: duty is a good thing. But if you examine the real force and conſequences of the term, as here applied, you will find it to contain every thing that can be imagined illegal, unjuſt, wicked, and oppreſſive. For my own part, I am aſtoniſhed that any man, at this time of day, exerciſing ſuch powers as are not according to law, and are much leſs according to reaſon, ſhould talk to you, with an open face, of integrity, of honour, of duty, of conſcience; and that, inſtead of aggravating and ſhewing you in what the charge which he has brought againſt me, in what my crime conſiſts, he has employed half his harangue in boaſting of his own character. If any man in the court who had not known that I was the defendant had come in at the time that that gentleman was talking of his integrity, his conſcience, and his duty; I aſk, would he not immediately have concluded that Mr. Attorney-General was the defendant then making his defence? He muſt. Let the gentleman's integrity and honour be as great as he tells you it is; what has that to do with me? What has that to do with the charge which he has brought againſt me? except indeed this; that, having nothing really to charge me with, he ſets up his own great, immaculate character in oppoſition to mine; that you may give a verdict againſt me, becauſe he is a man of honour, an uncorrupt man, a pure man of integrity, and would not charge me, if he did not think me guilty. Let him think what he pleaſes; if you do not think me guilty, I care very little what he profeſſes to think. I know that he is manly enough; and I honour that part of his character. He bears a man's heart in his boſom, and (though his office has made him hold the language he does) I defy him not to reſpect me. I know he does. I am ſure of it.

Gentlemen, I ſaid that ex officio contained every thing that was illegal, unjuſt, wicked, and oppreſſive; and I will prove it to you. Ex officio---(a little ſpecimen of it you have ſeen)---ex officio means a power to diſpenſe with all the forms and proceedings of the courts of juſtice, with all thoſe wiſe precautions which our laws have taken to prevent the innocent from being oppreſſed by exorbitant and unjuſt power——

Gentlemen, I was thrown off my guard. I own I was. I had prepared an argument; which I believe his lordſhip perceived: he therefore granted me what I intended to have inforced; and, having granted it to me, that grant was made uſe of to prevent me from gaining any argument in anſwer, of any kind. You muſt have taken notice of it; it is your duty to take notice. Juries have been too much conſidered as men out of court; and when an application has been made to the judge, to determine upon a point of law, the jury has been conſidered as having nothing to do with the matter. No more they have, indeed, to decide it. But the jury has this to do with the matter: they are to make a true deliverance; and they will ſee and will judge whether the defendant has juſtice done him or not, even in the practice of the court. I know nothing of the law: I am not ſorry for that: this is not a queſtion of law; and I am happy to have Mr. Attorney-General's authority to ſay, that it is ‘ the plaineſt, the ſimpleſt queſtion; and that it was too obvious for ‘ him to foreſee a difficulty in it.’ He ſaid, it was ‘ the plaineſt of all ‘ the plain and ſimple matters that were ever laid before a court;’ and being ſo, you are the beſt judges of it. And indeed the nature of a libel always makes a jury the beſt judges of it; for a libel (if it be ſo) is intended for miſchief: it muſt therefore be intelligible to the people, or no miſchief could be produced by it. If a man writes a libel that a common jury could not underſtand, (and you are a ſpecial jury, gentlemen) he muſt fail in his deſign. Obſerve then, gentlemen, this advertiſement is the plaineſt and ſimpleſt of all the matters that were ever laid before a court in which the attorney-general was concerned: and in theſe two years and a quarter that he has had to bring it to trial, he has not been able to ſee a difficulty in it; and yet he has had a ſpecial jury to determine it: a common jury could not be left to determine it: and that I will explain to you hereafter. I know very well, that not only juries, but many other perſons who apply even to the practice of the law, never trouble their heads to take into conſideration all together the enormous wickedneſs of the powers claimed in this ſort of proſecution. It ſhall be my buſineſs therefore to explain it to you. You ſhall judge of the honour, and integrity, and conſcience of the gentlemen who uſe them and enjoy them.

And, firſt of all, an information means no more than an accuſation. Appeal, indictment, information, are, as I take it (and I ſhall be corrected if I am wrong, it will be well corrected both by the attorney-general and the judge)---I take it they mean no more than accuſation; and they have a different ſpecific name becauſe of the different manner in which that accuſation is brought forwards. Then, gentlemen, this is an accuſation by duty, out of duty; and by this means, by this his duty, the attorney-general is enabled, contrary to the laws of the land, to accuſe whom he pleaſes, and what he pleaſes, and when he pleaſes. And (if he pleaſes) he only accuſes them, and never brings it to trial: he goes on harraſſing the ſubject with information upon information, if he pleaſes, and never brings that man to trial, If however, out of his mercy, or out of his reſentment, he does chuſe at laſt to bring it to a trial; why, gentlemen, he, in general, tries it by whom he pleaſes. Gentlemen, when it comes to trial, he tries it in what manner he pleaſes, he takes what advantages he pleaſes, and no reaſon will be given for thoſe advantages. Gentlemen, during the courſe and progreſs of the trial, if, notwithſtanding thoſe advantages he has already taken, he ſees ſome reaſon to ſuſpect that the verdict is likely to go againſt him, he claims a right to ſtop it if he pleaſes, without any deciſion; for he claims a right to withdraw a juror, as it is called; that is to ſay, You ſhall not come on to a verdict. The attorney-general muſt not deny it, unleſs indeed the practice of the court is changed in that particular.

The practice of the court we ſee does ſometimes change; for I have it now from the judge, that in all caſes the proſecutor has a right to reply; which truly I did not before think to be the practice: but, however, the Bar will take notice now; for they will ſoon have caſes in which they may enjoy that benefit and privilege, if it be one: the proſecutor has a right to reply, even though no evidence is called for the defendant.---I ſhall ſee ſome more new methods of proceeding in trials; I have ſeen a good many. I think there muſt be ſomewhere or other in the court a gentleman with ſpirit enough,---ſome gentleman or other---many I hope there are, who will (upon ſome trial where they may be proſecutors) who will take that advantage that has been allowed to-day, and will offer to reply where no evidence is called. There were ſome half words I know dropped about matter of law, but I hope that will be made plain.

Well, but if the attorney-general does not ſtop the cauſe without coming to a deciſion, but thinks he ſhall get a verdict in his own favour, and therefore ſuffers the cauſe to go on; if he loſes the verdict, he ſuffers none of thoſe diſpleaſing conſequences which other men muſt ſuffer; for the crown pays no coſts---none at all:---he can proſecute as often as he pleaſes, and whom he pleaſes, and pays no coſts! But that is not all.---Suppoſe he has convicted ſix, ſeven, or eight men for the ſame offence, he exerciſes the ſovereign power of pardon; he calls to judgment which of them he pleaſes, and lets go by which of them he pleaſes.---It has happened in the proſecution for this very paper:---out of ſeveral convicts, but three have been called up to judgment. That in ſome part I ſhall explain to you. But that is not all: the man or the men whom he calls up to judgment, he, the proſecutor, aggravates their puniſhment as he pleaſes; and that I will prove to you. In that, I think, I ſhall not be contradicted, becauſe I have the authority of the judge who is now trying this cauſe.

So that in every ſtage of the buſineſs you will find that there is an unjuſt, an illegal, a wicked, and an oppreſſive advantage. And that you may not think that I am declaiming without any proofs, I will ſo far treſpaſs upon your time as to come a little more to particulars.

And firſt, gentlemen, for the beginning of ſuch a proſecution.---He brings it on as he pleaſes; he has no reſort to a grand jury, or the country to accuſe; but, contrary to expreſs law, and what is much ſtronger, contrary to the ſtrongeſt and the very fundamental reaſon of that law, he has no recourſe at all to a grand jury; and that becauſe it is the pretended ſuit of the crown. Now, gentlemen, if we want to enquire (which is not often done, I know, in courts of juſtice) why any grand jury? why a grand jury at all? It is not owing to the nature of the offence; grand juries are in capital offences and in ſmall offences. Why are a grand jury to find the accuſation? for you muſt not be led away by technical terms. Information, appeal, indictment, all mean one and the ſame thing;---accuſation brought by different perſons---that is the only reaſon of their different appellations.---If that is not the reaſon of the difference of the names, I ſhall be corrected.

Then why a grand jury? I would tell you in my own words, if I had not the words of a perſon more to be relied upon. Sir John Hawles ſays, theſe are his words: ‘ the true reaſon of a grand jury---’

But, gentlemen, I ſhall juſt obviate an objection firſt, becauſe I ſhall not have an opportunity after it is made. It may be objected, that I have taken this from the State Trials; and I have heard from the bench that the State Trials are no authority. I have alſo heard from an officer very high in the law, and of very great acknowledged abilities, who ſits by the ſide of the attorney-general, that they are a much better authority (I ſpeak it becauſe I heard him ſay ſo) that they are a much better authority than the ſcrawl of a nameleſs Reporter. But I will tell you why the State Trials in certain caſes are the beſt authority; and that is, for this reaſon: becauſe they are equally good authority, whether what they relate is true or is falſe. It is a ſtrange aſſertion, but their authority is equally good for the purpoſe for which they are brought, whether the things they tell are true or falſe. I have heard them called from the bench (and called ſo for very good reaſons) ‘ libels upon the judges.’------‘ The State Trials are ſo far from being an authority, that they are ‘ libels upon the judges.’---Are they ſo? Then they are ſtill better authority than if they were true; that is, authority for the purpoſes for which they are brought; that is, for the condemnation of the wicked doctrines which they expoſe. For are they libels upon the judges? Was the intention of thoſe who wrote them to blacken their characters? Would the libellers then at that time of day (ſome a hundred, two, or three hundred years back, or according to the length of time) would an enemy have put into the judges mouths doctrines which were honourable? No; if he intended to libel them, he has falſely made them the propagators of thoſe doctrines which their ſouls abhorred. Can there then be a ſtronger evidence about the opinion which men had formerly concerning theſe doctrines? If there cannot, then there can be no ſtronger authority againſt the doctrines expoſed by the State-Trials. True or falſe, the State-Trials are the beſt authority which can be had; and better if they are falſe than if true.

Then, gentlemen, I will proceed to my authority: ‘ The true reaſon of ‘ a grand jury is the vaſt inequality of the plaintiff and defendant; and ‘ therefore the law has given this privilege to the defendant on purpoſe, ‘ if it were poſſible, to make them equal in the proſecution and defence, ‘ that equal juſtice may be done between both. It conſiders that the ‘ judges, the witneſſes, and the jury, are more likely to be influenced by ‘ the king than by the defendant: the judges, as having been made by ‘ him, and as it is in his power to prefer or reward them higher: and ‘ though there are no juſt cauſes for them to ſtrain the law, yet there ‘ are ſuch cauſes which, in all ages, have taken place, and probably always will. Nor was it, nor is it, poſſible but that the great power of ‘ enriching, honouring, and rewarding, lodged in the king, always had ‘ and yet muſt have an influence on the witneſſes and jury; and therefore it is that the law has ordered that at the king's proſecution no man ‘ ſhall be criminally queſtioned’ (this is a criminal queſtion) ‘ no man ‘ ſhall be criminally queſtioned unleſs a grand jury, upon their own ‘ knowledge, or upon the evidence given them, ſhall give a verdict that ‘ they really believe the accuſation is true.’

If, gentlemen, there are other reaſons for a grand jury than theſe, if there are others, you will have them; and though it will not be permitted to me to do (what with the utmoſt extent of my ignorance of the law, which is very great, I am ſtill ſure I could do by common-ſenſe and reaſon—I mean, refute thoſe other reaſons;) I ſay, though I ſhall not be permitted to do that here, you and all the world will be able, at your cooler hours, to determine upon the force of thoſe reaſons that ſhall be given, from whatever authority they may come. And in this reſpect I ſhall be happy; for I ſhall have the honeſty and the underſtanding of the public at large to judge of thoſe doctrines which my imbecility might not permit me ſufficiently to refute.

Gentlemen, it is true that the court of King's Bench has alſo aſſumed a power of accuſing men. They ſay they may ſafely be truſted with it. I believe their claim illegal; but I have nothing to do with it: and I acknowledge that it is much ſafer there, than in the hands of an attorney-general, who is whipped in and whipped out juſt as the miniſter, whoſe friend he is, goes in or out.

But that is not all. The court of King's Bench cannot grant an information without an affidavit, without an accuſation upon oath; no one of the judges of the court of King's Bench can do it; and yet they are a little more independent (they have fewer hopes, and therefore fewer fears) than the attorney-general; yet no one of the judges of the court can accuſe a man. It muſt be the whole court, and they muſt do it in conſequence of an oath. If I am wrong, you will have the pleaſure of contradicting it (turning to the attorney-general). But the attorney-general accuſes men neither upon the oath of others, nor yet upon his own oath. If he believes the matter of the accuſation true, it is but the belief of one man, and he a prejudiced man, and the moſt improper man in the kingdom for his authority to be taken in ſuch a caſe. But, gentlemen, what is much worſe, it frequently happens that no man whatever avows the accuſation, or believes it; no, not the attorney-general himſelf who files the information. I will prove it by-and-bye, even in the caſe of the attorney-general who filed this declaration. Gentlemen, I ſhall deſire by-and-bye, for your ſatisfaction and mine, to find out whether there is one man in the country that believes me guilty of the crime laid to my charge; a crime of that nature that is to have a puniſhment which is called by the law a temporary death, an excluſion from ſociety, impriſonment. The apparent object of this proſecution is to take what little money out of my pocket I may have there, and to impriſon me, and ſo exclude me from that ſociety of which I have rendered myſelf unworthy. However, I have the pleaſure to ſee that there ſits a gentleman by the judge who is now trying me, who, as well as myſelf, has charged the king's troops with murder; a charge which at that time excited great abhorrence and deteſtation againſt him. The judge and that gentleman have been laughing all the time of this trial; they have enjoyed each other's company exceedingly (a great laugh for ſome minutes of the whole audience). Well, gentlemen, (turning towards lord Mansfield and Mr. Wilkes) I have cauſed another laugh between the gentlemen; but it gives me pleaſure to think, that if ever I am to come out of priſon again (if you are ſo kind as to put me there) I too may have the honour (if it be one) of ſitting cheek by cheek with the judge, and laughing at ſome other libeller. I ſaid, if I come out again---becauſe if it is poſſible that I ſhould be put there for this charge, I believe that will never happen.---I will never ceaſe repeating the charge I have made, till thoſe men are legally tried and acquitted who are guilty of what I call murder. I will not be contented with one, nor with two, nor with twenty juries. I will repeat the charge of murder upon the troops every day, if this doctrine gets ſo far even as to a doubt; and I call upon the attorney-general now, if he may, if he can, if he will venture without the permiſſion of thoſe miniſters whoſe humble ſervant alone he is; if he may venture, I call upon him to pledge himſelf to bring an information for a ſeditious libel againſt the King and the Government every time I charge the troops with murder. I promiſe him I will give him buſineſs enough, and I hope he will (if he may venture to do it) promiſe to file an information every time I charge them with murder when they commit it.

But, gentlemen, I have wandered; though if I am to be ſhut up ſo ſoon, a few excurſions before it may be excuſed me.

The attorney-general does not apply then to the grand jury, and there is no perſon whoſe accuſation upon oath it is.

When he has filed his information, he proceeds or not upon it as he pleaſes; he files freſh informations if he pleaſes, when he pleaſes, as often as he pleaſes; he uſes it if he pleaſes as a vexatious method which may harraſs and ruin and deſtroy the greateſt fortune in this country. It has been uſed vexatiouſly. I do not ſay by the preſent attorney-general; I do abſolutely acquit him of that; he never, that I know of, has been guilty of that practice: but I do know attorney-generals who have: but that I may not ſeem to libel all the world, I will not mention them nor the caſe. When the attorney-general has brought his accuſation, and renewed and delayed it as much as he pleaſes, if he chuſes to try it, I ſaid, he tries it by almoſt whom he pleaſes. It may ſeem perhaps a ſtrange thing for me to ſay to a jury who are trying my cauſe; but it is a fact; for he is always ſure to have a ſpecial jury for the trial of this ſort of charge. Libel is always tried by a ſpecial jury. Now this ſeems a very comical thing; for there is an expence attending it. The gentleman, I ſuppoſe, would not be thought to be unneceſſarily laviſh of the income of the crown, which has lately been found ſo deficient; he ſurely would not voluntarily throw it away. And yet a man that came from Brentford (my clerk formerly) had two guineas for his expences. He is a very honeſt man; it was a very lucky matter for him: I wiſh, for his ſake, that he might be called a witneſs againſt me once a week upon ſuch a proſecution. Now if the ground of the charge happens to be, as this is, ‘ of all plain and ſimple matters ‘ that ever were laid before a court the moſt ſimple;’ it is a very ſtrange circumſtance that the attorney-general ſhould chuſe to have a ſpecial jury to try a thing in which there is nothing ſpecial! Special juries were never intended or appointed for that purpoſe. They were intended to examine into merchants accounts, or any critical or nice matter; for you know we are told that you have nothing to do with the law: you do not therefore want any legal education; and yet ſpecial juries are always made uſe of in matters of libel. And indeed why ſhould they not? It coſts the attorney-general nothing. In the caſe of any other proſecutor, it would be at his expence; but the crown pays this, that is, the people pay it againſt themſelves. However, that is no objection to Mr. Attorney-General; for if you look at the law-expences in the Civil Liſt of the laſt year 1776, as they are delivered in to parliament, you will find that they amount to the little inſignificant ſum of 60,000 l. A defendant againſt the crown is in a bleſſed ſituation! But as the expence is no reaſon againſt the attorney-general chuſing to try it by a ſpecial jury, he has a very ſtrong reaſon for chuſing a ſpecial jury; and that is, becauſe, by that means, he tries it by almoſt whom he pleaſes: I do not mean by the particular individuals whom he pleaſes, but generally by that deſcription of men that he pleaſes. Now this, gentlemen, is particularly unfortunate in my caſe; for the attorney-general ſaid (I heard him ſay it upon the firſt trial for this advertiſement) that nine-tenths of the people approved of all the meaſures of the miniſtry relative to America. The method of ſtriking a ſpecial jury ſeems at firſt ſight fair enough. Forty-eight men are ſtruck from a book. The defendant and the proſecutor each ſtrikes off twelve. That ſeems very fair and juſt; but it is very far from being ſo fair; for if nine-tenths of the people (which he himſelf acknowledged) are of that way of thinking (a way of thinking contrary to what I may well ſeem to be) you will obſerve that the attorney-general ſtrikes off two tenths and half a tenth out of the forty-eight; ſo that he will be ſure not to have one man of my way of thinking concerning America: I mean, it will be ſo, if at leaſt they know what they are about: ſo that you ſee there is ſure to be a little prejudice againſt the defendant in the minds of the jury. It is true, indeed, that the opinion of the jury concerning the meaſures relative to America has nothing fairly to do in this cauſe; but the prejudice may be extended from one thing to the other. We all know very well how men's minds are apt to run. But that is not all. This prejudice will be the caſe, even though the ſpecial jury are fairly ſtruck; but they are not fairly ſtruck. I believed ſo; but I never was ſure of it till this caſe of mine: and whatever I may ſuffer, I think it a cheap purchaſe to know what I now know by this means. The ſpecial juries in the counties, eſpecially in Middleſex, great numbers of them are qualified by the crown; they are eſquired by the crown; and theſe crown eſquires always attend upon the ſpecial juries. In the city, gentlemen, to which you belong, you know very well whether the deſcription of merchant has or has not changed within ſome years paſt. You know, I dare ſay many of you, what merchants were—what merchants are. You all know well that the very numerous and extenſive contracts which are going forward bring a ſwarm of merchants in amongſt you. Every man that has a contract becomes a merchant; every man that has a contract is liable to be ſtruck upon a ſpecial jury, and he is ſure to attend, if he is taken: and you muſt obſerve beſides, that the ſolicitor of the Treaſury, who is in this conſtant employ of ſtriking ſpecial juries, knows all the men, their ſentiments, their ſituations, their deſcriptions, and the diſtinction of men.

Now, gentlemen, for the method of ſtriking a ſpecial jury, which I ſhall not wonder that you are not acquainted with; and for the counſel, it is a matter that they are not concerned in. Obſerve, I do not lay theſe things to the charge of the attorney-general; he only uſes the powers which others put into his hands.—The ſpecial jury, you may imagine, are taken indifferently, and as it may happen, from a book containing all the names of thoſe who are liable to ſerve. I thought ſo, when I read the act of parliament appointing the manner in which they ſhould be taken; but when I came to attend to ſtrike the ſpecial jury, a book with names was produced by the ſheriff's officer. I made what I thought an unexceptionable propoſal: I deſired the maſter of the Crown-Office (whom I do entirely acquit, and do not mean the ſlighteſt charge upon) I deſired the maſter of the Crown-Office that he would be pleaſed to take that book; open it where he would; begin where he would, at the top or at the bottom; and only take the firſt forty-eight names that came. I ſaid, I hoped that to ſuch a propoſal the ſolicitor of the Treaſury could have nothing to object. I was miſtaken; he had ſomething to object. He thought that not a fair way (turning round to the attorney-general). There were witneſſes enough preſent; and I ſhould ſurely be aſhamed to miſrepreſent what eight or nine people were preſent at. He thought that not a fair way. He thought and propoſed as the faireſt way, that two ſhould be taken out of every leaf. That I objected to. I called that picking, and not ſtriking, the jury. To what end or purpoſe does the law permit the parties to attend, if two are to be taken by the maſter of the Crown-Office out of every leaf? Why then need I attend? Two may as well be picked in my preſence as in my abſence. I objected to that method. The maſter of the Crown-Office did not ſeem to think that I had propoſed any thing unreaſonable. He began to take the names; but objected that he could not take the firſt forty-eight that came, becauſe they were not all ſpecial jurymen; and that the names of common and ſpecial jurymen were mixed together, and that it would be a hard caſe that the party ſhould pay the expence of a ſpecial jury and not have one; that they were expected to be perſons of a ſuperior rank to common jurymen. I could have no objection to that, provided they were indifferently taken. I ſaid, Take then the firſt forty-eight ſpecial jurymen that come. He ſeemed to me that he meant to do it. He began; but as I looked over the book, I deſired him to inform me how I ſhould know whether he did take the firſt forty-eight ſpecial jurymen that came, or not; and what mark or deſcription or qualification there was in the book, to diſtinguiſh a ſpecial from a common juryman? He told me, to my great ſurprize (and he ſaid he ſuppoſed I ſhould wonder at it) that there was no rule by which he took them. Why then how can I judge? You muſt go by ſome method. What is your method? At laſt the method was this: That when he came to a man a woollen-draper, ſilver-ſmith, a merchant (if merchant was oppoſite to his name, of courſe he was a ſpecial juryman) but a woollen-draper, a ſilver-ſmith, &c. he ſaid that there were perſons who were working-men of thoſe trades, and there were others in a ſituation of life fit to be taken. How then did he diſtinguiſh? No otherwiſe than this: if he perſonally knew them to be men in reputable circumſtances, he ſaid, he took them; if he did not know them, he paſſed them by. Now, gentlemen, what follows from this?

But this is not all. The ſheriff's officer ſtands by, the ſolicitor of the Treaſury, his clerk, and ſo forth; and whilſt the names are taken, if a name (for they know their diſtinction) if a name which they do not like occurs and turns up, the ſheriff's officer ſays, ‘ O, ſir, he is dead.’ The defendant, who does not know all the world, and cannot know all the names in that book, does not deſire a dead man for his juryman. ‘ Sir, ‘ that man has retired.’ ‘ That man does not live any longer where ‘ he did.’ ‘ Sir, that man is too old.’ ‘ Sir, this man has failed, and ‘ become a bankrupt.’ ‘ Sir, this man will not attend.’ ‘ O (it is ſaid ‘ very reaſonably) let us have men that will attend, otherwiſe the pur‘poſe of a ſpecial jury is defeated.’ It ſeemed very extraordinary to me. I wrote down the names, and two of them which the officer objected to I ſaved. ‘ I begged him not to kill men thus without remorſe, as they ‘ have done in America, merely becauſe he underſtood them to be friends ‘ to liberty; that it was very true, we ſhall ſee them alive again next ‘ week and happy; but let them be alive to this cauſe.’ The firſt name I took notice of was Mr. Sainſbury, a tobacconiſt on Ludgate-hill. The ſheriff's officer ſaid, he had been dead ſeven months. That ſtruck me. I am a ſnuff-taker, and buy my ſnuff at his ſhop; therefore I knew Mr. Sainſbury was not ſo long dead. I aſked him ſtrictly if he was ſure Mr. Sainſbury was dead, and how long he had been dead? ‘ Six or ſeven ‘ months.’ ‘ Why, I read his name to-day; he muſt then be dead ‘ within a day or two: for I ſaw in the news-papers that Mr. Sainſbury ‘ was appointed by the city of London one of the committee’ (it happened to be the very ſame day) ‘ to receive the toll of the Thames navigation:’ and as the city of London does not often appoint dead men for theſe purpoſes, I concluded that the ſheriff's officer was miſtaken; and Mr. Sainſbury was permitted to be put down amongſt you, gentlemen, appointed for this ſpecial jury.

Another gentleman was a Mr. Territ. The book ſaid he lived, I think, in Puddle-dock. The ſheriff's officer ſaid, ‘ that gentleman was ‘ retired; he was gone into the country; he did not live in town.’ It is true, he does (as I am told) frequently go into the country (for I enquired). His name was likewiſe admitted, with ſome ſtruggle. Now what followed? This dead man and this retired man were both ſtruck out by the ſolicitor of the Treaſury; the very man whom the ſheriff's officer had killed and ſent into the country were ſtruck out, and not admitted to be of the jury. Now, gentlemen, what does that look like? There were many other names of men that were dead, and had retired, which were left out.

There is ſomething more unfortunate in the caſe of a ſpecial jury. The ſpecial jurymen, if they fail to attend that trial for which they are appointed, are never cenſured, fined, nor puniſhed by the judge. In the trial of one of the printers, only four of the ſpecial jury attended. This is kind in the chief juſtice, but it has a very unkind conſequence to the defendant, eſpecially in a trial of this nature; for I will tell you what the conſequence is. The beſt men and the worſt men are ſure to attend upon a ſpecial jury where the crown is concerned; the beſt men, from a nice ſenſe of their duty; the worſt men, from a ſenſe of their intereſt. The beſt men are known by the ſolicitor of the Treaſury: ſuch an one cannot be in above one or two verdicts; he tries no more cauſes for the crown. There is a good ſort of a man, who is indeed the moſt proper to try all this kind of cauſes; an impartial, moderate, prudent man, who meddles with no opinions. That man will not attend; for why ſhould he get into a ſcrape? He need not attend; he is ſure not to be cenſured; why ſhould he attend? The conſequence follows, that frequently only four or five men attend, and thoſe ſuch as particularly ought not to attend in a crown cauſe. I do not ſay that it happens now. Not that

I care: I do not mean to coax you, gentlemen: I have nothing to fear. You have more to fear in the verdict than I have, becauſe your conſciences are at ſtake in the verdict. I will do my duty, not for the ſake of the verdict. Now what follows this permiſſion to ſpecial jurymen to attend or not, as they like beſt? Why, every man that is gaping for a contract, or who has one, is ſure to ſhew his eagerneſs and zeal.

It happened ſo in the trial of the firſt cauſe for this advertiſement. The printer ſhewed me the liſt. Amongſt them, one of the firſt I obſerved, was Sir James Eſdaile, alderman of London, and a contractor for the army (there were ſeveral others; I do not mention the gentlemen's names). He would have ſtruck him out. I ſaid, No; there are ſo many bad that ought to be ſtruck out, leave in ſir James: it is impoſſible that a magiſtrate of London! with ſo much buſineſs! a contractor under the crown! if he has any modeſty! he cannot, an alderman of London! go down to be a ſpecial juryman in Middleſex!—He was the foreman of the jury. He was ſure to attend. And ſo they got the firſt verdict, in order to give them this influence upon men's minds.—'We have got a verdict. 'This queſtion has been determined by a jury.'——

Well, gentlemen, having then got ſuch a ſpecial jury as he uſually does get (for it ſeldom happens that twelve gentlemen have ſenſe enough of their duty to attend, as happens to be now my caſe)—the attorney-general brings on the trial. He then claims, amongſt other things, a right to reply, though no evidence is called for the defendant. You have heard what paſſed upon this ſubject with the judge. I will leave that matter now, though I think I have enough to ſay upon it; however, I will leave it unexamined now: I hope to live to argue that point for my client, and therefore will not now trouble you with that argument. You will yourſelves judge whether any reaſon was given to me, or to you, or to any man, why the attorney-general, proſecuting for the crown, having all the influence, power, and advantage that he can poſſibly have, why he ſhould have that advantage of reply—which my equal or inferior ſhall not have!

But beſides this, I told you before, that he claims a right of ſtopping it, when he pleaſes, by withdrawing a juror. I ſhould be glad to hear that contradicted and given up.

But further, if he loſes the verdict, he pays no coſts: the crown pays no coſts. The miſerable man that is harraſſed, even though innocent, though gaining a verdict under all theſe diſadvantages (if it is poſſible, and which ſeldom happens), yet ſtill he muſt ſtand by his coſts; and they may be, you ſee, whatever they pleaſe to make them.

Again, if the attorney-general gains a verdict, he puniſhes whom he pleaſes, and when he pleaſes. I think there were eight convictions for this advertiſement, yet but three have been called up to judgment. One, I think, was let off, becauſe there was a little falſe-ſwearing in the caſe by an officer under the crown—(I allow it to have been certainly a miſtake, becauſe he is a gentleman of character)—and therefore it is accounted for how this one got off: but how the other printers eſcaped, whether from the benevolence of the attorney-general, I do not know.

That is not all. He aggravates the puniſhment of the perſon againſt whom he gets a verdict, if he pleaſes. I was preſent in court when I heard the judge who now tries me (and who will perhaps give the ſame intelligence in my caſe) tell the attorney-general of that time (who is now chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas) when he moved that the convict (who was the gentleman who now ſits next to the judge) when the attorney-general moved that Mr. Wilkes might be committed to the King's Bench priſon, lord Mansfield inſtantly ſaid to Mr. De Grey—'The king's attorney-general may chuſe his priſon: all the priſons are the king's. The attorney-general may, if he pleaſes, move to have him ſent to Newgate.' His lordſhip mentioned Newgate: I heard it. And obſerve, this was an inſtruction to the attorney-general, who ſurely, of all men in the world, leaſt needs inſtruction: and it was in a caſe where he was proſecutor; and in a criminal matter, and proſecutor too for the crown. And this inſtruction was not in order to obtain juſtice againſt the offender; that was paſt; he had been convicted many years before;—but it was merely in aggravation of puniſhment. I did not know nor believe that the attorney-general had that right: I ſhould not have known it, if I had not learned it from ſo great an authority.

Gentlemen, having rehearſed what theſe claims are, I intreat you to conſider who it is that enjoys theſe powers; ſuperior to the powers which any one judge in this country enjoys; ſuperior to the powers which even the courts enjoy. It is the attorney-general! Now, who is the attorney-general? who is he? whoſe officer is he? what ſort of officer is he? I will tell you what a Scotch author of merit—(this is not law, but it is very good reaſon and great truth)—I will tell you what he ſays of the office of the attorney-general. What I ſay now, gentlemen, does not go againſt the perſon now intruſted with it; it goes againſt his office. I do not ſpeak of this gentleman particularly; all attorney-generals, at leaſt moſt of them (ſome of them indeed would not, but moſt of them will) uſe theſe unjuſt powers. Mallet ſays, in the preface to his life of lord chancellor Bacon—'The offices of attorney and ſolicitor general have 'been rocks upon which many aſpiring lawyers have made ſhipwreck of 'their virtue and human nature. Some of theſe gentlemen have acted 'at the bar, as if they thought themſelves, by the duty of their places' (that is, ex officio) 'abſolved from all the obligations of truth, honour, 'and decency'—(but not abſolved you find from talking of them)—'but 'their names (he ſays) are upon record, and will be tranſmitted to after 'ages with thoſe characters of reproach and abhorrence that are due to'—(to whom? This man is as unfortunate in his ſtyle as myſelf) 'the worſt 'ſort of murderers, thoſe that murder under the ſanction of juſtice.'—He was never proſecuted for it. He charged the office of attorney-general (which is ſomething more reſpectable than the office of a common ſoldier) with being the worſt ſort of murderers.

But the attorney-general, it is ſaid, is choſen by the king: that is what is pretended. He is the king's officer; but he holds it by a very precarious tenure: his future hopes are greater than thoſe of any man in this country; his fears therefore muſt be in proportion. Obſerve too, he enjoys theſe powers on the behalf of the king, againſt whom, particularly, all thoſe precautions were taken; for theſe precautions are not taken between ſubjects who are upon a footing; but all theſe precautions and advantages for innocence (that it may not be oppreſſed) they are all taken, not againſt the king, but againſt the crown; againſt that power which is more often abuſed than any other power; more liable to be abuſed, becauſe greateſt. But, gentlemen, the matter is a great deal worſe than this. He is not the king's officer. He knows better where his obligations lie. He is not ſo ungrateful. He would not, at a table with his friends, ſay that he is the king's officer: he knows a great deal better than that. He is in truth the officer of the miniſter: and if the miniſter goes out to-morrow, out goes the attorney-general. We cannot poſſibly have a ſtronger inſtance, and a happier for me, of this very thing. There ſits here in court a gentleman who ſhould now have been attorney-general (he loſt not the place, I ſuppoſe, for want of abilities) who refuſed a brief in this very cauſe; becauſe he thought it ſcandalous at the diſtance of two years and a quarter.—I ſuppoſe he might have ſtill ſtronger reaſons. If I knew them, I would uſe them. If I knew his reaſons why he thought this proſecution ſcandalous, you would hear a very different defence from any which I can give you. Put in then another miniſter, and the attorney-general thinks me a very honeſt man: but if there comes a different miniſter and a different attorney-general, —'O, put him out of the world; he is not fit for human ſociety; ſhut 'him up like a mad dog.'—You ſee it is not the king's officer, it is the miniſter's officer. Gentlemen, it is very well known that the attorney and ſolicitor general make a conſiderable part of every adminiſtration. They ſit there in the houſe of commons on each ſide of the miniſter; the two brazen pillars, the Jachin and Boaz of the miniſter in the houſe of commons. However, gentlemen, though this ſituation of theirs may make us ſmile, it is a very ſerious thing, eſpecially when their honour and conſcience are to go to you for proof, and inſtead of argument.

Now let us ſee, how have thoſe powers been exerciſed? I have ſhewn you what they are; I have ſhewn you who enjoys them: now let us ſee how they have uſed them; I mean the preſent attorney-general. I will not go back to tell you that the biſhops were reckoned guilty of a libel, not becauſe they oppoſed the introduction of the Popiſh religion, but becauſe they would not lend their own hands to the introduction of it. But how has it been uſed by the preſent attorney-general? I am driven to this inquiry. He has talked much of his conſcience, and that if he had not imagined that he was executing his duty, he never ſhould have thought of the proſecution: he did not know me; it was merely a matter of duty. Now I did not apprehend that it was a matter of his ſtirring, and that his motive was duty; but as he takes it upon himſelf, upon himſelf it muſt lie. Now therefore, how has he exerciſed this power which he enjoys in right of being the king's officer? I ſay, that he has then equally betrayed his own conſcience, and the dignity and prerogative of the crown (if injuſtice muſt paſs by theſe names)—I ſay that he has betrayed them all: for he has acted, not as the attorney-general of the king, but as the attorney-general of the houſe of commons. Never before this gentleman's time did any houſe of commons, I believe, I am ſure, never did they direct any attorney-general to file an information. Who enjoys the power then? The houſe of commons files informations! Worſe ſtill; the attorney-general files informations, not from his own mere motion, not from the direction of the crown, but by the direction of the moſt corrupt aſſembly of men that ever exiſted upon the face of the earth.—It may be called indecent to call them ſo; but, gentlemen, I know, that if every man was to ſpeak but one word expreſſive of his opinion concerning what I ſay, there are thoſe, perhaps within hearing, whoſe hearts would ſink within them. There is no man doubts it, and I ſhall not be afraid to ſay it.—But, gentlemen, now obſerve; this officer, the attorney-general, was never permitted to have a ſeat in the houſe of commons till the time of ſir Francis Bacon. He is no officer of the houſe of commons; he never was permitted to ſit there till that time; and out of the extreme veneration which they paid to the greateſt of mankind (for he was ſo), they permitted him, for the firſt time, to have a ſeat as a private member in the houſe. Now where have we got? He has no longer a ſeat in the houſe as a private member; he is the officer of the houſe of commons: that power which is pretended to be exerciſed for the crown, is exerciſed for the miniſter. The houſe of commons is the miniſter's; for he would not be miniſter, if he had not a majority. The attorney-general is brought in by him; the houſe directs the proſecution: whereas the method formerly was, that the houſe of commons uſed to addreſs the crown, to deſire the crown to order the attorney-general to file an information or to proſecute. Never till this time did the houſe think of directing the king's officer to file an information. The conſequence happened to be, what at the very time it was natural to foreſee would happen. The attorney-general proſecuted men whom he thought innocent. I happened by ſtealth (I am not often permitted to be there) I happened by ſtealth to hear the gentleman in the houſe of commons ſpeak a language which no man could miſtake. What is ſtill more, on one of the proſecutions brought, the vote for it was either reſcinded, or ſome healing vote was afterwards put into the journals of the houſe of commons, for having cauſed a proſecution to be brought againſt a perſon who was found to be innocent. Here is a dangerous power indeed! Who may not, if this is permitted, file an information againſt the ſubject? What a power is this in the hands of a miniſter to ruin! for if I am not ruined, it is the gentleman's mercy. I thank him for that mercy; for he might every term file an information, if he pleaſes.

Now, gentlemen, conſider in what ſort of a charge does he enjoy theſe extraordinary powers. You will find, that as he is the laſt man in the world (I ſpeak not of the man, but the office) that ought to be truſted with theſe powers, ſo he enjoys them in that kind of charge in which he ſhould leaſt of all enjoy them. For, gentlemen, libel as well as attorney-general depends very much upon the miniſter. Why, don't we all know very well, that they who were pilloried for libel in the laſt reign are penſioned in this? What then, is this the kind of charge in which this open door to oppreſſion ſhould be left to the attorney-general and to the miniſter? It is not for crimes againſt the ſtate that this power interferes, but for partial political opinions; and the man who is pilloried or impriſoned to-day, may, for the ſame act, be penſioned to-morrow, juſt as the hands change. If this party goes down, it is libel; if it comes up, it is merit. Is it in this kind of charge that an attorney-general ſhould enjoy all theſe unjuſt powers? I need not bid you conſider and recollect what ſort of things have been charged as libels: there is nothing that has not been ſo charged. Sermons,—petitions,—books againſt plays,—ſaying that money will corrupt men, nothing but barely mentioning the effects of money,—all have been proſecuted, and puniſhed, and ears cut off, and thoſe things, for libels. In ſhort, gentlemen, you will always find (your memories will go back enough to find it without reading) that whatever is contrary to the inclinations, intereſts, or even the vices of a miniſter, has always been, and ever will be, charged as libel. Even at this time, if the attorney-general's friend, Mr. Rigby, had been attorney-general, or to direct the attorney-general to file informations for libels, the preſent ſpeaker of the houſe of commons would have been accuſed of a libel, for recommending œconomy to the crown. We know that he would; and there is nothing extraordinary that a ſpeaker of the houſe of commons ſhould have an information ex officio filed againſt him for a libel. The ſpeaker, Williams, had one filed againſt him for publiſhing the journals of the houſe. They are now wiſer. Indeed that caſe has been ſcouted.

If then, gentlemen, theſe conſiderations ſhould make you careful and attentive in a trial upon a proſecution of this kind; the frequency of proſecution for libels, I ſuppoſe, ſhould add to your care and attention. For, gentlemen, when is it that libels are moſt frequent? When is it that proſecutions for libels have been moſt frequent? Have they been under the beſt governments, under the beſt adminiſtrations (for government is a word abuſed: I mean under the miniſters)? Have they been moſt frequent under the beſt, or always under the worſt? It is only bad men that will accuſe the good: good men don't accuſe good things: notwithſtanding which, you will find that under the beſt adminiſtrations there are few libels, and much fewer proſecutions; and under the worſt adminiſtrations you will always find them ſwarm. Whether it happens that under the worſt adminiſtrations (for there is always folly with wickedneſs) the miniſter is ſo fooliſh, as that, not attending to the principles of the perſon recommended to him, he, by miſtake, chuſes a good attorney-general, who has ſkill to diſcover and honeſty to purſue thoſe crimes which are detrimental to ſociety; or whether it happens, that a good miniſter chuſes a bad attorney-general, who has no honour or underſtanding to care for or to diſcover their evil tendency, and therefore does not proſecute at all;---but ſo it happens, that under a good miniſter there are no proſecutions for libel, under a bad miniſter you meet with little elſe.

Gentlemen, if the general nature of this kind of proſecution calls for your particular attention, the particular unfairneſs of this proſecution more ſtrongly demands it. Gentlemen, you will be pleaſed to remember, that the advertiſement which is now brought before you was publiſhed on the 9th of June 1775. Obſerve too, what is the charge. Not any harm that it has done; no, but only a tendency. The charge of the libel is a tendency to excite ſedition; a tendency to alienate the minds of his majeſty's ſubjects; a tendency to do a great many other bad things: I do not recollect them, nor care about them. What! come two years and a quarter afterwards to proſecute for a tendency (not actual miſchief, but a tendency to miſchief). It was ſo dangerous a thing, that it was ſuffered to rage and have its full influence without any check or controul; and then two years after (when its tendency muſt long ſince have ceaſed) comes the proſecution to check the tendency! I believe no grand jury would have found a bill for this proſecution at this diſtance of time: nay, I believe that all the judges of the King's-Bench would not have done it. The attorney-general was well aware of this objection upon the trial of the firſt printer. 'Why not?' ſaid the attorney-general---'Will folly ſay, that that which was a crime in 1775 is no crime in 1777? Will folly ſay?'---Why, what will not folly ſay? Folly will ſay any thing: and what wonder? when even a man of his natural good underſtanding, if placed in his peculiar ſituation, is often obliged to ſay what a moderate folly would bluſh at. 'Was it a crime, ſays he, two years ago, and is it no crime now?' That is not the queſtion: but, whether it ſhould be proſecuted now, after two years delay? That was the queſtion which he ſhould have ſpoken to. And would that be thought ſo ridiculous a poſition to be heard in a court of common law? You all know very well, that a ſimple contract debt cannot be recovered after ſix years is ſuffered to elapſe. Now, will folly ſay of that money, and the benefits of it which a man has enjoyed for ſix years, was it a debt ſix years ago and is it no debt now? No; no man will pretend that the debt is not accumulated. But what then? If you have ſuffered that time to paſs by, you ſhall not ſue for it now. So the unjuſt poſſeſſion of an eſtate for forty or ſixty years (according to the rules which the courts have laid down) the unjuſt poſſeſſion of an eſtate quiets the poſſeſſion. What then, does it become juſt? Have I robbed another family for ſo many years; retained the principal and the income; and does it now become juſt? No, but you ſhall not recover it; the door is ſhut againſt your ſuit. Appeals for felony, for rape, and for murder, they muſt be brought within a year and a day. If you let ſlip that year, you ſhall not proſecute. What! Does it ceaſe to be felony? Does it ceaſe to be rape? Does it ceaſe to be murder? No; there never was any ſuch folly that ſaid that; no folly ever ſaid it: but the law ſays, You ſhall not proſecute: you have loſt your time. But there is ſtill a ſtronger circumſtance concerning this doctrine, which I love beſt, becauſe it came from the gentleman himſelf. The eſtate of a man, the moſt obnoxious for the blackeſt treaſon, by an act of parliament, was propoſed to be reſtored to the ſon. I rejoice that he has it: but the argument of this very gentleman was, that---"oblivion ought to paſs over it: it was treaſon, to be ſure; but it was twenty years ago." Good God! if twenty years ſhall preſcribe againſt treaſon, or ſilence; or put oblivion upon it; if forty years poſſeſſion, for a large landed eſtate; if ſix years, for a ſimple contract debt; if one year, for appeal in caſes of rape, felony, or murder; what ſhall not the mere tendency---(not actual miſchief)---but the mere tendency of an inſignificant libel in a news-paper (if it was a libel; but it is not) what, ſhall not that be permitted a two years preſcription? I ſhall have others beſides folly, I believe, think with me in this queſtion.

But, gentlemen, whether it ſhall be proſecuted or not, the hardſhip is equal to me. I do not ſay, that it is abſolute law that it ſhould not be proſecuted; for this has never been adjudged: indeed the caſe has never happened before. The attorney-general has produced no precedent of ſuch a proſecution as this; he can produce none to you. But I deſire the attorney-general to remember what I now ſay to you and to the court. I ſay, that this abuſe of his power and prerogative, and of his unjuſt claims, will cauſe ſome method of quieting men in reſpect of libels, as men have been quieted in reſpect of poſſeſſions againſt the crown. It will be neceſſary: for it will be conſidered that the nature and the effects of the charge of libel have been very conſiderably changed in the preſent time. The charge of libel now affects both houſes of parliament. Privilege is gone; expulſion may be the conſequence; incapacitation follows! To what are they expoſed! I caſt my eyes by accident towards one---I beg the gentleman's pardon---there ſits near the judge one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed members of the houſe of commons: he is as liable to an information for a libel as I am at this minute.---In his book, in his book the charge of murder is as compleatly made as in my advertiſement: it is lately publiſhed in his Letter to the Freemen of Briſtol: he ſtands as liable to be expelled, to be puniſhed, to be ſhut up from ſociety as a mad dog as I do, and with the ſame pretence. Gentlemen, there are now great officers of ſtate whom I know to be more liable to a proſecution for libel than I am; who have written what has much more the aſpect of a libel, than any thing to be found in my advertiſement; and which may be proved againſt them by the ſame man that has proved my publication. It is true, thoſe, who are not concerned in the Gazette, may at preſent have left off the practice: but what ſignifies that? The attorney-general will tell them, that the number of years ſignifies nothing: it is folly only that will ſay that; even though it was written ten or twenty years ago, (for he has drawn no line) it is only folly that will ſay, it is not a crime now, if it was a crime then. Gentlemen, I muſt beg you particularly for your own direction to obſerve, the ſtrong reaſons againſt this practice of bringing a proſecution for a libel, long after the cauſe of the charge was given. Conſider the changes which are made both in the perſons charged, and the appearance of change which there may be in the thing charged. A man hereafter to be charged with an offence ſo uncertain as a libel, may, thinking himſelf in perfect ſecurity, change his ſituation; which he would not have done, if he had known that there was a proſecution for libel hanging over his head: and perhaps the attorney-general would not have brought that proſecution, if he had not changed his ſituation, and thereby made himſelf vulnerable, who was not ſo before. Why, a man might have had a wife and children ſince the publication of this libel; and it is known that to have them is called---'giving 'hoſtages to fortune.'---A man might have given hoſtages to fortune, and then comes a vindictive attorney-general and drags him away from his peaceful family and fire-ſide, drags him away for a libel written ten years ago: for he has drawn no line! Is this to be borne? is this to be ſuffered? I thank God, that is not my ſituation. There is, however, a change in my ſituation; but of that I ſhall ſay nothing; though I firmly believe, that that change in my ſituation cauſed this proſecution: and you yourſelves ſhall conſider. It is now two years and a month ago, or thereabouts, upwards of two years ago, that this advertiſement was publiſhed. They were very ſore at it; it was conſidered as an affront by thoſe who were glad that the men were killed. However, of them I know nothing; I have not accuſed them. A proſecution was ſoon after commenced againſt the printer who has here been evidence againſt me; and it ſtopped: he heard no more of it; it went faſt to ſleep, and was taken up again. When?---Immediately after it was known ſomewhere, that I had (after an interval of twenty years) entered again into commons at the Temple, in order to do that for others which I am now brought here to do for myſelf. Then re-commenced the proſecution; then am I become a libeller: but it ſleeps till then; it was brought again freſh into life by that act.

But beſides this, gentlemen, there is a great change not only in the perſon charged, but there is a great change alſo in the appearance of the thing which is charged to that perſon, by length of time. This advertiſement was written in a time of profound peace. A civil war has ſince taken place: much blood has been ſhed: much miſchief of all ſorts has been ſuffered; and I wiſh I could ſay, that there was not much more in proſpect. You cannot yourſelves therefore eaſily put back your minds to that ſituation in which they would have been, had the proſecution followed cloſe upon that publication. You cannot recollect the dates when certain proclamations iſſued; you cannot recollect the dates when certain injuries took place: unleſs one made it his particular ſtudy, there is not one of you can tell, whether this act paſſed at this time, or this proclamation at that time. If there is one of you who can recollect, you will find, that all thoſe meaſures which take place againſt rebels, have all been ſince that advertiſement. General Gage, whom I ſubpœna'd, and who would not attend you, who ſays, that he is gone away to Germany, he ſhould have proved to you, that he publiſhed a proclamation in which he gives notice to the Americans themſelves, long after this affair at Lexington and Concord. He gives them notice to come in, and warns them not to do ſo and ſo, otherwiſe they ſhould be conſidered as rebels: it was not therefore known that they were conſidered, in America, as rebels till that proclamation came. That proclamation was to work ſome effect: it muſt either be intended to make them rebels who were otherwiſe not; or to make them known to be ſo, who were ſo. If they did not in America know that they were rebels, till that proclamation came, how ſhould I here in England know it long before that proclamation did come? There is a great change in the appearance of this advertiſement brought forward for proſecution now, from what it would have had to your minds at that time. This you are bound to conſider. Indeed it was ſaid from the bench, on the trials of the printers, that this advertiſement blamed, and cenſured, and libelled 'all the meaſures of government'---(relative to America, I ſuppoſe).---All the meaſures of government! Not the meaſures that happened ſince the publication of it, ſurely! and if they can find in that advertiſement, that it cenſures all the meaſures before, I will be content to loſe a verdict. You will not, gentlemen, for you muſt not, take it upon what that gentleman ſays, what I meant and what I thought. If you can make out that meaning from the advertiſement, then do it; but you will find no word hinting at or cenſuring any man or any meaſure but that one meaſure of the Americans being put to death by the troops. If you can find in that advertiſement any name hinted at or alluded to, or any thing of that kind, the attorney-general will be much obliged to you; for he cannot. If he could, he would have ſhewn you in which part it was. He would have ſaid, Here this meaſure is alluded to; there that great miniſter of ſtate is alluded to. He has not, nor can do that: he has a reply coming forward, and, if he can do it, he will do it then. Therefore, gentlemen, you ſee that That might be a libel, if it was written now, which was not a libel at the time when it was written. Gentlemen, I don't mean that my advertiſement would be a libel, if it was written now. I know the contrary well; and ſo well, that, if it is become a doubt in this country, that it is a ſeditious libel againſt the king and the government to charge the troops with murder, I will write it again and again. If it is not a queſtion, then I am ſatisfied; but if it is made a queſtion in this country, that no man ſhall charge a ſoldier with murder without being guilty of a ſeditious libel againſt the king and the government, then I will go into priſon for life: for I will regularly charge the king's troops with murder (if they put men to death unauthorized by the law) regularly and conſtantly: and ſo I would do, if they made the puniſhment death. Gentlemen, if the advertiſement had the aſpect of a libel, it ſhould have been proſecuted as ſoon as it was publiſhed, that ſo the miſchievous tendency of it might have been prevented, and that fair play might have been done to me, and that you might not come to try an advertiſement, forgetting that the advertiſement preceded, and did not follow the rebellion. But if the attorney-general has paſſed his time, I ought then, gentlemen, as in all other caſes by law I ſhould have, to have the benefit of the fault of my adverſary. I ought not by his neglect and fault to be put into a worſe ſituation than I ſhould have been, if he had done his duty. But the attorney-general ſaid at firſt, in excuſe for that, that it was owing to an accident. If true, ſo much the more fortunate for the defendant. But how appears it? How does it appear that it happened by an accident? Is that to be ſo ſlightly taken up, upon the attorney-general's juſt hinting it? What was the accident? Has he proved it? has he named it? He cannot name it. Let him account for it. I heard the late attorney-general (the preſent chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas) declare, that it was his duty to account for his conduct in bringing that proſecution againſt the letter of Junius; which was brought quick too, not in this manner. He ſaid, it was his duty to account why he took one printer before another; becauſe he looked upon himſelf in filing informations to be exerciſing a judicial, official power, and not merely an advocate at the bar; he thought himſelf bound to juſtify his conduct. Let the attorney-general tell us the accident. I know ſomething more of the re-commencement of the proſecution than he thinks I do; and a very ſtrange circumſtance it was that brought it to my knowledge: however, I don't think I want that. But that is not all. An accident, he ſays, prevented the proſecution at the time when, he muſt acknowledge, it ought to have been proſecuted. Aye, but there is another accident. What is the accident which has happened, that makes it be proſecuted now? There are two accidents. He has only juſt hinted one of them (he has not told you what that is); but he is totally ſilent about the other. What is the accident that makes it to be proſecuted now, at the diſtance of two years? You ſee there is one accident which cauſed it not to be proſecuted at firſt, in a proper time; there is another accident that cauſes it to be proſecuted at an improper time. He is bound to juſtify himſelf (not only to you, but to every man): he is bound to tell you both accidents. I believe he will explain neither. Gentlemen, I am ſorry to take up ſo much of your time. I proteſt upon my honour, it is not to gain a verdict for myſelf: I have buſineſs to do that will take me up much more time than the judges dare to confine me on this charge. I am already a priſoner: I have been a priſoner in my own room much longer than they will chuſe to impriſon me. They will take care. The doctrines concerning libel have now riſen to ſuch a height, that they call for ſome remedy; and they will have it. The coming neceſſity of the times will produce it: and if we ſhall not have it from juſtice and honour, we ſhall have it from neceſſity.

Gentlemen, there are many other unfair practices in this caſe, beſides this delay of proſecution. Obſerve how it comes on. The attorney-general takes the printers firſt. Why not take the author firſt? He has ſaid indeed, that though it was ſigned (and he makes that a great piece of impudence) he has ſaid, that though it is ſigned with my name, it was---'as inſcrutable and impoſſible for him to follow it, as if the 'name had not been put there.' Theſe are the very words: 'as inſcrutable and impoſſible, as if my name had not been put there.'---Now, what ſaid the evidence that he brought to you? He told you that he had never refuſed; that he had never been aſked; that they had never made the ſlighteſt enquiry after the author. Now I appeal to your own conſciences: is there a man in this court that doubts whether the attorney-general doubted or not that I wrote that advertiſement? Is there a man in this court thinks ſo baſely and ſo meanly of me, that, having ſigned my name to an act of that kind, and paid (as I will prove to you) the money to the banker; is there a man in this court that doubts that the attorney-general would have found a difficulty to come at me? There is none of you that can believe what he ſays in that reſpect: judge then of the reſt.---Gentlemen, he took the printers firſt. I will tell you why he did that: it was to gain the influence of a verdict. He meant to take me; he did not think it inſcrutable or impoſſible. After he had gained the influence of a verdict on the printers, then he comes to the author. The queſtion now comes with a prejudice before you. A jury has determined upon it, has declared it to be a crime. My God! where is his honour and his conſcience? But he ſays, that he did not know the author.---He did know it; he was in poſſeſſion of the proof before he tried one ſingle printer; and therefore the printer, who is now the evidence, was not brought on to trial. The information was filed againſt him, and he withdrew his plea, upon an agreement with the attorney-general; thinking perhaps (you may ſuppoſe) that I ſhould play him ſome cunning trick, and ſink the evidence. I mention this, becauſe it has been thrown out, as if I had eſcaped from the power of the houſe of commons for want of evidence. The gentlemen (looking at the attorney and ſolicitor-general) know the caſe better; they know better. I know the gentlemen and their underſtandings.---They know how I eſcaped, and I will tell you preſently.

But, gentlemen, he takes the printers firſt; and which printer?—He who printed it laſt of all the others. Now, why did he take him firſt? I will not tell you myſelf, but the printer ſhall tell you. He was a ſtranger to me, and he writes to me this letter—'The printer of the 'Whitehall Evening-Poſt preſents his moſt reſpectful compliments to 'Mr. Horne, and takes the liberty of ſending Mr. Horne a copy of the 'information filed againſt him for publiſhing the advertiſement ſigned 'by Mr. Horne, on behalf of the Conſtitutional Society; and as the 'printer has great reaſon to believe, from his living in Middleſex, that 'adminiſtration will make their firſt attack upon him, as they generally 'deem themſelves ſure of a jury in that county,' &c.---Gentlemen, that was the reaſon why they took the printers firſt, and that printer firſt: and (which is a very ſingular thing) though they convicted that printer, they have never brought him up to judgment. But Mr. Attorney-General ſaid (and I had like to have forgot to mention it) that he did not know that I was the author. I have proved to you that he did know it before the trial of the printers. Common-ſenſe ſhews to you that he did know it, and had evidence againſt me. But then, I ſuppoſe, he will ſay, he did not ſtop the trial of the printers, becauſe that would have cauſed a delay.---It would have cauſed a delay! What, after ſtaying two years unreaſonably and unjuſtly?---It would have cauſed the delay of a term to take the author firſt, and give him fair play. Will he by-and-bye ſay, that he did not ſtop the printers trials, and bring me on firſt, merely to avoid delay? The printers would have been much obliged to him for the delay; they wiſhed and deſired it. They offered him evidence. I told this honeſt man (whoſe face I never ſaw before) when he came to me---(for the printers were not defended in the manner I wiſhed them to be defended; the little advice I gave was not followed)--amongſt the reſt I told this printer of the Whitehall Evening-Poſt, that I did not believe he could eſcape being tried firſt; but I told him he ſhould ſend his attorney to the attorney-general, and make excuſes, and beg and pray that he might not then be brought on to trial, but ſtay till after the London juries had tried the cauſe; and I adviſed---(we had a meeting; I forgot to aſk the witneſs the queſtion)---and I then adviſed that printer who was the evidence, that the London printers ſhould endeavour to preſs on their trials; and urge that ſuſpence was worſe to them than any thing that could follow a conviction; and that the Middleſex printer ſhould beg for delay.---Not that the attorney-general might be impoſed upon:---no, it would have been nothing but juſt and reaſonable:---but becauſe I would either cover a man with ſhame, if he refuſed it, or at leaſt (and ſo far kindly) prevent him, if poſſible, from expoſing himſelf, by pretending that all this is the natural courſe of accident; that it was done to avoid delay; that it was integrity, honour, purity, and conſcience.---However, I could not prevail: ſo great is the influence of that gentleman's office, and thoſe connexions which it cauſes. Though the printer was eager for it, his attorney ſaid, 'No; I can't be concerned in 'the cauſe; I would not for 500*l.* I can't ſpeak to the attorney-general; 'for God's ſake, get another attorney.'---'No, ſir, I don't mean that 'you ſhould loſe a client: I mentioned it, thinking you could have no 'objection to go to the attorney-general and pray delay, till after the 'other printers had been tried; your client's wife is near being brought 'to-bed.'---So the Middleſex printer was tried firſt, and a verdict gained. I did not wonder at it: I expected it. Gentlemen, though this was an accident, I muſt beg you to obſerve it is an accident which has always occurred. For in the caſe of that letter of Junius which was proſecuted, the firſt perſon proſecuted was Almon (who was not the publiſher, but had ſold it at his ſhop) who lived in Weſtminſter. Here too was the ſame accident; and it had the ſame conſequence; except, indeed, that in that caſe the London juries recollected themſelves; and though they had a verdict of a Middleſex jury, the London juries caſt it out. There was, however, a ſtruggle in their verdicts: there was ſomething---but I will not enter into that now: they would not, however, ſuffer their minds to be intirely influenced and affected by the prior verdict ſo obtained. A gentleman who was a juryman upon that occaſion in Middleſex, is now a baronet, and of great conſequence at the India-Houſe. Gentlemen, if you make yourſelves uſeful, there is a better track open to you than the honourable and juſt gains of your profeſſion. You will obſerve then that the ſame accidents always return, and they are never explained.

Gentlemen, there is one part of the treatment of me in this proſecution that I think I have a right to complain of as man to man. I gave them no trouble; I made no objections. I requeſted when the jury was ſtruck from the ſolicitor of the Treaſury (before witneſs) I told him I lived in the country, that I was always at home—I deſired he would ſave me unneceſſary trouble, and that he would do, as men ſay to the executioner, Do your office like a gentleman. He ſeemed to be well diſpoſed towards it, and treated me with great civility and complaiſance. I deſired him to preſent my compliments to the attorney-general (and that if he would not do that office for me, I would do it myſelf) and deſire he would let me know on what day he would chuſe to have the trial. The ſolicitor promiſed me he would. He kept me upwards of a fortnight, never letting me know that it would or would not be tried. He kept me till ſeven o'clock at night the day before the laſt day of the ſittings, uncertain whether I was to come here or not the next morning. What was the conſequence? I had told him the conſequence. I had a witneſs to ſend for one hundred and fifty miles. I ſent for him, and I have again brought him (I am aſhamed of the trouble I gave the gentleman, a ſtranger to me, I never ſaw him till now) I gave him the trouble to come and to go back two hundred and eighty miles. The perſon—(and it is not a common perſon, a porter, or meſſenger that can be ſent with a ſubpœna, when you do not know whether the witneſs will come or not)—I was forced to ſend him the ſame way. The ſolicitor for the Treaſury knew it; yet he never would let me know till laſt Tueſday night (laſt Tueſday afternoon I ſuppoſe my ſolicitor knew it) when the trial would come on. My witneſs was forced to go back and come again. Now, what is your verdict, (ſuppoſe it pleaſed the attorney-general to go on ſo two or three ſittings more) what is the effect of your verdict compared with that expence? Your verdict is the gentleſt part of the proſecution. When I ſay your verdict, it is becauſe then follows the judge's ſentence.

Gentlemen, if you don't know, it is proper that I ſhould inform you how the London verdicts were obtained. I was preſent in the court. One jury, I think, brought it in (at firſt) guilty of printing and publiſhing; a moſt ſtupid verdict! I am ſorry that honeſt men ſhould be ſo impoſed upon. Guilty of printing and publiſhing! I heard a gentleman once ſay, who has ſome ſkill in the law, that there was but one poſſible guilt that there could be in printing and publiſhing; and that was, if it was printed upon gilt paper. The pun is poor enough; but not too ſtupid for the doctrine, not a bit. There happened upon the trial of another of the printers to be ſome difference of opinion in the jury. They came into court; they deſired to be heard. A juryman deſired to know 'whether or not they were to find their verdict according to the information:' that was his queſtion (I don't know his name) which he deſired to know. It was plain enough what that honeſt man meant. It is true, he did not expreſs himſelf in the technical legal terms of the law, perhaps; but I did then ſay aloud (and I firmly believe that his lordſhip heard me; there are gentlemen in court that ſtood by and heard me) I did ſay (a little heated) 'his lordſhip dares not anſwer that queſtion.' I ſaid it out loud (I might well be ſuppoſed to feel a little) 'he dares not anſwer that queſtion; for he dares not deny it; it is too groſs: he dares not own it; for then he loſes the verdict.' His lordſhip did not anſwer it; his lordſhip did not. Are you to find according to the information?—Why you are to find the information according to the evidence. You are to find the thing, with which I am charged, proved. The juryman ſaid—according to the information—Why he was to find according; for according means agreeing, and means nothing elſe. The evidence agreeing with the information! Why yes, to be ſure, what is he to find elſe? He muſt find that or nothing, for that is the only thing before him. However, that queſtion was not anſwered. Then a little converſation, of a ſtrange nature, took place—(his lordſhip loves converſations with the jury)—a little converſation took place about intention. I hope, gentlemen, I ſhall at leaſt have this benefit by my trial, that the doctrine of intention will come out fairly and unequivocally to you; whether the jury have a right, whether it is their duty (it is the very giſt of the whole matter) to determine what was the intention. The laws have confined the jury to one ſingle word (ſo careful have they been). That word is guilt; that guilt which is charged. Guilt there can be none without intention. If guilt can be found without intention, ſo be it; but I hope that you, gentlemen of the jury, nor this court, will not be permitted to go away from hence with theſe equivocal ſayings which hitherto have been. Let it come out fairly, and let us know, in the name of God, what the doctrine is.

Gentlemen, I did object, if you remember it—(I don't now intend to go into it, for I ſhall ſtill be longer than I wiſh; but I think I ought to mention it, and I hope you will excuſe the loſs of your time)—gentlemen, we talked ſomething about the right of the attorney-general to reply—If there comes, ſaid his lordſhip, freſh matter.—There can come no freſh matter, unleſs there comes freſh evidence. The evidence is the matter; the pleading is a different thing. The proſecutor is bound to foreſee all that can be urged in defence by the perſon accuſed; and to anſwer it before it comes: that is, he is to make good his charge. If it is not ſo, ſee the other caſe; ſee, on the other hand, what I am to do. I am then to foreſee what he has to urge againſt me; and if I do not, what follows? Why, all that he urges in his reply (as he calls it) is a new part of the accuſation, which I ſhall have no opportunity of anſwering. The fact of publiſhing the advertiſement is not diſputed; I never diſputed it; the whole matter that we have to do together is, for him to prove it a crime by law or argument: therefore whatever argument he uſes in his reply, if it has any effect upon your minds, I may be convicted (if convicted upon ſuch argument) without ever having offered the leaſt defence; that is the bleſſed conſequence of his right to reply: ſo that he is not to foreſee what may be anſwered to his arguments; but the man charged is to foreſee what arguments may be urged againſt him.

Gentlemen, there lives this day a very great man in this country, whoſe doctrine and whoſe practices were diametrically oppoſite. He enjoyed the office of attorney-general. He has been a chief juſtice. He, as I am informed, never proſecuted but one libel, and that was Dr. Shebbeare, who is now penſioned by thoſe who made this gentleman attorney-general. What was his conduct? If ever there was an infamous libel againſt government, ſurely it was that (it is a great many years ago, but I read it). What was lord Camden's conduct? He left the whole to the jury; intention and all; the whole: he cut you off from nothing of your right. He did not hold the threatening language---'you may, if you will, take it upon you.'---Why that threatening? You may commit crimes, if you will: you may be as indecent as I may be ſuppoſed to be for repeating this: but, upon ſuch an occaſion as this, I reckon it not indecent. But---'you may, if you will.'---Why you not only may, but you are bound to do it; nor do you diſcharge your conſciences nor your oaths, if you do it not: but I hope you will have it clearly ſaid, whether you are bound or not. Lord Camden's remarkable words, when he finiſhed his charge againſt the defendant, was, that he did not wiſh the conviction of him, if any man whatſoever doubted of his guilt.

Gentlemen, another thing was ſaid, which I muſt warn you againſt; it was ſaid that this advertiſement (I believe I mentioned it) arraigned all the meaſures of government (at leaſt, I think, you need not ſearch into the advertiſement itſelf to be aſſured that it did not arraign the meaſures of government which have followed the publication). The printers who have been brought to judgment, have been ſentenced a hundred pounds; and they ſuffered what they were not ſentenced to, a week's impriſonment. Their fine, it was repreſented, was mitigated, for that they might have been or were impoſed upon by the author, the libel coming in the ſhape and form of an advertiſement, which diſarmed their caution; and therefore the fine was no more. Formerly our laws puniſhed men for being knaves; now I perceive they ſhall be puniſhed for being fools. If a printer, for the ſake of two ſhillings or half-a-crown, is impoſed upon by a wicked incendiary, who, under the ſhape of an advertiſement, diſarms their caution and ſlips it into their paper; the jury have, you know, nothing to do with their intention; therefore there muſt be a verdict againſt them of courſe: the judges find the printers have been impoſed upon; and therefore only impriſon them a week, and fine them one hundred pounds. It was a dear half-crown they gained! If the printers were impoſed upon, they ſhould have been acquitted. But by the evidence given now, you find they were not impoſed upon by me: there was no impoſition by me. What was my conduct towards the printer? This advertiſement I am now giving you will offend certain miniſters in this country: it is perfectly harmleſs and ſafe, and free from the cognizance of the law: the matter of it is juſt; it is true; but the law affords no guard or protection now from the power of the miniſtry in the houſe of commons, who vote men guilty! and vote things crimes! They have given out, owing to my forbearance (I did not wiſh to expoſe the nature of that defence which cauſed me to go ſafe from the houſe of commons) being ſilent, they have propagated a report, as if (like an artful tricking attorney or ſolicitor that is not uſed to honourable practice) I had made a charge upon them, and ſneaked out for want of evidence againſt me. I was determined, for the ſake of the laws of this land, that they ſhould either by forbearing to take notice of this advertiſement, or by taking notice of it, let it appear that they have no power to puniſh a man but by the laws: and therefore I furniſhed full evidence, in order to ſhew that even with the fulleſt evidence the houſe of commons have no power to try or to puniſh the ſubject. I knew I was ſafe from the courts of law, at leaſt that I muſt there be tried by a jury; and they may do their duty, if they pleaſe.——Gentlemen, for every minute of impriſonment that thoſe printers ſuffered, I do freely and frankly confeſs that I deſerve at leaſt a year, comparatively. If they deſerved a minute, for every minute I certainly deſerve a year; and for every farthing of that hundred pounds which they were fined, proportion only our guilt (if there is any guilt in the caſe), a million of money will not be ſufficient for my crime. If they can juſtify their ſentence on the printers, I will juſtify the court for the moſt ample puniſhment they can inflict on me. If I am guilty, no man upon earth ſo guilty. It was the moſt deliberate act of my life; it was thought of long before I did it. I made the motion; I cauſed the meeting; I ſubſcribed a great part of the money; I procured the reſt from my particular intimate friends: but I ſhall come to that by-and-bye.

Gentlemen, I have ſhewn you the method of proceeding by information ex officio: I muſt now deſire you to obſerve the method of puniſhment, when it comes to the court. Obſerve how that paſſes. The man is convicted this ſittings: he is called up for judgment next term: Go to priſon, ſays the judge, and then we will think of your ſentence. They ſentence him a hundred pounds; but for what was the week's impriſonment? It is put into the ſentence indeed---"and impriſoned until he pays his fine."---Well, but could the man pay his fine till he knew what it was?---Obſerve the diſtinctions which are made!---A general officer who is now in America, general Burgoyne, was proſecuted. He comes into court to receive ſentence for hiring ruffians to deſtroy the electors coming to poll; what is his puniſhment? He is fined a thouſand pounds; but he is not ſent to priſon whilſt his ſentence is deliberated upon; he is releaſed inſtantly. Now what ſays our law? Our law ſays, that 'a corporal puniſhment, however ſmall, is greater than a pecuniary puniſhment, however great.'---Quælibet pœna corporalis, quamvis minima, major eſt quâlibet pœnâ pecuniariâ, quamvis maximâ---or ſomething of that kind. Well then, the greateſt offenders, you ſee, have not the greateſt puniſhment. The miſerable printer who is impoſed upon by an incendiary---to priſon with him; we have not time to tell you now what we will do with him; and yet it does not ſeem to be a very difficult caſe: but in a very uncommon caſe, that of an officer of the king's troops hiring ruffians to deſtroy the electors coming to poll, and thereby gaining a ſeat in parliament; in this caſe no deliberation is neceſſary: or it is taken properly, before he is brought into court, that he might not ſuffer a moment's impriſonment. ---You ſee the difference. The delinquent was wiſhed good morning; the judge from the bench, when the general paid down his fine in court, wiſhed him good morrow. Another man was lately proſecuted, who would have taken away the eſtate of his neighbour, that neighbour not conſenting illegally to loſe it. He ſends him a challenge. He is proſecuted and convicted. No deliberation for ſentence; not a moment's impriſonment. He is fined a hundred pounds; and application is even made by the court to know if any body ever knew a precedent for a ſmaller puniſhment. Nobody indeed ever did: and yet this challenger was an elderly member of parliament, and a juſtice of peace for the county where he lived. He was ſtill better off than with a good morrow: he was told---Idem alii fecêre, et multi, et boni!---‘ Other men have done the ſame thing, ſir, as you; and many other men and good men!’---If he was a good man, why was he puniſhed? He ſtood not, at that time, a good man in the court; he did not appear there for his goodneſs.

Gentlemen, I ſome time ago hinted ſomething to you of the motives for this proſecution. I will now go no farther than only to ſhew you clearly what could not be the motives; and I will leave your minds to determine what is the motive: only ſo far I will ſay, that if the change in my ſituation, if I was allured to it by the lucrative emoluments of the profeſſion, and wiſhed to ſhare in the legal plunder of the people, this proſecution might then be very ſerious; but I laugh at it. I am out of the reach of the intended conſequences of this proſecution; I ſay, intended conſequences: for rely upon it, I am better known to thoſe who have cauſed this proſecution, than for them to have only in view the conſequences of impriſonment and fine. No, they know better: they know that no men act as I have always done who mean to be ſtopped by impriſonment and fine. But, gentlemen, I will ſhew you what is not the motive of this proſecution. The motive of this proſecution is not to prevent the evil tendency of this wicked libel; of this horrid charge againſt the king's troops of murder; againſt ſoldiers who never commit it, who are not likely to commit it. I am ſorry to read to you any paper: (I did indeed intend to have read many, but the time I ſee will be too long) I will only read one or two to you, juſt to ſatisfy you of ſome things which you perhaps are not aware of. Here is the Public Advertiſer of May 30th, 1775. You will find in it a very ſerious, very particular, very ſharp accuſation againſt the king's troops of murder; the whole circumſtances at length; and murder, murder, murder in every line; but it is ſo long that I will not read it to you now, becauſe you can all remember to look at it hereafter. The papers are May 30 and May 31. The government then, I mean the miniſter (I make an improper uſe of the word government) the miniſter deſires the public, upon this charge of murder againſt the troops, to ſuſpend their belief. What follows? This paper which I have proved ---‘ As a doubt of the authenticity of the account from Salem, touching an engagement between the king's troops and the provincials in Maſſachuſet's Bay, &c. I deſire to inform all thoſe who wiſh to ſee the original affidavits which confirm that account, that they are depoſited at the Manſion-Houſe with the right hon. the lord-mayor for their inſpection.

‘ Arthur Lee.’

Then come the copies of the affidavits; all the particulars at length: murder is not ſpared at all. Then, amongſt the reſt, comes an affidavit, which I ſhall prove to you preſently more authentically than this; though it is enough for me that it was publiſhed. But you know, gentlemen, I am not the original author of the charge. The gentleman has been talking of the original author of the charge: he thinks he may tell you ſo now, two years afterwards; but if he had told you ſo at the time of this advertiſement, every man in the court would have laughed at it. Here is the original charge, ſigned by the agent of the province where the murders were committed, and the original affidavits confirming it are here ſaid to be lodged with the lord-mayor for inſpection. It is very lucky for Mr. Lee that his receiving them, and cauſing them to be advertiſed, has cauſed no proſecution againſt him. We ſhall know preſently whether this affidavit be a forgery or not: the gentleman for whoſe it is given attends here by my ſubpœna to prove or to diſprove it.

‘ I Edward Thoroton Gould, of his majeſty's own regiment of foot, being of lawful age, do teſtify and declare, that on the evening of the 18th inſtant, under the orders of general Gage, I embarked with the light infantry and grenadiers of the line, commanded by colonel Smith, and landed on the marſhes of Cambridge, from whence we proceeded to Lexington. On our arrival at the place we ſaw a body of provincial troops armed, to the number of about ſixty or ſeventy men. On our approach they diſperſed, and ſoon after firing began; but which party fired firſt I cannot exactly ſay, as our troops ruſhed on ſhouting and huzzaing previous to the firing, which was continued by our troops ſo long as any of the provincials were to be ſeen. From thence we marched to Concord. On a hill near the entrance of the town we ſaw another body of the provincials aſſembled. The light infantry companies were ordered up the hill to diſperſe them. On our approach they retreated towards Concord. The grenadiers continued the road under the hill towards the town. Six companies of light infantry were ordered down to take poſſeſſion of the bridge, which the provincials retreated over: the company I commanded was one. Three companies of the above detachment went forward about two miles. In the mean time the provincial troops returned, to the number of about three or four hundred. We drew up on the Concord ſide of the bridge. The provincials came down upon us; upon which we engaged and gave the firſt fire. This was the firſt engagement after the one at Lexington. A continued firing from both parties laſted through the whole day. I myſelf was wounded at the attack of the bridge, and am now treated with the greateſt humanity, and taken all poſſible care of by the provincials at Medford.

‘ Signed Edward Thoroton Gould.’

When firſt I heard of this proſecution, and not before, I began to conſider with myſelf whether I had indeed made uſe of any ſuch expreſſion or word as diſtinguiſhed what I had ſaid from the caſe of many other perſons. Not a day paſſed but I found ſome news-paper with the ſame charge, containing the ſame word murder. I need not read any of them to you; you can all recollect. Go to the papers that are publiſhed today, to thoſe publiſhed before this charge was brought againſt me and ſince, and ſee if you don't conſtantly find in them this charge of murder againſt the king's troops. I took extracts from them till I was tired; and not only from the news-papers, but ſeveral other publications; from that honourable gentleman's publication and others, which are of more conſequence than fugitive pieces in a news-paper. Theſe all prove the attorney-general's nice ſenſe of honour and integrity, and regard to the public good, who proſecutes this advertiſement. Now, that men may not be miſled by it, after ſuffering them to run wild for two years, and be miſled without any controul! But, gentlemen, ſo far from that being the motive of this proſecution, the papers are all full of the ſame charge, and will continue full, I have no doubt. I proteſt upon my honour, they are none of them made by me: I have been dumb ever ſince. I meant to do good by it when I made the charge, and I have been dumb ever ſince, becauſe I could not ſee that any good was to be produced. If then you ſee what is not the motive for this proſecution of me, at this diſtant time, that will lead your minds to conclude what is the motive.

Gentlemen, the language of the attorney-general forces me to ſay a few words upon a ſubject which is the moſt diſagreeable for a man to ſpeak of; unleſs indeed it is when he appears as I do, a defendant. I thought when the attorney-general opened his charge upon this proſecution, that he would have taken a different line from that which he repeatedly purſued in the trials of the printers. He knew that I had heard him talk againſt ‘ indecency, a flood of obſcenity, and ſcandalous publications.’ I had already heard him charge that advertiſement to be full of ‘ ribaldry, Billingſgate, ſcurrility, balderdaſh, and impudence.’ I have not uſed a word that he did not uſe. All theſe I knew he had charged upon that poor advertiſement. I thought that upon this proſecution he would not give me ſuch an advantage as to ſay the ſame things, or take the ſame line that he took before. It is true, he gained a verdict by that line before, and therefore perhaps thought he might this time. I own I did think that he would have paid me the compliment of ſomething a little new; but he ſays he never knew ſo much of my talents and learning as at this time. The gentleman's memory is ſhort: I would have forgot it, if he had not. He repreſents me to you in the light of a ſcurrilous, ribald, balderdaſh, Billingſgate, impudent fellow. That boldneſs with which I defend the right of the ſubject, will not, with any man who has a regard for the right of the ſubject, paſs for impudence: thoſe who know any thing of me muſt judge whether I am impudent upon other occaſions.

Gentlemen, he has followed in this deſcription of me which he has given, and in that character with which he has been pleaſed to cloath me—he has followed the old practice of ſome ingenious tyrants, who uſed to dreſs up men in the ſkins of beaſts in order to encourage the dogs to worry them. Juſt ſo this gentleman dreſſes up his victims in the characters of beaſts, in order to expoſe them to your indignation. He had no pretence whatever for repreſenting me in that light. I do the more wonder at this language from him, becauſe he knew better. He has ſaid indeed, that he did not know the gentleman. The word know has many different meanings. He did not know me as a friend, or as an acquaintance; I never had that honour: but that he did know me ſo far as to know much more of the talents and learning (if there were any in the caſe) than what he can poſſibly have picked out from this day's hearing, is a notorious fact. However, gentlemen, if I am that Billingſgate fellow, unfortunate is it for the attorney-general that a fit of Billingſgate then once took him: and whilſt the fit was on him, he applied to a gentleman to introduce him to my company, abſolute ſtranger to him as I was. I did not requeſt it; the attorney-general requeſted it. Perhaps the gentleman who introduced him is in court. The fit was not a ſhort one: my conduct and my character was not, in his declared opinion, ſuch as he now repreſents it. I believe we ſat in a public coffee-houſe together, though in a private party, I ſuppoſe from eight or half after eight in the evening till paſt midnight conſiderably. I don't mention it to plume myſelf upon his diſtinction; I claim no honour from it: the gentleman might be deſirous of ſeeing me as you go to ſee a raree-ſhew, or as you would any ſtrange creature; it might be from ſome curioſity. I never was vain enough, gentlemen, to impute it to myſelf as a merit; I did not ſee any reaſon to grow proud upon it; but I mention it particularly for this reaſon, that not only it ought to have ſaved me from ſuch a repreſentation of character, but it ought to have ſaved the attorney-general from pinning ſuch motives upon me as he mentioned in another trial; ſuch as the gaining of half a crown, or the flying in the face of government. When he was in poſſeſſion of my motive, he knew it perhaps better than moſt men in England; and though I don't think I have a right to repeat what paſſed from that gentleman (though there was nothing in it diſhonourable to him), yet I may be permitted to ſay what came from myſelf to him. A queſtion was aſked me to account for a part which I played; and why I, who did not then ſeem to him to be a deſperate man driven by neceſſity to it, or that ill-behaved man, or that fool (for great numbers of patriots and miniſterial men go from folly on both ſides) he ſeemed to think I might have ſome more honourable motives about me, and wiſhed to know what they were. I told him my motives; and it is a ſtrange circumſtance that I ſhould then tell him that motive which is the very motive of this action of mine which he now proſecutes. I told the gentleman, in the year 1768, that there was a certain ſect of religion (which I named) which of all others was moſt abhorrent from my principles and way of thinking; but I added—‘ Perſecute them to-morrow, and I will declare myſelf of that ſect the next day.’ I appeal to himſelf; he will remember it; it is rather too remarkable. I will mention the ſect, if it is neceſſary. Shall I repeat the name of the perſon, the introducer, and the place? If there is any doubt, and he deſires it, I will mention the particulars; becauſe I ſhould be ſorry to be laughed at as if advancing a falſhood of this kind, and pluming myſelf for paſſing a few hours with the gentleman who happens now to be attorney-general. This paſſed long before this wicked advertiſement; long before I could foreſee that the Americans were to be treated as they have been. I think it ſhould have ſaved me from ſuch a repreſentation of character, and from ſuch motives as have been imputed to me; from that gentleman at leaſt, if he acts (as he pretends) without direction from others; for he has ſeen me ſteadily purſuing that ſame motive. Every action in which I have been known to be concerned, has ſteadily been upon one and the ſame principle. I have never had occaſion to ſupport a friend or an acquaintance to promote an election, or to vote, or to do any thing for my particular connections; they have alway been abſolute ſtrangers to me, and men taken up upon the footing of oppreſſion. Friends!——Yes, if friendſhip received from me could make them my friends. But friends!——No, if any friendſhip received from them was neceſſary to make them ſo. My motive has been conſtantly the ſame: I know no American.

Gentlemen, I have been more concerned in my room than I have with the commerce of men in the world; and I read there, when I was very young, that when Solon was aſked which was the beſt government, he anſwered—‘ where thoſe who are not perſonally injured, reſent and purſue the injury or violence done to another, as he would do if done to himſelf.’—That, he ſaid, was the beſt kind of government; and he made a law impowering men to do ſo. Now, gentlemen, we are happier, we are under a better government; for our laws enjoin us to do what he only impowered men to do. By our laws the whole neighbourhood is anſwerable for the conduct of each: our laws make it each man's duty and intereſt to watch over the conduct of all. This principle and motive has been repreſented in me as malice. It is the only malice they will ever find about me. They have in no part of my life found me in any court of juſtice, upon any perſonal conteſt or motive whatever, either for intereſt, or profit, or injury.

I have kept you too long to ſay a tenth part of what I intended to ſay, and I believe it is not neceſſary: I ſhall therefore paſs over many things that would give to ſome pleaſure, and to ſome pain. But as they are of that nature that I ſhall give myſelf the liberty of uſing, upon other occaſions, as I pleaſe (doing no wrong), I can the more readily forbear them here. But, gentlemen, in this matter of charging the king's troops with murder, there is a very ſtriking circumſtance; and that too, I ſuppoſe, the attorney-general will have forgotten. It is well known that, amongſt other oppreſſions and enormities which gave me pain, murders (without any conteſt and diſpute) committed and pardoned gave me much. I cauſed the ſoldiers in St. George's Fields to be proſecuted—the king's troops—for murder. I took them up. It was called no libel by the then attorney-general; no libel againſt the government. They were tried for murder. I did intend to have told you how they eſcaped; but it matters not. They were tried; they were charged with murder; and that not only in a court of juſtice; I advertiſed it, I ſigned it with my name: the ſame printer (I forgot to aſk him as an evidence: indeed I had before aſked him for a news-paper that contained the advertiſement, but he could not ſend me one) he could have proved it; but it is notoriouſly known, I charged that murder upon the king's troops with my name. It was not thought a libel then. It was thought a very great affront: for thoſe troops had been thanked, in the king's name, for their alacrity upon the occaſion. What then, if the king's name had been abuſed to thank men for their alacrity, what then? (I did not mention that, but I mentioned the murder committed.) There was murder committed. I ſaw it with my eyes; I ſaw many barbarities committed. I might have been amongſt the ſlain. And ſhall I not mention what I ſaw with my own eyes? Shall I have no tongue nor underſtanding, but in a court of juſtice? I certainly will.—What followed? Soon after that, Mr. Stanley, a conſiderable officer in the ſtate, moved in the houſe of commons for an act of parliament to take away from the ſubject the right of appeal in the caſe of murder; becauſe I had cauſed appeals to be brought; that is, I aſſiſted the parties who brought them. This motion was ſupported by Mr. Selwyn. Mr. Dyſon, a lord of the Treaſury, declared himſelf to be entirely of their opinion;—‘ becauſe the right of appeal for murder was (he ſaid) a ſhackle upon the king's mercy: but he begged a delay till the next winter, when he promiſed it ſhould have his aſſiſtance; that ſo the motion might not appear in the journals of the houſe all the ſummer, to alarm and terrify the minds of the people before that bill could be paſſed into a law, for which at preſent, he ſaid, there was not time.’—To avoid its alarming the people before it could be paſſed into a law!—Well, it did not ſtop there: ſome notice was taken of this, but not much, as it was for that time dropped. But this motion was revived ſome time after. Mr. Roſe Fuller (a better man to come forwards upon ſuch an occaſion) gave notice of a renewal of that motion in the houſe of commons: he was ſupported by Mr. Attorney-General. I was alarmed at that (and I will prove it; I am not now aſſerting what I will not prove). I inſtantly publiſhed what they might have called a libel, if it had not been upon ſuch tender ground. I ſent it to the public papers, with the initials of my name: I inſerted in it ſuch matter as could not fail to make it be known to come from me. That did not content me. I requeſted an honourable member of that houſe, who is now in court, Mr. Alderman Oliver, to preſent my compliments to Mr. Roſe Fuller and the attorney-general, and to inform them that, upon that ground, I was ready to go even to death; that I would ſtick at nothing; that, on ſuch an occaſion, I feared no proſecution for libel. I intreated them to tell me when they would bring the motion on, that I might be preſent to hear what paſſed, which I would faithfully report and freely comment upon. The attorney-general, in his ſupport of that motion, had reviled the right of appeal in the ſubject for murder, as a Gothic cuſtom. Gothic was the invidious charge he brought againſt it: it was a Gothic cuſtom! Why, gentlemen, ſo are all the rights, and liberties, and valuable laws which we have; they are all Gothic. But this was to be plucked out from amongſt the reſt; and becauſe it is Gothic that men ſhould be puniſhed for murder, becauſe it is a ſhackle upon the king's mercy, murderers are not to be puniſhed. Gentlemen, this attempt has a near affinity with this proſecution of me, for a libel againſt the government, for charging the king's troops with murder. Gentlemen, I beg your attention to this matter: for, you ſee, they have got farther now in their ſyſtem and their doctrines; and the mere charging of the king's troops with murder is to be conſidered as a ſeditious libel againſt the king and the government! But what thought the houſe of lords at the time of the Revolution upon this Gothic cuſtom?—King James the ſecond had cut off and murdered many of the peers, under a ſham trial of a commiſſion of peers whom he picked out. At the Revolution they took care to ſecure themſelves from ſuch trials in future; and therefore, on the 14th of January 1689, they entered this among their ſtanding orders:——‘ Whereas this day was appointed for taking into conſideration the report made the 8th day of this inſtant January, from the lords committees of privileges concerning the trials of peers: after due conſideration had thereof, it is reſolved by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that it is the antient right of the peers of England to be tried only in full parliament for any capital offences. And it is ordered that this reſolution be added to the roll of ſtanding orders of this houſe.’—This was to ſecure themſelves. But when they had done this, ſome noble ſpirits amongſt them being alarmed and apprehenſive, leſt, under this pretence, in future times the ſubject might be deprived of his right to proſecute thoſe who had committed murder, they (three days afterwards) on the 17th of January, entered the following declaration: ‘ It is declared by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, that the order made the 14th day of this inſtant January, concerning the trials of peers in parliament, ſhall not be underſtood or conſtrued to extend to any appeal of murder or other felony to be brought againſt any peer or peers: and it is ordered that this declaration be entered on the roll of ſtanding orders of this houſe.’—The peers at the Revolution (all Gothic as it was) took this right of the ſubject, and hugged it to their boſoms; and this too in their own caſe againſt themſelves. They would not themſelves be exempted from a poſſibility of being proſecuted to judgment, that juſtice might be done for the lives of the king's ſubjects, even if ſlain by themſelves. However, gentlemen, this Gothic right of appeal is not as yet taken from us: and I do firmly believe, that by the reſolution which I ſhewed, and by the meſſage which I ſent, and by the libel which I publiſhed (if ſuch things be libels), I do believe I have the merit of putting off (at leaſt for that time) ſo infamous an attempt. Infamous four-fold, if you conſider the doctrine now brought forwards.---The king's troops ſhall not even be charged with murder! Obſerve then what follows: the king perhaps will not purſue; the ſubject ſhall loſe his right of appeal; and you ſhall not even dare to ſay that the king's troops have committed murder.

I have already taken up much of your time; but I hope that the importance of the doctrine brought forward in this caſe, as it is the firſt (there is no precedent of ſuch a one), I hope that ſhall be my juſtification.

Gentlemen, I will now come to the advertiſement itſelf. The attorney-general ſays it is a ſcandalous publication; and he has repeated all thoſe terms which I have before mentioned to you.

Now, gentlemen, pray conſider with yourſelves, to what purpoſe has he done this? Look at the information (you have a right to carry it out of court with you); ſee if you can find any ſuch charge in the information; ſee if you can find any thing tantamount to ribaldry, or ſcurrility, or Billingſgate, or balderdaſh. Theſe make no part of the information at all. He has done it merely to miſlead and inflame. But he complains of ſcandalous publications! Who has moſt cauſe to complain of ſcandalous publications (taking the nation as divided in opinion between the Tory and the Whig doctrines)? who has moſt reaſon to complain of ſcandalous publications? Read Dr. Shebbeare and the archbiſhop of York! a penſioner of the crown, and an archbiſhop juſt created ſo by the crown! See how they have treated the Preſbyterians! And yet, I preſume, they are as reſpectable a part of the king's ſubjects as the king's ſoldiers! I think that to alienate the minds of the Preſbyterians, or of others from them, is doing no great ſervice to this country! Why not proſecute for that? No; penſions and mitres ſhall reward them! But, not to talk of theſe general matters, the attorney-general, in a proſecution of me for a particular advertiſement, thinks it his place to talk of ſcandalous publications. Pray, take the two individuals, the attorney-general and myſelf; which of us two has moſt cauſe to complain of ſcandalous publications? Judge fairly between us. He a gentleman in great office; a gentleman neceſſarily expoſed to the difference of opinions about his conduct: myſelf an obſcure man, who never did enjoy any office of truſt or of conſequence; who never was a candidate either for honour or for profit; who have no claim to the notice of the public. Compare this with the ſituation of that gentleman; then compare the ribaldry and the ſcandal that has been publiſhed about us both; and judge which ought moſt to have talked of ſcandal in this proſecution! Gentlemen, I have had the honour to be burnt in effigy, and I ſaw myſelf committed to the flames. I have been ſung about the ſtreets in ballads, and I ſaw a little pert parſon cocked up upon a ſtick in the ſinger's hands. The news-papers for ſome years were even ſick of my name. Even my cloaths afforded an entertainment for the wit of the theatre. As for caricatures, I have myſelf bought enough of them to furniſh a room:—my rooms are but ſmall, as you may eaſily ſuppoſe.---My life has been written, with my name at length, and the atheiſt and macaroni parſon printed at the bottom of a print in the frontiſpiece. Atheiſt! and with my name at length!---Scandalous publications, to be ſure, ſhould be urged by that gentleman againſt me!---Gentlemen, I have never complained of thoſe imputations. I proteſt (except with very ignorant, very poor creatures, and it does not ſignify what they think) I don't think thoſe imputations ever hurt my character; and if they have, I will take the chance of time to refute them. There was indeed one imputation that I believe did get ſome ground; and I thank the attorney-general for now relieving me from it: it was the worſt of all the other --a corrupt penſioner of the crown.---That was an imputation which I believe did ſtick by me; but there is no wonder at that at all. I did not even for that ſo much as accuſe the publications and the writers: it is the practice of the times, and the corruption of the miniſter, that libelled me! Every man may, without being abſurd, ſuſpect his neighbour of corruption, without any ſpecific charge brought againſt him. Good God! in a nation of lepers like this, who can expect to be thought clean! However, I agree with the attorney-general in all that he has ſaid generally againſt ſcandalous publications: they ought to be, and the laws (without ſtraining them) are now ſufficient to cauſe them to be ſuppreſſed. But, gentlemen, I ſhall never be found in the liſt of thoſe dealers in ſcandal. Well, but in the advertiſement he tells you, there is ſcurrility, Billingſgate, ribaldry, and balderdaſh.---The gentlemen of the law love to go by precedents. The attorney-general found a precedent for it; and therefore (without conſidering whether it would apply or not in this caſe) he made uſe of it to eke out the time. Mr. Noy, the attorney-general, in the Star-chamber, proſecuted a man for ſpeaking diſreſpectfully of ſtage plays; and he ſaid, that---'it may be fit enough and lawful to write againſt plays, by men 'that have a miſſion: and they muſt do their errand in mannerly terms, 'and in the ſame terms as other men expect to bear with them. Mr. 'Prynne had no miſſion to meddle with thoſe things, to ſee whether 'men ſhould not return to gentiliſm. The terms which he uſeth are 'ſuch as he finds among the oyſter-women at Billingſgate, or at the 'common conduit.'——Mr. Prynne had no miſſion, it ſeems, to prevent men from turning heathens; and therefore he ought not to endeavour to prevent them from turning heathens! But however, gentlemen, if I have uſed Billingſgate, and thoſe bad terms with which he charges me, I ſhall not be angry with the attorney-general, but very much obliged to him, if he will help me to correct my language. I am ſorry, however, to find that he does not intend I ſhall have much benefit by the example of his own. He has charged the advertiſement with impudence too: and it ſeems, gentlemen, by what I heard from him in the other trials, and in this, to be a very lucky impudence for me: for he did ſay, that 'wicked is a term too high for this advertiſement.'---Theſe are the very words; I took them down: 'wicked is a term too 'high for this advertiſement.' Upon what, then, does he expect to gain a verdict? He ſaid too, that 'its impudence diſarmed its wicked-'neſs."---I believe that is a new figure, not to be found in poetry or painting! Impudence diſarming wickedneſs! Why, gentlemen, that was in plain words telling the jury (if they had at all adverted to what he ſaid) that they had nothing to do with that advertiſement: for if it is not high enough to be wicked, it is too low for the verdict of a jury. You have nothing to do but with legal wickedneſs: a man cannot be proſecuted for ſcurrility and impudence.---But where, in which words of that advertiſement, is this ſcurrility and Billingſgate? In which ſentence is the unmeaning ribaldry and balderdaſh? Balderdaſh, I believe, is a term taken from the drunkard's table. Balderdaſh (if it means any thing) means---a rude mixture, a confuſed diſcourſe. Does he proſecute a rude mixture and a confuſed diſcourſe? If its aim and its object are difficult to be found out, is that an object of proſecution? In that caſe, it might as well have been written in Hebrew. But, gentlemen, all this was merely to inflame and miſlead you; and therefore I ſhall not dwell upon it. But, gentlemen, whilſt he has been miſ-ſpending the time of the court in that which makes no part of the information, he has not ſaid one ſingle word about that which does make a part of the information; I mean its falſhood. Falſhood is a part of the charge, and it is a criminal and an odious part of the charge; and if you don't find it in the advertiſement, you cannot give a compleat verdict. Falſhood is a part of the monſter which he has exhibited: and if one limb of it is wanting, you cannot give him a verdict. Gentlemen, I ſhall prove the aſſertions of the advertiſement to be true by my evidence; and I will not now delay you with them. And, gentlemen, I ſhall prove to you a thing which may now perhaps be a little uſeful to my character (if it ſuffers under that ſtigma of Billingſgate and balderdaſh, and incendiary intentions, with which I am charged); for I ſhall not only prove that the motion was made, the money collected, and paid, but I ſhall prove to you, that the advertiſement of the firſt ſum did produce the ſecond. The attorney-general ſays, it was only a fetch to fly in the face of the law. It was a fetch. It fetched 50l. more: and I will prove to you that it did ſo. I will tell you the perſon who ſent it, and the perſon who conveyed it to me; becauſe the purpoſe for which the money was given, the gentleman who ſubſcribed it, and the gentleman who conveyed it, are all worthy of each other. The money came from ſir Stephen Theodore Janſſen, who is now out of the reach of envy; it was conveyed to me by Mr. Alderman Oliver, who, though living, is equally out of the reach of cenſure; and it was paid for the purpoſe for which it is declared. And, gentlemen, I am the rather inclined to prove theſe circumſtances to you, becauſe his lordſhip in his charge to the jury on one of the latter trials, finding that no evidence had been brought of the truth of the aſſertions in the advertiſement, was pleaſed to forget a doctrine I have ſometimes heard about truth, and threw in, as a make-weight into the ſcale, an inſinuation of the poſſible falſhood of the advertiſement. His lordſhip ſaid, he 'did 'not believe ſuch a propoſal had ever been made, or ſuch money con-'tributed, or paid, or even ſuch a ſociety named exiſting. He hoped 'there were no perſons capable of ſuch an act: he hoped, and there-'fore he believed!' It is a tolerable inſinuation to a jury! He hopes there are no men capable of ſuch an act! What diſmal act muſt this be? It muſt ſurely be ſome act that excludes a man ever after, ſurely, from being admitted to ſit cheek by cheek, and laugh and joke together with his lordſhip. It muſt ſurely be an act of that kind that a man muſt be held in abhorrence. No honeſt man could keep one company after it. 'He hoped there were no men capable of ſuch an act, and there-'fore he believed it.' After this the attorney-general, from his lordſhip, took the ſame cue: and therefore, in a ſucceeding trial, he too inſinuated, that the ſubſcription was a mere pretence (a fetch he called it) to colour the advertiſement. I own when his lordſhip hoped, and therefore believed, I was in ſome pain for my own exiſtence: and though I ſtood cloſe at his elbow, I did not know but he might believe next, that there was no ſuch perſon as myſelf exiſting in the world. And yet I have heard his lordſhip ſay, on other trials (and if I miſrepreſent him, he will do juſtice to himſelf) I have heard him ſay---'What! ſhall not a judge and a jury know and believe what every one 'elſe knows and believes?'---(and it was upon a trial for a libel)---'Shall they alone be ſuppoſed ignorant of thoſe known and notorious 'facts which no one elſe in the court doubts?'---As I do not therefore know which of theſe two doctrines his lordſhip may adopt on this occaſion, and cannot tell what he may believe (becauſe I do not know upon all ſubjects what he may hope), I ſhall therefore prove the truth of my advertiſement. And when I have done that, perhaps, gentlemen, you will be told (as I have heard it ſaid) that falſe in the information ſtands for nothing, and is not a part of the charge! though obſerve, if I omit proving the truth, they will not fail to aggravate the charge, by inſinuating the falſhood.

Now then, gentlemen, I come to the very great offence of all; to that which does indeed make a part of the information, but has made no part (except in aſſertion) of the attorney-general's harangue:—I mean, charging the king's troops with murder. I am told, that it is not for any of thoſe aſſertions about ſubſcription, and payment, and collection, that I am proſecuted; but it is for charging the king's troops with murder. There the attorney-general ſaid, he 'put his finger.'—I have not charged the king's troops with murder: there is not any ſuch aſſertion in the advertiſement. There can be no charge, no truth or falſhood, but in an aſſertion. Gentlemen, I have no more aſſerted, that there were any perſons murdered, than I have aſſerted that they have left behind them widows, orphans, or aged parents. Perhaps no perſons were murdered, perhaps no perſons were even killed at Lexington and Concord on the 19th of April 1775. Perhaps, if there were any killed, they were ſuch as have left behind them neither widows, orphans, nor aged parents. The advertiſement does not aſſert any of thoſe things. There is indeed a deſcription in the advertiſement of certain perſons for whoſe uſe the collection was made: if there are no ſuch perſons, the intended charity will not take place. I indeed ſuppoſe the charge to be true: others had charged the king's troops with this murder nine days and more before my advertiſement. I have ſhewn you where; in the ſame news-paper of May the 30th and 31ſt, 1775, ſigned by the agent of the province. I ſuppoſed that charge true; but I did not make it. I took it as I found it. The charge was in all the news-papers of May 30th and 31ſt, 1775. Why not proſecute thoſe that brought the charge? The charge was authenticated in the moſt formal manner: original affidavits, taken on the ſpot, were lodged with the lord-mayor of London. The charge was not anonymous; it was ſigned by the agent of the province where the murders were committed; it was ſigned by Mr. Arthur Lee. He publickly avowed it every where. He ſat daily in this court, with the chief juſtice and the attorney-general, publickly as an advocate: he was retained on one of the trials: he ſtood up to avow it: his lordſhip knew what he was going to ſay, and would not permit him to ſpeak: it was in the firſt trial at Weſtminſter. You ſee then (nay, you know it from a thouſand publications) that this was not a wanton ſuggeſtion of my own; nor yet lightly taken up upon a ſlight rumour: but it was ſo given to the public, that no man could reaſonably doubt of it. The Gazette, publiſhed by authority, deſired every man to ſuſpend his belief; in declared anſwer to which theſe affidavits came. It has never ſince been contradicted, even by that very authority that deſired us to ſuſpend our belief. But, gentlemen, though I did not make the charge in this advertiſement, to ſave trouble I am willing to have it underſtood, that I did make the charge in the advertiſement: I do again make it now. I did not word that part of my advertiſement in the deſcriptive manner in which it ſtands through caution, and as a ſubterfuge to inſinuate a charge which I was afraid to make: ſo far from it, that I do tell you again I allow the charge. I believe, gentlemen, theſe murders will never be forgotten as long as the hiſtory of this country ſhall remain: for the murders of that day, the 19th of April, have been productive of all that ſlaughter which has happened ſince, and of all that which is ſtill to come. Suppoſe then, gentlemen, if you pleaſe, that I had charged the king's troops with murder. Well! what then? How follows the libel againſt the king and the government? for you muſt take notice that the accuſation in the information is not that I have charged the king's troops with murder. That would not have ſupported an information: an information could not be ſupported upon that charge. The charge againſt me is, that I have charged the king and the government with murder And to-day the gentleman has ſpoken a little more plainly than he did before. To-day he ſays, that 'I have charged the perſons employed by government with 'being guilty of murder; and conſequently thoſe who employed them are 'involved in the ſame guilt.' This is the charge againſt me. But how does he draw the conſequence? Is that to be found in the advertiſement? Does every man that ſays a ſoldier has committed murder, involve the king and the government in the commiſſion of that murder?

Gentlemen, I have not, in my advertiſement, even charged the miniſters. But if I had, I hope the miniſters or the troops are no part of that government which you acknowledge: at leaſt I am ſure the troops do not make a part of that government under which I was born; they do not make a part of that government to which I have repeatedly ſworn, and always held the moſt faithful and firm allegiance: and I will ſay more, they do not make a part of that government under which I will ever ſilently live. Indeed, gentlemen, Mr. Attorney-General ſeems to think the troops ſomething more ſacred even than the government: for he ſaid, in aggravation of the charge, that it was 'not only a libel 'againſt government, but even againſt the ſoldiers in our ſervice.'—If he ſhould happen to forget this alſo, the counſel who anſwered him at the time, and took notice of it, I hope will remember it—'Not only a ‘ libel againſt the government, but even againſt the ſoldiers in our ſer‘ vice:’ ſo that the troops are ſomething more than the government! I believe they are intended to be made ſo; for ours is a government of laws, not a government at will, either by troops, commanders in chief, miniſters, or king. Conſider, gentlemen, that the king's troops are only tolerated in this country for the purpoſe of foreign defence. They have been but of late years tolerated in time of peace. They have only an annual exiſtence; which exiſtence expires yearly, unleſs regenerated by a yearly vote. Now, gentlemen, conſider! Hanoverians, Heſſians, Brunſwickers, Waldeckers, the very Indian ſavages (for of theſe are the king's troops now compoſed) all theſe, by Mr. Attorney's doctrine, make a part of the bleſſed government of this country! and to charge any of thoſe king's troops with murder is to be guilty of a ſeditious libel againſt the king and againſt the government! Gentlemen, reflect. Have not the king's troops often been charged with murder? Does there paſs a year when ſome of them are not convicted for murder? and, in the laſt good old king's reign, were they not executed too for murder, when they were convicted? It is too notorious.---A libel to charge the king's troops with murder! I believe nobody ever dreamt that it was a libel againſt the government, or even againſt the miniſtry, to ſay that ſome of the king's troops have committed murder. If ſuch a charge is falſe and malicious (and a falſe and malicious charge may be made againſt the troops, as well as againſt any other perſon) it may be a libel againſt them, juſt as it would be againſt any other of the king's ſubjects; and they muſt ſeek the ſame remedy. They are not nearer, nor, I hope, dearer than we are; than any other of the king's ſubjects. How long have the troops been theſe privileged characters? What is there peculiar in their character, that to charge them with a murder ſhall be a libel againſt the king and the government? Suppoſe I had ſaid (as I believe I might truly), and as I know it has often been ſaid, that many murders have been committed by the king's patents, does any man think that the attorney-general would have proſecuted that as a ſeditious libel againſt the king and the government? And yet the king's patents are juſt ſuch as he pleaſes to make them: they are of his own begetting, and much more as he pleaſes to make them than even his children. But the troops? what are they? what are they, whoſe origin we know? what are thoſe who are of our own country?---Many of them, felons taken from gaols, and reſcued from the gallows. Of theſe are the king's troops compoſed. And is it wonderful to charge the king's troops with murder? But it is too ridiculous. I am ſure the attorney-general does not, he will not, pretend to ſay, that every particular charge againſt ſome ſoldier or ſoldiers for murder is a ſeditious libel againſt the king and the government! He will not ſay ſo! Suppoſe, gentlemen, ſome of the king's peace-officers had been charged with murder. It has often happened. Conſtables and peace-officers may exerciſe their authority in an illegal manner: they may kill men inſtead of arreſting them. They have done it; they have been ſometimes tried for it. Are not they as much the king's officers as the troops? Something more ſo, I ſuppoſe; for they are the officers of the real government of the country; the officers of the laws. And yet was ever any man proſecuted, or would any man now be proſecuted, if he charged a pack of conſtables with having committed murder? Would that be a libel againſt the king and the government? It could not be. Gentlemen, ſuppoſe ſome of the ſoldiers as brutal as Kirk's lambs (ſoldiers, for their cruelty, known by that name) ſhould renew again the horrid barbarities which they committed in the Weſt; would it then be a ſeditious libel to ſay that they had committed murder? I do not ſay, nor know, that the king has at preſent among his troops any lambs of Kirk's breed; but I am ſure he had in 1768; becauſe I then ſaw them not only commit murders, but other barbarities which not a ſavage hardly would commit. I ſaw one of the king's troops run his fixed bayonet under the ſhoulder-blade of a poor man, becauſe he could not get under a rail time enough out of his way: I ſaw a woman with child wounded: a ginger-bread woman murdered as ſhe ſat at near a quarter of a mile diſtance. Were not they murdered? Were not thoſe murders committed by the king's troops? by as numerous a body of the king's troops as thoſe who committed the murders at Lexington? Gentlemen, there was a perſon preſent; I don't know that I have a right to mention his name; but he ſaid he had ſerved as a ſurgeon under Braddock in America, and he told the juſtices of the peace, that, even in that country, he had never ſeen murder ſo wickedly, ſo wantonly committed. But perhaps the attorney-general does mean ſtill to proſecute me for calling them murderers. Why ſhould he not? It is but nine years ago! I don't know but that, as ſoon as this proſecution is over (if you ſhould eſtabliſh this doctrine), he may follow it with another proſecution for that libel too. The ſame printer can prove it; and I ſhall not deny it. —But the attorney-general will, I know, from neceſſity, be obliged to ſay, that this is a very different caſe from charging ſome individual ſoldiers with murder. The king's troops here, he will ſay, acted in that capacity, as the king's troops, in a body, under their officers, and in a military manner, as part of the king's army.---Well, it may be ſo; but, however, that is more than he has proved to you. If you believe that, you muſt take his word for it, or you muſt have it from the evidence which I ſhall produce. But if Mr. Attorney-General makes or attempts to make this diſtinction to you, gentlemen, between individual ſoldiers and thoſe acting as part of an army, I muſt then intreat him to draw the line. None has yet been drawn; but he muſt do it before you can give him a verdict. If he will give up, as I am ſure he will, that to charge any individual ſoldier with a murder is not a ſeditious libel againſt the king and his government; but ſhall inſiſt, that to charge a body of the king's ſoldiers, acting under their officers, is a libel againſt the king and the government; he muſt then draw ſome line. He will tell you, I ſuppoſe, whether it is a regiment, or a company, or a ſerjeant's guard, or a corporal's guard; what number, and how commanded is it; that draws the line; that makes it an offence againſt the king and the government, and makes it a ſeditious libel to charge them with murder. Look after him---ſee if he draws you that line.---He muſt likewiſe, gentlemen, when he has drawn it, ſhew you his law for it; and then he muſt prove that the troops I have charged fall within that line: and if he does all this, if he draws that line, and eſtabliſhes it by law, and proves that the troops I have charged are within that line which he eſtabliſhes by law, then you are bound to give a verdict againſt me. And if he would do that, I would at once ſave him the trouble of a trial. If he can draw that line, I will not keep the court a moment.

Gentlemen, I will be bold to ſay, that the whole army together, foreigners and natives, with all their officers, and the commander in chief, —aye, and the king himſelf at their head,—is no part of the government of this country; nor can they lawfully put any man to death. I ſaid, gentlemen, ſome time ago that there never had before been brought a proſecution upon ſuch a charge as this. Now, it is true, that a part indeed of the charge againſt honeſt John Lillburne, upon one of his trials, was, that he had accuſed the ſoldiery of having committed murder; and his words were (beſides the word murder, which he expreſſed at length) that they had committed murder by ‘ ſhedding the blood of war, in the ‘ time of peace:’ and he had likewiſe called their general, by name, a murderer. But, gentlemen, it muſt be remembered, that this proſecution was brought when the army were indeed, de facto, the government; when there was neither king nor parliament, but the army governed alone. Then indeed it was natural enough to call the troops the government, and to reckon it a ſeditious libel againſt the government to charge them with murder. Since that time, the attorney-general will find no ſuch proſecution. However, gentlemen, even then a London jury, faithful to their duty, in ſpite of the judges and the attorney-general (who then held the very ſame language which the attorney-general holds now), in ſpite of all their arts, at that perilous time, a London jury in this very court, ſitting in thoſe very places where you now ſit, did juſtice to their own conſciences, and they acquitted him, as you muſt me, unleſs you chuſe to exchange the laws of the land, and have military execution take place in this country. A ſtanding army, in the time of peace, is a monſter to the free conſtitution of this country: it has but very lately been ſuffered; and one of the great arguments that has been urged by thoſe who have from age to age oppoſed a ſtanding army, was, that they would be thenceforwards uſed as they now are. The penſioners of the crown and the friends of arbitrary government ridiculed ſuch a ſuppoſition. They ſaid, it was impoſſible that ſuch a time could ever arrive. I have read their arguments; I am ſure the gentleman who now proſecutes me has read their arguments. They were then afraid of this uſe of troops; and therefore thoſe who oppoſed the eſtabliſhment of the army gave it as their reaſon. Gentlemen, the courtiers ridiculed the thought that ſuch a time could ever arrive, or that the ſoldiers in this country could ever be ſo employed. Now, what would our fathers have ſaid, if any chief juſtice or attorney-general had at that time hinted that the ſoldiers ſhould not only be ſo employed, inſtead of the civil officers of juſtice, to inforce the law upon the ſubject; but that they ſhould alſo have a privilege, when they were employed, which the officers of juſtice never pretended to? Any man who had broached ſuch a doctrine (before the crown had got a firm poſſeſſion of a perpetual ſtanding army) ſuch a man would have been hooted at by both parties: by the court (not that they would have diſliked the doctrine, but) becauſe the ſecret would have been let out too ſoon. But now this ſame doctrine has made the chief juſtice an earl, and ſhall make the attorney-general a chief juſtice.

Gentlemen, I muſt entreat you to recal to your memory in what light military execution has always hitherto been conſidered in this country; and I ſhall give you (for it is worth the while) the circumſtances of the military execution at Glenco. (I publiſhed the pamphlet, that all the world might ſee it.) I mention it, becauſe it happened about the time of the firſt eſtabliſhment of a ſtanding army (in its preſent form) in this land. It is but about eighty years ſince. It happened immediately after the Revolution. Now, gentlemen, who were the Glenco men? ‘ It is certain and acknowledged by all, that they had been in ‘ the rebellions under Dundee, and under Buchan.’ The time of this ſlaughter was in very troubleſome unquiet times, at the moment of the Revolution: it was after repeated proclamations of indemnity and pardon. The laſt proclamation allowed them five months (from Auguſt to January) for them to come in and take the benefit of that proclamation. About ſix weeks after the expiration of that term, the ſlaughter happened; and about twenty-five or thirty of them were killed. Now, gentlemen, let us look for the reaſons which were given for that ſlaughter. The ſecretary of ſtate, Stair, gives theſe reaſons for that ſlaughter: theſe are his words:---‘ Since the government cannot oblige them, it is ‘ obliged to ruin ſome of them, to weaken and frighten the reſt.’ He goes much farther:---‘ It is a great work of charity to be exact in root‘ ing out that damnable ſect.’---They were not only obliged to do it, but it was charitable. He goes farther:---‘ for a juſt example of venge‘ ance, I entreat the thieving tribe of Glenco may be rooted out to ‘ purpoſe.’---He ſays it was ‘ a great advantage to the nation, that that ‘ thieving tribe were rooted out and cut off.’---‘ When you do your duty ‘ in a thing ſo neceſſary,’ (there was a neceſſity, you ſee)---‘ to rid the ‘ country of thieving, you need not trouble yourſelf to take the pains ‘ to vindicate yourſelf by ſhewing all your orders.’---‘ When you do ‘ right, you need not fear any body.’ He adds farther, gentlemen,--- ‘ Here is a fair occaſion for you to ſhew that your garriſon ſerves for ‘ ſome uſe.’---Theſe are his inſtructions; the ſecretary of ſtate's inſtructions to the troops:---it was a fair occaſion to ſhew that their garriſon ſerved for ſome uſe.---‘ The king's juſtice in this, will be as conſpicuous ‘ and uſeful as his clemency to others.’---Can any murder be dreſſed up in fairer terms? I defy the attorney-general, with all his abilities and force of language, to ſay any thing in behalf of this murder at Lexington, in more ſpecious terms than ſecretary Stair has done. ‘ It was ‘ charity to be exact---for a juſt example of vengeance---I entreat the ‘ thieving tribe of Glenco may be rooted out to purpoſe.---It is a great ad‘ vantage to the nation that the thieving tribe were rooted out, and cut off. ‘ ---When you do your duty, in a thing ſo neceſſary, you need not trouble

‘ yourſelf to take the pains to vindicate yourſelf by ſhewing all your ‘ orders. When you do right, you need not fear any body.---Here is ‘ a fair opportunity for you to ſhew that your garriſon ſerves for ſome ‘ uſe.'--- And after it was done, he ſays, ‘ All that I regret is, that any ‘ of the fort got away, and there is a neceſſity to proſecute them to the ‘ utmoſt.'---Theſe are the ſpecious reaſons given for this ſlaughter at Glenco by the then ſecretary of ſtate. But, notwithſtanding all theſe fine reaſons of the ſecretary (who would have been very glad to have had it conſidered as a ſeditious libel againſt government, for any man to ſay that that murder which he had authorized was a murder: he would have been very glad of this doctrine; it would have ſaved him) he himſelf acknowledges in a letter, that there was ‘ much talk at London, that the ‘ Glenco men were murdered.' There was much, obſerve, not a little; there was much talk at London that the Glenco men were murdered. And the parliament of Scotland, who took up the matter, ſaid, it had made ‘ much noiſe both in Scotland and the reſt of the king's dominions.'--- And, gentlemen, it was a very uſeful talk and noiſe. You will find what it produced. Now, what did the king? reluctantly indeed; but it produced good. What did the ſecretary of ſtate? What did the attorney-general? File an information for charging the king's troops with murder? (words and writing have the ſame effect; raſh words, indeed, ſhall have an excuſe where a deliberate writing ſhall not.) No! there was no information for a libel; but the king granted a commiſſion for an enquiry by what pretended authority that ſlaughter was committed. The officers of ſtate at that time knew what they were about, as well as they do at this time. There was a defect in the commiſſion. Gentlemen, in this firſt commiſſion which was granted, the officers who had the drawing it up, no doubt, took care that there ſhould be a defect. A defect there was, and the enquiry did not take place. But the much noiſe and the much talk continued; and two years afterwards the king was forced to grant another commiſſion of enquiry; and then care was taken that there ſhould be no defect. And that commiſſion of enquiry was put in force. It was a commiſſion of enquiry to ſome of the nobleſt and the greateſt in that country, Scotland, where the murders were committed. Gentlemen, what did thoſe lords commiſſioners? They reported, that the ſlaughter of the men at Glenco was---‘ a Barbarous Murder;' the very Billingſgate language complained of in me. Theſe noble Scotchmen voted and uſed that very expreſſion, that very ribaldry. The attorney-general has taken hold of a whole nation by calling it Billingſgate and ribaldry. Here is that very word, murder, barbarous murder, applied to the king's troops, which offends that gentleman ſo much in my advertiſement. He may now ſee, that I too had a precedent for it.---After the commiſſioners had diſcharged their duty, and made their report, that it was a barbarous murder; the parliament of Scotland took it up, and they voted the ſame Billingſgate---they voted that it was a ‘ Barbarous Murder.' And they addreſſed the king; and in that addreſs they call it a ‘ Barbarous ‘ Murder.' But that is not all. They juſtify the king. They find upon their enquiry, that the king's inſtructions had been contradicted: for his inſtructions were, that the Glenco men ſhould be proſecuted ‘ in ‘ the way of public juſtice, and no other way:' that is what they find for the king. And yet they were no friends of thoſe men who were murdered. They did not juſtify them, nor arraign all the meaſures which had been taken againſt them, by finding it a barbarous murder. But they juſtify the king; and they acknowledge themſelves ſo well perſwaded of their guilt, that they ſay, if the king had proceeded againſt them according to LAW, and had taken their lives, ‘ they would have met with no ‘ more than they deſerved.' However, gentlemen, I ſuppoſe that in that declaration they were rather haſty: for there were women and children, and old men of 80, killed: and I do ſuppoſe, that if they had been proceeded againſt according to law, the infants at leaſt would have been ſpared, if the old men and the women had not eſcaped. They go farther. They accuſe the ſecretary of ſtate, Stair, as ‘ the only warrant and ‘ cauſe' of the ſlaughter by his orders. They find that he ‘ did, in ‘ place of preſcribing a vindication of public juſtice, order them to be ‘ cut off and rooted out in earneſt, and to purpoſe; and that ſuddenly, ‘ and ſecretly, and quietly, and all on a ſudden.' It keeps pace very much with the murders at Lexington and Concord. That expedition was ſecretly, quietly, and all on a ſudden; an expedition at the dead of night.---They find that he directed the ſoldiers, that they ‘ ſhould not ‘ trouble the government with priſoners.'---Now the government cannot be troubled with priſoners; the miniſters might: government is not troubled with offenders.---He promiſes them, that ‘ their power ſhould ‘ be full enough:' and he orders them, that they ſhould ‘ begin with ‘ Glenco:' and his words are, that they ſhould ‘ ſpare nothing which be‘ longed to him.'--- Military execution differs a little from the laws of the land!---They accuſed the king's troops with murder, for executing the orders which they had received: they addreſſed the king ‘ to order ‘ his advocate to proſecute them:' and they deſire him, that he would ‘ ſend the troops home to be proſecuted:' ‘ there remaining---' (theſe are their very words) ‘ ſend them home to be proſecuted: there re‘ maining nothing elſe to be done for the full vindication of his Majeſty's ‘ government from ſo foul and ſcandalous an aſperſion.'---There remaining nothing elſe to be done! Not an information for a libel, but an enquiry into the matter, and a proſecution of the offenders! Now, gentlemen, then I muſt entreat you to obſerve what the troops are capable of doing: and I did intend to have read to you the cruel particulars of that narrative; but it is well enough, you will read it another time at your leiſure; and it is your conviction, more than your verdict, I ſeek. You will know where to find it. You will ſee in how barbarous, how wanton, how treacherous, and how cruel a manner they ſlaughtered men, women, and children. And this they were told was their duty; and this they thought a proper way (as Stair, the ſecretary of ſtate, who was a military man; they thought it, as he told them) a proper way to ſhew that they ſerved for ſome uſe. Gentlemen, you find then, by this report and vote, that murder may be committed by the king's troops without and even againſt the king's orders and inſtructions; therefore I conclude, that it is not neceſſarily a libel againſt the king and the government to accuſe his troops with murder. Indeed I go farther: I ſay, the king cannot give orders for ſuch a murder. It is an impoſſibility: nor, if it were poſſible, would ſuch orders juſtify the act. It exceeds the king's power; and would ſtill, by whomſoever authorized and committed, continue to be a murder. Gentlemen, you find too, that a ſecretary of ſtate may be guilty of exceeding the king's inſtructions (as in this caſe of Glenco he was upon enquiry found to have done). And as a ſecretary of ſtate may exceed the king's inſtructions, ſo may all thoſe other perſons through whoſe hands the orders paſs from the ſecretary of ſtate to the ſoldiers who execute them; conſequently, it is no charge againſt the king or the government to charge the troops with murder. But, whether the troops have orders or not, you ſee, that the king's troops who commit the fact are nevertheleſs guilty of murder, as it has been here voted, tho' acting under orders. Now then, gentlemen, I muſt beg you to compare that doctrine concerning Glenco (which has never been arraigned) compare it with this doctrine of the attorney-general concerning the ſoldiers at Lexington. In the trials of the printers he ſaid, and he ſays now, that the advertiſement is a ſeditious libel againſt the government, becauſe it arraigned the employment of the king's troops, and called the victory they had obtained a murder. There, he ſaid, he put his finger; ‘ for this (ſays he) arraigns all the meaſures of govern‘ ment; quelling rebels armed, to call that murder.' Now I beg of you to conſider what a number of things are left out in this manner of reaſoning, and what a number of things are taken for granted. In the firſt place, it does not appear, nor has he offered to prove any ſuch thing, that the ſlaughter at Lexington and Concord was a meaſure of government.—— Arraigning all the meaſures of government! and yet it does not appear that this was a meaſure of government; I mean, even according to the abuſed uſe of the word government; I mean, not a meaſure even of the ſecretary of ſtate. But if it had been, how does it follow that, by abuſing the meaſures of the miniſters of ſtate, I condemn all the meaſures of government? Suppoſe I condemn one meaſure of government, how does it follow that I condemn all? May not a man condemn that meaſure, and yet approve all the foregoing? I do not mean to be underſtood that I approve the foregoing meaſures: I abhor them. But there is nothing in the advertiſement before you which condemns the meaſures of government directly or indirectly: it relates to no other meaſure but merely to that one; and you are not to trouble yourſelves with what I may like, or what I may not like, but what I have expreſſed in that advertiſement which is before you. For in this caſe of Glenco, it is evident that the noble commiſſioners who voted it a barbarous murder, did not condemn all the meaſures of government: for they ſaid, ‘ If the king had proſecuted them by ‘ law, and taken their lives, he had done no more than juſtice:' it is plain therefore they did not condemn all the other meaſures of government, but only the ſlaughter by the troops; for they ſupported the other meaſures of government, and that at the riſk of their lives and fortunes. And, gentlemen, I know of my own knowledge, and I dare ſay you do, many perſons who have not diſapproved of all thoſe preceding meaſures relative to America, who yet did diſapprove of that raſh and wanton tranſaction. Then, gentlemen, as for the ‘ victory,' I think it will not appear to be quite ſo compleat a victory as that at Glenco! and therefore you ſtill ſee, that ſuch a victory as that may be called a murder. Gentlemen, for my own part, I do not heſitate to declare, that I abhor ſuch victories; victories by ſubject upon ſubject! And as for ſuch a victory as this, I do declare I think that the brows of ſuch conquerors inſtead of laurel ſhould be crowned with wreaths of hemlock. And as for his— ‘ quelling of armed rebels!' every word is falſhood.—They were not rebels, nor armed, nor quelled. They had committed no act of hoſtility; they had made no attack; they were ſleeping quietly in their beds, unapprehenſive of any attack upon themſelves, at the time that this expedition took place: and that I ſhall prove, gentlemen. What reaſon have you to believe that they were in rebellion, unleſs the attorney-general's ſaying ſo proves them to be in rebellion? for he has offered no proof to you of it. It is now—(and pray conſider this matter about rebels; though I think it does not matter; for a rebel may be murdered) but conſider, it is now two years and a quarter ſince this ſlaughter was committed; and yet, to this day, no perſon whatever has been proſecuted as a rebel. No legal proceedings of any kind have taken place. It is two years and a quarter ſince that execution upon the rebels, as they are called, and yet no proof of rebellion: and yet you are to believe, that they are rebels! The attorney-general, if they are rebels, ſhould do his duty: he ſhould proſecute.

Now, gentlemen, obſerve only another contradiction in the doctrines which are brought before you. You will be told, that if they were murdered, the murderers ſhould be proſecuted. You have been told ſo. Men are not to be charged with crimes; they are to be proſecuted by law. So then we are not to know, we are not to judge of murder when it is committed, till the law helps our judgment. And yet, obſerve, we are to judge of rebellion; which is a crime ſurely more difficult to be aſcertained, and about which there have been more doubts and diſputes than about murder. If a man, out of the court, exerciſes his judgment about a murder, he ſhall be puniſhed; but he is at the ſame time bound at his peril to exerciſe his judgment about rebellion; to know what is rebellion, and who have committed it. And yet, gentlemen, I muſt beg you to obſerve, that if theſe very men, executed by military force at Lexington, had been rebels; had been taken in rebellion; had been proſecuted, convicted, ſentenced, and had been leading to the gallows by the ſheriff; if theſe ſame king's troops had come and ſhot them, or run their bayonets into them, they would have committed murder. It is not their being rebels; it is not their being ſentenced—when they are even leading to execution, a man may commit a murder upon the convicts: and theſe troops would have committed murder, had they executed the men even in that condition.

Gentlemen, the ſame way of thinking of military execution has prevailed ever ſince that time. I ſhall not trouble you to repeat the particulars of the affair of Captain Porteous at Edinburgh. Theſe gentlemen are ſo little pleaſed with military execution upon themſelves, that Porteous was charged by them with murder. He was proſecuted, convicted, and when he was reprieved after ſentence, the people of the town executed that man themſelves, ſo little did they approve of military execution. Now, gentlemen, there are at this moment people of reputation, living in credit, making fortunes under the crown, who were concerned in that very fact, who were concerned in the execution of Porteous. I do not ſpeak it to cenſure them; for, however irregular the act, my mind approves it. I beg you likewiſe, gentlemen, to recollect that moſt wanton and moſt wicked rebellion of the year 1745. In what a manner was the victory over them ſpoken of in Smollet's—'Mourn, hapleſs Caledonia'!— It is known, I ſuppoſe, to every body who ever reads poetry. He calls it murder:

> "The naked and forlorn muſt feel
> "Devouring flames and murdering ſteel," &c.

I condemn his act; I do not juſtify it; but he was not proſecuted for it in that mild reign.

Gentlemen, it has always been judged a meritorious jealouſy in our civil officers; it was in Janſſen; it was in ſome other ſheriffs, who are ſtill living, when they refuſed the aſſiſtance of the military to execute criminals. So little proper are the military, with or without orders, for civil purpoſes, that it has always been thought a praiſe-worthy jealouſy in them to refuſe to ſuffer the military to aſſiſt at the execution of criminals: how much leſs then are they proper to execute them themſelves. In that proſecution of the king's troops for committing murders in St. George's Fields, I was particularly fortunate for this occaſion; and I ſhould have reaſon to rejoice for myſelf (if I alone was concerned), that I did by that proſecution bring out a doctrine (which I know to be falſe, and which if not diſcountenanced will be fatal) but I did draw out a doctrine from the bench which muſt prevent your verdict againſt me now. To juſtify the executions committed in St. George's Fields, or to ſave the delinquents from puniſhment, the judge declared from the bench that they were to be conſidered as any other men in the country; that it was a matter of no conſequence whether they wore a white coat or a red one; that they were on the ſame footing, and might be employed like any other ſubject. I know that to be falſe: they are diſtinguiſhed from other men, not ſo as to make them more qualified for execution, but leſs. However, this doctrine anſwered the purpoſe at that time: but this doctrine, if I am to be convicted, muſt now be laid aſide. The king's troops muſt no longer be conſidered as on a level and on the ſame footing with the king's other ſubjects. They muſt now, by the 'king's troops,' mean ſome perſons more ſacred, dearer, and nearer to his majeſty than any other of his ſubjects; and to arraign any action of theirs is to be guilty of a ſeditious libel againſt the government. Now, gentlemen, obſerve how rapid is their progreſſion; from toleration to equality, and from equality to domination; and from thence you may learn how dangerous is this doctrine. Obſerve, that firſt, and for many years, they beg hard to have troops tolerated, merely to prevent ſurprize, and to be ready againſt foreign enemies: that is the pretence. The judges next connive at their employment againſt the ſubject at home, under pretence of equality, and as being merely on the ſame footing with the king's other ſubjects, and with no other difference but the colour of their coats. From this laſt doctrine (though it includes a contradiction to what follows) the tranſition has been very ſhort indeed. They are now to be taken out of that equality with other ſubjects; and it is made a crime againſt the king and the government to condemn any ſlaughter which they may commit: and this too without any enquiry, without any proof concerning the nature of the execution or the manner of the ſlaughter; or whether it was directed, or was not directed; or by whom directed. And yet, gentlemen, I have learned from Mr. Juſtice Atkins (ſtill going to my only ſource of law, a ſtate trial) I have learned from him, that 'ſome judges are of an opinion that before a trial, or preſentment, or acquittal, modo legitimo, no action upon the caſe for ſlander will lie; it not being, he ſays, ripe for it till an acquittal. By the ſame reaſon, he ſays, it is not ready for an information, which is but the king's ſuit, the reaſon being the ſame in both.' So that, gentlemen, if that be true, this proſecution is too ſoon as well as too late: too ſoon, becauſe it precedes the enquiry into the fact, whether murder or not; and too late, for the reaſons I have already given. And I have no doubt, gentlemen, but that you yourſelves will think that the firſt ſtep to be taken to remove (if there be any) aſperſion on government, is to ſet on foot an enquiry into the murder; and then, if it ſhall be found a groundleſs charge, proſecute and puniſh thoſe who charged them. They ſay, why do I not proſecute them? or at leaſt, that I ſhould have proſecuted the murderers, or not charged them with the murder. It is well known, I have always done ſo when I could; and I would do ſo now if I could. I would proſecute thoſe troops guilty of thoſe murders. But how is that to be done? An act of parliament was made juſt before the commiſſion of theſe murders, to exempt the murderers from trial in America; and you will pleaſe to remember, that it is not long ſince an act of parliament was made in England for the more ſpeedy execution of murderers here. An act was made a few years ago for the more ſpeedy execution of murderers in England; and that becauſe it was thought a means of deterring men more effectually from murder. Now then what are you to conclude? What are you to conclude even from the circumſtance of delay alone? but either that what deters men from committing murder here, will not deter them from committing murder there; or elſe, that it was not intended to deter men from committing murder in America. Now what would any diſpaſſionate American think even of this ſingle difference between us? This act was made at a time too when checks for their ſecurity were more neceſſary than at any other time; for it was when troops were pouring in upon them. Obſerve, when Engliſhmen are murdered, as ſmall delay as poſſible ſhall be ſuffered between the fact and the puniſhment; in America, every delay and every poſſible difficulty! What was this likely to produce but mutual ſlaughter on both ſides? The ſoldiery were encouraged to murder by a proſpect of impunity; and the Americans, by that impunity of their murderers, were taught to defend and revenge themſelves. I beg you to recollect what happened in London only three or four years ago. A foreigner ſtabbed a coachman in Palace-Yard, Weſtminſter. The poor man in the agonies of death called out for a knife, that he might do himſelf juſtice (the fact is notorious; I believe it came out upon the trial) that he might do himſelf juſtice; as, he ſaid, he knew that his murderer would be pardoned! Gentlemen, he was miſtaken; his murderer was hanged: but it was a very natural thought for him, after the pardons for murder which had then been recently granted. For take away from men a reliance in the protection of the law, and they will wiſely, and juſtly, and properly, do juſtice for themſelves. The juſtice of this principle is acknowledged every where; in all countries. There is a ſignal inſtance of it. Even a French deſpot found it; and when the king of France pardoned one of his own blood for a murder which he had committed, he publickly bade him obſerve, that he would likewiſe pardon any one that ſhould murder him. Now, gentlemen, picture to yourſelves the Americans of Lexington and Concord ſleeping quietly in their beds, their wives and their infants by their ſides, rouſed at the dead of night, with an alarm that a numerous body of the king's troops (their numbers, perhaps, augmented by fear and report) were marching towards them by ſurprize in an hoſtile manner—theſe troops who were not to be brought to juſtice by them for any murders which they might commit! What ſhall they do? Shall they attempt to fly, and leave the helpleſs part of their family behind them? Shall they ſtay, and ſubmit themſelves and their families to the licentiouſneſs of theſe ruffians? I ſuppoſe there might be amongſt them (as amongſt us) ſome of both theſe ſorts: but however, for the honour of human nature, there were alſo ſome of another temper. They haſtily armed themſelves as well as they could; they collected together as they might; and they ſtaid waiting the event, determined not to attack, but to defend themſelves from lawleſs inſult, or to ſell their lives as dearly as they could. There is nothing ſurely in this that will juſtify the ſlaughter of them which enſued. And you will pleaſe to obſerve the time when this happened; for it is a very ſtriking fact. As ſoon as the act of parliament exempting them from trial for murder in America---as ſoon as that act got to America, and the weather would permit them, the troops did inſtantly and without delay commit thoſe murders with which I now charge them. That act of parliament was propoſed by the confidential friend of my judge; it was propoſed by lord George Germaine; and though the attorney and ſolicitor general, according to cuſtom, were inſtructed to bring in the bill, he propoſed it in the committee. He mentioned the word ſoldiers—troops:---but the attorney and ſolicitor general, or the other gentlemen who are in office (for I believe their names are mentioned for form, I do not mean to accuſe them) thoſe who drew up the bill, knew what was the ſecret intention of the propoſer (not the intention of the government), and therefore no ſoldier is to be found in the bill; but it is left at large---thoſe aſſiſting in the execution of the orders of the officers of juſtice; and the general of the army was at that time the civil governor of the town. Lord George Germaine, whom I have ſubpœna'd to appear, and who I underſtand does not mean to attend, was not then, it is true, in office; but he was very ſhortly after made ſecretary of ſtate for the American department. You ſee then that ſecretary Germaine was more ſubtle and cautious than ſecretary Stair. Now, if we would proſecute thoſe murderers, how is it to be done? How ſhall we find the ſurviving witneſſes? Having found them, how ſhall we get them to England? How ſhall we find the individual murderers? and if found, how ſhall we bring them hither?

Gentlemen, do you not plainly ſee? The act paſſes that they ſhall not be tried for murder in America.---The murders immediately follow.--- They cannot be tried by the Americans;---and (if the doctrine now attempted by this proſecution is eſtabliſhed by you) our miſerable fellow-ſubjects in America ſhall not have even the poor conſolation of being even pitied here. The murderers ſhall not be tried there: they ſhall not be charged here. But, gentlemen, I ſhall be told (as I have been) that the Americans were rebels. I anſwer, that it has not been proved. Times of diſcontent and ſuſpicion are not times of rebellion: ſuſpicion may be groundleſs, as well as diſcontent.

But, gentlemen, you will be told that it was no murder, becauſe there was a neceſſity for it.---Lord Stair ſaid the ſame for Glenco.--- Well, gentlemen, if upon the trial of the murderers it ſhould ſo appear, that would ſave them from a verdict of murder. But till that neceſſity appears, and is proved, every man is juſtified in calling it a murder. Neceſſity ſhall ſave the accuſed from a ſentence of death; but it ſhall not turn the accuſation into a libel, becauſe it had a reaſonable foundation. Men were killed without the ſanction of the law. However, I have never yet heard any neceſſity, any real neceſſity ſhewn for this ſlaughter; and I take it that my evidence will be ſufficient to make it appear that it was a voluntary act, not unexpected or waited for, but ſought for by the troops. Indeed, the attorney-general has excluded any ſuch notion; for he has called it a victory!---Neceſſary ſelf-defence (and no further than that reaches is any man juſtified in putting men to death) neceſſary ſelf-defence has, I believe, never yet been called a victory. The utmoſt which that could ever be called, would be a lucky or a happy eſcape. But neceſſity did never yet excuſe him who attacks; it will only excuſe in ſelf-defence. The law tells you, you muſt go back to the wall. If you go and attack, and ſo invite what follows, neceſſity will not afterwards acquit you. But, gentlemen, let it be neceſſity. If it is neceſſity, I am ſure, I am ſtill juſtified in calling it murder by the greateſt and (upon this occaſion) the beſt authority for me in this country. For if, when at a critical moment, to ſave this nation from an univerſal famine, it was neceſſary for the miniſters of ſtate to act contrary to law---if all men with one conſenting voice approved this ſalutary meaſure to ſave the lives of men, and both houſes of parliament returned his majeſty their thanks for concurring with it---I ſay, if, notwithſtanding this, it was neceſſary, in order to heal the wound which the conſtitution was ſuppoſed to have received (by the ſubjects lives being thus ſaved contrary to law) if it was neceſſary to have an act of parliament to indemnify thoſe innocently-guilty miniſters of ſtate, thoſe meritorious offenders; what, ſhall it not be equally neceſſary to have an act of parliament to indemnify thoſe who have put our fellow-ſubjects to death contrary to law! I know indeed there was a very ſevere judge once, who did go ſo far in the inſolence of his delegated authority, as to affirm that,

——— ——— ——— ‘ ’Twere all as good,
‘ To pardon him that hath from nature ſtol’n
‘ A man already made, as to remit
‘ Their ſawcy lewdneſs that do coin heav’n’s image
‘ In ſtamps that are forbid.---’Tis all as juſt
‘ Falſely to take away a life true made,
‘ As to put mettle to reſtrained means
‘ To make a falſe one.’———

But the doctrine now held out to us goes as much farther; as revenge and tyranny are more odious, more pernicious, and more deteſtable than luſt. Luſt, for its purpoſe, argued only that it was an equal crime to give life contrary to law, as to take away life contrary to law. But revenge and deſpotiſm only make it a crime to preſerve lives (which is a better kind of giving life than generation) contrary to law;---and deny it to be any crime to take away lives contrary to law, unleſs it be alſo at the ſame time contrary to the inclination of the tyrant.---Admit then, gentlemen, if you pleaſe, admit the motive for killing thoſe our fellow-ſubjects at Lexington and Concord to be as neceſſary as you pleaſe: go farther, admit it to be uſeful, admit it to be highly meritorious:---yet I hope the warmeſt admirer of ſuch kind of executions, the moſt thirſty after American blood and confiſcation, I hope he will not inſult our underſtandings by contending that it could be more meritorious, that it could be more uſeful, that it could be more neceſſary to kill men in ſupport of the meaſures of ſome particular miniſters, than to ſave this whole country from famine. Our law, gentlemen, has not called ſuch an action as that illegal embargo on corn by any ſpecific name, as it has called the illegal putting of men to death by the name of murder. Suppoſe then (what indeed was freely done) that any one, for want of a ſpecific name, had called that neceſſary embargo on corn, an illegal action: as when we ſay murder, we mean illegal ſlaying. Now then, I aſk (and I hope the attorney-general will tell us), would it have been a ſeditious libel againſt the king and the government to have called that meaſure illegal (for want of a ſpecific name) which the real government itſelf, the legiſlature, by the indemnifying act declared to be illegal? Whether the attorney-general may pretend this or not, I cannot tell: but I am ſure my judge muſt direct you otherwiſe.---He CANNOT for ſhame pretend, becauſe he forced an act of indemnity upon theſe men, who themſelves thought the act a ſufficient juſtification of itſelf; he forced them to be pardoned, to be indemnified by an act of parliament; and therefore I am ſure that he cannot pretend that utility and neceſſity ſhall juſtify the deaths of men, when he would not permit utility and neceſſity to be ſufficient, without an act of indemnity, to juſtify thoſe who had illegally ſaved this whole country from famine.

But, gentlemen, I am aſhamed to have ſaid ſo much upon a point ſo clear. It is not becauſe I am tired; or becauſe I am failing in many more arguments equally ſtrong. But I diſdain to take up more of your time, or to ſay a word more upon this ſubject. I will leave it juſt where it is. I leave it to the reply of the attorney-general, and the direction of the judge.

Mr. Horne having concluded, the attorney-general began to addreſs the jury by way of reply; upon which Mr. Horne roſe, and ſpoke to lord Mansfield as follows:

Mr. Horne. My lord, I don’t mean to interrupt the attorney-general: but, my lord, my haſte, and the ſhame I feel for having made any defence to ſuch a kind of charge, made me forget to examine my witneſſes. The attorney-general has not proceeded far in his reply, and I hope I ſhall be at liberty to call them now.

Mr. Attorney-General. You will not examine witneſſes to juſtify a libel?---My lord, I object to his calling witneſſes, except he had opened to what points he meant to call them.

Lord Mansfield. You had better not object, Mr. Attorney-General; you had better hear his witneſſes.

Mr. Horne. My lord, if Mr. Attorney-General make an objection, I will endeavour to obviate his objection.

Lord Mansfield. Call your witneſſes.

Mr. Horne. I call the attorney-general.

Lord Mansfield. Oh! you can’t examine the attorney-general.

Mr. Horne. Does your lordſhip deliver that as the law?---My lord, I call the attorney-general, and deſire that the book may be given to him.

Lord Mansfield. You muſt ſtate then what queſtions you mean to aſk him; for he has a right to demur to the queſtions, and take the opinion of the court.

Mr. Horne. If I do that, it will be more than he was directed by your lordſhip to do with any of the witneſſes he examined.

Lord Mansfield. They were called of common courſe; the attorney-general may demur to it.

Mr. Horne. If I aſk him an improper queſtion, he may then object to it, if he can.

Lord Mansfield. If you call the attorney-general in any cauſe, if you don’t ſtate the queſtion, he may demur.

Mr. Horne. Can he before he is ſworn?

Lord Mansfield. He may demur to being examined at all.

Mr. Horne. Yes, and I dare ſay he will.

Lord Mansfield. You might as well call a common attorney or an advocate employed againſt you in a cauſe.

Mr. Horne. But this, my lord, differs widely. In what I ſhall call Mr. Attorney-General to, he acts neither as attorney nor as advocate.

Lord Mansfield. State the queſtion.

Mr. Horne. My lord, I have many queſtions to aſk him. He has paraded upon his honour, his conſcience, and his duty. He is not acting as an attorney or an advocate in the cauſe. When he files an information, he is then acting as a judge or a jury; and if he has not acted in it with that integrity with which he would have done upon oath, ſo much the worſe for him. One chief reaſon why I deſire to examine him is, to obtain this: that I may point out a means by which an accuſation in future ſhall not be brought againſt a man without an oath, at leaſt from ſomebody. My lord, one queſtion I mean to aſk him is concerning that accuſation which he has now brought: how it came to be brought? how it came to be dropped? and ſome other circumſtances attending it. He has talked ſo much of the fairneſs, and the conſcience, and the integrity of his motives in doing it, that I am ſure it will look very comical if he refuſes to ſwear to thoſe declarations. If he will not ſwear to theſe motives, without his oath I cannot believe it: and if, contrary to my expectations, he does ſwear to it, after his oath I ſhall be left to exerciſe my own judgment.

Mr. Attorney-General. To any matter ſo impertinent as that! If that gentleman had had any queſtion of fact to have aſked me relative to his defence, I would not have objected to have ſworn to it; although I ſtand in the place of proſecutor in this cauſe, where in point of form I might: but I put myſelf upon this, that I will not be examined to queſtions ſo impertinent as thoſe that have been now propoſed.

Mr. Horne. My lord, the gentlemen of the jury will pleaſe to obſerve then, that here is an accuſation without an accuſer. Your lordſhip ſmiles! Upon my word, my lord, I do not think it a thing to be laughed at. If I had the honour to be talking with your lordſhip over a table, I ſhould ſpeak of it with the ſame ſeriouſneſs, and not as a quibble. I hope the gentleman will upon oath juſtify that information, for the integrity of which he has been haranguing.——He will not!—Well, then I muſt do without the evidence of the attorney-general.

Lord Mansfield. I cannot force him to be examined.

Mr. Horne. No, my lord, nor do I believe any body elſe could.——Pleaſe to call lord George Germaine.

[Lord George Germaine was called by the cryer, but did not appear.]

Mr. Horne. He is gone to Germany too, I ſuppoſe, with general Gage.

Mr. Alderman OLIVER ſworn.

Examined by Mr. Horne.

Mr. Horne. My lord, I call this witneſs to prove the truth of the aſſertions contained in the advertiſement.

Q. Sir, I muſt deſire you firſt to ſpeak to the particulars of a meeting called, during an adjournment of the Conſtitutional Society, in the year 1775. Was there a meeting called by you in June 1775?

A. I believe there was; upon your application.

Q. Are you ſure of it?---A. I am.

Q. Did you know the purpoſe for which it was called before it met?

A. Yes; I did.

Q. Did you approve of that purpoſe?---A. I did.

Q. Was a propoſal made to ſubſcribe any money, and for the purpoſes mentioned?

A. Yes, it was; and by you.

Q. A ſum of money was ſubſcribed?---A. There was.

Q. Did you contribute part of it?

A. I did.

Q. Was ſuch a direction, as in the advertiſement, given to me?

A. There was.

Q. There is another advertiſement of 50*l.*---I believe I need not read it; it is well underſtood. Did I receive that 50*l.* from you in the name of an unknown contributor?

A. Through me.

Q. Was that 50*l.* given for the purpoſes mentioned?

A. It was.

Q. By whom?

A. Sir Stephen Theodore Janſſen. I was alſo a ſubſcriber to the ſame purpoſe.

Q. I mentioned in the courſe of my defence what may otherwiſe perhaps be repreſented as not true: Did I ſend by you, upon a relation from you of a motion made for an act of parliament to take away the right of appeal from the ſubjects in caſes of murder, did I, or not, ſend that meſſage which you heard me repreſent in my defence?

A. You ſent a meſſage by me; and I dare ſay, from your accuracy of memory and your truth, you did deliver a meſſage from the attorney-general. Whether I thought that it would be of the ſame effect,---I did mention to Mr. Roſe Fuller the determination of Mr. Horne to go all lengths in oppoſition to that act which was to deſtroy the right of appeal in caſes of murder; and I do believe in my conſcience his application prevented any further ſteps being taken upon it.

Q. The fact, as I repreſented it, the witneſs ſays is true.

A. Certainly ſo.

William Lacey ſworn.

Examined by Mr. Horne.

[A receipt for 100*l. ſhewn to the witneſs.*]

Q. Is that your hand-writing?---A. It is.

Q. Do you recollect that 100*l.* for which that is your receipt, being paid in at your houſe?---A. I do.

Q. In the name of Dr. Franklin?

A. On his account.

Q. Do you know by whom that was paid?

A. I have it in my book in the name of Mr. Horne.

Q. Do you recollect me to have paid it myſelf?

A. I do not: but it was paid.

Q. Do you know of any other ſum paid?

A. No: I have got a copy as it ſtands in my book here.

Q. Is there any thing beſides the 100*l.* put in?---A. No.

Q. No 50*l.*---A. No.

Q. Where is Mr. Chetham?

A. He is in Ireland.

Q. He is a clerk in your houſe?---A. He was.

Q. And uſed to receive money occaſionally?---A. Yes.

Q. Do you know his hand-writing?

A. I believe I ſhould.

Q. Look at that receipt.

[A receipt for 50*l. was ſhewn to the witneſs.*]

A. I believe that to be his writing.

Mr. Horne. Call Mr. Gould.

Mr. Edward Thoroton Gould ſworn.

Examined by Mr. Horne.

Q. Did you in the year 1775 ſerve in a regiment of foot belonging to his majeſty?---A. I did.

Q. Was you preſent at Lexington and Concord on the 19th of April 1775?

A. I was.

Q. How came you to be there?

A. As a ſubaltern officer, ordered there.

Q. Ordered by whom?

A. General Gage.

Q. At what time did you receive thoſe orders?

A. I don't recollect immediately the time.

Q. Was it on the 19th, 18th, or 17th of April?

A. I believe it was on the 18th in the evening.

Q. Did you receive them perſonally from general Gage?

A. No ſuch thing.

Q. Whom then?

A. From the adjutant of the regiment.

Q. When did you ſet out from Boſton for Lexington?

A. I cannot exactly ſay the time in the morning, but it was very early, two or three o'clock.

Q. That is in the night in April, was it dark?---A. It was.

Q. Did you march with drums beating?

A. No, we did not.

Q. Did you march as ſilently as you could?

A. There were not any particular orders given for ſilence.

Q. Was it obſerved?

A. Nor it was not obſerved, not particularly by me.

Q. Were you taken priſoner at Lexington or Concord, or either of them?

A. At the place called Monottama, in my return from Lexington.

Q. I ſhall aſk you no queſtions that you diſlike; give me a hint if there is any one you wiſh to decline---Did you make any affidavit?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. Will you pleaſe to read that?

[Giving the witneſs the Public Advertiſer, May 31, 1775.]

A. I believe that to be the exact ſubſtance of the affidavit that I made.

Lord Mansfield. It cannot be read without the attorney-general conſents to it.

Mr. Attorney-General. I don't conſent.

Lord Mansfield. If he conſents to it, I have no objection.

Mr. Horne. May I give it to the jury?

Lord Mansfield. No; I ſuppoſe they have all read it years ago.

Mr. Horne. My lord, that is my misfortune that it is ſo long ago.

[Mr. Horne begins to read it.]

Lord Mansfield. You muſt not read it.

Mr. Horne. I have proved the publication by the printer.

Lord Mansfield. It will have a different conſequence, if you only mean to prove that there was ſuch an affidavit publiſhed. If you mean to make that uſe of it, then you may produce the affidavit, or have it read.---If you mean to prove the contents of it, they muſt come from the witneſs, and then you will have a right to have it read.

Mr. Horne. I mean both to prove the contents true, and the publication of the affidavit: that indeed, I have already proved.

Lord Mansfield. Then you may read the affidavit, if you make uſe of the publication of it.

Mr. Horne. I make uſe of both; that it was ſo publiſhed, and charged, and that it is true.

'The Public Advertiſer, Wedneſday May 31ſt, 1775.'

[The affidavit read.]

Q. Are the contents of that affidavit true?

A. They are; it was made at the time I was wounded and taken priſoner.

Q. Pray, do you know that the Americans upon that occaſion ſcalped any of our troops?

A. I heard they did; but I did not ſee them.

Q. You ſaw none?

A. I did not.

Q. From whom did you hear it?

A. From a captain that advanced up the country.

Q. Was you, at the time when the orders were given to you to go to Lexington and Concord, apprehenſive of any attack by thoſe Americans againſt whom you went?

A. We were as ſoon as we ſaw them; we found them armed.

Q. Before you went from Boſton?

A. That day we did.

Q. How many miles is Lexington or Concord from Boſton?

A. The farther is about 25 miles, the nearer is about 12.

Q. Did you know, had you any intelligence that the Americans of Lexington and Concord were, at that time, marching, or intending to march to attack you at Boſton?

A. We ſuppoſed that they were marching to attack us, from a continued firing of alarm guns, cannon, or they appeared to be ſuch from the report.

Lord Mansfield. Did you ſay cannon?

A. Cannon.

Lord Mansfield. When was that?

A. As ſoon as we began the march, very early in the morning.

Mr. Horne. But did you hear thoſe alarm guns before your orders for the march were given, or before your march began?

A. No.

Q. But after you had begun your march?

A. Yes; after we began our march the alarm guns began firing.

Q. Did you ſuppoſe thoſe alarm guns to be in conſequence of your having begun the march?

A. I cannot ſay.

Q. I will not deſire you to ſuppoſe (though the gentleman has ſuppoſed that they were coming to attack him) but do you know of any intelligence whether the perſons who fired the alarm guns, whether thoſe were the perſons who were killed at Lexington and Concord?

A. No; I do not.

Mr. Horne. How thoſe orders came you cannot tell, therefore I do not mean to examine to it.

One of Jury. Pray who did the alarm guns belong to; to the Americans or our corps?

A. From the provincials.

Mr. Horne. What do you mean by an alarm gun?---Alarm may be miſunderſtood.

A. That is, what they term in the country an alarm gun; it is a notice given to aſſemble the country.

Q. After you had begun your march, you heard theſe alarm guns?

A. Yes.

Mr. Horne. My lord Percy, I thank your lordſhip for your attendance. I will not trouble your lordſhip with any queſtions. I ſhall not aſk your lordſhip thoſe queſtions I intended, ſince general Gage has not thought proper to attend: he is gone to Germany I underſtand, and will not be back, I ſuppoſe, theſe---three or four days!

Lord Mansfield. Then you have done?

Mr. Horne. Yes.

(REPLY.)

Mr. Attorney-General.

May it pleaſe your lordſhip, and gentlemen of the jury,

The gentleman has choſen to take the conduct of his defence himſelf; and in the courſe of the conduct of it, he has proceeded in as ſingular a way as I believe ever any cauſe was conducted that was ever tried in any court of juſtice. He certainly has done more than the wiſdom, than the propriety, than the decency of any counſel would have permitted him to do on a ſimilar occaſion; and if I conjecture his aim aright, from the manner in which he has attempted the defence, he has more caſt about to be ſtopped in a great variety of parts, for the ſake of making it a topic of complaint, than ſeriouſly ſtated them, as hoping they could be deemed by any by-ſtander (and more particularly by you that are to judge of them) at all pertinent to his defence. I did not recollect on the outſet that I had ſo totally paſſed over the terms of this charge, much leſs that I had ſo profuſely enlarged upon ſubjects foreign and impertinent to that charge, as to lay me open to any reflections upon that account. It is not to my purpoſe, and therefore I will trouble you with no reflections upon thoſe various ſtories (hiſtories of various adventures in many parts of the world) with which he has thought proper to interlard the ſpeech he has made to you upon this ſubject; which, before I ſit down, I hope I ſhall be perfectly juſtified in having ſtated to you as one of the plaineſt, and cleareſt, and ſhorteſt propoſitions that ever was laid before a jury. Gentlemen, it is certainly true, the charge in the information conſiſts in this, that he did write and publiſh, and cauſe and procure to be written and publiſhed, a certain falſe, wicked, malicious, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libel. I was afraid, when my ſpeech was loaded with the imputation of having thrown out invectives in the terms of the information, that the information had not been ſufficiently explicit upon the true nature and quality of the libel which it offered to bring before you. I admit that the information is explicit, that it is direct, and that it perfectly and juſtly qualifies the nature of the charge that is brought before you of ſcandalous and ſeditious. It is likewiſe inferred that this is concerning his majeſty's government; and the employment of his troops; the information has therefore undertaken to ſay, that the ſcurrilous matter which follows was delivered in writing, concerning the king's government, and concerning the employment of the troops. If it was delivered concerning either, it is ſufficient: that it was delivered concerning both, I take now (by this time at leaſt) to be perfectly clear.

Then the matter of the libel is this: that at the Conſtitutional Society it was propoſed a ſubſcription ſhould be immediately entered into for raiſing the ſum of a hundred pounds, to be applied in the manner in which it proceeds to ſpecify afterwards. And the gentleman has been at the trouble to prove, that that was not merely a conceit and device of his, in order to introduce the charge that follows; but that the charge which follows was (in point of fact) introduced upon the previous act; which, according to my poor conception of the thing, does not deſerve ſofter epithets than that which followed. It is no alleviation at leaſt of the libel that he has publiſhed upon the government, that it took ſuch a commencement as it did, and proceeded in ſuch conduct as has been imputed. I thought it a candour, an article of fairneſs to names mentioned or even alluded to in the moſt diſtant way, to ſuppoſe that it had not been exactly in the way he thought fit to ſtate it. But whether it were or were not, in what view has he even ſaid to you, that that circumſtance, true or falſe, goes an inch towards qualifying the virulence and indecency of the libel that immediately follows it? The next words that he puts in are---'to be applied to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents 'of our beloved American fellow-ſubjects, who, faithful to the character 'of Engliſhmen, preferring death to ſlavery, were, for that reaſon only, 'inhumanly murdered by the king's troops at or near Lexington and 'Concord, in the province of the Maſſachuſets.' Let us a little ſee, what is the nature of the obſervations he makes upon it. In the firſt place, that I left it exceedingly ſhort. And the objection to my having left it ſhort was ſimply this: that I had ſtated no more to you but this, that of imputing to the conduct of the king's troops the crime of murder. Now I ſtated it, as imputing it to the troops ordered, as they were, upon the public ſervice. And imputing to that ſervice the crime and the qualification of murder, was an expreſſion ſcandalous and ſeditious in itſelf; reflecting highly upon thoſe troops; reflecting highly upon the conduct of them; and reflecting upon them to all the purpoſes and concluſions which this information ſtates. But, it ſeems, I did not argue it ſufficiently! I confeſs very fairly, that to argue ſuch propoſitions as thoſe (according to that gentleman's notion of arguing them ſufficiently) is far beyond all the compaſs of all the talents and abilities that I have in the world. I cannot ſpeak four hours in order to demonſtrate to you, that taxing people with the crime of murder, and taxing the conduct of people with that imputation, is a ſcandal upon the parties ſo reflected on. If there be a man of more diffuſive talents, of better talents at ſpeaking, who can expend four or five hours by enlarging upon that propoſition in that manner, I do not envy him his talents; for my lungs would not be ſufficient, if my talents were. I truſted that I had ſufficiently demonſtrated that poſition.

Now, on the other ſide, what is the kind of anſwer that is made to this? In the firſt place, he is to prove that it was murder! Aſſerting that it was murder over and over again in the ſpeech, is the palliation, and is the defence of this! But he is to prove that it was murder! I confeſs very fairly, that this is the firſt hour in which it ever entered into my imagination, that that ſpecies of proof could be allowed to a defendant! I am not at all ſorry that it has been allowed: for the conſequence has been to refute more than half the ſpeech, and more than half the application of it; therefore I am not ſorry that it has been allowed. But I will never, ſo long as I live, accede to this as a propoſition of law, that a man ſhall be at liberty in a libel to charge you with the crime of murder, and when he is indicted for that libel (or otherwiſe brought into judgment for it by information), that it ſhould be competent for him to put you to try, whether you have been guilty of murder or no. I did ſay, what common ſenſe dictates, what the law of every civilized ſtate under heaven preſcribes (and there is not a maxim of law to be fetched from any country or age that contradicts that), that the man that calumniates, and does not accuſe, deſerves to be puniſhed with exemplary ſeverity. He told you a long ſtory of murders ſuppoſed to have been committed in St. George's Fields, where he took to himſelf the merit of having proſecuted that murder. As far as that part of the ſtory goes, I don't quarrel with him. If he, ſeeing a tranſaction which he took to be murder, thought himſelf bound to proſecute that tranſaction, honeſtly, candidly, and with humanity and fairneſs to the priſoner, as well as to the friends of the deceaſed; if he did that, I do not quarrel with him: but whoever, in the moment of proſecuting that murder, publiſhed in the news-paper (either by advertiſement or otherwiſe) matter that was likely to cauſe an impreſſion upon the minds of the people at large, or upon the minds of the jury, before they heard that proſecution tried, did a moſt abandoned and a moſt wicked thing. Is that the way that people are to be tried for their lives? Are they to be brought before a jury in a regular courſe of trial, to be heard for themſelves upon the evidence then laid before them? and is the integrity of a libeller to interpoſe, by writing down their reputation; and by endeavouring to inſtil into people, where they cannot be heard, where they have no opportunity to contradict, and where witneſſes cannot be examined either on one ſide or the other, an impreſſion that they are guilty, without the form, without the eſſence of trial? If therefore there was ſuch an advertiſement as that publiſhed, that advertiſement I hold to be a moſt wicked one. Proſecuting men that are thought to be guilty, is a fair and an honeſt action. In this caſe, what is the excuſe here? That they cannot be proſecuted. Suppoſing the accident of the diſtance from that ſide of the water and other accidents ſhould ſo far intervene as to prevent the poſſibility of trying thoſe men, even if they had been guilty of murder, would it follow as a concluſion upon that, that they ſhall be libelled? and that it ſhall be in the power of any man alive to raiſe impreſſions behind their backs, by publiſhing in the news-paper imputations to their diſadvantage, which they cannot contradict or refute? calumniating them, accuſing them of murder? The time would undoubtedly come in which they would be to be tried for it, if guilty: and to be tried for it under that ſort of impreſſion! I am amazed that any man of common ſenſe could (even in his own caſe) imagine, that it would be tolerable doctrine in the ears of people that have lived for years in a civilized country, that that was the true way of proſecuting upon the ſubject of murder! He told you a ſtory of Glenco, which, if I underſtand him right, went directly the reverſe. They were to be tried. Unleſs he means to compare the authority of the Morning or London Evening Poſt to the councils of the whole nation! if he means to make that compariſon (which he did not make, and which is too abſurd for me to do for him); making that, a degree of idle analogy would ſeem to ariſe; but without that, abſolutely none.

Now with reſpect to the reſt, he has offered by evidence alſo to eſtabliſh, that this muſt neceſſarily be a murder; and the fate of thoſe people, it ſeems, is to be tried by the effect of that evidence! And what does that evidence amount to? Why, that the king's troops, under the command of general Gage, were in an hoſtile country; and that it was impoſſible for them to go upon any ſervice (ordered by that general and conducted by his officers) without an attack: that the moment they went out of Boſton alarm guns were diſcharged, in order to raiſe the power that poſſeſſed the country on the other ſide upon them, and to make the attack upon them. And this is the medium by which it is to be proved, that the ſoldiers who were ordered by their commander to advance from their poſt at Boſton into that country, were guilty of murder; becauſe they were ſurrounded upon the 18th and 19th of April, in conſequence of thoſe alarm guns, with an armed force on the other ſide, in order to withſtand and oppoſe their operations, they being at that time in an hoſtile country! Why, if I had meant, if I had thought it conſiſtent with law or with reaſon, to enter into a diſcuſſion of that queſtion with him, whether he is a libeller or not, for having charged them with murder by a printed paper, inſtead of charging them in a more direct way; if I had thought it neceſſary to eſtabliſh the caſe againſt him in the ſtrongeſt and moſt preciſe manner, it would have been by calling juſt ſuch a witneſs as that, in order to prove that the troops were themſelves attacked; and that, upon the moment of their going out of the place, they were ſurrounded with hoſtile attack. But neceſſity, it ſeems, neceſſity, according to the notion of law, is that which ſelf defence preſcribes, that a man muſt go to the wall who is attacked. He muſt fly firſt; and if he can eſcape by flight, then he ſhall not juſtify himſelf by turning and repelling the attack! What ſort of underſtandings does he imagine the audience to be compoſed of, when he repreſents an expedition and attack of this ſort in that manner? That the king's troops, when they heard the alarm guns and were attacked, were to fly, to get to the wall, and drop their arms! This is the notion of military diſpoſition in an hoſtile country! And this is the law that the learned gentleman has learned from the State Trials, the ſource of his reading! and which he has ſet forth with a dexterity, and a ſpecies of underſtanding, and a ſort of eloquence, which is peculiar to him. And I muſt ſay now, it is more than I ever heard before. If I had the honour of a converſation with him nine years ago, I had forgot it. I did not take notice of the converſation perhaps enough to retain it. I had ſtill leſs an idea that his abilities were ſo conſpicuous. But this ſpecies of eloquence I take to be peculiar to himſelf; as it could not have been delivered by a counſel: it would have been abſolutely impoſſible by a counſel uſed to practice; it would have been impoſſible to a counſel, uſed to feel the weight of his arguments, uſed to feel the ridicule of applying ſuch kind of arguments as theſe, and deterred by that means from doing it. No counſel would have thought himſelf warranted to do this. He would not have had conceit enough to think his own underſtanding ſo ſuperior to all that heard him, as to ſuppoſe he could paſs ſuch a propoſition upon his auditory, that the conduct of an army, in an hoſtile country, was to be like the caſe of a man indicted for murder to fly to the wall, for fear they ſhould do ſome miſchief! This is the ſort of defence he has thought fit to make upon this ſubject; and it gives me a ground for ſaying, that, if I was ſhort in applying the charges of the information as I ſhould have done, it is now compleatly applied.

All that part of the defence which went perfectly wide and foreign to all practical application to the caſe, I will now entirely drop. At the ſame time I cannot do it without making this obſervation; that, whatever be the degree of veracity claimed by and due to that gentleman, in the particular words that he thinks proper to impute to the various people whoſe words he has thought fit to quote; as far as my memory goes of the tranſactions which I do remember; as far as conjecture goes with regard to thoſe I have not a perfect memory of; I believe, that this failing at leaſt belongs to his repreſentation of them: that taking, as he has done, particular paſſages, for the ſake of remembering them to the diſadvantage of the ſpeaker, he has ſtripped them of their context. He has therefore made it impoſſible to recollect the whole, in order to ſee whether they would, or not, turn out ſuch nonſenſe as he has imputed to thoſe ſeveral ſpeakers. It may be true, for aught I can tell; though if any body had aſked me, whether I ever ſpoke upon that ſubject he mentions in the houſe of commons, I ſhould have ſaid no, directly; for I believe I did not. I believe Mr. Oliver will not ſay, that he brought any ſuch idle meſſage as that to me. I ſhould have treated it with ridicule. I have no objection to converſe with Mr. Oliver upon any ſubject he thinks proper. He does me honour by it. But if he had brought me ſuch a meſſage from a perſon in Mr. Horne's ſituation, reſpecting my conduct in parliament, a little laughing at the meſſage he muſt have excuſed. But he does not ſay he brought me ſuch a meſſage. I don't know that I bore any part in that debate. But he ſays, he took down ſome words; and that I ſaid, it was a Gothic cuſtom. --If I got up to make a ſpeech upon a propoſition of law of that magnitude and extent, of ſuch a variety of reading that that propoſition was open to, and contented myſelf with ſitting down, and ſaying, it was a Gothic cuſtom; I ſhould not have had any pretenſions to the ear of that houſe. If I made any diſcourſe about it; which I ſuppoſe I did, as he ſays I did; I ſuppoſe it is as idle, as fooliſh a kind of ſpeech as it is poſſible for any man to make. I ſhould not wonder if I was refuſed all audience there in all times to come, provided my ſpeeches were juſt thoſe which I have had the---(not misfortune, for I think it very natural) as I have heard to-day. Other people have ſhared exactly the ſame fate. Is it a fair thing, with reſpect to any judge, with reſpect to any court of juſtice? Is it a fair thing to ſtate one fiftieth part of a cauſe depending before them with an obſervation which the other forty-nine parts would never have juſtified upon it? Is it the part of a good citizen, of a man that reverences the laws of his country, of a man that wiſhes any thing but anarchy to riſe in a country? Is it the part of a good citizen to treat courts of juſtice in that manner, with reſpect to caſes cited from their deciſion in the way in which thoſe were cited? I mention them only in the way of obſerving that: for, to be ſure, it was perfectly impertinent to any queſtion depending before you; and unleſs it had been equally ſo with reſpect to the caſes themſelves, I ſhould not have given you the trouble of a ſingle word upon that. There was one thing which fell, which gave me ſome little aſtoniſhment to hear, and which I remember well. I don't take notes, but I have a pretty general remembrance of things delivered by me. I take myſelf to have ſtated to you in the outſet the very ſame doctrine of intention. Why, who doubts but that the intention conſtitutes the criminality of every charge of every denomination and kind? But the extreme ridicule of the thing is, the talking of that doctrine upon an occaſion like this! See what it is. The words are, that the American ſubjects for meritorious conſiderations upon their part, and for thoſe conſiderations only, were inhumanly murdered at Lexington and Concord, in the province of Maſſachuſets Bay. Nobody can doubt in the world, but that imputing inhuman murder to the conduct of thoſe troops, is abuſe! I ſuppoſe he did not mean it as flattery, to extol them, to deliver them down to poſterity (if ſuch paragraphs as theſe had any chance of reaching down to poſterity) to deliver them down to poſterity in terms of heroiſm! He meant to abuſe them: the words themſelves are abuſe. Then, I ſay, where words of direct, unqualified, indubitable abuſe are printed concerning any man alive; that the very circumſtance of printing calumny concerning a man, carries along with it an intention to abuſe him. Why it is nonſenſe to doubt it. One may ſpin words till one loſes the meaning of a ſentence, and the firſt words that are uſed in that ſentence; but it is nonſenſe to deny when you uſe direct abuſe;---when you revile them in the very attempt to juſtify the charge;---and again uſe terms of abuſe;---that thoſe terms of abuſe don't prove intention of abuſe: primâ facie, at leaſt, they will. If a man is called a raſcal, has he any doubt whether the man that called him ſo means to abuſe him or not? Why that is playing with words in a moſt ridiculous manner. And theſe are the kind of words that are now called in queſtion; and a jury are told, that where a libeller calumniates another with the imputation of a capital crime, that calumny carries along with it a proof of his intention to calumniate. That is the dreadful propoſition which is to prove an intention to overturn all the liberties of this country! I wiſh thoſe who talk about their liberties, would be pleaſed a little to have a ſmall regard for the liberties of others. The man that robs upon the highway, while he is unapprehended, is the freeſt of all human creatures: but the men whom he attacks, whom he plunders, whom he terrifies, theſe are not free as long as they are under his dominion and power.---The man that daſhes libels about him upon every one he is pleaſed to call his enemy, is the freeſt of all agents; but thoſe that he inflicts deep injury upon, are they free? And is it talking with common ſenſe to ſay it means the liberty of doing wrong? of attacking perſonal property, reputation, or what I pleaſe, without being controuled? Is that what you call freedom? It is a definition of freedom that I never expected to hear; and which can, I am ſure, do no good to any cauſe upon the ſide of which it is advanced, before any one gentleman of common ſenſe! That I call no freedom.

With regard to the reſt, what can one argue it more? Why, yes, it ſeems one may; becauſe if you will ſcan the conſtruction of theſe words well, they will not amount to a libel.---Not amount to a libel! it ſeemed to me a very hardy propoſition when it was firſt of all ſtated, that calling a number of men murderers was not a libel. No, ſays he, It is not a libel.---Obſerve, I called it under-writ, it is writ beyond common ſenſe, inſtead of below it, which was the firſt apprehenſion I had of the thing. For, he ſays, non conſtat that there were any perſons of that deſcription! non conſtat that there were any widows, orphans, or parents! —non conſtat that were any beloved American fellow-ſubjects---and I believe more about that laſt than any thing elſe; for I do not believe that our love to our American fellow-ſubjects was that ruling principle that governed this publication.---'Who, faithful to the character of Engliſhmen,'---(that may be true, for aught I know) 'preferring death to 'ſlavery, were, for that reaſon only, inhumanly murdered by the king's 'troops.'---Non conſtat whether there were or were not any king's troops! It happens unluckily in the laſt part of the ſentence, it is aſſerted that there were: for the ſentence runs---'who, faithful to the 'character of Engliſhmen, preferring death to ſlavery, WERE, for that reaſon only, inhumanly murdered by the king's troops:' ſo that if aſſertion was neceſſary, there is an aſſertion for you. But, however, how can any body trifle ſo much with his own underſtanding, or with the underſtandings of others, as to ſuppoſe that, if it had been without an aſſertion, ſuppoſe it had beeh a queſtion,---why did the king's troops murder our American fellow-ſubjects?---why would not that convey a libel juſt as much? Is there any neceſſary forms of words that compoſe a libel? I think it fair to ſay, that that was given up. It was uſed more to ſhew the ſkill of the adverſary than to the merits of the queſtion.

But, it ſeems, that a ſoldier may commit murder: Aye, to be ſure, ſo may any other man alive. There is no queſtion at all about that; but if any man is ſuppoſed to have committed murder, he ought to be tried. If any man is charged with having committed murder (otherwiſe than in a legal courſe) he is calumniated; he is libelled: and that is all that I have to contend before you. But it is a little doubted, whether this relates to the employment of the king's troops! I muſt admit that that doubt was ſtarted a little before the explanation of one of the witneſſes came: and I ſuppoſe, if that had been in the contemplation of the learned gentleman when he ſpoke, he would not have raiſed that as a matter of doubt; becauſe, as it ſtands now, it ſeems a very plain propoſition (both upon the evidence and the reaſon of the thing) that it was ſo applied, and meant to be ſo applied. Then he informs you, that I have uſed a number of words, and he gave you a liſt of them.---I wondered to find the words that I had uſed in a written ſpeech, brought in ſo many volumes into the court to be uſed again here. But, it ſeems, this is a collection of all the words I ever uſed in my life; and he ſits down in his chamber (the place he is moſt uſed to ſit in) collecting all theſe words, and then comes here with a criticiſm upon them. Now I have not the leaſt inclination to derogate from that learned gentleman's talents as a critic: and if the food of ſuch poor language as mine will ſerve the gentleman to employ himſelf upon, he is quite at liberty to do it upon this or any other occaſion, whenever he thinks proper to employ himſelf quite ſo innocently. The words, in ſubſtance, I will maintain. I really did not believe that the gentleman who had written that paragraph, would have undertaken to defend it juſt in the way in which he has done to-day. I thought that, inſtead of quibbling upon the force of it, that he would have advanced a great deal more boldly to it than he did; at leaſt in the outſet of the ſpeech to-day: and, in the latter part of his ſpeech, he ſo far juſtified what I foretold in my own mind upon the ſubject, that, I think, he has proved to a demonſtration (if that were an eſſential part of the caſe) that his true reaſon for writing that, was to defy the laws of the country; for ſo I ſtated it. I ſtated it that there was no affectation of diſcuſſing any ſubject; that there was no pretence or colour even of reaſoning upon any ſubject; under the maſk of which many others have thought proper to cloak themſelves, when they wiſh to write malignantly. But there was not even an affectation of that; but a blunt way of bolting out ſo much calumny, without qualifying it in any way in the world, or making it appear any thing more than that which I ſtated it to be;—an attempt to defy juſtice.—Either proſecute this, or never proſecute again as long as you live, is the true language of this advertiſement.

What is the reſt of his defence? It conſiſts in abuſing me; the judge; the jury; the Crown-Office; the law as it now ſtands; the counſel that appeared for the printers who were convicted of the ſame crime before, becauſe they did not do enough and act to his mind; and the ſolicitor of the Treaſury! That is the nature of the defence made in this cauſe! I have choſen to ſeparate it from the caſe, and yet I believe I ſhall be forgiven if I ſay a few words upon the reſt of the ſubject. The learned gentleman thinks proper to ſtate to you that this is a proſecution of two years old; becauſe the offence was committed on the ninth of June 1775, and becauſe you are now trying it in July 1777. Now if he could have made any thing of the obſervation, it would have been juſt as handſome to himſelf (it is nothing to me, for I deſpiſe all thoſe things) it would have been as handſome to himſelf, if he had thought proper to ſtate the facts preciſely as they were. This information was filed in Michaelmas term 1776; and it was not my fault, but his fault, that it was not brought on to trial in the Hilary term following. But ſtill there is between the 9th of June 1775 and Michaelmas 1776, ſome time, though not two years; a year and ſomething more. Then he complains that I thought proper to file my information againſt the printers firſt, although I might have applied to thoſe printers in order to have obtained evidence againſt him. In the firſt place, I have made it a rule to myſelf not to apply to any printers, in any other way than by charging them for their delinquency, and bringing them before a jury to be tried. That is the application that I make, and always will make to the printer of a libel. In the ſecond place, if I had thought proper to apply, as he calls it, to the printer, I might have had a fictitious converſation put upon me, in order to prove that I had practiſed with them to get Mr. Horne delivered up. Now in the third place, it is a matter of perfect indifference to me whether I proſecute the printer or the author. And I will tell you why. My notion with regard to authors are, that moſt of them are generated by printers; at leaſt more authors are produced by printers than printers by authors; and if the preſs was never to go till the good ſenſe of ſome author ſet it to work, it would prevent a great deal of the groaning of the preſs upon publications and ſubjects much too frivolous to be regretted if they were loſt; and I believe authors have grown more from the preſs, than the preſs has grown from authorſhip. If I ſtop the publication of libels, I think I do an eſſential good to the country. I know if they are printed and publiſhed oſtenſibly, where to apply to ſtop them: but I never did, nor ever will ſtop them by applying to the printers. He has explained, by examining the printers themſelves, that no ſuch application was made to them. I cannot ſtate exactly upon memory the time when I commenced this proſecution. I ſuppoſe it muſt have been about the time when the others were tried. If ſo, the conſequence is, that the Michaelmas term following, in conſequence of that application, was the very firſt time that I could file an information at all. I was told when the printers were tried here, Why do not you reſort to Mr. Horne? You are afraid of Mr. Horne. To be ſure, there was ſome reaſon. If I had known that I ſhould have been obliged to hear ſo much eloquence! eſpecially to have the trouble of replying to it; it would have been a proſpect I ſhould not have liked. But, I believe, I ſhould have waded through all that proſpect, if I had been ever ſo much apprized of it before. And when Mr. Horne was diſcloſed to be the author, I certainly ſhould have proſecuted him. But before he made that diſcloſure, what I ſaid is true; that he defied the laws of his country under the ſcreen of the printers. And he has proved himſelf that he was not to be diſcloſed without a proſecution. He gave no authority to the printers to go to the ſolicitor of the Treaſury, and make a diſcloſure of him: or, if he did, they made no ſuch diſcloſure. And yet this manner of delaying the cauſe is one of the grounds upon which he has thought proper to treat me juſt in the manner in which he did. Now I would beg you a little to recollect how that part of the converſation aroſe, when the learned gentleman ſpoke without book; when he ſpoke at firſt, and had not his words ſo well meaſured as the well-timed labour of his cloſet enables him to meaſure his words upon paper: he certainly took the freedom of charging me of uſing all means, right or wrong, foul or fair, in order to get a conviction.

Well, what is the next article of his harangue? I am reproached for having boaſted of the integrity of my character, becauſe I denied the truth of a falſe and impertinent charge; becauſe it is neither true nor pertinent, that ever I had employed myſelf in the way in which I am ſo repreſented to have employed myſelf. And what is the boaſt upon that? It is a very high one; for I called upon him to name his inſtances. That was my boaſt! and innocence, when it is able to call upon its reviler to name his inſtances, does make a proud and magnificent boaſt. So far I boaſted. Well, when called upon, what are the inſtances? The firſt is, that I proſecute before a ſpecial jury. That in a proſecution which I (the ſervant of the public) think proper (for reaſons of public weight and importance) to produce, I wiſh to have men of the firſt character, of the firſt ſituation, men of the higheſt and moſt approved honour, my judges! that is the firſt article in which the opprobrium is to be juſtified of my uſing all means, foul or fair, in order to obtain a conviction! In this he has all the advantage that an accuſer can poſſibly have: I confeſs the whole charge. It is my deſire to have all my actions ſo tried; it is my deſire, and I will, whenever I can, obtain a tribunal of that ſort; which (from the great dexterity and wiſdom of eloquence) is looked upon to be the beſt topic (before them) to condemn me for reſorting to! This is another matter he would have been totally deprived of, if he had ſubmitted, as thoſe poor printers did, to be defended by counſel. They would never have thought of abuſing the attorney-general (before a ſpecial jury) only becauſe he thought proper to lay his cauſe before that jury! It is a ſingular way to take thoſe topics which go beyond the ability or practice of any counſel whatever!

Then the next attack is upon the poor maſter of the Crown-Office, ſir James Burrow. I do not believe that there exiſts in this world a man of more inflexible integrity than ſir James Burrow. I never heard him charged in my life with any thing like opprobrium. I know perfectly well that if I were to apply to ſir James Burrow, in order to get any particular manner of ſtriking a jury, either in London or Middleſex, that he would ſet himſelf, for the whole evening after, to contrive how he could beſt croſs the purpoſe of that application. I know he would. I know him very well. I am ſure he is a very honeſt man; and I am ſure I ſhould fare exceedingly ill, if I was to attempt to make any ſuch application. None ſuch is ſuggeſted. But it is ſaid, that the ſolicitor of the Treaſury deſired ſir James to take this part; to take two ſpecial jurymen out of every leaf; giving this reaſon for it, becauſe the books might be made up; and that if it was once known to be the practice of ſir James to begin in the middle, or the end, or any part, they might be made up by the addreſs of the officer, ſo as to get a particular ſet of men for a jury. I will take it as ſaid by the gentleman: the ſolicitor propoſed that there might be taken two out of every leaf, which would produce the faireſt collection of the jury in the broadeſt manner, and out of the greateſt number and variety of names and people. So far I think nothing unfair in the ſolicitor's application: and I do not know, I proteſt to God, at this very moment, what earthly reaſon ſir James Burrow could have to refuſe that, except the one which I ſtrongly ſuſpect him of, namely, that one---that it was deſired by the ſolicitor for the crown:---for if he apprehended that it would give the ſlighteſt ground for ſuſpicion by taking any one article of conduct whatever, he is very nice, I know, and very obſtinate; and I am ſure, nothing would bind him more ſurely to refuſe to take a jury in that, which appears to me to be the moſt impartial way; ſtronger and quicker than an application on the part of the ſolicitor of the Treaſury. That is not all; but the ſheriffs of London are abuſed: the jurors are named merchants, who are not ſo! Why, do I make up that book? Is that one of my crimes? The ſheriffs of London make it up. When it is returned to the Crown Office, the names are taken out of it, in the moſt impartial manner; and the whole ſtate of that, inſtead of loading me or any one concerned with the ſlighteſt calumny, is the fulleſt acquittal that could be had! It does not therefore relate to any one concerned in this proſecution. Then I am wrong in another thing; for under all bad adminiſtrations, there is nothing ſo rife as proſecutions for libels! I ſhould be glad to know in the abſtract (without referring to thoſe documents, ſo many of which the learned gentleman produced himſelf) in the eight years I have had the honour of being attorney-general, how many proſecutions for libels have been brought? I wiſh that was ſtated, in order to ſhew the monſtrous number of proſecutions for libels! They are not ſo many as I could wiſh; for if you compare the proſecutions with the daily publications, that man that looks at thoſe publications, and ſees how rife and rank the ſcandal is upon all orders and denominations of men, upon all branches of the government and the ſtate, as well as private men; whoever ſees that, muſt look at them with a very peculiar eye, if he does not ſee that the encreaſe of the ſcandal is a great deal more than the encreaſe of the proſecution for that ſcandal! and yet this is one of the topics alſo for which I have been abuſed! It is ſaid alſo that I am corrupt in another reſpect, becauſe I condeſcend to conſider myſelf as the ſervant of the whole public, and ſo liable to receive orders from every branch of the legiſlature. The arguments that one hears uſed upon theſe occaſions, they are made only for the moment. I ſhould not be aſtoniſhed if from the ſame quarter I had heard that it was one of the moſt monarchical ſentiments in the world, to inſiſt that there is any public officer who was not under the orders of either houſe of parliament. I always took it to be the aſſuming of thoſe that call themſelves Whigs (for want of a better nickname) what I hold—that in a free ſtate the repreſentatives of the people aſſembled in parliament are a ſovereign member of that ſtate; and that every public officer, great or ſmall, is amenable to them. But how amenable to them? I wiſh that had been a little more ſtated. Amenable to them to do wrong? No man ought to be amenable to the greateſt and the proudeſt body of men whatever to do wrong. I have not been ſo amenable: for in thoſe inſtances in which I have thought it would be wrong to proſecute, I have ſtated it to the houſe; and the houſe has forborne the proſecution upon my repreſentation. That has been the conduct which I have held upon the occaſion; and a conduct which, if I am queſtioned for it (in any place where it would be pertinent), I ſhould be very glad to render an account of that conduct. But, ſays the gentleman (with a ſtrain peculiar to himſelf), will you ſubmit to be ſworn in order to be examined by me?—To what? Yes, ſir; to any one fact which can be alledged in your defence, I will ſubmit to be ſworn to the truth of it. But will you ſubmit to be ſworn in order to undergo impertinent queſtions about the motives and ſteps of your conduct from time to time, ſuch as I ſhall think proper to put to you?

Gentlemen, I put myſelf upon your good ſenſe! I put myſelf (for the queſtion was not meant for you) I put myſelf upon the candour and the good ſenſe of the audience, that I was impertinently treated in the propoſal; and that I ſhould have been ridiculous to have ſubmitted to that propoſal! I ſpoke to ſome perſons about it (whoſe authority I am not permitted to cite to you) who concurred in opinion with me: but I am ſure, and I put it to the mind of every gentleman, whether I did not act right in that matter. To have refuſed him juſtice would have been a hard and improper meaſure; I did not refuſe that. To refuſe to anſwer impertinent queſtions, I did refuſe it; and I appeal to the candour and good ſenſe of this audience that I did right to refuſe it; and it would have been ridiculous to have done otherwiſe.

Theſe are the topics which, as far as I can recollect, have been produced againſt me. With regard to the reſt, the gentleman informs you, that the law as it ſtands is full of a great variety of hardſhips. I don't know that ſyſtem of law under heaven which may not be perverted to purpoſes of hardſhip. I don't know any thing ſo perfectly ridiculous as to argue from the poſſibility of the corruption of a good thing to its worthleſſneſs. In order to make any thing of that, he ſhould have gone the length not only of ſtating what might have been done, but what was done; otherwiſe you may ſit and hear that glorious conſtitution (which I have known ſo many able and eloquent writers and ſpeakers extol in the higheſt terms to the ſkies) you may ſit and hear it reviled from one end to the other: not for the miſchief that it actually does; not for the inequality in point of juſtice that it actually adminiſters; but which it might! But let him prove that there is any thing in my conduct of this proſecution that deſerves thoſe epithets with which he charged it, and I muſt ſubmit to be covered with them. But that will not make an iota of difference in your verdict. What does it ſignify to you (who ſit to conſider whether this be a true or a falſe charge) that it comes at this time or at any other? The gentleman taxes me with folly in ſaying, that if it were a crime in 1775, it muſt be ſo in 1777! I ſhould hold it to be the utmoſt folly to ſay otherwiſe. If there were any improper practices with regard to the proſecution, it might be a reaſon of objection to thoſe who proſecute; but with regard to the mere queſtion to be put to the jury ---is he guilty in manner and form?---it is abſolutely nothing; it would be folly to aſſert it.

I have now ſtated to you the progreſs of this buſineſs, referring to his own witneſſes for the truth of that progreſs; and I truſt, that upon that repreſentation, I ſhall not be found to have miſconducted myſelf even in the courſe of this proſecution. I have gone very much out of my way, and very contrary to the turn of my temper, when I have embarked ſo far in a defence of myſelf at all; but when facts are ſtated, I thought it neceſſary to re-ſtate and explain theſe facts. Beyond that, let general and looſe reflections take what place they pleaſe. I put myſelf upon my public conduct for my juſtification, without boaſting of that conduct either one way or the other. If I am wrong in that conduct, let it condemn me: if I am right in that conduct, let it approve me. It is upon that only that I deſire to reſt it; without boaſting or without diſclaiming, either on one ſide or the other. I will ſay no more upon that ſubject, but refer it to you to determine what ought to be done upon a charge thus ſtated, and thus induſtriouſly proved upon the part of the defendant, if any proof had been wanting to ſupport it upon the part of the proſecutor.

Lord Mansfield. Gentlemen of the jury, if ever there was a queſtion, the true merits of which lay in a very narrow compaſs, it is the preſent. This is an information againſt the defendant for writing and compoſing, and printing and publiſhing, or cauſing to be printed and publiſhed, that is, for being the author and publiſher of a paper, which the information charges as a ſeditious libel. If it be a ſeditious libel in its own nature, there is no juſtification attempted: why then there are but two points for you to ſatisfy yourſelves in, in order to the forming of your verdict.

Did he compoſe and publiſh; that is, was he the author and publiſher of it? Upon this occaſion, that is entirely out of the caſe; for it is admitted. As to the excuſe of ignorance, or being impoſed upon (which is a topic in the caſe of printers and others) it is out of this caſe, becauſe it is avowed to be done deliberately; and it is now avowed, and the contents of it. Why then there remains nothing more but that which reading the paper muſt enable you to form a judgment upon, ſuperior to all the arguments in the world; and that is,

Is the ſenſe of this paper that arraignment of the government, and the employment of the troops, upon the occaſion of Lexington, mentioned in that paper? Read! You will form the concluſion yourſelves. What is it? Why it is this: that our beloved American fellow-ſubjects ---(therefore innocent men)---in rebellion againſt the ſtate——They are our fellow-ſubjects; but not ſo abſolutely beloved without exception! Beloved to many purpoſes: beloved to be reclaimed: beloved to be forgiven: beloved to have good done to them: but not beloved be ſo as to be abetted in their rebellion!---and therefore that certainly conveys an idea that they are innocent.---But farther it ſays, that they were inhumanly murdered at Lexington by the king's troops, merely on account of their acting like Engliſhmen, and preferring liberty to ſlavery! The information charges the libel to relate to the king's government and the employment of his troops. Read it, and ſee whether it does relate to them. If it does, what is the employment they are ordered upon? what is the employment that they execute? To murder, the paper ſays, innocent ſubjects; becauſe they act like Engliſhmen, and prefer liberty to ſlavery! Why then, what are they who gave the orders? what are they who execute them? Draw the concluſion. It don't ſtand upon argument. If any man dares to give orders to murder a ſubject, or to execute thoſe orders, or to make any ſubject a ſlave, he is as high a criminal as can exiſt in this ſtate. Evidence has been examined, and though (unuſual) I was very deſirous every thing offered ſhould be heard; and you have had Mr. Gould examined: and whatever doubt there might be with regard to the occaſion of hoſtilities at Lexington; whatever weight the obſervations might have before; yet now, upon his evidence, you ſee how it ſtands! The unhappy reſiſtance to the legiſlative authority of this kingdom by many of our fellow-ſubjects in America, is too calamitous an event not to be impreſſed upon all your minds; all the ſteps leading to it are of the moſt univerſal notoriety. The legiſlature of this kingdom have avowed that the Americans rebelled, becauſe they wanted to ſhake off the ſovereignty of this kingdom; they profeſs only to bring them back to be ſubjects, and to quell rebellion: troops are employed, money is expended upon this ground; that the caſe is here, between a juſt government and rebellious ſubjects; for a juſt and a good purpoſe, for the benefit of the whole. If I don't miſtake, the firſt hoſtilities that are committed---(though many ſteps on both ſides leading to them exiſted before)---but, if I do not miſtake, the firſt hoſtilities are thoſe committed upon the 19th of April, 1775. If ſome ſoldiers, without authority, had got in a drunken fray, and murder had enſued, and that this paper could relate to that, it would be quite a different thing from the charge in the information; becauſe it is charged as a ſeditious libel, tending to diſquiet the minds of the people. Now what evidence has Mr. Gould given? Why, he ſays, that he was ſent with a part of the king's troops, by the orders of general Gage, the governor of the province, the commander of the king's troops; that when they began their march (which was about two or three in the morning) he heard (I think he ſays he heard) a continual firing of alarm cannon, which is a ſignal, at certain diſtances, uſed in America to raiſe the country; and that they heard as ſoon as they began their march; and from thence they concluded that the provincials were marching to attack them. When they came within ſight of them, they found them armed, in bodies of troops armed. This was not a ſtated time of peace when the king's troops, under the authority of the governor, go from one part to another; to have bodies of men, in military array, armed, and ſignals fired! but this they found. And he ſays, he cannot tell himſelf; but to a queſtion aſked him, he ſays, he heard the provincials charged our troops. He ſays in his affidavit, which he has likewiſe ſworn to, and which you may compare, that he ſaw, on their arrival, he ſaw a body of provincial troops armed, to the number of about 60 or 70 men: 'on our arrival they diſperſed, and ſoon after firing 'began; but which party fired firſt I cannot exactly ſay.' And then, towards the latter part of the affidavit, he ſays, 'the provincial troops 'returned, to the number of about three or four hundred. We drew up on 'the Concord ſide of the bridge. The provincials came down upon us; 'upon which we engaged, and gave them the firſt fire.' And ſays he, 'this was the firſt engagement after the one at Lexington. A continued 'firing from both parties laſted the whole day. I myſelf was wounded 'at the attack of the bridge, and am now treated with great humanity as 'a priſoner.' Now from this account you ſee, that they had erected in effect their ſtandards; each had their troops in battle array; they were ready to fight. Who (from this evidence) fired firſt, he cannot tell; that is, originally the firſt. He heard that the provincials charged; but whether the one or the other fired firſt, he cannot tell; when the two bodies were in the field, each expecting the other to attack.---This is the account given by the defendant's witneſs: that it was the king's troops, by order of the commander and the government, that were engaged in this fray, in which thoſe lives were loſt! Then if there is nothing particular, but it is a conſequence of the general diſpute, of the cauſe of this moſt lamentable and unhappy war, no good man but muſt lament it, and wiſh them reclaimed. If it is barely the conſequence of that which has led to further hoſtilities ſince, you will read this paper, and judge for yourſelves. You will judge whether it conveys a harmleſs, innocent propoſition for the good and welfare of this kingdom, the ſupport of the legiſlative government, and the king's authority according to law; or whether it is not denying the government and legiſlative authority of England, and juſtifying the Americans; averring that they are totally innocent; that they only deſire not to be ſlaves; not diſputing to be ſubjects, but they deſire only not to be ſlaves; and that the uſe that is made of the king's troops upon this occaſion (for you will carry your mind back to the time when this paper was wrote) was to reduce them to ſlavery. And if it was intended to convey that meaning, there can be little doubt whether that is an arraignment of the government and of the troops employed by them or not. But that is a matter for your judgment. You will judge of the meaning of it; you will judge of the ſubject to which it is applied, and connect them together; and if it is a criminal arraignment of theſe troops, acting under the orders of the officers employed by the government of this country, to charge them with murdering innocent ſubjects, becauſe they would not be ſlaves, you will find your verdict one way: but if you are of opinion that the conteſt is to reduce innocent ſubjects to ſlavery; and that they were all murdered (like the caſes of undoubted murders, of Glenco, and twenty other maſſacres that might be named) why then you may form a different concluſion, with regard to the meaning and application of this paper.

Without giving you any reaſon, you will eaſily gueſs why I paſs over a great deal that has been ſaid; that ought not to have been ſaid; but there is one thing that is relative to the ſubject, and therefore it ought to be ſaid: that was, a doubt (upon one of the former trials upon the printers) that occurred to the jury, in which they had a difference of opinion; and they agreed to come in and leave it to my deciſion. I had told them (as I told you) that one of the points to guide your verdict was, whether you underſtood the meaning of the writing to be as charged by the information. One of them underſtood, or doubted, whether (this was in the caſe, you ſee, of a printer of a third perſon) whether actual proof of a ſeditious intention (diſtinct from the inference from the act itſelf) was neceſſary to be proved. The other thought that a ſeditious intent was by law to be inferred from the ſeditious act; and they came in and propoſed their doubts. And I told them what I tell you (and what I believe never was doubted, and what was not queſtioned upon that occaſion, though I deſired they would move the court upon it, if they had any doubt) that it is not neceſſary to prove an actual intent, which is the private operation of a man's mind; but a jury were to exerciſe their judgment from the nature of the act, as to the intent with which it is done. As, if a man writes and publiſhes a ſeditious libel, a libel that has a ſeditious tendency, that is a ground to a jury from whence to infer---(when it is without any juſtification, without any excuſe)---that is a ground from whence to infer a ſeditious intent. Juſt as if a man murders another without any juſtification of that act, it is a ſufficient ground for the jury to infer that he did it maliciouſly. That anſwer was given to the jury.

Gentlemen, here I conclude every thing I ſhall trouble you with, by way of charge, becauſe you will exerciſe your judgment, as I have ſaid before, upon the paper and the information, by reading them, which you may have to carry out with you. But merely for the ſake of the audience, as ſomething has been ſo much mentioned in the cauſe (for I don't give you any reaſon for taking no notice of any thing out of it) I think proper to ſtate it in ſo particular a manner, that when you come to ſee it miſrepreſented, you may all of you remember what it is, and what it was, and upon what ground it paſſed; and that is, with regard to the attorney-general's reply. You ſee, as the caſe is, it is entirely out of this cauſe: for the defendant has called witneſſes; and I thought it right that he ſhould know it early, that he might not abſtain from calling witneſſes to avoid the reply, and in that manner be ſurprized. Now I will tell you what I take to be the practice with regard to that matter. The nature of a reply is the plaintiff's anſwer to new matter advanced by the defendant. The plaintiff knows his own caſe; he knows his own witneſſes; he opens it; he obſerves upon his witneſſes; and he draws ſuch concluſions from them as he thinks proper, to perſuade a jury to encreaſe the damages. The defendant, if he only makes obſervations upon the ſame evidence, and only draws concluſions from the ſame evidence to the jury, to leſſen the damages; why there, there is nothing new, there is no new matter at all: and by the practice, for the expedition of buſineſs in civil cauſes, and in proſecutions in the name of the king, with common informers, the practice is, that they don't reply where that is the caſe. But, notwithſtanding that, if the defendant was to ſtart a point of law, the other muſt be heard. If he was to throw out to the jury, to catch and to ſurprize them, allegations of fact which he called no witneſſes to prove---you recollect how many millions of facts you have had urged to-day, for which no witneſſes were called---(how many extrinſic to the cauſe)---there the counſel for the plaintiff may ſet the jury right, and lay them out of the cauſe, and ſhew that they are abſolutely irrelevant and immaterial. But, in ſolemn trials, in ſtate proſecutions, where the attorney-general attends, I never knew it denied but that he had a right to reply. I was many years ſolicitor-general: I was attorney-general: I have known it often, where nothing has been ſaid for the defendant that they thought called for a reply. I never knew it denied to the attorney-general, where he inſiſted upon being heard in reply: and I believe the preſent attorney-general has replied ſeveral times. This is ſo much the law of the land, that (if my memory does not fail me) in the moſt ſolemn caſes (and as I ſpeak from memory only, if there ſhould be any ſlip in it, I hope I ſhall be excuſed) and, to the beſt of my memory, in the trial of my lord Byron (if any gentleman can correct me, I ſhall be very glad to be corrected---I dare ſay there are ſome here that were of counſel in that cauſe) in the trial of lord Byron, who called no witneſſes, no evidence, the attorney-general replied. The houſe of commons, as the public proſecutor for the nation, inſiſt upon it as an abſolute right, that they are to reply. It is a great while ago; but, if my memory does not fail me, I think I replied for the houſe of commons upon the trial of lord Lovat, though he called no evidence. I ſpeak from memory, it is many years back; and therefore, if I am miſtaken, I do it with that reſerve and qualification to be ſet right.---This has nothing at all to do with the cauſe; but it at leaſt explains, to thoſe who want to underſtand it, the light in which I ſee that matter, and the ground upon which I determined it.

[The jury withdrew about five o'clock, and returned into court about half an hour after ſix; and gave in their verdict, that the defendant was Guilty.]

Further Proceedings in the Court of King's-Bench at Weſtminſter (a).

Wedneſday, November 19, 1777.

(The attorney-general moved for judgment againſt Mr. Horne.)

Lord Mansfield. Is the defendant here?

Mr. Daniel, the defendant's attorney, anſwered, that he was.

(The information was read by order of the court.)

Mr. HORNE.

MY lords, with great ſubmiſſion and reſpect to your lordſhips, and in full confidence and ſecurity of protection by the laws of my country, I preſume to offer to your lordſhips that I am not, upon this information, a proper object for the judgment of this court. And, my lords, I cannot mention what I have to ſay in arreſt of the judgment which Mr. Attorney-General has prayed againſt me, without firſt acknowledging the obligations which I have, and the thanks which I owe, to my proſecutor and to my judge: for, my lords, it is to them, and to the arguments which they uſed in order to obtain a verdict from the jury, it is to them that I am indebted for that argument which muſt prevent the judgment. At the ſame time, my lords, it is but juſtice in me to declare, that whatever ill-founded doubts might, at the beginning of the trial, have harboured in my mind concerning any perſonal enmity, hoſtility, or prejudice towards me, before the cloſe of the trial they were all entirely effaced: for enmity, my lords, is not a ſupine and careleſs, but an active and curious principle, prompting men to neglect nothing which may tend to produce the deſired miſchief. And your lordſhips, I am perſuaded, will ſee reaſon to believe with me, that, ſo far from any uncommon diligence having been uſed againſt me, neither my proſecutor, nor my judge, nor my jury had ever ſo much as once caſt an eye over the information brought againſt me; for your lordſhips will inſtantly perceive, by looking at the record, that I am not therein charged with any crime.

My lords, when firſt I ſaw the charge in the information, I thought of it the ſame which I now offer to your lordſhips; and therefore, fearing nothing but the inattention of the jury, the greater part of my defence conſiſted of motives preſſed upon the jury for their attention: and when I hoped I had ſecured that point (the only favour, as I then declared to them, which I had to requeſt) I then proceeded to ſhew that there was not any crime in that which was alledged againſt me; keeping my eyes always fixed upon that with which alone I had to do, namely, the charge in the information; and I deſired the jury to take the information out of court with them.

But, my lords, when I heard the reply of Mr. Attorney-General, and the addreſs of the judge to the jury, I was no longer at a loſs to underſtand how it happened that I could not ſee in the charge againſt me that criminal matter which they imagined it to contain: for, my lords, I then heard, for the firſt time, that there was an inſurrection or rebellion in the colony of Maſſachuſett's-Bay; that certain perſons—and thoſe perſons denominated king's troops—were employed by his Majeſty and by the government for the purpoſe of quelling that inſurrection or rebellion; that in this their employment and ſervice an engagement enſued between the ſaid rebels or inſurgents and the ſaid king's troops ſo employed; that in this engagement certain of the ſaid inſurgents or rebels were ſlain by the ſaid king's troops; and that my advertiſement and the charge of murder, ſaid to be contained in it, related to the ſaid inſurgents or rebels ſo ſlain by the ſaid king's troops ſo employed.

And, my lords, the judge did very fairly, and very plainly and preciſely, and in expreſs words ſhew to the jury, that on theſe circumſtances did depend the whole criminality of the charge againſt me.

Now, my lords, though the jury did, through want of attention, forget to conſider that theſe circumſtances were neither proved nor charged; your lordſhips, I am ſure, who are to look to nothing but to the record itſelf; your lordſhips, I am ſure, will not fail to conſider, that no indictment or information can be cured or made good by any implication, argument, ſuppoſed notoriety, or intendment whatever. Nothing can be aſſumed or intended againſt me, but what is expreſſed in the record itſelf. If therefore in the whole range of poſſible occurrences there can any one be imagined in which it would not be criminal to ſay that the king's troops (no technical term, my lords, troupeaux,—flocks—companies—even deſerters may be comprehended under that term)—if therefore any one poſſible occurrence can be imagined (and I ſuppoſe there are a great many, the judge who tried me helped me to ſome, above twenty)—if any one can be imagined, in which it would not be criminal to ſay that the king's troops have committed murder, then your lordſhips cannot, upon this information, proceed to judgment; becauſe the information wants thoſe neceſſary averments, which cannot by any means be intended. For your lordſhips will find, by looking at the record, that in each of the various counts which this information contains, it is ſimply averred, that I did write and print and publiſh, and cauſe and procure to be written and printed and publiſhed, to the tenor and effect following.

Your lordſhips will therefore be pleaſed to examine the record; and I have not the ſmalleſt doubt that your lordſhips will do me that juſtice which my jury, through want of attention, did not.

Mr. Attorney-General. My lord, if I underſtand the effect of this motion, it is, that the matter of the information, as charged, does not ſtate a crime. That indeed is the neceſſary form of the objection to be made in this ſtage of the buſineſs; for, in this ſtage of the buſineſs, every thing is to be taken to be ſolemnly true which that information has ſtated as eſſential to the conſtitution of the crime, and which the jury conſequently have found. Now, my lord, it is ſaid that nothing is to be aſſumed but what appears upon the record; and that the information wants ſome averments. I was very attentive to collect, if I poſſibly could, what ſpecies of averment it was that the information was ſuppoſed to want. But I miſſed it, if it has been ſtated on the part of the defendant. What kind of averment inſerted in this information would have ſupplied it, and have made it a perfect deſcription of the crime? I ſhall take up the information itſelf to ſhew, in the courſe of the argument, that there is enough ſtated in it to make the crime. The information does not end, as is ſuppoſed on the part of the defendant, merely in theſe words,---that he had 'written and publiſhed, and cauſed and procured to be written 'and publiſhed, according to the tenor and effect following.' The information ſtates expreſly that he had---'written and publiſhed a certain 'falſe, wicked, malicious, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libel of and concerning his majeſty's government and the employment of his troops, according to 'the tenor and effect following.' So that the matter found by the jury, and upon which your lordſhip is either to pronounce judgment, or to ſay that, ſtated ſo upon the record, it amounts to no crime in eſtimation of law, is, that he did write that falſe, wicked, malicious, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libel of and concerning the king's government and the employment of his troops.

I own I expected that he would have gone farther, and that he would have endeavoured to prove that ſuch words as are included under the tenor and effect following, delivered in writing to be printed and publiſhed concerning the king's government and concerning the employment of his troops were, in themſelves, ſo manifeſtly innocent, that it was neceſſary for a court of juſtice, upon this record, to ſay that, notwithſtanding the jury has found a libel publiſhed according to the tenor and effect following, yet there is, in truth, no LIBEL.

Your lordſhip will obſerve what it is that he had ſaid concerning the king's government, and concerning the employment of his troops;---that 'our beloved American fellow-ſubjects, faithful to the character of 'Engliſhmen, preferring death to ſlavery, were, for that reaſon only, in- 'humanly murdered by the king's troops, at or near Lexington and Con- 'cord in the province of Maſſachuſett's-Bay, in New England, on the 19th 'of laſt April.' This therefore is what he has ſaid concerning the government and concerning the employment of the troops;---that they were to commit murder upon the king's ſubjects, only becauſe they were, ſomething better than innocent,---meritorious, in being faithful to the character of Engliſhmen, and in preferring death to ſlavery. If it be poſſible to ſtate that theſe words (uttered and applied in the manner in which this record applies them, to the public government of the country, and the employment of the troops) are innocent words, then the argument might have taken ſome foundation. But to ſay that there is any want of averment in this---till I hear what averment could have made this charge more plain, more diſtinct, as a charge of murder upon the king's ſubjects, againſt the employment of the troops, againſt a national exertion of public force; it cannot, in my mind, by words be made more ſtrict and plain than it now ſtands upon the record.

The effect of theſe words I induſtriouſly avoid to ſpeak of now: the degree of favour that belongs to them will be the ſubject of farther diſcuſſion: the only queſtion that is at preſent before the court, is ſimply this;---whether the libel, as ſtated in the record, does or does not contain ſufficient matter of ſlander.

(REPLY.)

Mr. Horne. I ſhould be very happy, my lords, at all times to pay to Mr. Attorney-General all thoſe compliments which are perſonally and officially due to him; and I would rather have riſqued the chance of expoſing myſelf, than not to pay to him the compliment of a reply; if indeed I could have found in his anſwer any thing to which even the appearance of a reply could be given. However, I will do for him what I can.

Mr. Attorney-General has ſaid, that he could not diſcover from any thing which I had advanced, what omitted averments were ſuggeſted by me to be neceſſary to the information. My lords, though Mr. Attorney-General may have miſſed them, your lordſhips, I am ſure, did hear me very plainly and diſtinctly: and though I did not formally ſay, ſuch and ſuch averments are neceſſary to the information; yet when I told your lordſhips, that in the reply of the attorney-general, and in the addreſs of the judge to the jury, I then heard, for the firſt time, that there was a rebellion in Maſſachuſett's-Bay, and that certain perſons were employed to quell that rebellion; your lordſhips, I am ſure, and the whole court very well underſtood that thoſe were the averments which were neceſſary to the information. And, my lords, it was not out of any ſatirical inclination that I imputed the omiſſion of thoſe averments to careleſſneſs; I had other reaſons. For, indeed, I know very well (and upon reflection I dare ſay your lordſhips will know very well) why thoſe averments were omitted. My lords, the truth is, that Mr. Attorney-General found himſelf between Scylla and Charybdis. If he inſerted theſe averments, he ſplit on one ſide, on the proof. My lords, the advantages are very numerous and great which I ſhould have derived from thoſe averments. The information would have been deſtroyed, for want of proving what was averred; therefore he did not chuſe to aver them. By the nature of his anſwer to me, I am perſuaded he was aware of it: and, from certain intelligence, I know that there was a conſultation on the drawing up of the information againſt me. It was propoſed to alter the information; but having obtained verdicts upon the other informations, it was, upon conſultation, agreed by the learned gentlemen, the king's counſel, that the information againſt me ſhould be literally the ſame. I know it from certain information, which I obtained without the leaſt treachery in my informants; for the gentlemen who cauſed me to know it, had not, in what they ſaid, the leaſt notion that they were telling me any thing.

(a) "Further Proceedings on the Trial of John Horne, Eſq. upon an Information "filed ex officio, by his Majeſty's Attorney-General, for a Libel, in the Court of King's-"Bench, on Wedneſday the 19*th and* Monday the 24*th of* November." Publiſhed by the defendant, from Mr. Gurney's ſhort-hand notes.

My lords, before I heard Mr. Attorney-General's anſwer, I was a little apprehenſive that I might meet with ſome difficulties. I was ſure I ran no hazard in the principle of my objection. I thought, indeed, that I might perhaps be puzzled in the application of it, by caſes of law, or by precedents that I had never before heard of. Now, my lords, tho' Mr. Attorney-General has not favoured me with any, and though I cannot myſelf give you an adjudged caſe; yet your lordſhips will forgive me, unuſed to theſe matters, if I read to you the opinion of a learned judge in a matter exactly ſimilar to this. It is in the caſe of lord Ruſſell. The opinion I mean is that of Mr. Juſtice Atkins. His words are remarkably fortunate for me; and it being that kind of law obvious to perſons who pretend to underſtand no more than what common ſenſe will direct them to, I did happen to have read that book long ago. I beg leave to read ſome little of it, becauſe it literally applies. He takes notice of that part of the indictment where it is averred againſt lord Ruſſell, that he was at a conſultation for the purpoſe of ſeizing the king's guards. He ſays, ‘guards’ [there is no difference between guards and troops,---except indeed that troops is a much wider word than guards.---Troops! we ſay a troop of ſtrolling players.]

‘The guards---What guards? What, or whom does the law underſtand or allow to be the king's guards, for the preſervation of his ‘perſon? Whom ſhall the court that tried this noble lord, whom ſhall the ‘judges or the law that were then preſent, and upon their oaths, whom ‘ſhall they judge or legally underſtand by theſe guards? They never ‘read of them in all their law-books. There is not any ſtatute law ‘that makes the leaſt mention of any guards. The law of England takes ‘no notice of any ſuch guards; and therefore the indictment is uncertain ‘and void.'---He ſays, ‘the love of his ſubjects is next under God, the ‘beſt guard of kings.' He ſays,---‘The very judges that tried this noble ‘lord were the king's guards, and the kingdom's guards, and this lord ‘Ruſſell's guard againſt all erroneous and imperfect indictments, from ‘all falſe evidence and proof'---(What immediately follows does not, indeed, apply in my caſe)---‘from all ſtrains of wit and oratory'---(there has been none here, my lords)---‘miſapplied and abuſed by counſel. It had been fit for the court that tried this noble lord on this indictment, to have ſatisfied themſelves from the king's counſel, what was ‘meant by theſe guards.---But admit the ſeizing and deſtroying of thoſe ‘who are now called the king's life-guard, had been the guard intended ‘within this overt fait,' or OPEN DEED, (theſe, my lords, are the averments which are ſimilar to thoſe that I propoſe---theſe are the averments which Mr. Attorney-General enquired after) ‘yet (he ſays) ‘the indictment ſhould have ſet forth, that de facto the king had choſen ‘a certain number of men to attend upon and guard his perſon, and ſet ‘forth where they did attend, as at Whitehall, or the Meuſe, or the Savoy, &c. and that theſe were the guards intended by the indictment to ‘be ſeized and deſtroyed; that by this ſetting forth, the court might ‘have taken notice judicially, what and who were meant: but to ſeize ‘and deſtroy the king's guards, and not ſhew who and what is meant, ‘makes the indictment very inſufficient.'

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General (I beg the court's pardon, I ſhall take up very little of their time) the attorney-general ſays, he expected I ſhould have ſaid that the matter contained in the information is no libel.---I ſhould perhaps have ſaid ſo, if libel had been ſuch a technical term that I could have known what it meant: and if it was ſuch a definite and technical term, then perhaps my objection would not have all that weight with you which I now believe it will.---The ſending of a wooden gun was adjudged by this court to be a libel. There are many other things that might be adjudged libels. It is impoſſible for me to ſay what libel means. It is not a technical term; and perhaps if it had been, the attorney-general would not have had quite ſo much difficulty to make this information good: but not being a technical term, it makes thoſe other averments the more neceſſary.

Mr. Attorney-General has then tried to help the deficiency of the averments in the information by, of and concerning—‘of and concerning ‘his majeſty's government and the employment of his troops.'—I believe there is no crime comprehended in of and concerning; for it may be of and concerning good, as well as bad. The word concerning means, looking at together; and that is the only, and the ſingle meaning of the word concerning.

Now, my lords, if Mr. Attorney-General ſhould ſucceed in this his prayer, he will be a very fortunate, though not a very reaſonable gentleman.

My lords, a proof of all thoſe matters which ſhould have been averred (which I am founded in ſaying by the opinion of the judge, who preſſed them upon the jury as motives for their verdict, and which I firmly believe he would not have done, if he had not believed that they were contained in the information) a proof, my lords, of all thoſe circumſtances was ſupplied for the attorney-general by the judge on the trial; for he produced no evidence of them himſelf: and he will be very fortunate, indeed, if he can now prevail upon the court to ſupply likewiſe the deficiencies in the information.

Lord Mansfield. Whatever the degree of guilt may be, how ſtrongly ſoever it may have been proved, or whatever obſervations may have ariſen in this caſe; yet if the defendant has a legal advantage from a LITERAL FLAW, God forbid that he ſhould not have the benefit of it. It is moſt certain, that at the trial the information was conſidered to be words ſpoke of and concerning the king's government and HIS employment of his troops; that is, the employment of the troops by government. Upon that ground the defendant called a witneſs, Mr. Gould. The attorney-general roſe to object to him; but it was very clear that he was a proper witneſs; and he acquieſced immediately, becauſe it was extremely material to ſhew what the ſubject-matter was to which the libel related—if it was the employment of the troops under proper authority that came within the charge in the information.—Had it been a lawleſs fray (which I believe I ſaid at the trial), had it been a lawleſs fray, it would not. Though the ſaying ſo might have been a libel of the individual's, yet it would not have been this libel: it would not have been this libel of the king's troops employed by him. Now at firſt, and at preſent, it ſeems to me, that ‘of and concerning the king's government and the employment of his troops,' pins it down. But I doubt a little upon it. There is ſome weight in the objection, whether in the form of drawing there ſhould not have been inuendos. In common reaſon and underſtanding, it is charged; but whether technically charged or not, I do not know; and therefore as to this point, without prejudice we will take ſome time to conſider of it; to ſee whether precedents can be found which require this technical ſcrupuloſity over and above that certainty which is ſufficient to every reader: and we will go on with the reſt, de bene eſſe, as we could not pronounce judgment upon it now, and will conſider of it till he comes up again, if we find ſufficient to ſatisfy us to over-rule the objection.

[Lord Mansfield then read his notes of the evidence given upon the trial as follows.]

Lord Mansfield. This is an information filed by the attorney-general againſt John Horne; and it was for publiſhing the advertiſements that have been read from the information.

Thomas Wilſon proved the advertiſements in queſtion, the manuſcripts, to be the hand of Horne; and Henry Sampſon Woodfall, he publiſhed the advertiſements. He ſwears that the defendant gave him a paper the 7th of June, to publiſh in his own and ſend to the other papers; and that the defendant paid the fees. Then he produced two advertiſements to publiſh. The defendant croſs-examined him, and he aſſented to the queſtion of the croſs-examination, by ſaying, "By your deſire I inſerted theſe advertiſements, and publiſhed them as your act and deed. You never deſired to be ſcreened; but you deſired to be given up. You ſaid, they ſhould not want full evidence." William Woodfall proved likewiſe a paper given him by the defendant to be inſerted in The London Packet and Morning Chronicle; which were the advertiſements in the record. Therefore, upon the fact of printing and publiſhing there is no doubt at all.

The defendant called a witneſs to prove, that really and in truth there was a ſubſcription, and that the money was actually raiſed; and he likewiſe called William Lacey, who proved that 100*l.* was paid to him, and by him remitted to Dr. Franklin: that was 100*l.* and no more. And then the defendant called Thoroton Gould. And he ſaid, that at Lexington, on the 19th of April 1775, he was a ſubaltern officer. He was ordered there by the adjutant of general Gage, the commander in chief of his majeſty's troops, and governor of the province: and he, together with the other troops, ſet out; and between two and three in the morning he was taken priſoner: that he heard the provincials charged our troops.—"We found them armed. We ſuppoſed they were marching to attack us, from a continual firing of alarm cannon, early in the morning, as ſoon as we began to march. Notice or alarm guns are to raiſe the country." Upon this evidence the jury found him guilty.

Lord Mansfield. Mr. Attorney-General, have you any thing to ſay?

Mr. Attorney-General. Mr. Horne, I ſuppoſe, will ſay what he can in extenuation.

Lord Mansfield. Mr. Attorney-General, have you any thing to ſay?

Mr. Attorney-General. It belongs to the defendant, I apprehend, to ſtate what he can to the court in his extenuation.

Mr. Horne. I ſhall ſtate nothing in extenuation till your lordſhip's deciſion has told me that there was a crime. I do not know where the crime lies at preſent. My objection goes, that there is no crime in the information. It is impoſſible for me to extenuate that which I do not acknowledge.

Lord Mansfield. Have you no affidavits of circumſtances, or any thing?

Mr. Horne. None in the world.

Lord Mansfield. Let him be committed.

Mr. Horne. Will your lordſhip commit me before it appears whether I am even accuſed of any crime?

Lord Mansfield. No, then you may come up on Monday.—You came voluntarily now?

Mr. Horne. I did.

Lord Mansfield. Then come up voluntarily again.—If you ſhould find any precedents on either ſide, I wiſh you would give them to us.

[This recommendation to bring precedents was repeated to the attorney-general and to the defendant, two or three times.

To which Mr. Horne replied, that he was not himſelf very likely to produce precedents.]

King's-Bench, Monday, Nov. 24, 1777.

LORD MANSFIELD.

IN reading my notes the other day in the caſe of The King and Horne, I overlooked the reference to a written piece of evidence that was given by him at the trial, and I am told I did not ſtate it; and therefore I will ſtate it now.

He produced to captain Gould the Public Advertiſer of the 31ſt of May 1775, which purported to be the copy of an affidavit made by captain Gould, while he was a priſoner in the cuſtody of the rebels at Medford, and printed in that paper: and he aſked him whether the contents were truly printed. I told him, that if he meant to prove the facts to be true as above, it could not be proved by affidavit, the man being preſent; and even if he was abſent, they could not be proved by affidavit: but that if he meant to ſhew that, at that time, there exiſted a public account of it in the paper; that might be of uſe to reſtrain or qualify the meaning of the paper that was in queſtion by the information. He ſaid, he deſired it to be read in that light; and in that light it was read, and is as follows:

'I Edward Thoroton Gould, of his majeſty's own regiment of foot, being of lawful age, do teſtify and declare, that on the evening of the 18th inſtant, under the orders of general Gage, I embarked with the light infantry and grenadiers of the line, commanded by colonel Smith, and landed on the marſhes of Cambridge, from whence we proceeded to Lexington. On our arrival at that place, we ſaw a body of provincial troops armed, to the number of about 60 or 70 men. On our approach they diſperſed, and ſoon after firing began; but which party fired firſt, I cannot exactly ſay, as our troops ruſhed on ſhouting and huzzaing previous to the firing, which was continued by our troops ſo long as any of the provincials were to be ſeen. From thence we marched to Concord. On a hill near the entrance of the town we ſaw another body of the provincials aſſembled. The light infantry companies were ordered up the hill to diſperſe them. On our approach they retreated towards Concord. The grenadiers continued the road under the hill towards the town. Six companies of light infantry were ordered down to take poſſeſſion of the bridge, which the provincials retreated over. The company I commanded was one. Three companies of the above detachment went forward about two miles. In the mean time the provincial troops returned, to the number of about three or four hundred. We drew up on the Concord ſide of the bridge. The provincials came down upon us; upon which we engaged and gave the firſt fire. This was the firſt engagement after the one at Lexington. A continued firing from both parties laſted through the whole day. I myſelf was wounded at the attack of the bridge, and am now treated with the greateſt humanity, and taken all poſſible care of by the provincials at Medford.

Signed

Edward Thoroton Gould.'

There was a motion made the other day in arreſt of judgment, and many objections, I underſtood, that were taken to ſhew that the charge, as it ſtands upon this record, is inſufficient in law to ſupport any judgment: that there was no averment as to the ſtate of the Maſſachuſett's colony at that time; either that there were riots, inſurrections, or rebellions: that there were no averments that the king had ſent any troops: that there was no averment that there was any ſkirmiſh or engagement; or how it began; or the nature of it: how it began, or how it went on, or ended: and that it was not averred that the employment of the troops was by the king's authority. The only objection that had colour in it was, what I mentioned laſt—that the employment of the troops was not averred to be by the king's authority. I thought then, and ſaid, that the averment of the words being written 'of and concerning the king's government," was an anſwer; but no precedent was cited or alluded to on either ſide. I fancy the attorney-general was ſurpriſed with the objection. But there was no precedent; and I could not ſay upon my memory whether precedents might not require ſome technical form of expreſſion as to that medium through which words are averred to be written of the king's government. And if any flaw had happened formally, technically, or verbally, that were not at all founded in the ſenſe or reaſon of the thing, I ſhould in this caſe be of the ſame opinion that I was in the caſe of an outlawry---that the defendant ought to have the benefit of it: and therefore I deſired that we might think of it for ſome time, that precedents might be ſearched, and the books looked into. We have fully conſidered of it, and the precedents have been looked into, and we have fully conſidered the information, and all the objections that were mentioned, and all the objections that we could think of; and we are all clearly of opinion, without any doubt, that the information is ſufficient. An indictment or information muſt charge what in law conſtitutes the crime, with ſuch certainty as muſt be proved: but that certainty may ariſe from neceſſary inference; in the manner ſettled in the caſe of The King and Lawley in Strange. Plain words, in a libel, ſpeak for themſelves. If they are doubtful, their meaning muſt be aſcertained by an inuendo. Here the words are plain; they want no inuendo. They are averred to be written 'of 'and concerning the king's government and the employment of his 'troops." The obvious meaning is, that the employment of the king's troops muſt be under his authority; and it neceſſarily is ſo, if the words alſo relate to and are written of and concerning the king's government. This muſt now be taken to be true; becauſe the verdict finds it. Had the queſtion aroſe upon a demurrer, it muſt equally have been taken to be true. The giſt of every charge of every libel conſiſts in the perſon or matter of and concerning whom or which the words are averred to be ſaid or written. In The King againſt Alderton the information was held bad, becauſe it was not laid in the information, it was not laid that the libel was of or concerning the juſtices of Suffolk. Where the words are averred to be written of the king's government where—(there are ſeveral precedents)—or of the government of the kingdom, or of the government, ſuppoſe, of the navy; as to any thing further as to which they are alſo written, thro' the medium of which they calumniate the king's government, there is no form of expreſſion technically neceſſary. And it cannot be; becauſe there may be caſes where the king's government might be calumniated through an imputation upon the groſs licentiouſneſs of his troops. The queſtion to be tried is, whether the words laid are written of the king's government. It may vary the degree of miſchief, guilt, or malice; but it is totally immaterial as to the conſtitution of the crime upon the record, whether the words refer to ſomething that has exiſted, or are an entire fiction. Had Lexington been left out; or had any other place been mentioned, where there had been no ſkirmiſhes, or engagement, inſtead of Lexington; it would without any inuendo have been equally a libel. It is the duty of the jury, to conſtrue plain words and clear alluſions to matters of univerſal notoriety, according to their obvious meaning, and as every body elſe who reads muſt underſtand them. But the defendant may give evidence to ſhew that, in the caſe in queſtion, they were uſed in a different, or in a qualified ſenſe. If no ſuch evidence is given, the obvious meaning to every man's underſtanding muſt be deciſive. Before this trial, five ſeveral juries had found thoſe words, from their neceſſary meaning, to be of and concerning the king's government. Here, in this caſe, the defendant gave evidence: and the evidence he gave demonſtrated that the words related to troops acting under the king's authority; and conſequently related to the king's government. And I am the more confirmed that upon this occaſion there is little colour of doubt of any flaw in the information, that in thoſe five trials that I allude to, in one or other of them, a great variety of counſel of learning, eminence, and ability, were employed. They were called upon to pry with all the ſharpneſs that they had into the information, to pick a hole in it: there were three judgments given upon conviction upon them; and no counſel ſaw or imagined there was any flaw in it. THEREFORE we are all ſatisfied that the information is ſufficient.

Mr. Attorney-General. The defendant has been convicted on the oaths of twelve of his countrymen with having written, printed, and publiſhed, and cauſed to be written, printed, and publiſhed, a certain falſe, wicked, malicious, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libel of and concerning the king's government and the employment of his troops; aſſerting, that the national force of this country has been employed in the murder of the king's ſubjects, for as meritorious an attribute as can be imputed to man: and he has ſpecified the time and place at which that was done.

The charge, as contained in the information, reſts within a narrow compaſs. I might have ſtated, perhaps, and proved a different crime to have ariſen upon it; but I did ſtate that which, according to my judgment, was a crime of ſuch quality, was a crime of ſuch heinouſneſs, and of ſuch a ſize, as fairly called for the higheſt reſentment which any court of juſtice has thought proper to uſe with reſpect to crimes of this denomination. My lord, although the crime, upon the ſtate of it in the information, reſts within the compaſs which I have now mentioned; yet, as it now comes before the court, the matter that now requires the conſideration of juſtice does not lie within that narrow compaſs. The defendant himſelf has thought it important to the ſituation which he wiſhes to hold with a certain body of men in this country, not to leave it juſt in the place in which the information does: he has thought it eſſential to his views (which I don't enter into particularly what they are), but he has thought it eſſential to his views, to prove how much he meant by writing in that manner to the public; and alſo to prove how much he meant, and how directly, how pointedly, and how confidently, to inſult the public juſtice of the country, by not only committing as high a crime as could be committed within the deſcription of miſdemeanor againſt the public authority and welfare, but by ſtating himſelf to have committed that crime with a view of inſulting the public juſtice of the country. My lord, if it had been eſſential to us to prove that that crime, and that that caſe which is ſpecified in the indictment, was the ſubject of a murder committed under public authority by the national forces of the country, he has himſelf thought proper to ſtate and to prove by his witneſſes, that he meant the attack made by the king's troops upon a body of rebels. Your lordſhip has taken notice of the addition of this affidavit that was introduced into the cauſe. The effect of that evidence was to prove that which was but too well known before, namely, that in the time there ſpecified, the 19th of April 1775, the rebels had arrayed themſelves in arms; had formed magazines; had taken ſtations in the country in which they had placed themſelves; were ready to ſurround the forces of the king, as far as their abilities could do it, upon any motion to be made by theſe forces: that upon the inſtant, very early in the morning, (and whether accidentally or otherwiſe let that be decided by the witneſſes) the king's troops, marching in perfect ſilence—that, upon the inſtant of that happening, the firſt demonſtrations that were made upon the part of the rebels was the firing alarm-guns; underſtood exceedingly well by the witneſs, and exceedingly well explained by him: it proved that he underſtood them perfectly, namely, by the rebel troops inſtantly ſurrounding them. I ſtate that to have been induſtriouſly proved on the part of the defendant, in order to mark that he meant to fly at the very higheſt ſubject, and to offend in the moſt heinous manner in which it was poſſible for him to contrive to offend.

My lord, he did not think it enough to have proved that ſuch was the intention of the paper with which he was at that time charged; but he alſo thought it incumbent upon him to produce witneſſes to prove another part of the contents of that paper; namely, that he had attended a ſolemn meeting; at which meeting he, with certain other perſons there aſſembled, had contributed money to the amount of about 100*l.* and that the purpoſe for which they contributed it, was the comfort and relief of thoſe whoſe merits with them was ſtated to conſiſt in no other particular than the circumſtance of their relation to thoſe rebels that ſtood in arms againſt the king's forces: he brought witneſſes to prove the fact. That the money was actually paid, is not the thing that I pin upon: let it be doubted whether the 50*l.* came actually to the hands of the banker; or that the money was afterwards applied to any of the purpoſes that are there ſtated. To be ſure, there was not proof alledged upon that ſubject. Whether it is to go to thoſe people, or whether it is to go to any other purpoſes ſimilar to thoſe, in the intention of thoſe who ſubſcribed the money (that is, the inſulting and affronting government and the king), it is a matter of very little conſequence to the point I am now ſpeaking to. He was at the pains to prove that they went through that buſineſs that I am ſtating to your lordſhip, in order to afford comfort and relief to thoſe who ſtood in that ſpecies of relation to rebels; which, as far as it goes, is to excite that rebellion, by offering that degree of encouragement to thoſe who ſhall happen to periſh in ſuch a flagitious offence: as far as it goes, it amounts to that. The libel therefore that now ſtands before your lordſhip, which the occaſions of the defendant of a different ſort (which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more particularly to preſently) obliged him to aggravate, obliged him to go to the extent that I have now ſtated, is ſuch a one that I believe it will be totally impoſſible for the imagination of any man, however ſhrewd, to ſtate a libel more ſcandalous and baſe in the fact imputed, more malignant and hoſtile to the country in which the libeller was born, more dangerous in the example, if it were ſuffered to paſs unpuniſhed, than this which I have now ſtated to your lordſhip.

Your lordſhips have ſeen that the libel is ſuch, that it is impoſſible by any epithets to aggravate it. I depend entirely upon the ſtate which I refer to---which your lordſhip has delivered to the court---I depend upon that for the moſt emphatical deſcription of every circumſtance that tends to create criminality, which is poſſible to be alledged not only againſt this, but againſt any other libeller whatſoever.

My lord, ſuch was the nature of the libel. The next queſtion that I meant to trouble your lordſhip upon, is the conduct of the preſent defendant in the article of publiſhing the libel; and, ſubſequently to that publication, in the article of avowing it, holding it up, maintaining it to the world, thruſting it in the face of juſtice, and proclaiming—— Sic honor et nomen divinis vatibus. It is a language addreſſed to the loweſt and moſt miſerable mortals. There is no man of any value in point of underſtanding in this country, that does not know that the information contained in it is falſe, abſurd, impoſſible, even below the worth of refutation; but it is addreſſed to the loweſt of the mob and to the bulk of the people, who it is fit ſhould be otherwiſe taught, who it is fit ſhould be otherwiſe governed in this country. My lord, the occaſions of this reverend gentleman to keep up the opinion of a particular part of the factions in this country, his private occaſions obliged him to be very diſtinct, and very anxious to explain it. On the part of the proſecutor, it was enough to prove that he had publiſhed the libel. The evidence for the proſecutor went plainly and diſtinctly to that fact. We produced the original paper under his hand. We produced the man to whom it was delivered, Woodfall, in order to publiſh it in a paper which he printed himſelf, called The Public Advertiſer. We proceeded to prove that the occaſion of delivering it to him, and the office in which he was employed, was not merely to publiſh it in that paper, but to carry it round to all the other public papers, and to make the diſperſion of it as univerſal as he poſſibly could. Here therefore we did eſtabliſh upon him, by theſe plain facts, a publication of as univerſal a ſort as it was poſſible for him to obtain.

One would have thought that theſe facts ſo ſtated had conſtituted crime enough. But it is not enough to be criminal, with this man; he muſt be criminal in a way that may ſhew himſelf able to defy juſtice; in a way to convey to the people, who believe in thoſe fooliſh repreſentations, that they actually do trample upon juſtice. I believe a great multitude of thoſe gentlemen called authors, Mr. Woodfall's contractors, are men, in fact, who are juſt capable of writing in an impudent ſtyle. The ſingle, ſimple merits of an impudent ſtyle is, I ſuppoſe, qualification enough to prevent any material diſtinction between his whole rabble of authors. If there is any diſtinction at all, it muſt ariſe from the ſuperior confidence of thoſe who cannot only write in that ſtyle, but ſtand forth in the face of the juſtice of the country, and ſay—'punish me if you dare.'——Theſe men loſe their credit, theſe men loſe their opportunities with their own faction, if, when called upon for their crimes, they don't preſerve the ſame impudence. That made it neceſſary for the preſent defendant not to be ſatisfied with what the proſecutor had proved upon him, but to undertake a proof of his own; to put him upon ſtill higher ground with his connections. By the examination of Woodfall, he has undertaken to prove that the method of his tranſactions with him had been at all times, that he ſhould at all times, for his own ſake, if called upon, give him up to juſtice. A good decent ſort of contract, that long way back, between a divine of the church of England and his printer! that he ſhould print for him upon the terms of the ſaid divine being ready to be given up to juſtice, at all times when he ſhould be called upon! My lord, the firſt inſtance of the execution of that contract was upon a polemical ſubject of divinity, between this gentleman and one of his pariſhioners, ſir John Gibbons. Mr. Woodfall did not ſtate to the court which part was taken by which: I cannot poſſibly tell how the controverſy ended: but in an extract upon the ſubject of religion, for the edification of the pariſh, it was neceſſary that there ſhould this contract intervene, that the reverend author ſhould be ready to ſtand forth, in caſe the printer was called upon. But with regard to the preſent publication, this was to be much more emphatical. He had been called upon in another place. He was afraid that he had not been thought by his friends to be confident enough in maintaining what he was charged with; and that, if he eſcaped, it was upon ſome doubt, whether the guilt was proved upon him or not: upon which he called upon this Woodfall to depoſe, that, in the manner of delivering him that paper, it was done with an induſtrious and affected ſolemnity. The words of it were, '—did I, or did I not, formally before the witneſs, when called in, deliver that paper as my act and deed; as if it had been a bond?'—And, in the latter end of the evidence,—'if they now chuſe to take notice of this advertiſement'——it was to that purpoſe; for this reaſon, that 'in the laſt tranſaction before the houſe of commons it was pretended they let me off becauſe they could not get full evidence. Do you remember I ſaid, that if they now choſe to take notice of this advertiſement, they ſhould not want full evidence?'——Now, my lord, to be ſure what had paſſed between this author and this printer, (whether it was more or leſs in confidence) would have made it of no conſequence whatever to the public. It would have been impoſſible for us to have known it; or, if it had, to have adduced it in evidence. That would have been of no conſequence whatever to the public. It never could have attained to the public knowledge, excepting that intereſt I have ſo often alluded to, that intereſt of recommending himſelf to his patrons, and defying public juſtice.

I don't ſtate the offence to have conſiſted in the converſation that was held between him and the printer; but I ſtate the offence to ariſe in his anxiety to proclaim to the public, that ſuch is the manner in which he dares to inſult the juſtice of the country. There ariſes the aggravation of the crime, in the manner in which I have ſtated.

With regard to the reſt, the ſtrange conduct of the defendant—I don't know whether that is properly before the court, any more than his miſrepreſentation of the proceedings of the court; which I ſhall urge for no earthly purpoſe but this: in order to demonſtrate that the aim and object of publiſhing ſo very infamous a libel as this, went even beyond the libel itſelf; to endeavour, if he could, to make a paradeful triumph over juſtice. That, I take it, is the aim and object of the whole.

I have done my duty with regard to the charge that is now before the court. With regard to the puniſhment alſo, it is my province and my duty to ſpeak.

All other crimes of ſpecific denomination are followed by the letter of the law with peculiar puniſhments: and they are held forth, by that puniſhment and by that denomination, to the people in the true point of view in which it is the intereſt of the public that they ſhould be ſeen. The law, by enacting particular puniſhment upon ſpecific crimes, has ſtated to the public that degree of terror to ariſe from the example of puniſhment, which in wiſdom, it is hoped, will be ſufficient to reſtrain offenders from committing the ſame crimes. My lord, that is not ſo in the caſe of a miſdemeanor; which in its variety and conſequences may involve crimes of a different nature and complexion, and of very different degrees of guilt. Concerning thoſe crimes the public neither has a right nor can poſſibly be informed in any other manner than by the judgment of this court. My lord, this court, in pronouncing judgment upon this offence, is to do by this ſpecies of offence, with regard to the reſt of the public, and to the purpoſe of deterring crimes, what the law does when it ſpecifies particular puniſhments. Your lordſhips are in theſe caſes to ſupply the deficiencies of the law, and to ſhew to thoſe who have been deſirous to offend the laws of their country, by the example of its puniſhment, in what ſort of eſtimation this degree of guilt is held by the law: and I, whatever I have thought upon the ſubject, ſhall be obliged to confeſs, that if the puniſhment is leſs than the old deliberate judgment has gone to and reſted upon, that I have been miſtaken in the nature of the crime. All my apology for the miſtake muſt conſiſt ſimply in this ſingle circumſtance: that, lying ſo near to high treaſon, it was very difficult for my imagination and judgment to draw the line between them. That muſt be my apology, if I have miſtaken the nature and quality of this crime.

My lord, the puniſhments to be inflicted upon miſdemeanors of this ſort, have uſually been of three different kinds; fine, corporal puniſhment by impriſonment, and infamy by the judgment of the pillory. With regard to the fine, it is impoſſible for juſtice to make this ſort of puniſhment, however the infamy will, always fall upon the offender; becauſe it is well known, that men who have more wealth, who have better and more reſpectful ſituations and reputations to be watchful over, employ men in deſperate ſituations both of circumſtances and characters, in order to do that which ſerves their party purpoſes: and when the puniſhment comes to be inflicted, this court muſt have regard to the apparent ſituation and circumſtances of the man employed, that is, of the man convicted, with regard to the puniſhment.

With regard to impriſonment, that is a ſpecies of puniſhment not to be conſidered alike in all caſes, but varies with the perſon who is to be the object of it: and ſo varies with the perſon, that it would be proper for the judgment of the court to ſtate circumſtances which will make the impriſonment fall lighter or heavier, as the truth is, upon the perſon preſented to the court. I ſay, my lord, that would be proper, if I had not been ſpared all trouble upon that account by hearing it ſolemnly avowed in your lordſhip's preſence, by the defendant himſelf, that impriſonment was no kind of inconvenience to him: for that certain employments, which he did not ſtate, would occaſion his confinement in ſo cloſe a way, that it was mere matter of circumſtance whether it happened in one place or another; and that the longeſt impriſonment which this court could inflict for puniſhment, was not beyond the reach of accommodation which thoſe occaſions rendered neceſſary to him. In this reſpect, therefore, impriſonment is not only as with reſpect to the perſon not an adequate puniſhment to the offence, but the public are told, and told by a pamphlet which bears the reverend gentleman's name (may-be his name may have been forged to it; but by a pamphlet that bears that name) that it will be no puniſhment. And your lordſhips (according to the uſual ſtyle with which he has affected to treat juſtice, from the beginning to the end) are told that you cannot puniſh him in that way: and therefore, if that is a ſpecies of puniſhment which cannot affect him, as your lordſhip has been before told in a manner to be relied upon, he has made it manifeſt that your lordſhips judgment in that part of the puniſhment, operates nothing with reſpect to him perſonally; and conſequently that it will loſe its whole force and efficacy as with reſpect to that example which the public juſtice ought to hold out to the world.

I ſtated in the third place to your lordſhips, the pillory to have been the uſual puniſhment for this ſpecies of offence. I apprehend it to have been ſo in this caſe for above two hundred years before the time when proſecutions grew rank in the Star-Chamber, and to thoſe degrees which made that court properly to be aboliſhed. The puniſhment of the pillory was inflicted, not only during the time that ſuch proſecutions were rank in the Star-Chamber, but it alſo continued to be inflicted upon this ſort of crime, and that by the beſt authority, after the time of the aboliſhing the Star-Chamber, after the time of the Revolution, and while my lord chief juſtice Holt ſat in this court. In looking over precedents for the ſake of the other queſtion, I obſerved that Mr. Tutchin (an author of ſome eminence in his day) was angry with Holt, the lord chief juſtice, for transferring, as he called it, the puniſhment of bakers to authors. That was upon a perſonal conceit which ſuch an author as Tutchin thought himſelf entitled to entertain of the ſuperior dignity of that character all along. He thought that the falſifying of weights and meaſures was a more mechanical employment than the forging of lies; and that it was leſs gentleman-like to rob men of their money than of their good name. But that is a peculiarity which belongs to the little vanity that inſpires an author. I truſt therefore, when I ſpeak of lord chief juſtice Holt, and of the time in which he lived, I ſpeak (for all, but particularly for this) of as great an authority as ever ſat in judgment upon any caſe whatever. His name was held high during his life, and has been held in reverence in all ſubſequent times. He deſerved popularity, by doing that which was right upon great, trying, and important occaſions. He obtained popularity, becauſe he deſpiſed all other means of aiming at it, but that of doing right upon all occaſions. From the temper of thoſe times, from the vehemence and deſigns of that faction that oppoſed him, ſir John Holt would have been reviled; if the revilers of that day had not obſerved in the greatneſs of his ſpirit and character, that it was impoſſible to reach him: and he has preſerved a name which was highly honoured during his life, and which will live as long as the Engliſh conſtitution lives. Citing him, therefore, in ſupport of this as a proper puniſhment to be inflicted upon this ſort of offence, is giving, in my apprehenſion, the greateſt authority for it.

My lord, in pronouncing an opinion upon the objections ſtarted by the defendant, I would deſire no better, no more pointed, nor no more applicable argument than what that great chief juſtice uſed, when it was contended before him that an abuſe upon government, upon the adminiſtration of ſeveral parts of government, amounted to nothing, becauſe there was no abuſe upon any particular man. That great chief juſtice ſaid, they amounted to much more: they are an abuſe upon all men. Government cannot exiſt, if the law cannot reſtrain that ſort of abuſe. Government cannot exiſt, unleſs when offences of this magnitude, and of this complexion, are preſented to a court of juſtice, the full puniſhment is inflicted which the moſt approved times have given to offences of much leſs denomination than theſe, of much leſs. I am ſure it cannot be ſhewn, that in any one of the caſes that were puniſhed in that manner, the aggravation of any one of thoſe offences were any degree adequate to thoſe which are preſented to your lordſhip now. If offences were ſo puniſhed then, which are not ſo puniſhed now, they loſe that explanation which the wiſdom of thoſe ages thought proper to hold out to the public, as a reſtraint from ſuch offences being committed again. It was my duty alſo to conſider this as with a view to the public conviction.

I am to judge of crimes in order to the proſecution: your lordſhip is to judge of them ultimately for puniſhment. I ſhould have been extremely ſorry, if I had been induced by any conſideration whatever to have brought a crime of the magnitude which this was (of the magnitude which this was when I firſt ſtated it) into a court of juſtice, if I had not had it in my contemplation alſo that it would meet with an adequate reſtraint; which I never thought would be done without affixing to it the judgment of the pillory. I ſhould have been very ſorry to have brought this man here, after all the aggravations that he has ſuper-induced upon the offence itſelf, if I had not been perſuaded that thoſe aggravations would have induced the judgment of the pillory. The puniſhment, however, to be inflicted for this crime reſts finally with your lordſhip. If the court is of opinion that that judgment is not to be pronounced, it will be my humble duty to ſubmit with the moſt perfect acquieſcence. I have no intereſt in the buſineſs but as the officer of the public. I am nothing near ſo good a judge of the intereſt which the public have in the buſineſs as your lordſhips ſitting in this court; but when I am ſtating a matter to the court for judgment, I muſt ſtate it as I feel it; and I feel it ſo. And if it were my province to do more than to ſtate it ſo, I ſhould ſtill continue to think of it as I do at preſent.

Mr. Horne. My lords, though your lordſhips judgment is to be pronounced upon myſelf, I ſhall attend to hear it with the indifference and curioſity of a traveller; which I was early inſtructed to do in ſuch circumſtances as theſe, long before I could imagine I ſhould ever be in them. My lords, I am a little the more at a loſs to addreſs your lordſhips, becauſe (and I am not aſhamed to be laughed at for my diſappointment) I acknowledge that I came this morning into the court in the full aſſurance, that I ſhould find leſs difficulty to go out of it than I did to come in. My lords, I had no notion at all that evidence could ſupply the defects of the information; or that it would be attempted to be ſo ſupplied by evidence. I did not, it is true, at the time I objected to the deficiencies of the information, I did not, amongſt other things, add evidence. I believe I am time enough now to move any thing in arreſt of judgment; and if I am, I deſire that your lordſhips would underſtand me now to object to the ſupplying of the defects of an information by any evidence whatever. My lord, I apprehend that your lordſhip had directed Mr. Attorney-General and myſelf (and I ought, if what he has ſaid of me be any thing like truth, to beg his pardon for coupling my unworthy name with his) but, my lord, I thought that he and I were directed, if we could, to produce precedents. I own to your lordſhip, I did not well underſtand the direction when I received it; becauſe I had laid before you a ſacred principle, with which I was much better acquainted than with precedents; and for one of which I would willingly give up all the precedents that ever exiſted.

My lords, I ſhall no doubt be very irregular in the order of what I ſhall ſay to your lordſhips; and I ſhould not have ſaid a word, if there were not in Mr. Attorney-General's harangue ſome things that might eaſily ſtir a man to anger, if he was not as little ſuſceptible of it as I am. My lords, I feel not the leaſt anger at any thing that has paſſed. The gentleman on the trial had ſtripped me of common ſenſe; but he allowed me a ſort of underſtanding. My lords, he ſhifted his ground in his reply. He firſt, out of kindneſs and compliment to me, ſuppoſed what I had written to be beneath common-ſenſe: my lords, he afterwards found it proper to make it beyond common-ſenſe. At firſt I was a fool: at laſt I was a madman. My lords, at firſt he thought it---(I forget his expreſſion) but he thought it candor (I think he ſaid) to the names of perſons alluded to, though diſtantly, to ſuppoſe that what I had written was falſe. To ſave others from ſome ſcandal of imprudence or impropriety, he thought it candor to impute falſhood to me. My lords, when that was proved to be true, he only ſaid, that he did not mend the matter: indeed, whichever ſide of the caſe I took, nothing could mend the matter.

It is not my buſineſs, my lord, to take the ſmalleſt notice of what fell from your lordſhip; nor ſhall I mention a number of things, which I might juſtly be permitted to mention, of wilful and groſs miſrepreſentations of the evidence upon the trial: I ſhould not have mentioned it at all; but Mr. Attorney-General has hinted, though not ſpecified, miſrepreſentations by me of the proceedings of the trial.

My lords, he has endeavoured to alarm me with monſtrous fines, with long impriſonment, with infamous puniſhment. My lords, infamy is as little acquainted with my name as with that gentleman's or with your lordſhips. I feel no apprehenſions from the pillory. I do feel ſome little pain that a gentleman, taking advantage of my ſituation, ſhould ſay and offer thoſe things, unfounded in appearances even of truth, againſt me, which neither he nor any man like him dare to inſinuate in any other ſtation but this.

He has attempted likewiſe to inſinuate, my lords, a ſpecies of robbery. When he did ſo he was guilty of falſhood. He ſaid, that my witneſs did not prove that the 50*l.* was paid into the bankers. My lords, he literally proved it.

My lords, he repreſents me as ſpeaking the language of---'if you 'dare to puniſh me;'---and he ſays, 'it is a language addreſſed to the 'loweſt of the mob'. Indeed I think ſo too: but it is his own language, not mine.

My lords, he has dwelt upon my occaſions, my deſperate ſituation, my want of character and fortune. My lords, it is my misfortune that from my cradle I have had as effeminate an education and care and courſe of life as Mr. Attorney-General. It is my misfortune that there was not a greater want of fortune: and as for my occaſions, my means have always been beyond them. I ſhould rather, my lords, if I was ſpeaking in extenuation or to mitigate your puniſhment, I ſhould rather cloſe in with Mr. Attorney-General, and acknowledge myſelf that deſperate, helpleſs wretch that he has repreſented me: perhaps it would be the moſt effectual motive to your lordſhips compaſſion. My lords, I never in my life ſolicited a favour: I never deſire to meet with compaſſion.

My lords, he has talked to your lordſhips of my patrons. I have had in my life, and very early in my life, the greateſt of patrons; aye! with all their power, greater than any that now hear me. My lords, I renounced my patrons, becauſe I would not renounce my principles; repeatedly, over and over again, of different deſcriptions, and in different ſituations. My lords, I am proud, becauſe I am inſulted; or elſe I certainly ſhould not have held any of this language.

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General through a blameful careleſſneſs has told you a ſtory of a theological, polemical diſpute between myſelf and a pariſhioner. I can eaſily conceive that he let himſelf fall into that miſtake for the ſake of drawing a ſmile from your lordſhips and the court upon the reverend gentleman. But in this, like the reſt, my lords, there is not a ſyllable, not the ſmalleſt foundation of truth. I never had a theological, polemical diſpute. My lords, I am free to acknowledge, that no theological diſputes that ever I read, and I have endeavoured to read all that ever happened, none of them ever intereſted me in the manner that the preſent diſputes do intereſt me. My lords, I never was made to be a martyr. I have opinions of my own; but I never intended to ſuffer for them at the ſtake.

My lords, he has endeavoured to inſinuate that all that I wrote, and all that I ſaid, was for the ſake of a paradeful triumph over juſtice: and he has talked again and again of the mob. My lords, the mob have conferred no greater favours upon me than upon Mr. Attorney-General. I have been repeatedly followed by very numerous mobs in order to deſtroy me, ſingle and alone, for a great length of way; not once, or twice, or three times, but four and five times; two or three thouſand at my heels. I am ſenſible of the ridicule of the ſituation, even whilſt I mention it. Theſe are the only favours that I have ever received from the mob; theſe are the only favours that I have ever ſolicited; and I proteſt to your lordſhips I had much rather hear the mob hiſs than halloo: for the latter would give me the head-ach, the firſt gives me no pain. My lord, I have heard of thoſe who have expreſſed more wiſhes for popularity than ever I felt. I have heard it ſaid, and I think it was in this court, that they 'would have popularity: but it ſhould be that 'popularity which follows, not that which is ſought after.' My lords, I am proud enough to deſpiſe them both. If popularity would offer itſelf to me, I would ſpeedily take care to kick it away.

My lords, as for ambition, and bodies of men, and parties, and ſocieties, there is nothing of it in the caſe. There is no body of men with whom I can think, that I know of. There is no body of men with whom I am connected. There is no man or men from whom I expect help, or aſſiſtance, or friendſhip, of any kind, beyond that which my principles or ſervices may deſerve from them individually. Private friendſhips I have, like other men; but they are very few: however, that is recompenſed to me, for they are very worthy.

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General has ſaid, that I repreſented impriſonment as no kind of inconvenience to me. As no kind of inconvenience, my lords, will not certainly be true; becauſe the great luxury of my life is a very ſmall but a very clean cottage: and though impriſonment will be ſo far inconvenient to me, the cauſe of it will make it not painful.

My lords, I find that not only I have a ſort of underſtanding very different from that of Mr. Attorney-General, but my notions of law, and my notions of humanity, are equally different. My lords, between the time that I had laſt the honour of appearing before you and the preſent time, it happens very unfortunately for Mr. Attorney-General that he has proved, that not only my notions of law and decency, but my notions of propriety and humanity, are widely different from his: and I mention it, my lords, becauſe it goes immediately to the doctrine now attempted to be eſtabliſhed. Mr. Attorney-General has heard a perſon, as great as himſelf, between that time and this, juſtify the legality, the propriety, the humanity of the tomahawk and the ſcalping-knife. Between the laſt time I appeared here and this time, theſe have been the ſort of king's troops juſtified, by a high officer of the law, to be employed, as legal, proper, mild, and humane.

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General has ſaid, that I declared upon the trial that I had a certain employment which made it neceſſary for me to be confined as long as your lordſhips ſhould or would confine me. That is not true. My lords, I did ſay that I had an employment, had ſomething to do, that would confine me to my room longer than your lordſhips would confine me. I believe I ſaid more---I neither intended when I ſaid it to affront you, nor will attempt at this time to appeaſe you.---I ſaid longer than your lordſhips dare to confine me; thoſe were the words: and I ſaid it, becauſe I did believe and do ſtill believe that your lordſhips dare not wilfully do injuſtice. My lords, as for that certain employment, I did not ſay it was neceſſary. It is an employment of amuſement merely; an employment that I meant to make public; but not for the ſake of gain or praiſe. My lords, when firſt I began my life, I was encouraged to worthy and to virtuous actions by the temptation of praiſe: I have long ſince learned, my lords, to be able to do thoſe actions which I think virtuous, in deſpite of ſhame.

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General has done what I have before heard attempted to be done with very great ſorrow: he has attempted to reinſtate the Star-Chamber. The fault he finds with it is only its rankneſs,---'before the proſecutions grew ſo rank in the Star-Chamber, and which 'rankneſs cauſed it to be aboliſhed.'---I don't recollect the words of that act by which it was aboliſhed; but I am ſure that its rankneſs alone is not the reaſon given. If the gentleman would lend me his memory, I ſhould then repeat that none of the powers, nor none like them (your lordſhips know better the words, I don't recollect the words) but nothing like them was ever to be put in uſe again in that or in any other court, as well as I can remember.

Mr. Attorney-General has talked of the perſonal conceit of Tutchin concerning authors. I thought myſelf, till a ſtrong zeal made me act otherwiſe, as little likely to become an author as any of thoſe gentlemen who hear me. I have never been a contractor with any news-papers; he knows I have not. If I deſired the printer of the Public Advertiſer to give me up always to juſtice, my lords, I cannot eaſily conceive how Mr. Attorney-General could find any thing to juſtify his oratory upon that ſubject. Is that a defiance of a court of juſtice? Is that flying in the face of the juſtice of the country? To be willing to abide its ſentence; not to withdraw myſelf from its cenſure; not to wiſh even to avoid any enquiry into my conduct; is that to be that bold-faced audacious man that defies the juſtice of his country? My lords, if it is, I can only again deplore that a gentleman, who muſt have great underſtanding, and great talents and abilities, from the office which he holds, that the underſtanding of that gentleman ſhould be ſo very different from mine.

My lords, I have already appeared in this ſituation often enough; and if I had, as he imagines I have, any luxury or pleaſure in holding myſelf forth in public; if I had, it would long before this have been ſatisfied. ----There are many other things which I might ſay to your lordſhips; but as I truſt, and fully truſt, that I ſhall ſtill find a remedy, my lords, againſt the preſent deciſion, I ſhall forbear ſaying one ſyllable in extenuation of what the attorney-general has been pleaſed to charge me with; and leave your lordſhips to pronounce your judgment without the leaſt conſideration of me, without the ſmalleſt deſire that you ſhould abate a hair from what you think neceſſary for the juſtice of my country. I ſhall leave it entirely to your lordſhips diſcretion.

Mr. Juſtice Aſton. John Horne, clerk, you ſtand convicted, upon an information filed againſt you by his majeſty's attorney-general, of writing and publiſhing, and cauſing to be printed and publiſhed, a falſe, wicked, and ſeditious libel of and concerning his majeſty's government and the employment of his troops. The libel has been openly read in court from the record; and, upon the report of his lordſhip who tried this information, it appears that, upon your own croſs-examination of one of the witneſſes, you gloried in the publication of it; that you avowed you did not deſire to be ſcreened; and that you avowed yourſelf the author of it. Since that indeed, in this court, you attempted to gloſs over parts of this libel, and to confine its tendency to a poſſible private charge upon the king's troops, and not concerning his majeſty's government; to treat that word to be indeterminate in its ſignification, and not to carry with it the conſtruction which the information avows, and which the jury have found, of its concerning the king's government and the employment of thoſe troops by his authority. You have ſaid very truly that evidence is not to ſupply any defect in an information. There is no defect in the information: the information ſets forth the libel at large; and the information charges that libel to be of and concerning his majeſty's government, as I before-mentioned. Upon that the court has now decided agreeable to the finding of the jury; and no man can really miſtake the malicious meaning and inſinuation of it. It is a libel which contains a moſt audacious inſult upon his majeſty's adminiſtration and government, and the conduct of his loyal troops employed in America. It treats thoſe diſaffected and traitorous perſons who have been in arms and in open rebellion againſt his majeſty, as faithful ſubjects---faithful to the character of Engliſhmen: and it falſely and ſeditiouſly aſſerts, that for that reaſon only they were inhumanly murdered by his majeſty's troops at Lexington and Concord. By this ſame libel ſubſcriptions too are propoſed and promoted for the families of thoſe very rebels who fell in that cauſe, traitorouſly fighting againſt the troops of their lawful ſovereign. This is the light in which this libel muſt appear to every man of a ſound and impartial underſtanding; this is the plain and the unartificial ſenſe of it. The contents of this libel have been too effectually ſcattered and diſperſed by your means, as charged in the ſeveral counts of the information, and they have been inſerted in divers and different news-papers. The contents are too well known, and I truſt abhorr'd, to need any repetition from me, for the ſake of obſerving farther upon their malice, ſedition, and falſehood. The court have conſidered of the puniſhment fit to be inflicted upon you for this offence: and the ſentence of the court is, ——That you do pay a fine to the king of 200l. that you be impriſoned for the ſpace of twelve months, and until that fine be paid; and that upon the determination of your impriſonment, you do find ſureties for your good behaviour for three years, yourſelf in 400l. and two ſureties in 200l. each.

Mr. Horne. My lord, I am not at all aware of what is meant by finding ſureties for the good behaviour for three years. It is that part of the ſentence that perhaps I ſhall find moſt difficulty to comply with, becauſe I don't underſtand it. If I am not irregular in entreating your lordſhip to explain it to me——your lordſhips, I ſuppoſe, would chuſe to have your ſentences plainly underſtood, and I know not the nature of this ſuretyſhip.

Lord Mansfield. It is a common addition.

Mr. Horne. And it may be a common hardſhip.

Mr. Juſtice Aſton. Not to repeat offences of this ſort.

Mr. Horne. Of this ſort?

Lord Mansfield. Any miſdemeanour.

Mr. Juſtice Aſton. Whatever ſhall be conſtrued bad behaviour.

Mr. Horne. If your lordſhips would impriſon me for theſe three years, I ſhould be ſafer; becauſe I can't foreſee, but that the moſt meritorious action of my life may be conſtrued to be of the ſame nature.

Lord Mansfield. You muſt be tried by a jury, by your country, and be convicted. You know it is a moſt conſtant addition. You know that yourſelf very well.——Where are the tipſtaves?

A P P E N D I X.

No. I. Proceedings on the Caſe concerning the King's Prerogative in reſpect to the Education and Marriage of the Royal Family. Hilary Term, 4 Geo. I. 1717.

[The following caſe is chiefly taken from the Reports of lord Forteſcue, who was a judge of the Common-Pleas at the time the opinion of all the judges was taken upon it. Forteſc. Rep. 401. The only addition, we make, to lord Forteſcue's ſtate of the arguments is to ſupply a conſiderable deficiency in the copy of the written opinion given by the two diſſenting judges. What we have introduced for this purpoſe is the opinion of the two diſſenting judges at length, inſtead of the imperfect copy of it in lord Forteſcue. This part is taken from a book intitled the Life of Judge Price.—In lord Forteſcue's Report, the caſe is called 'The grand Opinion for the prerogative 'concerning the royal family.'

Since the caſe we now preſent to the reader, one part of the ſubject of it has undergone a parliamentary diſcuſſion, the occaſion of which was the act paſſed in 1772, for better regulating the marriages of the royal family. 12 G. III. c. 11. The preamble to that act contains a declaration, that 'the kings of this realm have ever been 'intruſted with the care and approbation' of ſuch marriages. The generality of this recital, together with the reſtraints introduced to guard the deſcendants of George the ſecond from improper marriages, cauſed much debate in parliament, both on the ancient law and the policy of the new regulation concerning this important ſubject. In the houſe of lords two proteſts were ſigned againſt paſſing the act; and theſe will enable the reader to judge, what were the principal objections to it. See the Hiſtory and State Papers in the Annual Regiſter for 1772, and Almon's Parl. Deb. for the ſame year. Whilſt the act was under conſideration of the lords, they conſulted the judges on the extent of the prerogative of the crown in reſpect to marriages of the royal family; who concurred in opinion, that the approbation of the marriages of the king's grand-children belonged to his majeſty, and alſo the approbation of the marriage of the preſumptive heir of the crown, in whatever degree related to the king; but confeſſed, that they could not preciſely aſcertain, to what other branches of the royal family this prerogative extended. Beſides the inſtances of the crown's interpoſition noticed in the following caſe, our late moſt diſtinguiſhed commentator on the law of England refers to many others, which he arranges according to the degrees of relationſhip. 1 Blackſt. Comment. 8th edit. 225. See alſo the caſe of the counteſs of Shrewsbury, ante page 108 of his volume.]

THE judges met on the 22d day of January in Hilary term in the fourth year of his late majeſty king George, and in the year of our Lord 1717, at the right honourable the lord Parker's chambers in Serjeants-Inn in Fleet-ſtreet, he being then lord chief juſtice of England, (afterwards lord chancellor of Great Britain) in purſuance of the then lord chancellor Cowper's letter from the king.

The judges being met, the chancellor's letter was read, which was to ſignify the king's pleaſure, that all his judges ſhould meet, with all convenient ſpeed, and give him their opinion upon the following queſtion, viz.

' Whether the education, and the care of the perſons of his majeſty's grandchildren, now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldeſt ſon of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, when his majeſty ſhall think fit to cauſe him to come into England, and the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors, governeſſes and other inſtructors, attendants and ſervants, and the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, do belong of right to his majeſty, as king of this realm or not.'

Soon after the judges were met, they had a meſſage ſent them, from his royal highneſs, George, then prince of Wales, now king of Great Britain, by his ſecretary Mr. Molineux, now deceaſed, and by his own ſolicitor-general, Mr. Carter, ſince ſir Lawrence Carter, a baron of the Exchequer, to this effect: that his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, underſtanding that a queſtion relating to his right of guardianſhip to his children was before them, deſired, that before any determination was had upon it, they would give leave that he might be heard by his counſel concerning the ſame, and then the meſſengers withdrew.

After which the judges having conſulted together about this meſſage, agreed on this anſwer, viz.

We have conſidered of what you have been pleaſed to propoſe from his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, and we are all of opinion, that in caſes wherein our advice is required by his majeſty, we cannot hear counſel without his majeſty's leave.

The ſame meſſengers being called in again, the ſaid anſwer was given to them by the lord chief juſtice Parker in the name of all the judges.

Thereupon the judges agreed to acquaint the lord chancellor with this meſſage, and with the anſwer, in order to acquaint the king.

Immediately after this, without loſs of time, the judges entered on the conſideration of the queſtion referred to them.

Blencow juſtice. I don't ſee, my lords, but marriage takes in the whole queſtion, but let us debate the whole matter minutely, and give our opinions ſeriatim.

Dormer juſtice, for the king. What is very material to this purpoſe, is, the marriage articles of Car. 1. then prince of Wales, with the infanta of Spain, in the life-time of his father, king James 1. under the great ſeal. One of thoſe articles relates to the education of the iſſue of that marriage, which was, that the ſons and daughters, born of that marriage, ſhould be under the care, and brought up by the infanta of Spain until the age of ten years. Thereupon the prince himſelf ſays, if they thought that term was not enough, that he would intercede with his father, the king, that the ten years of education with the infanta might be lengthened to twelve years: and ſays further, ' and I promiſe, ' and freely, and of mine own accord ſwear, if it happen that the intire ' power of diſpoſing this matter be devolved to me, I will approve of the ' ſaid term of twelve years.' And theſe articles were ſworn to by both king and prince. 1. Ruſhworth 86, 87.

Chief juſtice King, afterwards lord chancellor, quoted Rymer, 4 tom. fol. 605, 608. 8 Edw. 3. and fol. 620 and 624.

Lord Parker chief juſtice. The caſe of H. 3. is very material. The king's ſiſter Joan was abroad, and with her own mother in France, and yet the king here in England made the match with Alexander king of Scotland. The king ſays, dabimus in Uxorem, et nos & concilium noſtrum fideliter laborabimus ad eam habendam. Rymer 1 tom. p. 240, 350. 4 H. 3. Anno 1220. Et ſi forte eam habere non poterimus, dabimus ei in uxorem Iſabellam junior' ſororem noſtram. And many other ſtrong expreſſions there are, as maritabimus et conceſſimus in uxorem; laborabimus per nos & amicos noſtros. Rymer, vol. 1. 241, 407. Madox Tit. Aid 412. H. 3 had aid to marry his ſiſter. 12 Co. Rep 29, 30.

The king of Sweden was propoſed to the lady Elizabeth, (afterwards queen Elizabeth) for marriage; but ſhe refuſed, becauſe it was not firſt communicated to her majeſty the queen. Cotton's Record, 326.

There is alſo the famous caſe of the counteſs of Shrewſbury, and ſhe was ſent to the Tower, and impriſoned there for a high miſdemeanor and great contempt, in being privy to the flight of lady Arabella, who being of the blood royal, had married one Mr. Seymour without the conſent of the king, and he was likewiſe impriſoned in the Tower for that marriage. Co. Rep. 12. p. 94.

In the caſe of the duke of York, being to be married to the ducheſs of Modena, there was an addreſs of the houſe of commons to the king, that he might not be married to that princeſs. The king's anſwer (which was remarkable) was, that the marriage was compleated, and by his royal authority and conſent. See lord Clarendon's Hiſtory.

About December 1699, an addreſs was moved for by the houſe of commons to the king, to remove the then biſhop of Saliſbury from being preceptor to the duke of Glouceſter, and it paſſed in the negative, which ſhews the parliament thought the power to be in the crown.

Another inſtance is, the caſe of the earl of Marlborough. The king appointed him governor of the duke of Glouceſter, as a mark of his qualifications for an employment of ſo great a truſt, and as an inſtance of this prerogative.

So in the caſe of the marriage of the princeſs of Orange, it was made wholly by the king, againſt the father's conſent.

In Rymer, tom. 8. 698. there is a power given by the king to certain lords to treat of a marriage of the king's ſon, the prince of Wales, with one of the daughters of John duke of Burgundy, and earl of Flanders.

Friday, Jan. 24, 1717, the judges met again at the ſame place, and thereupon the paſſage in Edw. 5. was read out of Kennett's Hiſtory of England, viz. The queen continuing in the ſanctuary with her ſon, the duke of York, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſent by the duke of Glouceſter, and other lords, to the queen, to perſuade her to deliver up the duke of York, or elſe they were to take him away by force.

Here the prince of Wales's ſecretary, the ſaid Mr. Molineux, attending the judges, with Mr. ſerjeant Reynolds the prince's counſel, ſent in to the judges, and brought an order with them from the king in the following words:

The king having been informed, that his royal highneſs the prince of Wales deſired to be heard by his counſel, his majeſty's pleaſure is, that any one ſingle perſon that his royal highneſs ſhall think fit to appoint may apply to the judges, and ſhall be admitted to lay before them what he has to offer in behalf of his royal highneſs, in relation to the queſtion before them. Upon this Mr. Molineux offered to come in, but he was refuſed to be admitted, becauſe he was not within the order of his majeſty; but Mr. ſerjeant Reynolds, afterwards lord chief baron, was admitted as counſel for the prince of Wales, according to the king's leave, and argued as follows:

Reynolds ſerjeant at law, for the prince. My lords, I have orders from the prince of Wales to attend on a queſtion relating to the guardianſhip of his children.

Whereupon the lord chief juſtice Parker informed him exactly what the true queſtion was, which was read to him verbatim, though he confeſſed he knew what the queſtion was before he came.

And then the ſerjeant went on thus. The guardianſhip of the children of right belongs to the father. 3 Co. 37. Ratcliff's caſe. 2 Roll's Abr. 40, 41, 42. The caſe of the father and grandfather is diſtinctly conſidered, and the cuſtody appears to belong to the father, and not to the grandfather, and ſo is 30 Ed. 3. 17. a. and Vaughan 180. None can have the cuſtody of the ſon and heir apparent but the father. Co. Litt. 84. a. In the caſe of younger children the argument is as ſtrong againſt the grandfather, and ſo is 4 & 5 Ph. & M. cap. 8. Now why is the power here ſuppoſed to be in the grandfather, when 12 Car. 2. is poſitive that the power is in the father, and that the father can appoint a tutor and guardian, and the prince of Wales is within that act? 2 Roll's Abr. tit. Guardian, p. 37. Though the prince is but a ſubject, yet in dignity he is made much greater, and ſuppoſed in ſome caſes to be almoſt equal with the king, as Seld. tit. Honour, 495. So that the reaſon ſhould be ſtronger for the prince to have greater power than ordinary perſons have. Now as to Bracton, who treats of this ſubject, that is tranſcribed from Juſtinian. Therefore that book and the inſtance there ought not to be regarded, for he deviates from the common law, and is nothing but civil law. Vide Selden's Diſſertation on Fleta.

There is little to be found in Rymer concerning this matter, for there is no inſtance where there is a father and grandfather alive together, but one in the 8th vol. Rymer, p. 608. In H. 4th's time, grants were indeed made by the king for the maintenance of the earl of March in the cuſtody of the prince of Wales. But there is nothing here can eſtabliſh a prerogative in the crown. I have only looked over the firſt ten volumes of Rymer, and ſhall not trouble your lordſhips with hiſtory, as that of Ed. 5. in Kennett's Hiſtory, where the queen ſaid that ſhe had adviſed with learned counſel, and they told her that ſhe had the right of wardſhip to the duke of York.

There is no inſtance or caſe whatſoever in any law book or record, in the caſe of the crown, or indeed any where elſe, that the cuſtody belongs to the grandfather, nor was ever claimed or pretended to by the grandfather.

As to marriage, every man may marry his daughter where he pleaſes. The antient feudal law did extend pretty far as to marriages. Britt. cap. 67, 68. p. 168. b. So is Co. Litt. 140. and never denied but only in the caſe of a widow holding of the crown, who cannot marry without leave of the crown. Mag. Cha. cap. 7. 2 Inſt. 18. 6 H. 6. Cotton's Records.

Marriage always belongs to the father, and the prince of Wales here would be intitled to aid pur file marrier. It is true the ſtatute of 28 H. 8. cap. 18. makes it high treaſon to marry any of the royal family; but then this ſhews it was lawful before this act, becauſe reſtrained by act of parliament, and now that act is repealed.

Rymer, vol. 4. 605, 608. which was in 8 Ed. 3. ſeveral procuratorial letters quantum in nobis were granted to the archbiſhop of Canterbury to marry, and in page 620. are procuratorial letters, in the caſe of Edmund earl of Cornwall, quantum in nobis to be married. Sandford 216.

There is one inſtance indeed in Rymer of the marriage of a daughter in the life-time of the father, who was the king's ſiſter, which is in vol. 1. Rymer 407. and in 26 H. 3. de matrimonio contrahendo, &c. promittimus & modis quibus poterimus laborabimus per nos & per amicos noſtros. But this ſhews it was not done by the prerogative alone, and indeed there is nothing to ſupport any notion of that nature. As to the caſe in Ruſhworth, page 87, 88. concerning the oath and marriage articles there mentioned, they were allowed to be contrary to the known laws of England, and the treaty therefore confirmed by parliament.

The prince's counſel, ſerjeant Reynolds, having ended his argument, withdrew: and then the Lord chief juſtice Parker went on with the caſe of Ed. 5. The queen being in the ſanctuary ſays, my ſon, as my learned counſel tell me, is my ward, becauſe he hath no lands by deſcent holden by knights ſervice, but only by ſocage; and therefore to me by law the guardianſhip of my ſon does belong. Kennett's Hiſtory 490. Then

The ſtory in Ed. 3. was read, to ſhew Richard the ſecond, then prince of Wales, and ſon of the late Black Prince, was in the cuſtody of his mother, for he was at Lambeth with his mother, which is nothing to the purpoſe. But what brother Reynolds ſays about the ſtatute 12 Car. 2. it is neither law nor reaſon, nor is, or can the prince of Wales be within that act of parliament.

As to the authority of Bracton, to be ſure many things are now altered; but there is no colour to ſay it was not law at that time, for there are many things that have never been altered and are law now. And as to what is ſaid as to the articles and oath quoted out of Ruſhworth, their being againſt law, that is only gratis dictum; for whether it was a fair treaty or no, is not the queſtion, for this matter was only between the king and the prince.

Price baron. There is ſuch an oath on the occaſion of the ſaid marriage as has been mentioned; but I do not know whether it has not been proteſted againſt. We muſt truſt to collectors for theſe articles. The articles of marriage of Car. 1. with Henrietta Maria, are in Rymer, vol. 17. 673, 676. one of the articles much like what was mentioned before, which was, that ſhe was to have the nurture of her children till 13 years old, theſe articles were agreed on in king James's time, 12 Rymer 658. The prince's counſel ſeemed to agree, that marriage and education go together.

King chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas, afterwards lord chancellor. In the bill of precedency it fully appears, that the king's grandchildren are children. In the caſe of children of the royal family ſent beyond ſea, the king's grandchildren are within that law. So prayers for the king and his royal family, includes all his grandchildren, though the king had no ſon living.

Chief juſtice Parker. The law of God and law of nature are rather with the grandfather, and the ſucceſſion cannot be altered, for that every man has a right in the royal family.

Eyre juſtice. It is the conſtant cuſtom for all the king's ſervants to aſk the king's leave to marry. Rymer, vol. 16. p. 710.

Price baron. There is no judicial determination, nor any caſe that comes up to this. The queſtion here is, whether this power be in the king, excluſive of the prince? If there be an ill king upon the throne, it may be very miſchievous.

King chief juſtice. The queſtion is, whether the king's grandchildren can marry without the king's leave; for the father cannot compel them. It is impoſſible this queſtion ever ſhould come into Weſtminſter-Hall to be determined there, and therefore to ſay there is no legal determination, is to ſay nothing to the purpoſe. This is in its nature ſo great a truſt that it cannot by the conſtitution be lodged any where but in the crown.

Parker chief juſtice. There is no law againſt any one for marrying without the father's conſent; but the crime is to marry any of the royal family without the king's conſent. The king's conſent was always held neceſſary, in the caſe of marriage of any of the royal family, always uſed and never conteſted. Were it otherwiſe it would be ſetting up two independent powers, and is a truſt too big for any ſubject.

The caſe of the princeſs of Orange's marriage, and that of the princeſs Anne of Denmark, are great inſtances of the power and prerogative of the crown. Theſe matches were publicly declared by the king himſelf, and againſt the conſent of the father.

Montague baron quoted Stair's Inſtitutions of the Laws of Scotland, fol. 38. which agrees with Bracton, lib. 1. cap. 9. exactly, and with Fleta, lib. 1. cap. 6.

Eyre juſtice quoted Cowell's Inſt. tit. 9. p. 14. de patria poteſtate; then he ſaid that Edward the Black Prince diſpoſed of the governance of his ſon Richard of Burdeux, afterwards Richard 2. to Simon Burleigh made his tutor at Burdeux. Hollingſhead 414.

And in the caſe of the counteſs of Shrewſbury no offence was declared. Hob. 235. Dugdale's Baronage.

Dormer juſtice quoted Ruſhworth's Collect. 1*ſt part.* 168. Eachard 974. Bacon of Government, fol. 14. And in lord Clarendon's Hiſtory, Baby Charles is ſaid to be the child of the kingdom.

Then the judges proceeded to give their opinions ſeriatim, beginning from the junior, which was baron Forteſcue Aland, who had been ſolicitor-general to the then prince of Wales, one of the firſt officers in his ſervice, as follows.

Forteſcue Aland baron. My lords, this is a queſtion of great importance to the whole kingdom, and I am content for the better diſcuſſing it to divide it into two parts; becauſe it has been ſo done by ſome of my brothers, though I ſhould have thought that if the king has the marriage of his grandchildren, of neceſſary conſequence he had their education too.

I will then conſider firſt, whether the king has the care and approbation of the marriage of prince Frederick, and his other grandchildren; and whether of right it belongs to his majeſty, as king of this realm, or not.

This ſubject, touching the power of a grandfather, may be treated of, either as a public or a private right. It has been treated of pretty much as a private right by the two judges that differ, and by the counſel for the prince of Wales, which I think is an error, in the foundation of their argument; for it ought manifeſtly to be treated as jus publicum, ſuch a right as our law books expreſs it to be, quod ad ſtatum reipublicæ ſpectat, and that makes it the king's prerogative, and that is the king's inheritance, as king of this realm, which is too great a point to be governed by the narrow rules of private property. Now to treat this otherwiſe, I think, is injurious to the prince himſelf and all his children. Our law books ſay he is eſteemed as one neareſt to the king. So it has been determined in full parliament, in the caſe of the prince of Wales in H. 6th's time; and in his patent, which was made by authority of parliament in 33 H. 6. the introduction of the patent is, ut ipſum, qui reputatione juris cenſetur eadem perſona nobiſcum, digno preveniamus honore, &c. ſo that in the eye of the law, they are to be reckoned but as one perſon.

It is for the ſame reaſon that an act of parliament which relates to the prince, is a public law, of which every body is to take notice, becauſe whatever concerns the prince, concerns the king, and whatever concerns the king concerns every ſubject in England; and therefore the act that relates to the duchy of Cornwall has been held to be a public law. Now let us ſee what is ſaid in my lord Coke's 8 Rep. called the Prince's Caſe. Speaking of the prince, 'tis ſaid, coruſcat radiis regis patris, & cenſetur una perſona cum ipſo rege. So ſays lord Hobart, who was the prince's chancellor, Hob. Rep. p. 226.

'Tis for the ſame reaſon, that it was high treaſon, by the common law of England (before any ſtatute) to compaſs and imagine the death of the king's eldeſt ſon and heir, who is generally made prince of Wales, though now born duke of Cornwall (but is not ſo of a collateral heir to the crown); and this offence is called crimen læſæ majeſtatis, a crime that hurts the majeſty of the king himſelf. It follows then that as they are but one perſon in law, ſo in point of law they are ſuppoſed to have but one will in relation to the education, marriage, and management of the grandchildren; and the prince of Wales in point of law is ſuppoſed in every thing to concur with his majeſty; which quite ſubverts and deſtroys the diſtinction in common perſons of grandfather, father and ſon. Now the king as he is parens patriæ, he is alſo parens nepotum, parent of his grandchildren, as lord Coke himſelf expounds the king's nephew to ſignify his grandſon, alſo from the Latin nepos, which ſignifies both. So in the caſe of a queen conſort, ſhe is the firſt wife in the kingdom, Quen in the Saxon language ſignifying wife. And therefore by reaſon of excellence it was the name for the king's wife, who conſider her in her private capacity, as the private wife of a common ſubject, ſhe cannot ſue or be ſued by herſelf, nor can grant to or from (a) her huſband; but then conſider her in her public character and capacity, as a queen, ſhe can ſue and be ſued by herſelf, and make grants to and from the king her huſband, by her prerogative; and antiently ſhe had a great many. Now I think in this caſe much may be argued from the names and appellations of the children of the royal family.

In hiſtory they are called the children of England, and all of them born princes and princeſſes of England, before they had any title, and all of them kings and queens in potentia, and may one day reign over us. Selden calls them heirs apparent of England, and they are called ſo in the parliament rolls. This agrees with the moſt early times in our kingdom, for till H. the firſt's time they were diſtinguiſhed from all other perſons, by calling both the eldeſt and the reſt of the king's ſons Clito and Clitones, and they had no other titles. Now Clito is a Latin word which comes from the Greek work Κλειτὸς which ſignifies Inclytus, moſt noble and famous. So the word Ætheling, as Edgar Ætheling, who was not the king's ſon, but his great nephew, from the Saxon word Ethel, nobilis; which ſhews that all the royal family were called by the ſame name as the king's ſons, and ſo ſets out the admirable union of the royal family. Selden's Tit. Hon. 498, 499.

The firſt ſon of the king is called prince of England, before any creation. And ſo it is in Scotland. Before the Union he was called prince of Scotland. And ſo ſays Mr. Selden it is in other nations. As in France, the duke of Orleans, regent of France, was called Petit Fitz de France, grandſon of France, not grandſon to the king. So Henrietta Maria, in the marriage articles with Charles the firſt, was called Fil'e de France, daughter of France, and not daughter of the king. Rymer 17. tom. p. 674. Selden's Titles of Honour 493, &c.

Having then made it appear, I think clearly, that all the children and grandchildren of the royal family are public perſons, and princes of the nation, and the prince of Wales himſelf one and the ſame perſon with the king; it follows manifeſtly, as a juſt corollary and conſequence, that the king, who has the executive power in him, is to have the care and command in the marriages of theſe children, for the good of the whole nation. It is part of that original truſt, which, by the conſtitution of our government, is repoſed in the king, for the ſecurity of his people.

And as this is a prerogative veſted in the crown, in the reaſon of the law, and nature of a monarchy; ſo in all ages the crown has practiſed, and been in poſſeſſion of this right.

Now in the point of marriages there are precedents from the time of H. 3. down to this time.

In 28 H. 6. it was one of the articles of impeachment of high treaſon againſt the duke of Suffolk, for attempting only to marry his ſon to Margaret the daughter and heir of the duke of Somerſet, who had a right to the crown, after the death of the king without iſſue, although ſhe was not heir apparent, for there was a prince of Wales then living. Cotton 642, 643.

When he came to his trial he did not deny but it was an offence, but inſiſted it was not true, for that ſome of the lords then preſent knew, that he intended to marry his ſon to the earl of Warwick's daughter.

And this is ſtill the ſtronger, becauſe this lady was in ward to him, and ſo he had a private right in her marriage.

By an act of parliament of 28 H. 8. it is made high treaſon to marry any of the royal family. It is thereby enacted, that if any perſon preſume to marry any one of the king's children lawfully born, or otherwiſe, or commonly reputed or taken for his children or grandchildren, without the ſpecial leave of the king, he ſhall be adjudged a traitor to the king and the realm; and thereby it is made high treaſon in the lady too, being againſt the king and realm; which ſhews plainly, the whole kingdom is concerned.

And though this act is now repealed in a crowd with other acts, to bring all treaſons to the ſtandard of 25 Edw. III. yet it is impoſſible the parliament ſhould make that high treaſon that was no crime at all before, and eſpecially high treaſon in his own children, nay when it was lawful before to marry any perſon of the royal family, (if the doctrine we are taught be true) and each had a private right to marry as they pleaſed. And it is obſervable here, the parliament makes no difference whether the father be living or not, nor takes any care of that paternal right which is pretended.

In queen Mary's time, though this offence ceaſed to be high treaſon, yet it did not ceaſe to be a crime: for in the year 1558, the king of Sweden ſent a meſſage ſecretly to the lady Elizabeth, the queen's half ſiſter only, afterwards queen Elizabeth, who was then at Hatfield, to propoſe marriage to her; but ſhe rejected it with warmth, for this reaſon, becauſe the propoſal came not to her by the queen's direction. And upon an excuſe made by the king of Sweden, that he firſt made love as a gentleman of quality to gain her conſent, and then he would, as a king, addreſs himſelf to the queen in proper form; her anſwer was, ſhe was to entertain no ſuch propoſitions, unleſs the queen ſent them to her. Upon this the queen ſent ſir Thomas Pope to the lady Elizabeth, to let her know ſhe well approved of the anſwer ſhe had made; and the lady Elizabeth further declared, ſhe would never ſee the meſſenger more, becauſe he had preſumed to come to her without the queen's leave. Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, vol. 2. 361.

So that here is one foreign king and two queens of England concurring in the ſame ſentiment; which ſeems ſtrongly to argue it is the law of nations, as well as the prerogative of this crown.

The next inſtance I ſhall mention, is the caſe of lady Arabella, and a law book to ſupport it, and that is the counteſs of Shrewſbury's caſe, 12 Co. 94. in the tenth year of king James the firſt. The counteſs of Shrewſbury was then in priſon, and ſent for before the council to anſwer to a contempt of dangerous conſequence, becauſe ſhe refuſed to anſwer, when examined about lady Arabella's flight, for marrying Mr. Seymour, ſhe being of the royal family: and there the attorney and ſolicitor-general of the king charge it as a crime, that lady Arabella being of the blood royal, had married Mr. Seymour, ſecond ſon of the earl of Hertford, without the king's privity and conſent. Now it appears Seymour was committed to the Tower for this offence, but eſcaped; and that lady Arabella was alſo committed, and ſhe eſcaped, and was taken flying beyond ſea, before ſhe got over.

The firſt crime charged upon the counteſs, was her abetting the flight of lady Arabella her niece, and the immediate crime was her not anſwering in that caſe. Now, if marrying without the king's leave was no crime, ſhe could never have been accuſed, for not anſwering to her abetting the flight for ſuch marriage; ſo that the marrying without leave was plainly charged as a crime. They both were committed for a crime, and they both fled as for a crime, and it is admitted and taken for granted to be a crime; and her contempt in not anſwering, in the caſe of marriage in the royal family, reſolved to be a crime: and this was done by all the great miniſters of ſtate, and by the chancellor, and two chief juſtices, Fleming and lord Coke, and chancellor of the Exchequer and duchy, and chief baron, in the fifteenth year of king James the firſt; and in the end ſhe was fined 10,000 l. and committed to the Tower.

The next caſe I ſhall mention is the marriage of the princeſs of Modena and the duke of York. There was an addreſs of the houſe of commons to the king, to prevent this marriage. The king's anſwer is very remarkable. 'It is compleated,' ſays the king, 'but it was with my conſent and authority;' and the parliament acquieſced in that anſwer.

Now this addreſs was abſurd, if the king had no power to prevent it; ſo that this amounts to the judgment and opinion of the king and parliament, that this right was in the crown, excluſive of his brother. So here is the king claiming this authority, even againſt his own brother, and his private right, and the parliament confirming it.

Then there is the marriage of the princeſs Mary, daughter of the duke of York, with the prince of Orange. This match was made intirely by the king's conſent, even without the knowledge of the duke her father, and againſt his liking and conſent. The king, ſpeaking to ſir William Temple about this match, ſays, 'If I am not deceived, the prince of Orange is the honeſteſt man in the world, and I will truſt him; therefore he ſhall have his wife, and you ſhall go and tell my brother ſo, and that it is a thing I am reſolved on.' The duke was chagrin'd a little, but ſaid, 'the king ſhall be obeyed.' See ſir William Temple's Memoirs.

Here is a father acknowledging the right to be in the king, to marry his own daughter, who was only a collateral relation to the king, and married againſt the father's will, as every one knows.

In 1683, the match with the princeſs Ann, the other daughter of the duke of York, was made by the king, in the ſame manner. And both theſe marriages were eſtabliſhed by a public declaration of his majeſty to the whole nation.

And thus I beg leave to conclude the inſtances of marriage; but with this remark: that happy it is for this nation, that the king in the two laſt inſtances had this prerogative; for had this pretended paternal right then prevailed, the Engliſh nation had been for ever undone, and our religion deſtroyed, and we had never ſeen the many and great bleſſings we enjoy, and are likely to enjoy by this family ſitting on the throne of Great Britain.

Thus the nation ſees the trace of this happy prerogative, from Henry the third's time to this very day, being the compaſs of almoſt 500 years, uninterrupted, undiſputed, and not one ſingle inſtance to the contrary.

Theſe inſtances concerning marriages of the royal family being ſo numerous, and the light ſo glaring, from hiſtories, records, public acts, ſtatutes, and law books, the two judges, who differ, could not reſiſt this part of the queſtion; but have retired to the other part, that of the education, though I hope to prove that if the king has the marriage, he muſt have the education too.

The reaſon that my lord Coke gives, why the queen dowager cannot marry without the king's leave is, ne capitalibus inimicis regis maritentur. Now the reaſon for the king's having the wardſhip of his grandchildren, and education too, is ſtronger, viz. leſt the heir of the crown himſelf be led aſide by ill principles, and bad politics, and become himſelf an enemy to the conſtitution, and to the kingdom. Marriage is one of the main ends of the education, and that education is a principal qualification for that marriage, and therefore can never be ſo properly placed as with him who has the marriage. Vide 6 H. 6. 2 Inſt. p. 18.

(a) There is conſiderable inaccuracy of language in this and other parts of the Report.——EDITOR.

Beſides, theſe two powers, if placed in different perſons, may claſh, and be repugnant; for which of them is to determine when the marriage is to begin, and to whom, and when the education is to end.

Again: if the king has the marriage, he has the appointment of the time of that marriage, and conſequently he can at any time appoint it; and he that can at any time appoint the marriage, can at any time call for the cuſtody of that perſon; and he that can at any time demand the perſon out of cuſtody of another, has the intire power over that perſon.

Again: it is a true and regular argument, and concluſive to ſay, that whoever has the end, muſt have the means alſo, otherwiſe he cannot be ſaid to have the end.

If I have the marriage of any perſon, I can never be ſure of that, unleſs I have the cuſtody and education of that perſon. But his majeſty's prerogative, in this part of the queſtion relating to the education, is as clearly to be made out, though not by ſo many inſtances as the caſe of marriage.

When prince Charles had by ſurprize got leave of his father to make a journey to Spain, to fetch home his miſtreſs the infanta; revolving in his mind the hazard of that expedition and the ill influence it might have on the people, king James then declared that the prince was looked upon by his people as the ſon of his kingdom. Clarendon's Hiſtory, p. 14. And this being related by him, carries with it his authority too, who was a very great lawyer, and chancellor of the realm.

The law books of Bracton and Fleta, which have been quoted, are the antient law of the land extending to all caſes; but this law being altered only in private caſes by uſage and ſtatute, it remains law to this day, as to the royal family; becauſe as to them this law has had no alteration by any law or ſtatute whatever, and the uſage has gone accordingly.

Theſe law books are ſo ſtrong, that there has been no way thought of to evade them, but by denying the authority of them, and calling it civil law. But I own I am not a little ſurprized that theſe books ſhould be denied for law, when in my little experience I have known them quoted, almoſt in every argument where pains have been taken if any thing could be found in thoſe books to the queſtion in hand; and I have never known them denied for law, but when ſome ſtatute or uſage time out of mind has altered them. We have been told indeed that they were quoted in the caſe of ſhip-money; but I believe that objection would not have been made, if they had been aware, that theſe very books were quoted on both ſides the queſtion: which deſtroys the objection, and ſhews they were approved of by all who argued in that caſe, both of one ſide and the other.

But if it be meant civil law, becauſe it is in force in all civilized nations, I believe that is true; for I take this to be the prerogative of all kings: nor has there been any inſtance given in any monarchy, where the law is otherwiſe.

Mr. Selden ſays the king of England is an emperor, and this realm an empire, and ſo called in ſtatutes and records without number; and if ſo, he will have this prerogative equal with other kings and emperors, if no ſtatute, law, or uſage ſays the contrary.

If the prerogative then be the law of nations, that is part of the law of the land, and will give the king a clear title to it.

See the ſtatute of precedency which is 32 H. 8. cap. 10. It enacts, that no perſon preſume to ſit at any ſide of the cloth of ſtate (except the king's children). Then when it goes on to place the great officers of ſtate, it ſays, that being barons they ſhall be placed on the left ſide of the parliament chamber, above all dukes, except the king's ſon, the king's brother, the king's uncle, the king's nephew, i. e. his grandſon, or the king's brother's or ſiſter's ſon.

Now this ſhews that the king's ſon, and the king's nephew or grandſon, is comprehended under the term, king's children, becauſe the latter is ſubſtituted in the place of the former.

17 Edw. 3. archbiſhop of Canterbury came into parliament and demanded, ſi les enfans notre ſen. le roy, born beyond ſea, ſhould inherit in England, becauſe born out of the king's dominions, and aliens; and all the parliament agreed, let them be born where they would, they ſhould inherit. Cotton 38. It would be a jeſt to imagine that the king's grandchild was not within that law, and within the words les enfans children: and there is the ſame reaſon in this caſe.

Another reaſon is, that the king's grandſon is higher in dignity, becauſe nearer the crown, than any other of the king's ſons, except his own father, therefore ought to be eſteemed equal with his own ſons: and therefore if prince Frederick were here, and the king had other ſons beſides the prince, he would take place of all thoſe, as Richard of Burdeaux did, when his grandfather placed him at a public table, above all his own children who were his uncles. Speed 723.

Purſuant to this notion, grandchildren of the crown are ſtiled children in records.

There is 50 Edw. 3. Richard prince of Wales, his writ of ſummons to parliament is directed thus: rex Edwardus chariſſimo filio meo Ricardo principi Walliæ. Cotton 143.

So is 51 Edw. 3. This prince Richard holds a parliament, by commiſſion from his grandfather, and that runs in the ſame manner: de circumſpectione & induſtriæ magnitudine chariſſimi filii noſtri Ric'i principis Walliæ. Pat. Rol. 51 Edw. 3. m. 41.

Now, I think education is of greater conſequence than marriage, both to the perſon and to the people of England. To the perſon, becauſe if he be bred either in the Popiſh religion, or is trained up in any other communion, though Proteſtant, except the church of England, he is not capable of reigning; and if bred up in arbitrary principles, inconſiſtent with a limited monarchy, the whole nation will then be in danger: whereas an ill choſen match will only be the moſt uneaſy to the prince that marries, and will little affect the ſtate, ſo long as the prince is ſteady, and adheres to the conſtitution.

Where is a prince to be educated, who is to be bred up a king, but in the palace and court of a king, and under his ſpecial care and influence?

The learned ſir John Forteſcue, called by ſir Walter Rawleigh the bulwark of the law of England, who was chief juſtice and chancellor, and alſo tutor to the prince of Wales in H. 6th's time, in his Treatiſe De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, which conſiſts of dialogues between him and the prince about his education, ſays, that there were two things that a prince, who is like to be heir to the crown, ought principally to be inſtructed in; that is, martial diſcipline, and the laws and conſtitution of England: and where are thoſe to be had but in the king's armies, and among the great officers and miniſters of the king?

The ſame ſir John Forteſcue ſays, ſpeaking of the king's wards in knights ſervice, the princes of the realm alſo holding of the king, muſt be well educated, ſince theſe orphans in their childhood are brought up in the king's houſe; therefore I cannot but greatly commend the riches and magnificence of the king's court, becauſe it is the ſupreme ſchool for the nobility of the land, whereby the realm flouriſhes and is preſerved: ca. 45. p. 107.

There is a patent in the 13th of Edw. 4. from the king to the biſhop of Rocheſter, whereby he was conſtituted tutor to the prince, and preſident of the prince's council, which is very remarkable. In the preamble it ſays, Howbeit every child in his youngage ought to be brought up in virtue and knowledge; yet nevertheleſs ſuch perſons as God has called to the pre-eminent ſtate of princes, and to ſucceed their progenitors in the ſtate of regality, ought more ſingularly to be informed and inſtructed in knowledge and virtue. We therefore, deſiring our deareſt ſon the prince, perfectly, knowingly and virtuouſly to be educated in his youth, and wholly truſting in the truth, wit, knowledge and virtue, and alſo love and affection that our reverend father hath to us and to our iſſue, we have committed and deputed him to teach and inform our ſaid ſon, and alſo appointed him preſident of his council, giving him power to aſſemble all the counſellors of our ſaid ſon.

Now, what I would obſerve from this patent is, in the firſt place, that it ſhews the great regard that is to be had to all the prince's or king's children, all who are like to ſucceed to the crown, that they above all others ought moſt ſingularly to be educated, and makes no diſtinction in the education between the firſt or any other of the princes of the royal blood, and the education to be perfect in knowledge and virtue.

In the next place, it ſhews the qualifications of ſuch tutors, and who is to chooſe them.

This does not invade the paternal right, but is conſiſtent with it. It is very poſſible that a grandſon may obey both father and grandfather; nor can it be ſuppoſed that the father and grandfather will give contradictory commands without breach of duty in the ſon: but it ought to be preſumed by all reaſonable men, that they will both concur in material parts of the education, both for the good of their child and for the ſafety of the kingdom; ſo that in this concurs the law of God as well as man: for I believe nobody never yet doubted but a grandſon was within the fifth commandment; and in obedience to that law, the patriarchs always conformed themſelves. But theſe ſticklers for paternal right ſeem to have forgot the right of the mother, which by the fifth commandment is as well eſtabliſhed as the right of the father; and ſome civilians give a ſuperiority to the mother, at leaſt by the law of nature: and I believe that nobody ever thought that giving this power to the father excluded the right of the mother: nor can the ſuppoſition that the mother ſhould contradict the command of the father, any more deſtroy the ſuperiority of the huſband in the one caſe, than the ſame groundleſs ſuppoſition in the ſon, deſtroy the right of the father in the other caſe.

But to ſuppoſe for once an unreaſonable thing, and what will never happen, that there ſhould be contradictory commands, the public good muſt be preferred, and duty to parents muſt be always ſubject to the ſafety of the whole community; and the king, who is parens patriæ, as well as parens nepotis, muſt be obeyed; to whom there is a double obligation, by nature and by allegiance, i. e. by the law of God and law of man.

As to what was ſaid by brother Reynolds, the prince's counſel, in relation to the ſtatute of 12 Car. 2. cap. 24. that the prince was within that act of parliament, I deny it to be law, or any thing like it: for then it would be in the power of the prince to grant or appoint by deed or will the guardianſhip, cuſtody or tuition of his ſon to the king of France, the Turk, or any perſon whatever; which would be in effect to give him a power of diſpoſing of the crown. And by this learned doctrine the royal family might be diſperſed all over Europe; and this nominee would be intitled to take the profits of all the lands of ſuch heir to the crown, and the management of all his eſtate.

What was ſaid by my brother Eyre, as to the Black Prince's diſpoſing of his ſon's governance, that was a caſe of abſolute neceſſity, and in the abſence of the king in foreign parts, for he was then on his journey to the Holy Land. Vide Acta Regia.

Montague baron. I do not know that I ever was or could be of any other opinion than for the king in this caſe. What gave me the firſt impreſſion was the government and diſcipline among the patriarchs, who educated and governed all the grandchildren and great-grandchildren under them.

In the patent for the ſole making of cards, the king is called parens patriæ, et cuſtos regni, et pater-familias totius regni.

I inſiſt on Bracton and Fleta being good authorities. It is objected, indeed, this is civil law. That may be, and yet it may be and is the law of the land alſo; and theſe books take notice of ſeveral things that are law now, beſides this caſe. Theſe books are often quoted by the greateſt judges and lawyers heretofore in England, and allowed as law. The lord chief juſtice Holt in the caſe of Coggs and Bernard, Trin. 2 Anne, which was (a very fine caſe) in the King's Bench, grounded himſelf on Bracton in giving the opinion of the court. There is too but one family, and the prayers of the church are formed accordingly; and it would make great confuſion if the prince of Wales ſhould differ from his majeſty. On great reaſon then, is this prerogative founded; becauſe the royal family ſhould not be of any other religion whatſoever than that of the church of England: and not only that, they ſhould not be Papiſts. If you ſecure the crown, the king muſt have the education, and ſo the children of the crown will be bred up accordingly; and children do include grandchildren, no doubt. Now the law of purveyance was for all the royal family, not confined to children, but extends to grandchildren.

As to the caſe of Edward 5. there may be ſome ſatire in it, but no argument, ſo as to bind us to take notice of what was ſaid only in the ſanctuary by the queen. And as to what was ſaid about the governance of Richard, ſon of the Black Prince, he was abroad then, as has been obſerved.

Pratt juſtice, afterwards chief juſtice of England. The caſe of marriage in the royal family is an undoubted prerogative of the crown, proved by all the arguments the nature of the thing is capable of; conſtantly claimed, always enjoyed, and conſtantly ſubmitted to; and when done and acted contrary, it was always taken to be a great offence, and ſome time thought high treaſon. And that the crown has been in poſſeſſion of this prerogative, appears by the many inſtances out of Rymer, where it appears the crown granted proxies for that purpoſe very often.

The counteſs of Shrewſbury's caſe in 12 Co. Rep. p. 94. is ſtrong, though it did not proceed to judgment, not pretended to be ſaid, nor was it ſaid to be no offence. The caſe of the duke of Suffolk's attempt only was thought to be high treaſon: from thence it may be inferred it was a very great offence. Then there is the opinion of the parliament in 28 H. 8. 18. and no inſtance is or can be given to the contrary. The caſe of the princeſs of Orange is very material: the king made the match, and the duke of York, her father, was againſt it. But it was ſaid the princeſs of Modena deſired the king to prevent it: but what was the king's anſwer? His anſwer was, it is too late, it was by my conſent. Here is the claim of prerogative, againſt the opinion and conſent of the father. So much as to the point of marriage.

Now as to the education of the children and grandchildren of the royal family, that is a natural and neceſſary conſequence, that if the crown has the marriage of the royal family, it hath the care of their education. If not educated well, they cannot be married well. The king having the end ſhould have the means; he ſhould take care of their perſons, that they ſhould not be diſpoſed of to the prejudice of the nation, for it cannot be undone afterwards. I do not ſee any anſwer given to that caſe in Ruſhworth, about the infanta of Spain. The ſon might in fact have contracted as well as the father, though perhaps wrong; yet he does not any way contradict the power of his father. And this carries authority of parliament with it. I am of opinion this prerogative was never diſputed by any of the royal family, and many have been proſecuted for the breach of it; and indeed we never can have any inſtances in this affair, but when there is diſcord in the royal family. Great inconveniencies attend the contrary. How great diſtractions and confuſions attended the differences between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, when one of the family was at home, and the other abroad!

Eyre juſtice, and the prince of Wales's chancellor. I am of a contrary opinion to my brothers that ſpoke laſt. The queſtion is, whether the king has a legal right to diſpoſe of the marriage and education of his grandchildren, excluſive of the father? The inconveniencies are above me to expatiate upon; but if any thing be amiſs, the legiſlature will ſet it right. No authority has been produced out of any of our law books, no guardianſhip by the prerogative has yet been proved. The lord chief juſtice Coke ſays nothing of this prerogative: he would tell us ſurely when theſe prerogatives began, and where they ended. As to Bracton and Fleta, what is quoted out of them is not law, nor accounted ſo. There is no ſuch term in our law, as emancipatio or foriſfamiliatio: Dr. Cowell reſtrains it to the father's dying. Cowell's Inſt. tit. 9. Grandchildren may be children, but that argues nothing as to wardſhip; but whether the practice in the crown, as to this prerogative, be otherwiſe, is the queſtion. It doth not appear in any of theſe cuſtodies, whether it was in the life of the father or not; and there is reaſon to think it muſt be by reaſon of ſome tenure. As to the caſe of the duke of Glouceſter, that does not appear to us, but it was by conſent. A motion was made in parliament, to remove him from his preceptor, and it paſſed in the negative. To be ſure, the public has an intereſt in all the king's children. The parliament ſometimes interpoſes in the caſe of proclaiming peace and war, and yet the king has that right. So the king has interpoſed in theſe caſes; but it cannot be inferred from thence it is a right. And give me leave to ſay, the crown has not always been in poſſeſſion of this prerogative; for Edward the Black Prince came over and returned to Berkhamſtead till the death of the grandfather, Hollingſhead: and it is material that he had the governance and education of his ſon Richard. In the caſe of Edw. 5. it was not pretended, nor thought of, that the king had this right. The queen's inſiſting, and being in poſſeſſion, is an inſtance againſt the uſage. They did not inſiſt on any law to take the duke of York out of her hands. The prince is the guardian to his ſon by nature and by law; and no law book makes any other diſtinction. Inconveniencies are not what is left to my conſideration, and the uſage is on our ſide the queſtion.

As to marriages of the royal family, they are of a public conſideration. Alliances and treaties depend upon them. The crown has always interpoſed in theſe. So in private families the grandfather has interpoſed ſometimes.

As to the caſe of the duke of York's children, though thoſe marriages might be without the actual agreement of the duke, yet it does not appear that it was againſt his conſent; ſo is no inſtance at all: and indeed there is no inſtance appears that they have been diſpoſed of againſt the conſent of the father.

As to that caſe of the duke of Suffolk's being impeached of high treaſon, can any one ſay it was high-treaſon? In the caſe of lady Arabella, there was no ſuch declaration there: it was a contempt indeed, but not ſaid ſo by the judges. There may be inſtances of high treaſon concerning thoſe marriages in former ages, but there is no law caſe, or law book, or ſtatute, that now declares the king has this prerogative; therefore I cannot be convinced that the king has any legal right to it.

Dormer juſtice. I am of a contrary opinion to my brother Eyre, and that the king has a legal right to this prerogative. The king is pater patriæ, and his grandchildren are the children of the kingdom, and of the public. And I think the king that has the marriage has the care of education alſo. The duke of Norfolk at his trial confeſſed it was a great contempt in him, to attempt to marry the queen of Scots. So in the caſe of the king of Sweden, queen Elizabeth would not hear of it, nor ſee the perſon who was to propoſe the match to her, without the queen's leave, though ſui juris. The father has not the diſpoſition of his eldeſt ſon in the caſe of the royal family. In the caſe of the duke of Glouceſter this right was taken for granted. As to the caſe of Edward 5. what the queen ſaid there in the ſanctuary, that argues nothing; and ſhe did deliver him up at laſt. It is ſaid, here is no particular caſe. If no particular law book in the caſe, yet there are many notorious facts, records and inſtances out of Ruſhworth and other books, which amount to uſage with ſuch a conſtancy, as makes it law, and gives this prerogative to the king.

Price baron. This is a caſe of great conſequence, ſo that I am in great perplexity. Not that I am afraid to give my opinion, but I cannot come into the opinion which moſt of my brothers have given. The queſtion is, whether the king has this prerogative, excluſive of the prince his ſon? The father hath the guardianſhip againſt the grandfather. So is Roll's Abridgment, and 30 Edw. 3. and Littleton, ſect. 114. Preſcription to the marriage of the tenant's ſon againſt the father, was againſt the law of nature. Vaughan's Reports on 12 Car. 2. is ſtrong. The father is guardian by nature, Dyer 190. It's againſt any law whatſoever, between ſubject and ſubject. It is very plain and clear the prince is a ſubject, and the prince held by tenure at firſt, and that tenure is taken away by the act of 12 Car. 2. But this they ſay does not bind the king's prerogative. And why ſo? The court of wards and liveries were once his prerogative, but not ſo now. I wiſh there is nothing in the belly of this queſtion, to get ſomething after it: they muſt have diſtinct ſettlements, if you ſet the grandſon above the father: dependance creates duty. It was an article of impeachment, to endeavour to introduce the civil law. Bracton and Fleta are old civil law books. They may fetch out of theſe books, ſhip-money, and diſpenſing power: they were all fetched out of theſe old books. As to Rymer, he is anſwered by this: either the king had the right of wardſhip in thoſe caſes, or he interpoſed out of care to the royal family. The nobility themſelves did ſometimes maintain and portion their relations abroad. To call all bounties, rights, is very hard. As to the caſe of H. 6. not to marry a queen, without the king's conſent, they would not make that law if they had a law before. Owen Tudor married the widow of H. 6. That was the reaſon of that law; and when repealed, that ſhewed it to be unreaſonable. Nobody can ſhew any legal proſecution for theſe things. As to the articles of marriage of Car. 1. I can hardly think the king would make ſuch an oath, I have ſuch an opinion of his piety; for thoſe articles are void; and it is no wonder that kings will not treat but with kings. That caſe of the princeſs of Orange was with conſent, there being an agreement between the two brothers. That of the duke of Glouceſter was alſo by agreement, for who would deny the king? All theſe are no more than conceſſions or agreements. We have a legiſlature which will interpoſe, if there be any miſmanagement in the prince. I will ſuppoſe for once, the prince could be a Papiſt or an Atheiſt: the parliament would interpoſe in ſuch a caſe. It is with great anxiety I ſpeak in this caſe.

Tracy juſtice. I differ from my brother that ſpoke laſt. This power is part of the original truſt repoſed in the king. We owe the bleſſings of this government to a marriage made againſt the conſent of the father. Here are all ſorts of proofs, from Henry the third's time to this very time, of marriages in the royal family; the expreſſions are not only laborabimus, but dabimus et conceſſimus. The caſe of the princeſs of Orange is a ſtrong caſe. The king made that match by his own authority: no notice taken of the father, who was forced to ſubmit to it. So that of queen Elizabeth is very ſtrong when ſui juris; no need to compliment in ſuch caſe. That caſe of lady Arabella is very material. She was committed to the Tower and charged with this crime, and ran away, and eſcaped with hazard from this crime. If it were not criminal, there could not be all that ſolemn examination by two chief juſtices and a chief baron, and other miniſters of ſtate. The parliament alſo has affirmed this power. The ſtatute 28 H. 8. is a ſtrong argument that the parliament thought it to be unlawful, when it was once made high treaſon. That addreſs in the duke of York's caſe to ſtop the marriage with the princeſs of Modena is very material; and, in ſhort, I think this power in the crown has been proved very well. And this I would obſerve, does not exclude the father's advice and counſel. Now if this be ſo in the caſe of marriages in the royal family, it is a great argument it is ſo as to education. Suppoſe the duke of York had brought up thoſe two princeſſes Papiſts, we ſhould have been all undone, and loſt our religion. Nothing can be of greater concern than the care of education. To be deprived of education is of much more conſequence than marriage: the law muſt then of neceſſity be the ſame in both. We cannot expect like inſtances in education as in marriage, becauſe theſe are tranſacted with other perſons, with princes, and of the greateſt quality abroad, and beyond ſea, and are to be made public; but directions about education are of a private nature, and not likely to be tranſmitted beyond ſea. Of latter times we have them in Spaniſh matches, as in the articles of the prince of Wales himſelf. The caſe of the duke of Glouceſter is directly in point, and which I rely upon. King William named all his ſervants by his own authority, without any notice to any body: ſo the ſuppoſed conſent has no proof nor probability. The very addreſs to the king ſuppoſes he had a right. I think there are more inconveniencies in denying this prerogative, than in any other prerogative whatſoever; and the prerogative muſt prevail. The ſtat. of 12 Car. 2. could never intend that any father had power to diſpoſe of the royal family. They would have prevented ſuch inconveniencies by this act, if they had imagined any ſuch thing, or that it would be ſo conſtrued.

Blencow juſtice. I am of the ſame opinion with my brother that ſpoke laſt. The precedents are ſo ſtrong, and the objections ſo weak, that I am clear of opinion the king has this prerogative: it is a prerogative ſo eſſential, that the kingdom cannot ſubſiſt without it. Inſtances of marriage go to full age, as well as infants. They have produced no inſtances on their ſide of the queſtion. Marriage is nothing without education. It is a dreadful thing to ſeparate the intereſt of the king and prince. Children of the crown are the greateſt ſtrength of the nation, greater than the ſhipping or militia: it is of infinite conſequence, and the nation cannot ſubſiſt without it; and we are to adviſe the king according to law.

Powis juſtice. I am of the ſame opinion this prerogative clearly belongs to the kings of England. This being of ſuch infinite conſequence, it would deſtroy us all if it were otherwiſe. We always conſider inconveniencies, in all matters of law. And in other nations it is ſaid, Salus populi eſt ſuprema lex. To give the children of the king education, and to breed them up for kings, is a neceſſary prerogative; and particularly, to ſee them brought up in the Proteſtant religion, and to reform their morals, and to learn the conſtitution, and how to govern. The king is the fitteſt and only perſon to breed them up with the love of their king and country; and he is the head of the family; and he is moſt able to do it, becauſe he is aſſiſted with the pockets of his ſubjects. As to marriages, Rymer is full: and to ſay they were by agreement is an odd argument; for this is an anſwer to every right and prerogative of the crown. There are no facts or inſtances on the other ſide, but all on this ſide the queſtion; but they would have them all to be by accident or agreement. The main objection is, there are no book caſes. That is impoſſible, as has been mentioned. As to this peculiar prerogative, how could ſuch an affair come into Weſtminſter-Hall? Counteſs of Shrewſbury's caſe is a great authority, and ſhe was fined ten thouſand pounds. Afterwards was the marriage of the duke of York to the ducheſs of Modena, and the princeſs of Orange's caſe; which are very ſtrong. As to education, that is a conſequence of marriage; a fortiori, becauſe education is of greater concern than marriage; for the education concerns the public much more, the other private life only. Now the principal article, in that match of Charles the firſt, was the education of thoſe children; and by ſecuring the education, they ſecured our religion from Popery, in the opinion of both courts. The caſe of the duke of Glouceſter runs throughout as an authority, and the governor or preceptor ſubmitted to it after a conteſt.

If the contrary were true, this would be a monſtrous inconvenience; for then the father might deviſe away the heir to the crown, and they might bring him up as they pleaſe, a Mahometan, or what not; and this deviſe could not be altered until the heir came of age. Vaughan 180. That caſe of Edw. 5. was only about the ſanctuary: that was the conteſt there and nothing more.

Bury chief baron. As to marriages, that prerogative in the crown is very clear. The crown has had it in all ages, and claimed it as their right. That of dabimus et conceſſimus in Rymer, is very ſtrong. In all times it has been accounted a crime to marry any of the royal family without leave from the crown; and all that have had a hand in ſuch marriages have been accounted criminal. As to education, ſo many inſtances cannot be expected, becauſe it has ſeldom happened that there are grandchildren in the royal family. The caſe of the duke of York's children is ſtrong: the king claimed it as a right, and made the contract, and the duke gave it up. As to the authority of the houſe of commons, they did not interpoſe as a legiſlature; and that affirmed the power of the crown. Though there be a law to the contrary, yet the parliament may interpoſe. I own I did not think that ſo many precedents could be found, as are here produced both as to marriage and education too.

King chief juſtice, afterwards lord chancellor. The queſtion is, whether the care and approbation of marriages in the royal family, excluſive of the father, belong to the crown? That queſtion doth not touch the paternal right, to be ſure; but the queſtion is, whether ſuch marriage can be without the conſent of the crown? And that is plain it cannot. As to marriages in fact in the royal family, nobody can inſtance any to be made theſe five hundred years without the crown's conſent. The crown in fact has done it; and where the crown has not been conſulted, it has been conſidered as a crime. The caſe of lord Brandon in Henry the eighth's time, and the caſe of lady Arabella, are ſtrong precedents. It was taken for granted that it was a crime and contempt, in the laſt caſe. If this had been no crime, the counteſs of Shrewſbury could not have been guilty of any crime whatever. The houſe of commons addreſs in 1673, was ridiculous, if the king had no power. As to education, ſo many inſtances of marriage is a good argument for education too. But it is objected, this invades the right of the father. Not at all ſo; nor is this againſt the law of God in any ſenſe: for duty to parents is ſtill ſubject to the public good; and there is a duty ſtill to the mother, as well as to the father.

In the next place, this is not a guardianſhip by tenure; ſo is not within 12 Car. 2. And if there be a guardianſhip by prerogative, as this is, it could not be within that ſtatute; which ſhews, that this could not come in queſtion in Weſtminſter-Hall or our law books: we can learn it no otherwiſe than by facts or uſage. You could have no inſtance but from Edward the Black Prince to Charles the firſt's time: you could have none in all theſe reigns. As to that caſe of Edw. 5. that is only of a queen who claimed it in the ſanctuary, but it does not follow that it was law. Ruſhworth, in all the addreſſes about the Palatinate, mentions the children of the Palatinate. It is reaſonable to ſuppoſe the king did take care of the education of the princeſſes of Orange and Denmark. By order of council, the king declares he had concluded that marriage; and that ſhews it was done by the king's authority. In that of the duke of Glouceſter, every body knows the king appointed him his tutor. The addreſs of the houſe of commons was to remove him. Why ſhould the king remove him if he had no power over him? So that I am clear the king has this prerogative.

Lord Parker chief juſtice of England, and afterwards lord chancellor of Great-Britain. I am of the ſame opinion with my lord chief juſtice King. The firſt queſtion is as to the care and approbation of marriages in the royal family. In private families, if a daughter grows up and is marriageable, there is no law againſt the daughter's marrying againſt the father's conſent; but if againſt the king's conſent, and ſhe is one of the royal family, that is againſt the law expreſsly. The fifth commandment requires obedience from the grandſon, as well as from the ſon. If the grandfather command the ſon any thing, the ſon ought to comply, elſe it is diſobedience, and in the king only to command. Then as to the education of the royal family, that is in the king only, as his peculiar prerogative. The marriage articles of Car. 1. is a very ſtrong caſe, and ſtronger than I could expect to find it. There being no grandchildren ſince Edward the third's time, ſo many inſtances cannot be produced; nor can this happen, but where there is a diſagreement in the royal family. In this caſe of Car. 1. it is not only an agreement, but a ſolemn treaty upon oath, and many years a-doing. The king did not need to enter into a treaty, if the prince had it in his own power intirely; but he ſays conditionally, if this devolves to me, then I will alter it. The contract was not of ſo much uſe if the grandfather lived; but if he died it would devolve to him, and then he would alter and enlarge it. And whether this contract was well or ill made, is not the queſtion, and nothing to the purpoſe: there was a power to make this contract in the king; nor is it a queſtion, whether an ill uſe be made of the power or not. But the prince has almoſt in expreſs words ſaid, he has not that power. The power is not in the prince till it devolves to him as king. And this was on a very ſolemn occaſion. It is never to be ſuppoſed the king will make an ill uſe of any power he has by law, nor is it to be preſumed the king will do wrong, becauſe all power is committed to him by law. You may ſuppoſe any ſubject, though never ſo great, to be in the wrong, but not the king. No man that talks like a lawyer can ſay otherwiſe; and therefore I think clearly this is the king's prerogative.

Both theſe opinions were afterwards drawn up in ſhort by the ten judges, for the prerogative, and alſo in ſhort by the two judges, that differed in opinion from the ten, againſt the prerogative, and were delivered ſeverally under their hands to the lord chancellor, to deliver to the king. They are as follows.

To the KING's Moſt Excellent MAJESTY.

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

IN humble obedience to your majeſty's commands, ſignified to us by the right honourable the lord chancellor, requiring the opinion of all your majeſty's judges upon the following queſtion, viz.

'Whether the education and the care of the perſons of his majeſty's 'grandchildren, now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldeſt ſon of 'his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, when his majeſty ſhall think fit 'to cauſe him to come into England, and the ordering the place of their 'abode, and appointing their governors and governeſſes, and other inſtructors, attendants and ſervants, and the care and approbation of 'their marriages, when grown up, belongs of right to his majeſty, as 'king of this realm, or not?

We whoſe names are hereunto ſubſcribed, being ten of your majeſty's judges, together with the other two judges, having taken the ſame into conſideration, and after the moſt diligent ſearch that we could in this time make into acts and proceedings of parliament, treaties, public inſtruments, and records, hiſtories and law books, and conſideration of the powers and prerogatives, which from time to time in very many inſtances have been exerciſed, and owned to belong to your majeſty's royal anceſtors and predeceſſors, with relation to the marriages and care of the perſons of the branches of the royal family, and of the great concern of the whole kingdom in ſo important a truſt; and after having, purſuant to your majeſty's farther command, ſignified in like manner to us, heard a learned ſerjeant-at-law, who, by the command of his royal highneſs, laid before us ſeveral things relating to the queſtion aforeſaid; and after ſeveral conferences, and deliberations upon all the matters aforeſaid, and what occurred to us, and the other judges thereupon; we are humbly of opinion, that the education and the care of the perſons of your majeſty's grandchildren now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldeſt ſon of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, when your majeſty ſhall think fit to cauſe him to come into England, and the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors and their governeſſes, and other inſtructors, attendants and ſervants, and the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, do belong of right to your majeſty, as king of this realm.

All which we moſt humbly ſubmit to your royal majeſty's great wiſdom.

Mr. baron Price's and Mr. juſtice Eyre's opinion upon the prince's caſe.

Feb. 1, 1717.

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

IN humble obedience to your majeſty's commands, ſignified to your judges by the right honourable the lord chancellor, we have taken into conſideration the following queſtion, viz.

Whether the education and care of the perſons of your majeſty's grand-children, now in England; and of prince Frederick, eldeſt ſon of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, when your majeſty ſhall think fit to cauſe him to come into England, and the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors, governeſſes, and other inſtructors, attendants, and ſervants, and the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, belong of right to your majeſty, as king of this realm, or not?

And we are humbly of opinion, that the education and care of the perſons of your majeſty's grand children, the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors, governeſſes, and other inſtructors, attendants, and ſervants, belong to the prince their father. But, that the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, belong to your majeſty, as king of this realm.

This, ſir, is our humble opinion. But when we acquaint your majeſty that the care and approbation of the marriages of your grand-children belong to your majeſty, as king of this realm, we deſire to be underſtood, as ſpeaking of a care and approbation not excluſive of the prince their father. But as your majeſty's care will be always employed for the good of the royal family, and the welfare of your people; ſo it is a duty incumbent upon every member of the royal family to apply to your majeſty, and receive your royal approbation upon every occaſion of this kind; for we find that all negotiations of marriages in the royal family have been carried on by the intervention of the crown, and ſuch marriages as have been contracted without the royal conſent and approbation, have been thought contempts of the regal authority: but we find no inſtance where a marriage has been treated by the crown, for any perſon of the royal family, without the conſent of the father; and we beg leave to aſſure your majeſty, that there is no one expreſſion in any of our law-books that warrants any ſuch aſſertion.

As to the other part of the queſtion, in anſwer to which we cannot concur with the other judges; it is our duty humbly to lay before your majeſty, that in our opinion the father hath in all caſes a right to the cuſtody and education of his children, and this we take to be clear from the general rule of law.

This right of the father is ſaid in our books, to be founded jure naturæ, and to be annexed by nature to the perſon of the father. In caſe of younger children, it never was diſputed; and in regard to the eldeſt ſon, or daughter and heir, to whom lands deſcended from a collateral anceſtor, the right of the father obtained even againſt the lord, though his ſeigneural right to the wardſhip of his tenant during the minority prevailed againſt the grandfather, and all other anceſtors lineal and collateral. Littleton, Coke, and Vaughan, all agree that none can have the cuſtody of a man's ſon and heir apparent from the father; and in the common caſe of a tenure in ſoccage, even the mother has the right of guardianſhip, after the death of the father, preferable to the grandfather. From hence we take it to be the general rule of law, that the guardianſhip of the children is a right common to every ſubject of this kingdom, who is a father, without exception.

Littleton. § 114 33 H 6. 55. Co Litt. 84. 84. b. 3 Co. 38. Vaugh. 180. Litt. §. 123.

Upon the beſt ſearch we have been able to make, we can find but two books written by Engliſh lawyers, that can poſſibly induce a contrary opinion (Bracton and Fleta). Bracton treating de patria poteſtate ſays, Qui ex filio tuo & ejus uxore naſcitur, i. e. nepos tuus & neptis, æque in tua poteſtate ſunt, & pronepos & proneptis, & deinceps cæteri; and; in poteſtate patrum ſunt filii qui naſcuntur in juſto & legitimo matrimonio, idem in nepotibus & pronepotibus, quantum ad avos & proavos paternos; which Fleta has alſo ſaid in, almoſt, the ſame words, and which both have taken from Juſtinian's Inſtitutes. This ſhews it to have been a part of the Roman law; but it neither is, nor, as we conceive, ever was, a part of the law of England. It is well known that Bracton and Fleta wrote their ſeveral Treatiſes upon the plan of the imperial laws; and it is as well known, that thoſe laws never obtained, here, through the general averſion this nation (always zealous of its liberties) had towards them; and accordingly, wherever theſe writers differ from our year-books, and authentick reports, they are not allowed to be of authority. And as to this part of the Roman law in particular, which relates to the patria poteſtas, it is acknowledged by all, even by Juſtinian himſelf, that it was ſo peculiar to the Romans, that it never obtained among any other people whatſoever. Jus autem poteſtatis, quod in liberos habemus, proprium eſt civium Romanorum; nulli enim ſunt homines, qui talem in liberos habeant poteſtatem, qualem nos habemus.

Bracton. l. 1. c. 9.

ibid. §. 4.

Fleta, l. 1. c. 6.

Juſtin. l. 1. tit. 9. §. 3.

Juſtin. l. 1. tit. 9. §. 2.

But to give a more particular anſwer to theſe paſſages, which are the only ones that have the leaſt appearance of law, it is evident they cannot be made to affect the caſe of the royal family, by any other conſtruction than what will equally affect every other family in England. But that from theſe paſſages nothing can be concluded, to determine the extent of the patria poteſtas in any family here, is clear from the reaſon, on which the power of the grandfather among the Romans is founded.

Now the reaſon of the Roman law, why children ſhould not be in the power of the father, but of the grandfather excluſive of the father, was, becauſe the father himſelf was not ſui juris, and in his power, but in patris familias ſui manet poteſtate, mancipioq; which are the words of the LAWS of the XII Tables; and it was manifeſtly abſurd, that he ſhould have others in his power, who was not in his own.

This ſervile condition of the ſon to the father, which had ordinarily no end, till the father himſelf was pleaſed by emancipation to put an end to it, being the ſole foundation of the grandfather's right to the grand-children, as well as to every thing elſe the father was poſſeſſed of; when this ſtate of the father ceaſed, the power of the grandfather neceſſarily ceaſed with it: and ſo it is declared in Juſtinian's Inſtitutes, that if the ſon was emancipated, and ſet free from the power of his father, the children begotten after ſuch emancipation are not in the power of the grandfather, but of the father.

Quod ſi poſt emancipationem conceptus fuerit, patris ſui emancipati poteſtati ſubjicitur.

Juſtin. l. 1. tit. 12. §. 9.

But not to inſiſt that by the laws of England no father has ſuch a power over his children, even in their minority, as the Roman law gave; it is undeniable, that with us marriage hath the nature of a true and proper emancipation of the perſon of the ſon; and by conſequence, even upon the grounds of the Roman law, the grandfather with us can have no right to the children of the ſon, but the father only. If therefore nothing otherwiſe appears to diſtinguiſh the caſe of the royal family, there can be no foundation upon which any prerogative can be eſtabliſhed in the inſtance now in queſtion; and we humbly apprehend that the only precedents which can be alledged to ſupport ſuch a prerogative, when conſidered, will not be found ſufficient.

The firſt, in the 22 H. 3. intitled in Rymer, De Alianora filia Galfridi, &c. is only a declaration under the great ſeal, that William Talbot had ſurrendered to king Henry 3. the caſtle of Glouceſter, & Alianoram conſanguineam ſuam ſanamet incolumem. What can be inferred from hence is hard to determine, any farther than that this Alianor was in ward to the crown, and had been committed to the care of Talbot, who had ſurrendered her and her eſtate ſafe again to the king.

378. 1 Rymer.

The other precedent, which is in 11 H. 4. is a grant of an annual ſum of 500 marks to the prince of Wales for the expence of the maintenance of Edmund earl of March, and his brother, ſo long as they ſhould remain in the prince's cuſtody, to whom they had been committed the February before. As to this, it appears by the hiſtory and records of thoſe times, that Roger de Mortimer their father was killed in Ireland 22 R. 2. and that their mother ſoon after married ſir Edward Charlton lord Powis, and died 7 Hen. 4. ſo that the eldeſt ſon was then in ward to the crown, by reaſon of his lands held of the crown, as were his lordſhips of Wigmore and Clare, inter alia; and his brother Roger was then an infant of very tender age, and under the care of the king, as next relation: and it appears that he died very young; in which latter caſe, we humbly conceive, that the care which the king was pleaſed to take of an infant and orphan ſo nearly related to him, will not be a precedent to eſtabliſh a power in the crown to diſpoſe of the cuſtody of a child while the father is living.

If any ſtreſs can be laid upon printed hiſtory, the caſe of Richard, ſon to Edward the Black Prince, will be an inſtance againſt this power ſuppoſed to be lodged by law in the grandfather. He being a minor, lived with his father as part of his family, and his father appointed his governor, of which we have this relation in Holingſhead: that ſir Simon Burlie, kinſman to Dr. Burlie, one of the inſtructors of Edward the Black Prince, having been admitted among other young gentlemen to be ſchool-fellow with the prince, he grew in ſuch credit and favour with him, that afterwards, when his ſon Richard of Bourdeaux was born, the prince, for ſpecial truſt and confidence which he had in the ſaid Simon Burlie, committed the governance and education of his ſon Richard to him; and after the death of the Black Prince, it appears by two very remarkable inſtances in our hiſtory, that Richard continued with his mother till the death of his grandfather king Edward the third.

The younger children of Edward 4. lived with their mother, whoſe wardſhip ſhe declared ſhe claimed by the advice of learned counſel, according to the relation given us by ſir Thomas More, afterwards lord chancellor of England, in his Hiſtory of thoſe Times; nor was it then pretended, that the king had any right to their education, or the care of their perſons; and although the queen was prevailed upon to part with her ſon Richard duke of York, her daughters remained in her cuſtody till ſhe herſelf was contented to ſend them to court.

Stow 445. 1 Kennet 490.

As to the education of their late majeſties queen Mary and queen Anne, during their minorities, it does not appear to us, that their uncle king Charles the ſecond appointed their governeſſes and ſervants, or any one perſon that attended them; and we are not enough acquainted with the circumſtances of the duke of Glouceſter's caſe to make the proper remarks, but it ſeems to have been by agreement with the king: and we humbly conceive, that the motion in parliament, 13 December 1699. for an addreſs to the king to remove the then biſhop of Saliſbury * from being his preceptor, can be of no weight in this matter, ſince it paſſed in the negative.

It is poſſible that ſomething may be inferred in favour of this prerogative, from that article of the treaty, ſaid to be made by king James the firſt concerning the match with Spain, which related to the nurture and education of the children of that marriage. It is not to the preſent queſtion to conſider, whether there ever was ſuch a treaty as is related by Ruſhworth or not. It is certain, that it is not to be found upon record, the proper evidence of all publick treaties. The articles of the treaty are ſaid in Ruſhworth to be ſtiled by the cardinals, propoſitions for the right augmentation and weal of the Roman Catholick religion. And, in truth, almoſt every article is ſo derogatory to the ſupremacy of the crown, and the ſtatutes made for the eſtabliſhment and ſecurity of the church of England, that it could have carried no ſort of authority with it in point of law, even though it had appeared, in a regular manner, under the great ſeal, and not from the reports of hiſtorians only. Nor can the oath ſaid to be taken by prince Charles, while in Spain, to intercede with his father, that the ten years of the education of the children which ſhould be born of this marriage with the Infanta, accorded in one of the articles of this treaty, might be lengthened to the term of twelve years, as the prince deſired, be looked upon as a precedent to determine what the law of England is. The right to the care and education of the children of that marriage, had it taken effect, was not then in diſpute: and had it been ſo, nothing can be concluded from the voluntary engagement of the prince, in favour of a marriage ſo much deſired by himſelf, as well as by his father, wherein the queſtion of this right was never the ſubject of debate.

17 Rymer 676. There was indeed an article in the treaty with France, upon the marriage of king Charles the firſt with princeſs Henrietta Maria, whereby it was agreed that the children of that marriage ſhould be brought up with their mother till their age of thirteen; but it is evident, that treaty was made with king Charles the firſt, after his acceſſion to the crown, and not with king James his father. King James, it is true, ſent over the earls of Carliſle and Holland to treat of that match; but the treaty was not concluded till after his death, and then by powers from king Charles the firſt, whoſe ſtipulations for the education of his own children could need no aſſiſtance from his prerogative. 17 Rymer 679.

Thus have we humbly laid before your majeſty, what we have to offer in relation to the books and precedents that have fallen under our conſideration upon this head, which we cannot think ſufficient to infer a prerogative in your majeſty, as king of this realm, in the care and education of your majeſty's grand-children, during the life, and without the conſent of their father; a prerogative, as we humbly apprehend, hitherto unknown to the laws of England.

All which is moſt humbly ſubmitted to your majeſty's great wiſdom.

Theſe opinions of the judges his majeſty was pleaſed ſome time after to communicate to his privy council in manner following.

At the Court at Kenſington, the 1ſt of July, 1718.

PRESENT,

The king's moſt excellent majeſty in council.

HIS majeſty was this day pleaſed to communicate to the lords of his moſt honourable privy council, that his royal pleaſure had ſome time ſince been ſignified to his judges, by the late lord chancellor Cowper, that they ſhould give their opinion upon the queſtion juſt before mentioned.

And that his majeſty, having afterwards been informed that ſome of the counſel of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales expreſſed a deſire to lay before the judges ſomething relating to the queſtion aforeſaid, had further ſignified his royal pleaſure to his judges, that any one ſingle perſon, that ſhould apply to the ſaid judges for that purpoſe, ſhould be admitted to lay before them what ſuch perſon ſhould have to offer from his royal highneſs. And that the judges had returned their anſwer to the ſaid queſtion; which anſwer his majeſty was pleaſed to order to be read this day in council; and the ſame was read, whereby it appeared that the ſaid judges had taken the ſaid queſtion into conſideration, and had heard a learned ſerjeant at law, who by command of his royal highneſs had laid before them ſeveral things relating to the queſtion aforeſaid; and that ten of the judges, that is to ſay, Thomas lord Parker, now lord high chancellor of Great-Britain, then lord chief juſtice of the court of King's Bench; ſir John Pratt, knight, now lord chief juſtice of the ſaid court of King's Bench, then one of the juſtices of the ſaid court; ſir Peter King, knight, lord chief juſtice of the court of Common Pleas; ſir Thomas Bury, knight, lord chief baron of the court of Exchequer; ſir Littleton Powys, knight, one other of the juſtices of the court of King's Bench; ſir John Blencowe, knight, Robert Tracey and Robert Dormer, eſquires, juſtices of the ſaid court of Common Pleas; ſir James Mountague, knight, one of the barons of the court of Exchequer; and ſir John Forteſcue Aland, knight, now one of the juſtices of the court of King's Bench, and then one of the barons of the court of Exchequer, were of opinion,

'That the education and care of the perſons of his majeſty's grand-' children now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldeſt ſon of his ' royal highneſs the prince of Wales, when his majeſty ſhall think fit ' to cauſe him to come to England, and the ordering the place of their ' abode, and appointing their governors and governeſſes, and other in-' ſtructors, attendants and ſervants, and the care and approbation of ' their marriages when grown up, belong of right to his majeſty, as ' king of this realm.'

And that Robert Price, eſquire, one of the barons of the court of Exchequer, and ſir Robert Eyre, knight, then one of the juſtices of the aforeſaid court of King's Bench, and chancellor of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, were of opinion,

'That the education and care of the perſons of his majeſty's grand-' children, the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their ' governors and governeſſes, and other inſtructors, attendants and ſer-' vants, belong to the prince their father; but that, the care and appro-' bation of their marriages, when grown up, belong to his majeſty, as ' king of this realm.'——Adding, 'that in what concerned the mar-' riage they deſired to be underſtood as ſpeaking of a care and approba-' tion not excluſive of the prince their father.'

II. The Caſe of John Wilkes, Eſq. on a Habeas Corpus, Common Pleas, Eaſter Term, 3 Geo. III. 1763.

The following caſe is from the late Mr. Serjeant Wilſon's Reports, 2 Wilſ. Rep. 150. But we have added another Report of the judgment from a book, intitled, "A Digeſt of the Law of Libels;" as on compariſon it appeared to ſupply ſome defects in the Serjeant's account. It was attempted to obtain a fuller report of the judgment than either of the two notes we lay before the reader. But we were unſucceſsful.

The great point of the caſe, namely, whether the privilege of parliament extended to a proſecution for a ſeditious libel, was the chief inducement to our inſerting it.

Mr. Serjeant Wilſon's Report.

A member of parliament diſcharged, without bail, being committed for writing a ſeditious libel.

ON Saturday April 30, 1763, in the morning the defendant Wilkes was arreſted by two of the king's meſſengers, by virtue of a warrant from the ſecretary of ſtate; the * TENOR of which warrant is in the words following: " George Montague Dunk, earl of Halifax, viſcount " Sunbury and baron Halifax, one of the lords of his majeſty's " moſt honourable privy council, lieutenant general of his majeſty's " forces, and principal ſecretary of ſtate: Theſe are in his majeſty's name to " authorize and require you (taking a conſtable to your aſſiſtance) to make " ſtrict and diligent ſearch for the authors, printers and publiſhers of a ſeditious and treaſonable paper, intitled, The North Briton, Number " XLV, Saturday April 23, 1763. printed for G. " To Nathan Carrington, John Money, James Watſon,
" and Robert Blackmore, four of his majeſty's meſ-
" ſengers in ordinary.

The ſame morning, a copy of the above warrant having been obtained from the meſſengers, who then had Mr. Wilkes in their own cuſtody, and an affidavit being made of the truth of ſuch copy, and that Mr Wilkes was then in cuſtody of two of the above meſſengers at his houſe in Great George-Street in Weſtminſter, the ſame were produced in the court of Common Pleas the ſame 30th day of April at twelve o'clock at noon, or a few minutes before or after that hour; whereupon, at the ſame time, it was moved by my learned brother Glynn, that a writ of habeas corpus might be allowed to iſſue inſtantly, returnable forthwith. The lord chief juſtice Pratt was pleaſed to ſay, that this was a moſt extraordinary warrant; and the court ordered an habeas corpus to be iſſued inſtantly, returnable forthwith. It being now about one o'clock, the rule of court for the iſſuing the habeas corpus could not poſſibly be drawn up and entered, nor could the writ be made out, ſigned and paſſed under the ſeal of the court before four or five o'clock in the afternoon: and although it was certainly known by the officers under the crown, particularly by Mr. Webb, then ſolicitor to the Treaſury, that this writ had been ordered to iſſue by the court between twelve and one o'clock, while Mr. Wilkes was in the cuſtody of the meſſengers at his houſe in Great George-ſtreet, yet, before the coming of the writ to the meſſengers, (the ſame afternoon about five o'clock) Mr. Wilkes was haſtily (I had almoſt ſaid in contempt of the king's high court) committed to the Tower of London.

Mr. Wilkes's ſolicitor, and one of his counſel, ſoon after they heard of ſuch commitment, went to the Tower in order to conſult and adviſe with him, but were denied admittance to him; major Rainsford informing them, that he had received orders from the * ſecretary of ſtate not to admit any perſon whatſoever to ſpeak with, or ſee Mr. Wilkes; and further informed them, that he had juſt before refuſed the right honourable earl Temple ſuch admittance, ut audivi.

* Ld. Halifax.

On Sunday May the firſt, the ſame gentlemen went again to the Tower, between the hours of twelve and one, on the ſame occaſion, but were again denied admittance to ſee or ſpeak with Mr. Wilkes; and ſoon afterwards, ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen of the firſt diſtinction were refuſed admittance to ſee or ſpeak to Mr. Wilkes, and particularly his own brother was refuſed, ut audivi.

After ſuch denial, Mr. Wilkes's ſolicitor demanded of major Rainsford a copy of the warrant of commitment of Mr. Wilkes to the Tower, which was readily granted by the major, the tenor whereof is in the words following: " Charles earl of Egremont and George Dunk earl of Halifax, lords " of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy council, and principal ſecretaries of ſtate: " Theſe are in his majeſty's name to authorize and require you to receive into

Mr. Webb, ſolicitor to the Treaſury, being preſent in major Rainſford's room when the copy of the ſaid warrant of commitment was granted, Mr. Wilkes's counſel and ſolicitor applied to Mr. Webb for admittance to Mr. Wilkes; whereupon (it is true) Mr. Webb deſired the major to allow ſuch admittance, and ſaid he would be anſwerable, and indemnify the major: but the major, with the true ſpirit of an excellent officer, anſwered, “ he would not, or he could not diſobey orders.” Mr. Webb replied and ſaid, he imagined, or he believed, there muſt have been ſome miſtake in the orders, and that if either of the ſecretaries of ſtate were in town, he would apply and endeavour to obtain the deſired admittance; and that if he could ſucceed therein, he would ſend or bring an order for that purpoſe in the afternoon of the ſame Sunday, May the firſt; whereupon Mr. Wilkes's counſel and ſolicitor departed from the Tower for ſome hours, and between the hours of eight and nine in the evening of the ſame day, returned again to the Tower, and applied for admittance to Mr. Wilkes; but the major not having received any orders or meſſage from either of the ſecretaries of ſtate, or from Mr. Webb, refuſed admittance, as he had done before, ut audivi.

On Monday the ſecond day of May, at the ſitting of the court of Common Pleas in the morning, the meſſengers returned the writ of habeas corpus which had iſſued and been delivered to them on the thirtieth of April in the afternoon, after Mr. Wilkes was out of their cuſtody, and committed to the Tower as above; the tenor of which return indorſed on the ſame writ returns thus, viz. “ In obedience to the within com-

“ Common Pleas at Weſtminſter, that at the time of the coming of this “ writ to us, the within named John Wilkes was not, nor at any time
“ ſince hath been in our cuſtody, or in the cuſtody of either of us; ſigned
“ by two of the meſſengers to whom the writ was directed.”

Upon reading the writ and the return thereof, it was moved by the king's ſerjeant, that the ſame might be affiled of record.

To which ſerjeant Glynn for Mr. Wilkes objected, and inſiſted that the return was too general in this particular caſe, (although it might be a good return in another caſe not circumſtanced like the preſent) for that it clearly appeared to the court by ſufficient evidence, viz. the affidavit and warrant of arreſt and ſeizure of Mr. Wilkes, upon which the writ was founded and granted laſt Saturday at noon, that Mr. Wilkes was then in the cuſtody of the meſſengers, and therefore they ought to have returned and certified to the court in what manner, when and by what authority he was taken out of their cuſtody, and what was become of his body.

Some of the king's ſerjeants replied, that all the precedents of returns of writs of habeas corpus in the Crown-Office, where the party therein named was not in the cuſtody of the meſſengers (to whom the writ was directed) at the time of the coming of the writ, were like the return in the preſent caſe; which aſſertion, at firſt, ſeemed to have weight with the lord chief juſtice and two others of the judges, who thereupon thought the return well enough; but Mr. Juſtice Gould was pleaſed to ſay he much doubted, whether the precedents in the Crown-Office of returns to writs of habeas corpus were like the preſent return, as had been aſſerted by the king's ſerjeants; and ſaid if the precedents were not ſo, he ſhould be of opinion, that this was an inſufficient return, becauſe he thought, from what appears in evidence in the caſe, the court has a right to know what is become of the king's ſubject Mr. Wilkes, ſince he was in the meſſengers cuſtody laſt Saturday at noon; whereupon (hæſitante curia) the writ and return were not permitted to be affiled of record upon this motion; and precedents were ordered to be looked into, and the matter of the return was ordered to be debated at another day; but I never heard that it was.

In the caſe of Sir William Morris who had a ha.cor. for his wife, the return was like the preſent. The like in Holmes's caſe for his wife. B. R. about Michaelmas term 1765.

Afterwards the ſame Monday, May 2, a motion was made to the court grounded upon a copy of the aforeſaid warrant of commitment of Mr. Wilkes to the Tower, and an affidavit of the truth thereof, for another habeas corpus to be directed to the conſtable, &c. of the Tower of London, which was granted returnable without delay.

Tueſday, May 3. At the ſitting of the court (which was crowded to ſuch a degree as I never ſaw it before) in the morning Mr. Wilkes was brought to the bar, and ſat among the ſerjeants (next to the reporter on his left hand,) when the lieutenant of the Tower returned upon this ſecond writ of habeas corpus the warrant of commitment of Mr. Wilkes to the Tower by the two ſecretaries of ſtate (before ſet forth); which being read, ſerjeant Glynn moved the court that Mr. Wilkes might be diſcharged out of cuſtody without bail, and grounded his motion on three points, two whereof were objections to the legality of the warrant of commitment (the reader will obſerve that the general warrant of arreſt and ſeiſure was not now before the court, and therefore the legality of that could not now be debated); the third point was, that Mr. Wilkes was a member of parliament, and therefore was privileged from being arreſted for any crime except treaſon, felony, and breach of the peace; and that ſuppoſing him the author of the preſent ſuppoſed libel (which he abſolutely denies) it is only a miſdemeanor, and none of the three abovementioned crimes and miſdemeanors.

The firſt objection taken to the warrant of commitment was, that it doth not appear to the court that Mr. Wilkes was charged by any evidence or information upon oath before the ſecretaries of ſtate, that he was the author or publiſher of the North Briton, number XLV. that, for any thing that appeared to the court to the contrary, the ſecretaries of ſtate committed Mr. Wilkes to the Tower, upon their own mere imagination or ſuſpicion that he was the author and publiſher of this ſuppoſed libel.

The ſecond objection taken to the warrant of commitment was, that it was too general, and doth not ſet forth ſufficient, ſubſtantial matter whereupon the court can judge whether the North-Briton, number XLV. (ſuppoſing Mr. Wilkes the author and publiſher thereof) is a moſt infamous and ſeditious libel, tending to inflame the minds and alienate the affections of the people from his majeſty, and to excite them to traitorous inſurrections againſt the government; that the warrant not having ſet forth the North Briton, number XLV. or ſuch parts thereof as the ſecretaries of ſtate deemed infamous, ſeditious, &c. the court cannot judge whether any ſuch paper ever exiſted, it not being before them; or if it does exiſt, whether it be an infamous libel or not.

Bacon, Abr. title Commitment E.

In the third place, ſuppoſing the warrant of commitment to be good; yet that Mr. Wilkes being a member of parliament (which was admitted by the king's counſel) is privileged from arreſts in all caſes except treaſon, felony, and actual breach of the peace, therefore ought to be diſcharged without bail. That libels may, and often do tend to the breach of the peace was admitted, and therefore the court of King's Bench frequently grants informations againſt the authors, printers and publiſhers thereof; but this is never done but upon affidavits laid before the court aſcertaining the ſaid authors, printers or publiſhers: for ſurely that matter which only tends to a breach of the peace, cannot with any propriety be ſaid to be an actual breach of the peace; and it was ſaid that it is univerſally agreed, a libel is not an actual breach of the peace; therefore it was inſiſted for Mr. Wilkes, that upon this point alone (although the others ſhould be over-ruled) he ought to be diſcharged from his impriſonment in the Tower, without bail.

Mr. Serjeant Hewitt for the crown, in anſwer to the firſt objection ſaid, that it was not neceſſary to ſet forth the evidence or information upon which the warrant of commitment was made, in the warrant; but as to the ſecond objection, he admitted that it muſt appear upon the face of ſuch warrant for what particular ſpecies of a crime or miſdemeanor the party was committed, according to the caſe of the King v. Roe and Kendall, 1 Salk. 345. 5 Mod. 78. and that in the preſent caſe, if the commitment had been for writing and publiſhing a libel generally, without ſpecifying the nature and tendency thereof, it would have been ill; but here it is ſaid to be “ for being the author and publiſher of a moſt infamous and “ ſeditious libel, tending to inflame the minds and alienate the affections
“ of the people from his majeſty, and to excite them to traitorous in-
“ ſurrections againſt the government.” This he thought was a ſufficient ſpecification of the nature of the libel, and of the miſdemeanor ſuppoſed to be committed by Mr. Wilkes againſt the government; but he ſaid he would not be underſtood to affirm that the paper called the North-Briton, number XLV. (which was not before the court) was a libel; that he had found no caſe upon a libel like this, and therefore could not ſay what was a ſufficient and preciſe certainty in a warrant of commitment for a libel; but he thought it not neceſſary to ſet forth the whole, or any part thereof, in the warrant.

As to the third objection of privilege, ſerjeant Hewitt admitted that Mr. Wilkes was a member of parliament, and could not legally be arreſted but for treaſon, felony, or breach of the peace. He cited Hob. 215. Hick's caſe, to ſhew that a libel tends to the breach of the peace; but whether the preſumed libel in the preſent caſe was a breach of the peace or not, he would not take upon himſelf to ſay; nor would he ſay that the arreſting Mr. Wilkes in the preſent caſe was not a breach of privilege of the houſe of commons.

Serjeants Whitaker, Nares and Davy, for the king, ſpoke to the like effect; but none of them affirmed, that the writing or publiſhing a libel was an actual breach of the peace (as I underſtood), or that the arreſt of Mr. Wilkes in the preſent caſe, was not a breach of privilege of parliament; and (I think) they all declined ſaying any thing more about the privilege of parliament, than what ſerjeant Hewitt had ſaid before. When the king's ſerjeants had concluded, Mr. Wilkes made the following ſpeech to the court.

“ My Lord! I am happy to appear before your lordſhip and this court, where “ liberty is ſo ſure of finding protection and ſupport, and where the law (the “ principle and end of which is the preſervation of liberty) is ſo perfectly un-
“ derſtood. Liberty, my lord, hath been the governing principle of every action
“ of my life; and actuated by it, I always have endeavoured to ſerve my gra- “ cious ſovereign and his family, knowing his government to be founded upon
“ it; but as it has been his misfortune to have employed miniſters who have “ endeavoured to caſt the odium and contempt ariſing from their own terrible
“ and corrupt meaſures on the ſacred perſon of their ſovereign and benefactor, “ ſo mine has been the daring taſk to reſcue the royal perſon from ill-placed “ imputations, and fix them on the miniſters, who alone ought to bear the blame
“ and the puniſhment due to their unconſtitutional proceedings. For the proof
“ of my zeal and affection to my ſovereign I have been impriſoned, ſent to the “ Tower, and treated with a rigour yet unpractiſed even on Scottiſh “ rebels. But however theſe may ſtrive to deſtroy me, whatever perſecu-
“ tion they are now meditating againſt me, yet to the world I ſhall proclaim,
“ that offers of the moſt advantageous and lucrative kind have been made to “ ſeduce me to their party, and no means left untried to win me to their con- “ nections. Now, as their attempts to corrupt me have failed, they aim at in- “ timidating me by perſecution. But as it has pleaſed God to give me virtue
“ to reſiſt their bribes, ſo I doubt not but he will give me ſpirit to ſurmount
“ their threats in a manner becoming an Engliſhman who would ſuffer the

“ ſevereſt trials rather than aſſociate with men who are enemies to the liberty “ of this country. Their bribes I rejected, their menaces I defy; and I think “ this is the moſt fortunate event of my life, when I appear before your lord- “ ſhip and this court, where innocence is ſure of protection, and liberty can “ never want friends and guardians.”

Then the court took time to conſider, and appointed Friday following to give their opinion, and ordered Mr. Wilkes to be remanded to the Tower, and to be brought up again to the bar on Friday the ſixth of May; and upon that day, Mr. Wilkes being again at the bar, the lord chief juſtice delivered the opinion of the whole court.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE PRATT, after ſtating the warrant of commitment, ſaid, there are two objections taken to the legality of this warrant, and a third matter inſiſted on for the defendant, is privilege of parliament.

The firſt objection is, that it does not appear to the court that Mr. Wilkes was charged by any evidence before the ſecretaries of ſtate, that he was the author or publiſher of the North Briton, number XLV. In anſwer to this, we are all of opinion, that it is not neceſſary to ſtate in the warrant that Mr. Wilkes was charged by any evidence before the ſecretaries of ſtate, and that this objection has no weight. Whether a juſtice of peace can ex officio, without any evidence or information, iſſue a warrant for apprehending for a crime, is a different queſtion. If a crime be done in his ſight, he may commit the criminal upon the ſpot; but where he is not preſent, he ought not to commit upon diſcretion. Suppoſe a magiſtrate hath notice, or a particular knowledge that a perſon has been guilty of an offence, yet I do not think it is a ſufficient ground for him to commit the criminal; but in that caſe he is rather a witneſs than a magiſtrate, and ought to make oath of the fact before ſome other magiſtrate, who ſhould thereupon act the official part, by granting a warrant to apprehend the offender; it being more fit that the accuſer ſhould appear as a witneſs, than act as a magiſtrate. But that is not the queſtion upon this warrant. The queſtion here is, whether it is an eſſential part of the warrant, that the information, evidence or grounds of the charge before the ſecretaries of ſtate ſhould be ſet forth in the warrant? And we think it is not. Tho. Rudyard's caſe, 2 Vent. 22. cannot be applied to this caſe; for in the caſe of a conviction it is otherwiſe. It was ſaid that a charge by witneſs was the ground of a warrant; but we think it not requiſite to ſet out more than the offence, and the particular ſpecies of it. It may be objected, if this be good, every man's liberty will be in the power of a juſtice of peace. But Hale, Coke and Hawkins, take no notice that a charge is neceſſary to be ſet out in the warrant. In the caſe of the ſeven biſhops, their counſel did not take this objection, which no doubt but they would have done, if they had thought there had been any weight in it. I do not rely upon the determination of the judges who then preſided in the King's Bench. I have been attended with many precedents of warrants returned into the King's Bench; they are almoſt univerſally like this; and in ſir William Wyndham's caſe, 1 Stra. 2, 3. this very point before us is determined. And Hawkins, in his 2 Pl. Coron. 120. ſect. 17. ſays, “ It is ſafe to ſet forth that the party is charged “ upon oath; but this is not neceſſary; for it hath been reſolved, that a “ commitment for treaſon, or for ſuſpicion of it, without ſetting forth “ any particular accuſation, or ground of ſuſpicion, is good;” and cites ſir William Wyndham's caſe, Trin. 2 Geo. Dalt. cap. 121. Cromp. 233 b.

The ſecond objection is, that the libel ought to be ſet forth in the warrant in hæc verba, or at leaſt ſo much thereof as the ſecretaries of ſtate deemed infamous, ſeditious, &c. that the court may judge whether any ſuch paper ever exiſted; or if it does exiſt, whether it be an infamous and ſeditious libel, or not. But we are all of a contrary opinion. A warrant of commitment for felony muſt contain the ſpecies of felony briefly, “ as for felony for the death of J. S. or for burglary in “ breaking the houſe of J. S. &c. and the reaſon is, becauſe it may “ appear to the judges upon the return of an habeas corpus, whether it “ be felony or not.” The magiſtrate forms his judgment upon the writing, whether it be an infamous and ſeditious libel or not at his peril; and perhaps the paper itſelf may not contain the whole of the libel; inuendo's may be neceſſary to make the whole out. There is no other word in the law but libel whereby to expreſs the true idea of an infamous writing. We underſtand the nature of a libel as well as a ſpecies of felony. It is ſaid the libel ought to be ſtated, becauſe the court cannot judge whether it is a libel or not without it; but that is matter for the judge and jury to determine at the trial. If the paper was here, I ſhould be afraid to read it. We might perhaps be able to determine that it was a libel, but we could not judge that it was not a libel, becauſe of inuendo's, &c. It may be ſaid, that without ſeeing the libel we are not able to fix the quantum of the bail; but in anſwer to this, the nature of the offence is known by us. It is ſaid to be an infamous and ſeditious libel, &c. it is ſuch a miſdemeanor as we ſhould require good bail for, (moderation to be obſerved) and ſuch as the party may be able to procure.

The third matter inſiſted upon for Mr. Wilkes is, that he is a member of parliament, (which has been admitted by the king's ſerjeants) and intitled to privilege to be free from arreſts in all caſes except treaſon, felony, and actual breach of the peace, and therefore ought to be diſcharged from impriſonment without bail; and we are all of opinion that he is intitled to that privilege, and muſt be diſcharged without bail. In the caſe of the ſeven biſhops, the court took notice of the privilege of parliament, and thought the biſhops would have been intitled to it, if they had not judged them to have been guilty of a breach of the peace; for three of them, Wright, Holloway, and Allybone, deemed a ſeditious libel to be an actual breach of the peace, and therefore they were ouſted of their privilege moſt unjuſtly. If Mr. Wilkes had been deſcribed as a member of parliament in the return, we muſt have taken notice of the law of privilege of parliament, otherwiſe the members would be without remedy, where they are wrongfully arreſted againſt the law of parliament. We are bound to take notice of their privileges, as being part of the law of the land. 4 Inſt. 25. ſays, the privilege of parliament holds unleſs it be in three caſes, viz. treaſon, felony, and the peace: theſe are the words of Coke. In the trial of the ſeven biſhops, the word peace in this caſe of privilege is explained to mean where ſurety of the peace is required. Privilege of parliament holds in informations for the king, unleſs in the caſes before excepted. The caſe of an information againſt lord Tankerville for bribery, 4 Annæ, (a) was within the privilege of parliament. See the reſolution of lords and commons, anno 1675. We are all of opinion that a libel is not a breach of the peace. It tends to the breach of the peace, and that is the utmoſt, 1 Lev. 139. But that which only tends to the breach of the peace cannot be a breach of it. Suppoſe a libel be a breach of the peace, yet I think it cannot exclude privilege; becauſe I cannot find that a libeller is bound to find ſurety of the peace, in any book whatever, nor ever was, in any caſe, except one, viz. the caſe of the ſeven biſhops, where three judges ſaid, that ſurety of the peace was required in the caſe of a libel. Judge Powell, the only honeſt man of the four judges, diſſented; and I am bold to be of his opinion, and to ſay, that caſe is not law. But it ſhews the miſerable condition of the ſtate at that time. Upon the whole, it is abſurd to require ſurety of the peace or bail in the caſe of a libeller, and therefore Mr. Wilkes muſt be diſcharged from his impriſonment; whereupon there was a loud huzza in Weſtminſter-hall. He was diſcharged accordingly.

(a) This muſt be a miſtake of the reporter; for lord Tankerville's caſe was in 1758. See Journ. Dom. Proc. 6 June in that year.——Editor.

Lord chief juſtice Pratt's argument on delivering the judgment of the court, from the book intitled, ‘ A Digeſt of the Law of Libels.’

WHEN this return was read, my brother Glynn, counſel for Mr. Wilkes, made two objections to it; and though thoſe ſhould fail him, he inſiſted that Mr. Wilkes, from the nature of his particular ſtation and character, as being a member of the houſe of commons, was intitled to privilege of parliament, and ought for that reaſon alone to be diſcharged from his preſent impriſonment. To begin with the objections. The firſt was, that it did not appear by the warrant that Mr. Wilkes ſtood charged upon any evidence with being the author of the libel deſcribed in the warrant. The true queſtion ariſing upon this objection is, whether ſtating the evidence be eſſential to the validity of the warrant. And upon this point we are all clearly of opinion that the warrant is good. We conſider the ſecretaries in the light of common juſtices of the peace: they no more than any common juſtices can iſſue warrants merely ex officio, or for offences within their private knowlege, being in thoſe caſes rather witneſſes than magiſtrates. But though this be admitted, it will not affect the preſent queſtion. The preſent queſtion is, whether the ſtating the evidence be eſſential to the validity of the warrant? No authority has been cited by the defendant's counſel to ſhew it. Rudyard's caſe in 2 Ventr. 22. was indeed referred to; but upon examining that caſe, it does not apply. The commitment there was a commitment in execution, and therefore it was neceſſary in that caſe to ſtate the evidence. It was urged farther, that the ground of the juſtices juriſdiction reſted in the charge by witneſſes; and if it was otherwiſe, every man's liberty would be in the power of the juſtices. The objection deſerves an anſwer; and if it had not been determined before, I ſhould have thought it very weighty and alarming: but it has been ſettled. Before I mention the caſe where it was ſolemnly adjudged, I would take notice, that neither my lord Coke, lord Hale, or Mr. Hawkins, all of them very able writers upon the crown law, have conſidered ſuch a charge as is contended for to be eſſential. In the trial of the ſeven biſhops, though they were committed upon a ſimilar warrant, their counſel did not take the ſame objection. In referring to that great caſe, I am not to be underſtood as intending to give any weight to the determination of the judges who ſat upon the bench, in that cauſe. I rely only on the ſilence of the defendants counſel, who were all of them lovers of liberty, and the greateſt lawyers of that age. We have ſeen precedents of commitments returned upon habeas corpus's into the King's-Bench, where the warrants have been all in the ſame form, and no ſuch objection taken; but the very point was determined in the caſe of ſir W. Wyndham, 3 Vin. Abr. 530, 535. Stra. 2. who was committed for high treaſon generally, and not on the charge of any body ſtated in the commitment. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 120. chap. 17. ſect. 17. refers to the caſe of ſir W. Wyndham, and ſays it is ſafer to ſet forth that the party is charged upon oath, but that is not neceſſary. Thus ſtands this point on authorities.—The other objection was, that the libel itſelf ought to have been ſet forth in hæc verba; but upon that point too, we are all of opinion that the warrant is good. It was urged, that the ſpecific cauſe of detention ought to be ſtated with certainty; and therefore if a man be committed for felony, the warrant muſt briefly mention the ſpecies of the felony. Now the ſpecies of every offence muſt be collected by the magiſtrate out of the evidence; but he is not bound to ſet forth the evidence: he is anſwerable only for the inference he deduces from it. As to a libel, the evidence is partly internal and partly external. The paper itſelf may not be compleat and concluſive evidence; for it may be dark and unintelligible without the inuendo's, which are the external evidence. There is no other name but that of libel applicable to the offence of libelling; and we know the offence ſpecifically by that name, as we know the offences of horſe-ſtealing, forgery, &c. by the names which the law has annexed to them. But two reaſons were urged why the law ought to be ſtated. Firſt, it was ſaid, that without it the court cannot judge whether it be a libel or not. The anſwer is, that the court ought not in this proceeding to give any judgment of that ſort, as it would tend to prejudication, to take away the office of a jury, and to create an improper influence. The other reaſon was, that unleſs the libel be ſtated, the court cannot be able to determine on the quantity of bail. I anſwer, that regard to the nature of the offence is the only neceſſary rule in bailing. As to the offence of a libel, it is an high miſdemeanor, and good bail (having regard to the quality of the offender) ſhould be required. But if the libel itſelf was ſtated, we could have no other meaſure of bailing than this. Beſides, there has been no caſe ſhewn to warrant this reaſon, and it was not urged in the caſe of the ſeven biſhops. But then it remains to be conſidered, whether Mr. Wilkes ought not to be diſcharged. The king's counſel have thought fit to admit, that he was a member of the houſe of commons, and we are bound to take notice of it. In the caſe of the ſeven biſhops, the court took notice of their privilege from their deſcription in the warrant. In the preſent caſe, there is no ſuit depending. Here no writ of privilege can therefore iſſue, no plea of privilege can be received. It reſts, and muſt reſt on the admiſſion of the counſel for the crown: it is fairly before us upon that admiſſion, and we are bound to determine it. In lord Coke 4 Inſt. 24, 25. after ſhewing that privilege of parliament is conuſable at common law, he ſays, that privilege generally holds, unleſs it be in three caſes, viz. treaſon, felony, and the peace. We have not been able to have recourſe to the original record, but in Cotton's Abridgement, fol. 596. you will find my lord Coke was right. The caſe I would refer to is that of William Lake, 9th of Hen. 6. who being a member's ſervant, and taken in execution for debt, was delivered by the privilege of the houſe of Commons; the book adds, (and for that purpoſe I refer to it) wherein is to be noted, that there is no cauſe to arreſt any ſuch man, but for treaſon, felony, and the peace. In the trial of the ſeven biſhops, the words 'the peace' are explained to mean 'ſurety of the peace.' In the caſe of the King v. ſir Thomas Culpepper, reported in 12 Mod. 108. Lord Holt ſays, that whereas it is ſaid in our books, that privilege of parliament was not allowable in treaſon, felony, or breach of the peace, it muſt be intended where ſurety of the peace is deſired, that it ſhall not protect a man againſt a ſupplicavit, but it holds as well in caſe of indictment, information for breach of the peace, as in caſe of actions. In the caſe of lord Tankerville a few years ago, which though not reported in any law book, is upon record in parliament, it was held, that bribery, being only a conſtructive, and not an actual breach of the peace, ſhould not ouſt him of his privilege. There is no difference between the two houſes of parliament in reſpect of privilege. The ſtatutes of 12 & 13 Wil. 3. c. 3. and 2 & 3 An. c. 18. ſpeak of the privilege of parliament in reference not to one houſe in particular, but to both houſes. What then is the preſent caſe? Mr. Wilkes, a member of the houſe of commons, is committed for being the author and publiſher of an infamous and ſeditious libel. Is a libel ipſo facto in itſelf an actual breach of the peace? Mr. Dalton in his Juſtice of the Peace, fol. 289. defines a libel as a thing tending to the breach of the peace. In ſir Baptiſt Hicks's caſe, Hob. 224. it is called a provocation to a breach of the peace. In Lev. 139. The King v. Summers, it was held to be an offence conuſable before juſtices, becauſe it tended to a breach of the peace. In Hawk. Pl. Cor. 193. chap. 73. ſect. 3. it is called a thing directly tending to a breach of the public peace. Now, that that which tends only to the breach of the peace, is not an actual breach of it, is too plain a propoſition to admit of argument. But if it was admitted that a libel was a breach of the peace, ſtill privilege cannot be excluded, unleſs it requires ſurety of the peace; and there has been no precedent but that of the ſeven biſhops cited to ſhew that ſureties of the peace are requirable from a libeller; and as to the opinion of the three judges in that caſe, it only ſerves to ſhew the miſerable ſtate of juſtice in thoſe days. Allybone, one of the three, was a rigid and profeſſed (a) Papiſt; Wright and Holloway, I am much afraid, were placed there for doing jobs; and Powell, the only honeſt man upon the bench, gave no opinion at all. Perhaps it implies an abſurdity to demand ſureties of the peace from a libeller. However, what was done in the caſe of the ſeven biſhops, I am bold to deny was law.

Upon the whole, though it ſhould be admitted, that ſureties of the peace are requirable from Mr. Wilkes, ſtill his privilege of parliament will not be taken away till ſureties have been demanded and refuſed. Let him be diſcharged.

[This judgment for privilege of parliament in the caſe of libel, was taken into conſideration by both houſes at their firſt meeting afterwards. The diſcuſſion ended in a joint vote, by which it was reſolved, "that the privilege of parliament doth not extend to the caſe of writing and publiſhing ſeditious libels, nor ought to be allowed to obſtruct the ordinary courſe of the laws in the ſpeedy and effectual proſecution of ſo heinous and dangerous an offence." Almon's Deb. Comm. for 1763. This reſolution was not carried without a very ſtrong conteſt. Of the debates on this occaſion, no regular account has been yet publiſhed. But the Annual Regiſter for 1763, gives a general view of the chief topicks on each ſide; and the proteſt made againſt the reſolution in the houſe of lords, contains a maſterly and ſpirited argument againſt thus narrowing the privilege of parliament. This proteſt will appear by the following extract from the journal of the lords.]

Extract from the Journal of the Lords.

Die Martis, 29 Novembris, 1763.

THE order of the day for reſuming the adjourned conſideration of the report of the conference with the commons of Friday laſt being read;

The third reſolution of the commons was read, as follows:

'Reſolved, by the commons in parliament aſſembled,

'That privilege of parliament does not extend to the caſe of writing and publiſhing ſeditious libels, nor ought to be allowed to obſtruct the ordinary courſe of the laws, in the ſpeedy and effectual proſecution of ſo heinous and dangerous an offence.'

And it being moved to agree with the commons in the ſaid reſolution;

The ſame was objected to. After long debate thereupon,

The queſtion was put, whether to agree with the commons in the ſaid reſolution?

It was reſolved in the affirmative.

Diſſentient,

Becauſe we cannot hear without the utmoſt concern and aſtoniſhment, a doctrine advanced now, for the firſt time, in this houſe, which we apprehend to be new, dangerous, and unwarrantable, viz. that the perſonal privilege of both houſes of parliament has never held, and ought not to hold, in the caſe of any criminal proſecution whatſoever; by which, all the records of parliament, all hiſtory, all the authorities of the graveſt and ſobereſt judges, are entirely reſcinded; and the fundamental principles of the conſtitution, with regard to the independence of parliament, torn up and buried under the ruins of our moſt eſtabliſhed rights.

We are at a loſs to conceive, with what view ſuch a ſacrifice ſhould be propoſed, unleſs to amplify, in effect, the juriſdiction of the inferior, by annihilating the ancient immunities of this ſuperior court.

The very queſtion itſelf, propoſed to us from the commons, and now agreed to by the lords, from the letter and ſpirit of it, contradicts this aſſertion; for, whilſt it only narrows privilege in criminal matters, it eſtabliſhes the principle. The law of privilege, touching impriſonment of the perſons of lords of parliament, as ſtated by the two ſtanding orders, declares generally, that no lord of parliament, ſitting the parliament, or within the uſual times of privilege of parliament, is to be impriſoned or reſtrained, without ſentence or order of the houſe, unleſs it be for treaſon or felony, or for refuſing to give ſecurity for the peace, and refuſal to pay obedience to a writ of habeas corpus.

The firſt of theſe orders was made after long conſideration, upon a diſpute with the king, when the precedents of both houſes had been fully inſpected, commented upon, reported, and entered in the journals, and after the king's counſel had been heard. It was made in ſober times, and by a houſe of peers, not only loyal, but devoted to the crown; and it was made by the unanimous conſent of all, not one diſſenting. Theſe circumſtances of ſolemnity, deliberation, and unanimity, are ſo ſingular and extraordinary, that the like are ſcarce to be found in any inſtance among the records of parliament.

When the two caſes of ſurety for the peace, and habeas corpus, come to be well conſidered, it will be found that they both breathe the ſame ſpirit, and grow out of the ſame principle.

The offences, that call for ſurety and habeas corpus, are both caſes of preſent continuing violence; the proceedings in both have the ſame end, viz. to repreſs the force, and to diſarm the offender. The proceeding ſtops in both when that end is attained; the offence is not proſecuted or puniſhed in either; the neceſſity is equal in both, and, if privilege was allowed in either, ſo long as the neceſſity laſts, a lord of parliament would enjoy a mightier prerogative than the crown itſelf is intitled to. Laſtly, they both leave the proſecution of all miſdemeanours ſtill under privilege, and do not derogate from that great fundamental, that none ſhall be arreſted in the courſe of proſecution for any crime under treaſon and felony.

Theſe two orders compriſe the whole law of privilege, and are both of them ſtanding orders, and conſequently the fixed laws of the houſe, by which we are all bound until they are duly repealed.

The reſolution of the other houſe, now agreed to, is a direct contradiction to the rule of parliamentary privilege, laid down in the aforeſaid ſtanding orders, both in letter and ſpirit. Before the reaſons are ſtated, it will be proper to premiſe two obſervations.

Firſt, that in all caſes where ſecurity of the peace may be required, the lord cannot be committed till that ſecurity is refuſed, and conſequently the magiſtrate will be guilty of a breach of privilege, if he commits the offender without demanding that ſecurity.

Secondly, although the ſecurity ſhould be refuſed, yet, if the party is committed generally, the magiſtrate is guilty of a breach of privilege, becauſe the party refuſing ought only to be committed till he has found ſureties; whereas, by general commitment, he is held faſt, even though he ſhould give ſureties, and can only be diſcharged by giving bail for his appearance.

This being premiſed, the firſt objection is to the generality of this reſolution, which, as it is penned, denies the privilege to the ſuppoſed libeller, not only where he refuſes to give ſureties, but likewiſe throughout the whole proſecution, from the beginning to the end; ſo that, although he ſhould ſubmit to be bound, he may, notwithſtanding, be afterwards arreſted, tried, convicted, and puniſhed, ſitting the parliament, and without leave of the houſe, wherein the law of privilege is fundamentally miſunderſtood, by which no commitment whatſoever is tolerated, but that only which is made upon the refuſal of the ſureties, or in the other excepted caſes of treaſon or felony, and the habeas corpus.

If privilege will not hold throughout in the caſe of a ſeditious libel, it muſt be becauſe that offence is ſuch a breach of the peace, for which ſureties may be demanded; and if it be ſo, it will readily be admitted, that the caſe comes within the exception, ‘ provided always, that ſureties have been refuſed, and that the party is committed only till he ſhall give ſureties.’

But firſt, this offence is not a breach of the peace; it does not fall within any definition of a breach of the peace, given by any of the good writers upon that ſubject; all which breaches, from menace to actual wounding, either alone or with a multitude, are deſcribed to be acts of violence againſt the perſons, goods, or poſſeſſions, putting the ſubject in fear by blows, threats or geſtures. Nor is this caſe of the libeller ever enumerated in any of theſe writers among the breaches of peace; on the contrary, it is always deſcribed as an act tending to excite, provoke, or produce, breaches of the peace; and although a ſecretary of ſtate may be pleaſed to add the enflaming epithets of treaſonable, traiterous, or ſeditious, to a particular paper, yet no words are ſtrong enough to alter the nature of things. To ſay then, that a libel, poſſibly productive of ſuch a conſequence, is the very conſequence ſo produced, is, in other words, to declare, that the cauſe and the effect are the ſame thing.

But, ſecondly, if a libel could poſſibly, by any abuſe of language, or has any where been called, inadvertently, a breach of the peace, there is not the leaſt colour to ſay, that the libeller can be bound to give ſureties for the peace, for the following reaſons:

Becauſe none can be ſo bound, unleſs he be taken in the actual commitment of a breach of the peace; ſtriking, or putting ſome one or more of his majeſty’s ſubjects in fear:

Becauſe there is no authority, or even ambiguous hint, in any lawbook, that he may be ſo bound:

Becauſe no libeller, in fact, was ever ſo bound:

Becauſe no crown lawyer, in the moſt deſpotic times, ever inſiſted he ſhould be ſo bound, even in days when the preſs ſwarmed with the moſt invenomed and virulent libels, and when the proſecutions raged with ſuch uncommon fury againſt this ſpecies of offenders; when the law of libels was ranſacked every term; when loſs of ears, perpetual impriſonment, baniſhment, and fines of ten and twenty thouſand pounds, were the common judgments in the Star-chamber; and when the crown had aſſumed an uncontroulable authority over the preſs.

Thirdly, this reſolution does not only infringe the privilege of parliament, but points to the reſtraint of the perſonal liberty of every common ſubject in theſe realms, ſeeing that it does, in effect, affirm, that all men, without exception, may be bound to the peace for this offence.

By this doctrine every man’s liberty, privileged as well as unprivileged, is ſurrendered into the hands of a ſecretary of ſtate. He is by this means impowered, in the firſt inſtance, to pronounce the paper to be a ſeditious libel; a matter of ſuch difficulty, that ſome have pretended, it is too high to be intruſted to a ſpecial jury of the firſt rank and condition: he is to underſtand, and decide by himſelf, the meaning of every inuendo: he is to determine the tendency thereof, and brand it with his own epithets: he is to adjudge the party guilty, and make him author or publiſher, as he ſees good: and laſtly, he is to give ſentence by committing the party. All theſe authorities are given to one ſingle magiſtrate, unaſſiſted by counſel, evidence, or jury, in a caſe where the law ſays, no action will lie againſt him, becauſe he acts in the capacity of a judge.

From what has been obſerved, it appears to us, that the exception of a ſeditious libel from privilege is neither founded on uſage or written precedents, and therefore this reſolution is of the firſt impreſſion; nay, it is not only a new law, narrowing the known and ancient rule, but it is likewiſe a law ex poſt facto, pendente lite, et ex parte, now firſt declared to meet with the circumſtances of a particular caſe; and it muſt be further conſidered, that this houſe is thus called upon to give a ſanction to the determinations of the other, who have not condeſcended to confer with us upon this point till they had prejudged it themſelves.

This method of relaxing the rule of privilege, caſe by caſe, is pregnant with this farther inconvenience, that it renders the rule precarious and uncertain. Who can foretel where the houſe will ſtop, when they have, by one infringement of their own ſtanding orders, made a precedent, whereon future infringements may, with equal reaſon, be founded? How ſhall the ſubject be able to proceed with ſafety in this perilous buſineſs? How can the judges decide on theſe or the like queſtions, if privilege is no longer to be found in records and journals, and ſtanding orders? Upon any occaſion privilege may be enlarged, and no court will venture for the future, without trembling, either to recognize or to deny it.

We manifeſtly ſee this effect of excluding, by a general reſolution, one bailable offence from privilege to-day, that it will be a precedent for doing ſo by another, upon ſome future occaſion, till, inſtead of privilege holding in every caſe not excepted, it will, at laſt, come to hold in none but ſuch as are expreſsly ſaved.

When the caſe of the habeas corpus is relied upon, as a precedent to enforce the declaration, the argument only ſhews, that the miſchief aforementioned has taken place already, ſince one alteration, though a very juſt one, not at all applicable to the preſent queſtion, is produced to juſtify another that is unwarrantable.

But it is ſtrongly objected, that if privilege be allowed in this caſe, a lord of parliament might endanger the conſtitution by a continual attack of ſucceſſive libels; and if ſuch a perſon ſhould be ſuffered to eſcape, under the ſhelter of privilege, with perpetual impunity, all government would be overturned; and therefore it is inexpedient to allow the privilege now, when the time of privilege, by prorogations, is continued for ever, without an interval.

This objection ſhall be anſwered in two ways. Firſt, if inexpediency is to deſtroy perſonal privilege in this caſe of a ſeditious libel, it is at leaſt as inexpedient, that other great miſdemeanors ſhould ſtand under the like protection of privilege; neither is it expedient, that the ſmaller offences ſhould be exempt from a proſecution in the perſon of a lord of parliament; ſo that if this argument of inexpediency is to prevail, it muſt prevail throughout, and ſubvert the whole law of privilege in criminal matters; in which method of reaſoning there is this fault, that the argument proves too much.

If this inconvenience be indeed grievous, the fault is not in the law of privilege, but in the change of times, and in the management of prorogations by the ſervants of the crown, which are ſo contrived, as not to leave an hour open for juſtice. Let the objection nevertheleſs be allowed in its utmoſt extent, and then compare the inexpediency of not immediately proſecuting on one ſide, with the inexpediency of ſtripping the parliament of all protection from privilege on the other. Unhappy as the option is, the public would rather wiſh to ſee the proſecution for crimes ſuſpended, than the parliament totally unprivileged; although, notwithſtanding this pretended inconvenience is ſo warmly magnified on the preſent occaſion, we are not appriſed that any ſuch inconvenience has been felt, though the privilege has been enjoyed time immemorial.

But the ſecond and beſt anſwer, becauſe it removes all pretence of grievance, is this, that this houſe, upon complaint made, has the power (which it will exert in favour of juſtice) to deliver up the offender to proſecution.

It is a diſhonourable and an undeſerved imputation upon the lords, to ſuppoſe, even in argument, that they would nouriſh an impious criminal in their boſoms, againſt the call of offended juſtice, and the demand of their country.

It is true, however, and it is hoped, that this houſe will always ſee (as every magiſtrate ought that does not betray his truſt) that their member is properly charged; but when that ground is once laid, they would be aſhamed to protect the offender one moment. Surely this truſt (which has never yet been abuſed) is not too great to be repoſed in the high court of parliament! While it is lodged there, the public juſtice is in ſafe hands, and the privilege untouched; whereas, on the contrary, if for the ſake of coming at the criminal at once, without this application to the houſe, perſonal privilege is taken away, not only the offender, but the whole parliament, at the ſame time, is delivered up to the crown.

It is not to be conceived, that our anceſtors, when they framed the law of privilege, would have left the caſe of a ſeditious libel (as it is called) the only unprivileged miſdemeanor. Whatever elſe they had given up to the crown, they would have guarded the caſe of ſuppoſed libels above all others with privilege, as being moſt likely to be abuſed by outrageous and vindictive proſecutions.

But this great privilege had a much deeper reach. It was wiſely planned, and hath hitherto, through all times, been reſolutely maintained.

It was not made to ſcreen criminals, but to preſerve the very being and life of parliament; for when our anceſtors conſidered, that the law had lodged the great powers of arreſt, indictment, and information, in the crown, they ſaw the parliament would be undone, if, during the time of privilege, the royal proceſs ſhould be admitted in any miſdemeanour whatſoever. Therefore they excepted none. Where the abuſe of power would be fatal, the power ought never to be given; becauſe redreſs comes too late.

A parliament under perpetual terror of impriſonment can neither be free, nor bold, nor honeſt; and if this privilege was once removed, the moſt important queſtion might be irrecoverably loſt, or carried by a ſudden irruption of meſſengers, let looſe againſt the members half an hour before the debate.

Laſtly, as it has already been obſerved, the caſe of ſuppoſed libels is, of all others, the moſt dangerous and alarming to be left open to proſecution during the time of privilege.

If the ſeverity of the law touching libels, as it hath ſometimes been laid down, be duly weighed, it muſt ſtrike both houſes of parliament with terror and diſmay.

The repetition of a libel, the delivery of it unread to another, is ſaid to be a publication; nay, the bare poſſeſſion of it has been deemed criminal, unleſs it is immediately deſtroyed, or carried to a magiſtrate.

Every lord of parliament then, who hath done this, who is falſely accuſed, nay, who is, though without any information, named in the ſecretary of ſtate’s warrant, has loſt his privilege by this reſolution, and lies at the mercy of that great enemy to learning and liberty, the meſſenger of the preſs.

For theſe and many other forcible reaſons, we hold it highly unbecoming the dignity, gravity, and wiſdom of the houſe of peers, as well as their juſtice, thus judicially to explain away and diminiſh the privilege of their perſons, founded in the wiſdom of ages, declared with preciſion in our ſtanding orders, ſo repeatedly confirmed, and hitherto preſerved inviolable by the ſpirit of our anceſtors, called to it only by the other houſe, on a particular occaſion, and to ſerve a particular purpoſe, ex poſt facto, ex parte, et pendente lite in the courts below.

No. III. Proceedings on Error in an Action of falſe Impriſonment by Dryden Leach, againſt John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, three King's Meſſengers, King's-Bench, Eaſter Term, 5 G. III. and Michaelmas Term, 6 Geo. III. 1765.

[Theſe proceedings, though in the caſe of a civil action, fully come within the idea of a ſtate trial. They grew out of the proſecutions for the printing and publiſhing No. 45. of the political paper called The North-Briton, and involve the diſcuſſion of ſeveral points relative to matters of the moſt public nature, namely, the magiſterial powers claimed as incident to the office of ſecretary of ſtate, the ſeizure of papers, and the legality of general warrants. The caſe is entirely taken from ſir James Burrow's report. See 3 Burr. 1692 and 1742. Eaſter term, Friday 17 May, 1765.]

Eaſter Term, 5 Geo. III.

SOON after the court ſat, the lord chief juſtice Pratt came perſonally into court, to confeſs (ore tenus) his ſeal put to a bill of exceptions in this caſe; purſuant to the requiſition of the following writ, viz.

'George the third, &c.—To our truſty and well-beloved Charles Pratt, knight, our chief juſtice of the bench, greeting.---Whereas we have lately been informed that in the record and proceſs, and alſo in giving of judgment in a plaint which was in our court before you and your aſſociates, our juſtices of the ſaid bench, by our writ, between Dryden Leach, and John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, in a plea of treſpaſs, aſſault, and impriſonment, manifeſt error hath intervened, to the great damage of the ſaid John James and Robert; which ſaid record and proceſs, for the error aforeſaid, we have cauſed to be brought into our court before us; and now, on the behalf of the ſaid John James and Robert, we are informed, in our ſaid court before us, that at the trial of the iſſue firſt joined between the ſaid parties in the plea aforeſaid, the counſel, learned in the law, of the ſaid John James and Robert alledged on their behalf certain exceptions to the opinion then declared and given by you; and that the ſaid exceptions were then and there written in a certain bill, to which you put your ſeal, at the requeſt of the ſaid John James and Robert, according to the form of the ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided; and the ſaid John James and Robert have brought into our court before us the ſaid bill, with your ſeal put to the ſame, as it is ſaid; whereupon the ſaid John James and Robert have beſought us to do what further ſhould ſeem meet to be done in this behalf, according to the form of the ſaid ſtatute; and foraſmuch as by the ſaid ſtatute it is ordained, that in ſuch caſe the juſtice whoſe ſeal ſhould be put to ſuch exception be commanded to appear before us at a certain day, to confeſs or deny his ſeal; therefore we command you that you perſonally appear before us, on the morrow of the aſcenſion of our Lord, whereſoever we ſhall then be in England, to confeſs or deny the ſeal ſo put to the ſaid bill of exceptions as aforeſaid to be your ſeal, according to the form and effect of the ſaid ſtatute; and that you bring with you, at the ſame time, this writ. Witneſs William lord Mansfield, at Weſtminſter, the 24th day of April, in the fifth year of our reign.'

N. B. The bill of exceptions, ſealed by lord chief juſtice Pratt, had been previouſly brought into this court, and was now in the hands of Mr. Owen, as ſecondary of the office of pleas; and all the proceedings, down to and including the abovementioned writ, were entered upon the rolls of this court.

The lord chief juſtice Pratt being now come into this court, purſuant to the command contained in the ſaid writ, delivered it to the lord chief juſtice of this court; Mr. Owen, at the ſame time, delivering the original bill of exceptions into lord Mansfield's hand. Whereupon lord Mansfield, ſhewing to lord chief juſtice Pratt the ſeal thereto affixed, aſked him, 'Whether that was his lordſhip's ſeal, or not.' To which queſtion his lordſhip anſwering in the affirmative, lord Mansfield redelivered the bill of exceptions to Mr. Owen; at the ſame time delivering to him the abovementioned writ, with orders 'that it ſhould be filed.'

> Note --There was no written return to this writ; but Mr. Owen propoſes to indorſe upon it---'Sir Charles Pratt, knight, the chief juſtice within named, perſonally appeared in the court of the lord the king, before the king himſelf, &c. on the day within written; and confeſſeth that the ſeal put to the bill of exceptions within mentioned is his ſeal.'

Mich. Term, 6 Geo. III. Roll 60.

ERRORS having been aſſigned upon the bill of exceptions mentioned above, they now came on to be argued.

This was an action of treſpaſs † brought in the court of Common Pleas by Dryden Leach, againſt three king's meſſengers, John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, for breaking and entering the plaintiff's houſe, and impriſoning him, without any lawful or probable cauſe; to the plaintiff's damage of 2000l.

The defendants below pleaded two pleas. The firſt was the general iſſue, 'Not guilty:' on which iſſue was joined.

The other plea (pleaded by leave of the court) was a ſpecial juſtification, as to the breaking and entering of the plaintiff's dwelling-houſe, and ſtaying and continuing therein for ſix hours, and making the aſſault upon him, and ſeizing, taking, and impriſoning him, and keeping and detaining him in priſon for four days: as to all which, they ſay, That before the commitment of the ſuppoſed treſpaſs, viz. on 19th April 1763, the king made a ſpeech from the throne, &c. in which ſpeech was contained the following declaration, &c. &c. That on the 23d April 1763, a certain ſeditious and ſcandalous libel or compoſition, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45.' was unlawfully and ſeditiouſly compoſed, printed and publiſhed, concerning the king and his ſaid ſpeech; in which libel were contained, &c. &c. &c. That the earl of Halifax was then one of the privy council, and one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate; and that information was given to him of the ſaid publication of the aforeſaid libel; and the ſaid libel was then ſhewn and produced to the ſaid earl; and he thereupon in due manner iſſued his warrant in writing under his hand and ſeal, directed to Nathan Carrington and theſe three defendants, who were then four of his majeſty's meſſengers in ordinary; by which warrant, the ſaid earl did in his majeſty's name authorize and require them, taking a conſtable to their aſſiſtance, to make ſtrict and diligent ſearch for the ſaid authors, printers and publiſhers of the aforeſaid ſeditious libel, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45, April the 23d, 1763;' and them or any of them having found, to apprehend and ſeize, together with their papers, and to bring in ſafe cuſtody before the ſaid earl, to be examined concerning the premiſſes, and to be further dealt with according to law: in the due execution whereof, all mayors, ſheriffs, juſtices of the peace, conſtables, and all others his ſaid majeſty's meſſengers, officers civil and military, and loving ſubjects whom it might concern, were to be aiding and aſſiſting to them the ſaid Nathan Carrington, John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, as there ſhould be occaſion. They further ſay, that for forty-four weeks and upwards before the iſſuing of the ſaid warrant, certain weekly compoſitions, intitled, 'The North Briton,' and reſpectively numbered in a progreſſive order, had been printed and publiſhed on Saturday in every week; and that the ſaid ſeditious libel, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45. Saturday April the 23d, 1763,' was one of the ſaid weekly compoſitions. They ſay that the plaintiff followed and exerciſed the art and buſineſs of a printer; and did in fact print and cauſe to be printed one of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, intitled, 'The North Briton;' to wit, the North Briton, No. 26. and that after the iſſuing of the aforeſaid warrant, and before the committing of the ſaid ſuppoſed treſpaſs, to wit, on the 27th of April, 1763, Information was given to them the defendants, 'that the ſaid Dryden Leach and his ſervants were the printers of the aforeſaid ſeditious libel, intitled, 'The North Briton No. 45. Saturday, April the 23d, 1763.' Wherefore the defendants, being his majeſty's meſſengers in ordinary as aforeſaid, took to their aſſiſtance a certain conſtable, to wit, one Thomas Freeman, who was then a conſtable of the pariſh of St. Margaret, Weſtminſter, in the county of Middleſex, to aid them in the execution of the aforeſaid warrant; and, together with the ſaid conſtable, entered into the aforeſaid dwelling-houſe of the ſaid Dryden Leach, in which the ſaid Dryden Leach carried on his aforeſaid buſineſs of a printer, the door thereof being then open, to ſearch for the printers of the ſaid ſeditious libel, in order to carry them before the ſaid earl of Halifax, to be examined concerning the ſame: and thereupon, the ſaid defendants, together with the conſtable aforeſaid, did then and there find, within the ſame houſe, a newly-printed copy of one of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, intitled, 'The North Briton,' and alſo an unfiniſhed copy of part of another of the ſaid compoſitions then alſo newly printed, and which ſaid newly-printed copies were part of a new edition, which the ſaid Dryden Leach and his ſervants were then and there reprinting, of the aforeſaid weekly compoſitions. Whereupon the defendants, together with the conſtable abovenamed, did gently lay their hands on the ſaid Dryden Leach, and ſeized and took him into their cuſtody, in order to bring him before the ſaid earl of Halifax, to be examined concerning the ſaid ſeditious libel; and in ſo ſearching for the printers of the ſeditious libel, and ſeizing and taking the ſaid Dryden as aforeſaid, did then and there neceſſarily ſtay and continue in the ſaid houſe of the ſaid Dryden for the ſpace of ſix hours, part of the time in the declaration mentioned. And becauſe the ſaid earl of Halifax was, during all the ſaid ſpace of four days, part of the aforeſaid five days in the ſaid declaration mentioned, employed in other buſineſs belonging to his ſaid office of ſecretary of ſtate, ſo that the ſaid Dryden Leach could not then, or during the ſaid four days be brought before the ſaid earl for the purpoſe aforeſaid, they the ſaid defendants, together with the conſtable aforeſaid, did keep and detain the ſaid Dryden Leach in their cuſtody for the ſaid ſpace of four days, part of the ſaid time in the declaration mentioned, in order to carry him before the ſaid earl of Halifax for the purpoſe aforeſaid. They further ſay, that at the end of the aforeſaid four days, and not before, upon the examination of the ſaid Dryden Leach and certain other perſons who were then and there examined concerning the premiſſes, it appeared to the ſaid earl of Halifax, ‘ that the ſaid Dryden Leach did not print the ſaid ſeditious libel intitled “ The North Briton, No. 45. Saturday April the 23d, 1763:” and thereupon, the ſaid defendants, by the command of the ſaid earl of Halifax, did then and there releaſe the ſaid Dryden Leach out of their cuſtody, and diſcharged and ſet him free from that impriſonment. Which are the ſame breaking and entering of the aforeſaid dwelling-houſe of the ſaid Dryden Leach, in the declaration mentioned, in which, &c. and ſtaying and continuing therein for the ſpace of ſix hours, part of the time in the ſame declaration mentioned; and alſo as to the making of the aforeſaid aſſault upon the ſaid Dryden Leach, and ſeizing, taking and impriſoning of the ſaid Dryden Leach, and detaining him in priſon for the ſpace of four days, part of the ſaid time in the ſaid declaration mentioned, above ſuppoſed to have been done by the defendants, whereof the ſaid Dryden hath above complained againſt them. And this they are ready to verify. Wherefore they pray judgment, if the ſaid Dryden ought to have or maintain his aforeſaid action thereof againſt them, &c.

† See the 549th and 559th rolls of C.B. of Mich. term, 4 G. 3. and below at large.

The plaintiff replied, as to the ſaid plea in bar as to the breaking and entering the dwelling-houſe, and ſtaying and continuing there ſix hours (part of the time in the declaration mentioned), and alſo as to the making of the aſſault upon him, and ſeizing, taking and impriſoning of him, and keeping and detaining him in priſon for four days (part of the time in the declaration mentioned); that the defendants, of their own wrong and without the cauſe by them in their plea alledged, broke and entered his dwelling-houſe, and ſtaid and continued therein for ſix hours, and made an aſſault upon him, and ſeized, took and impriſoned him, and kept and detained him in priſon for the four days in the plea mentioned (part of the time in the declaration mentioned), in manner and form as he has above complained againſt them. And upon this iſſue was joined.

The cauſe came on to be tried before lord chief juſtice Pratt, on the 10th of December 1763, at Guildhall: and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff upon both iſſues; and gave him damages 400*l.* beſides his coſts and charges, &c. On the 16th of June 1764, judgment was ſigned for the plaintiff, for 400*l.* damages, and 51*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* coſts.

At the trial, a bill of exceptions was tendered and received; which ſtated the iſſues, the coming on to trial, &c. and the evidence, and deſcribed a printed paper, intitled, ‘ The North Briton, No. 45.’ and the information given thereof to the ſecretary of ſtate, and his warrant to the defendants below, together with another king's meſſenger, Nathan Carrington; and what Mr. Carrington had been told of Mr. Leach's being the printer of it; and their thereupon entering his houſe, and finding ſome of the other numbers of the ſame paper newly printed by him; and their thereupon taking him into cuſtody, in order to carry him before the earl of Halifax, one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate; and that he, appearing not to be either author, printer or publiſher of the ſaid paper, called, ‘ The North Briton, No. 45,’ was diſcharged by them, by the earl's order, without being ever carried before him. They ſay, that their evidence intitled them to the benefit of the ſtatute of 24 George 2. c. 44. Though it was denied by the counſel for the plaintiff Leach, that either they or the ſecretary of ſtate himſelf were within that ſtatute, or thoſe of 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. or 21 Jac. 1. c. 12. (the former of which, being only temporary, was made perpetual by the latter, and by which liberty is given to juſtices of peace and all others acting under their command ‘ to plead the general iſſue, and give the ſpecial matter in evidence.’)

That the chief juſtice of the Common Pleas was of opinion, ‘ that their evidence was not ſufficient to bar the plaintiff of his action:’ whereas, the bill of exceptions inſiſts ‘ that it was.’

This bill of exceptions being ſealed, and the ſeal acknowledged, as is beforementioned, the defendants below aſſign errors: and a joinder in error was put in by the plaintiff Leach.

The aſſignment of errors was to the following effect: (It may be ſeen at large, in the 60th roll of Eaſter term, 5 Geo. 3. B. R.)

The defendants come, on Wedneſday next after fifteen days of Eaſter, 4 Geo. 3. before our lord the king at Weſtminſter, and ſay, That at the trial, their counſel propoſed exceptions to the opinion of the lord chief juſtice Pratt; which exceptions were written in a bill, and ſealed by the chief juſtice: which bill of exceptions the defendants now bring into this court, and pray a writ to the chief juſtice, to confeſs or deny his ſeal; which writ is granted to them, returnable on the morrow of the aſcenſion. At which day, before our lord the king at Weſtminſter, come the defendants in their proper perſon, and the ſaid chief juſtice of the Common Pleas likewiſe in his proper perſon, and acknowledges his ſeal put to the ſaid bill of exceptions. [The form and ceremony of his doing this may be ſeen in the preceding page] Then they ſet out the bill of exceptions, verbatim, ‘ Be it remembered, &c.’ It recites all the proceedings particularly and minutely, from the very beginning to the end, concluding with the verdict of the jury: which it would be tedious to repeat, as they have been already ſufficiently ſpecified. (They are entered upon the rolls 549 and 550 of the court of Common Pleas, in Michaelmas term, 4 Geo. 3.) The defendants (now become plaintiffs in error) then alledge, (in their ſaid bill of exceptions) that upon the trial, the counſel for the plaintiff Leach, in order to prove the defendants guilty of the treſpaſs, gave in evidence, ‘ that on the 29th of April 1763, the defendants entered the plaintiff's dwelling-houſe, ſearched it, and continued in it four hours; ſeized and took Leach into their cuſtody againſt his will and conſent; and kept and detained him in their cuſtody againſt his will and conſent for four days:’ which was all the treſpaſs, aſſault and impriſonment, committed by the defendants, or any of them. Whereupon their counſel, in order to bar the ſaid action, and to acquit them thereof under the general iſſue above pleaded, gave in evidence and proved, ‘ That before the committing of the treſpaſs, the king made a ſpeech from the throne, &c. containing the ſeveral expreſſions ſtated in the ſecond plea of the defendants; and that afterwards and before the ſuppoſed treſpaſs, a paper, intitled, The North Briton, No. 45. &c. was printed and publiſhed; and that the ſame contained the ſeveral matters ſet forth in their ſaid ſecond plea:’ and it was proved on their behalf, ‘ that the earl of Halifax was, all that time, one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and one of the privy council; and that information was given to him of the ſaid publication of the abovementioned paper; and the ſame was then ſhewn to him; and that thereupon the ſaid earl iſſued his warrant in writing, under his hand and ſeal, directed to Nathan Carrington and the defendants, who were then four of his majeſty's meſſengers in ordinary.’ And their counſel then produced and gave in evidence the warrant aforeſaid, which was in the words and figures following, that is to ſay, ‘ George Montagu Dunk, earl of Halifax, viſcount Sunbury, and baron Halifax, one of the lords of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy council, lieutenant-general of his majeſty's forces, and principal ſecretary of ſtate, &c.—Theſe are in his majeſty's name to authorize and require you, taking a conſtable to your aſſiſtance, to make ſtrict and diligent ſearch for the authors, printers and publiſhers of a ſeditious and treaſonable paper, intitled, The North Briton, No. 45. Saturday April 23, 1763, printed for G. Kearſly in Ludgate Street, London; and them or any of them having found, to apprehend and ſeize, together with their papers, and to bring in ſafe cuſtody before me, to be examined concerning the premiſſes, and further dealt with according to law. In the due execution whereof, all mayors, ſheriffs, juſtices of the peace, conſtables, and all others his majeſty's officers civil and military, and loving ſubjects whom it may concern, are to be aiding and aſſiſting to you, as there ſhall be occaſion. And for your ſo doing, this ſhall be your warrant. Given at St. James's, the 26th day of April 1763, in the third year of his majeſty's reign. Dunk Halifax. To Nathan Carrington, John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, four of his majeſty's meſſengers in ordinary.’ And it was farther proved on behalf of the ſaid defendants, ‘ that ſeveral of the like warrants had been granted, at different times, from the time of the Revolution to the preſent time, by the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and had been executed by the meſſengers in ordinary for the time being; and that the paper in the ſaid warrant deſcribed was the ſaid paper ſo printed and publiſhed as aforeſaid; and that the warrant aforeſaid, before the committing of the ſuppoſed treſpaſs, to wit, on the 26th day of April aforeſaid, in the year of our Lord 1763, was delivered to the defendants, to be executed;’ and ‘ that they were then three of his majeſty's meſſengers in ordinary, and ſtill are ſo.’ It was alſo proved, on their behalf, that ‘ for forty weeks and upwards next before the iſſuing of the aforeſaid warrant, certain weekly compoſitions, intitled, ‘ The North Briton,’ had been printed and publiſhed on Saturday on every week; and that the aforeſaid paper, intitled, ‘ The North Briton, No. 45, Saturday April 23, 1763,’ deſcribed in the ſaid warrant, being one of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, was printed and publiſhed before the iſſuing of the ſaid warrant, to wit, on the 23d day of April 1763; and that after the iſſuing of the abovementioned warrant, and before the committing of the ſaid ſuppoſed treſpaſs, to wit, on the 28th day of April, in the year aforeſaid, the defendants were informed by Nathan Carrington, one other of the meſſengers in the ſaid warrant named, and one of the perſons to whom the ſaid warrant was directed, that from the information he had received, he was of opinion, that the ſaid Dryden Leach, who then and long before was, and ſtill is a printer in the city of London aforeſaid, was the printer of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, intitled, ‘ The North Briton;’ for that he the ſaid Carrington had been informed that one Mr. Wilkes, a perſon ſuppoſed to be the author of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, had been ſeen frequently to go into the ſaid Mr. Leach's houſe; and that an old printer, whoſe name he the ſaid Carrington did not mention to the defendants, had told him, that the ſaid Mr. Leach was the printer of the ſaid compoſitions; and that thereupon the defendants took to their aſſiſtance a conſtable, and with the conſtable entered Leach's dwelling-houſe (the door being open) to ſearch for the ſaid Leach and his books and papers; and to bring him, together with his books and papers, in ſafe cuſtody, before the ſaid earl of Halifax, to be examined concerning the premiſſes, and to be further dealt with according to law; and upon that occaſion did ſearch the ſaid houſe, and neceſſarily continued therein for the ſaid ſpace four hours.’ And it was further given in evidence and proved, on the part of the ſaid defendants, ‘ That upon that ſearch, the defendants did find Leach in the ſaid houſe, and did alſo then find a newly-printed ſheet, containing a copy of one of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, intitled, ‘ The North Briton, No. 1.’ and part of a copy of another of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, intitled, ‘ The North Briton, No. 2.’ which ſheet was printed by the ſaid Dryden Leach.’ And it was further proved, ‘ that the ſaid Dryden Leach did alſo print one of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, intitled, ‘ The North Briton, No. 26.’ And the defendants, with the aſſiſtance of the conſtable, did ſeize and take into their cuſtody the ſaid Dryden Leach, in order to bring him in ſafe cuſtody before the ſaid earl of Halifax, to be examined concerning the premiſſes; and on that occaſion did keep and detain him in their cuſtody for the ſpace of four days; at the end of which time, it appearing by the examinations of divers perſons then taken, touching the author, printer and publiſher of the ſaid paper, that the ſaid Dryden Leach was not the author, printer or publiſher thereof, the defendants, by the command of the ſaid earl of Halifax, releaſed and diſcharged him from that impriſonment: but the ſaid Dryden Leach was never carried before or examined by the ſaid earl of Halifax. And that the entering the houſe of the ſaid Dryden Leach, and ſearching the ſame, and taking into and detaining in their cuſtody him the ſaid Dryden Leach in the manner and on the occaſion herein before ſtated, were the whole of the treſpaſs, aſſault and impriſonment, committed by the ſaid defendants, or any of them.' But it was proved on the part of the ſaid Dryden Leach, 'that he was not the author, printer, or publiſher of the ſaid paper, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45.' in the ſaid warrant mentioned, nor of any other numbers of the ſaid weekly compoſitions, except as before ſtated.' Whereupon the counſel for the defendants inſiſted before the ſaid chief juſtice, that the ſaid ſeveral matters ſo produced and given in evidence on their part as aforeſaid, were ſufficient, and ought to be admitted and allowed as deciſive evidence to intitle them to the benefit of the ſtatute of 24 Geo. 2. intitled, 'An act for rendering juſtices of the peace more ſafe in the execution of their office, and for indemnifying conſtables and others acting in obedience to their warrants;' and that therefore the ſaid Dryden Leach ought to be barred of his aforeſaid action, and the ſaid defendants acquitted thereof. And thereupon the ſaid defendants, by their counſel aforeſaid, did then and there pray of the ſaid chief juſtice to admit and allow the ſaid matters and proof ſo produced and given in evidence for the ſaid defendants as aforeſaid, to be concluſive evidence to intitle the ſaid defendants to the benefit of the ſtatute aforeſaid, and to bar the ſaid Dryden Leach of his action aforeſaid. But to this, the counſel for the plaintiff then and there inſiſted before the chief juſtice, that the matters and evidence aforeſaid ſo produced and proved on the part of the defendants as aforeſaid, were not ſufficient, nor ought to be admitted or allowed to intitle the ſaid defendants to the benefit of the ſtatute aforeſaid, or to bar the ſaid Dryden Leach of his aforeſaid action; and that neither the ſaid defendants, or any of them, nor the ſaid earl of Halifax, were or was within the words or meaning of the ſtatute made in the ſeventh year of his late majeſty king James the firſt, intitled, 'An act for eaſe in pleading againſt troubleſome and contentious ſuits proſecuted againſt juſtices of the peace, mayors, conſtables, and certain other his majeſty's officers, for the lawful execution of their office;' nor of the ſtatute made in the twenty-firſt year of the reign of the ſame late king, intitled, 'An act to enlarge and make perpetual the act made for eaſe in pleading againſt troubleſome and contentious ſuits, proſecuted againſt juſtices of the peace, mayors, conſtables, and certain other his majeſty's officers, for the lawful execution of their office, made in the ſeventh year of his majeſty's moſt happy reign;' nor of the ſaid ſtatute made in the twenty-fourth year of the reign of his late majeſty king George the ſecond; nor in any wiſe intitled to the benefit of any of thoſe ſtatutes. And the counſel for the ſaid Dryden Leach further inſiſted, that the ſeizure and impriſonment of the ſaid Dryden Leach were not made and done in obedience to the ſaid warrant; nor had the ſaid defendants, or any of them, in that behalf, any authority thereby. And the ſaid chief juſtice did then and there declare and deliver his opinion to the jury aforeſaid, 'That the ſaid ſeveral matters ſo produced and proved on the part of the defendants were not, upon the whole caſe, ſufficient to bar the ſaid Dryden Leach of his aforeſaid action againſt them;' and, with that opinion, left the ſame to the ſaid jury. Whereupon the ſaid counſel for the ſaid defendants did then and there, on behalf of the ſaid defendants, except to the aforeſaid opinion of the ſaid chief juſtice; and inſiſted on the ſaid ſeveral matters and proofs as an abſolute bar to the aforeſaid action, by virtue of the laſt mentioned ſtatute. And inaſmuch as the ſaid ſeveral matters ſo produced and given in evidence on the part of the ſaid defendants, and by their counſel aforeſaid objected and inſiſted on as a bar to the action aforeſaid, do not appear by the record of the verdict aforeſaid, the ſaid counſel for the aforeſaid defendants did then and there propoſe their aforeſaid exception to the opinion of the ſaid chief juſtice, and requeſted the ſaid chief juſtice to put his ſeal to this bill of exception, containing the ſaid ſeveral matters ſo produced and given in evidence on the part of the ſaid defendants as aforeſaid, according to the form of the ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided: and thereupon the aforeſaid chief juſtice, at the requeſt of the ſaid counſel for the abovenamed defendants, did put his ſeal to this bill of exception, purſuant to the aforeſaid ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided, on the tenth day of December aforeſaid, in the ſaid fourth year of the reign of his ſaid preſent majeſty.

C. PRATT. L. S.

And hereupon the ſaid John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore ſay, that in the record and proceedings aforeſaid, and alſo in the matters recited and contained in the ſaid bill of exceptions, and alſo in giving the verdict upon the ſaid iſſue between the parties aforeſaid firſt above joined, and alſo in giving the judgment aforeſaid, there is manifeſt error, in this, that the ſaid chief juſtice, before whom, &c. at and upon the trial of the ſaid iſſue between the parties aforeſaid firſt above joined, did declare and deliver his opinion to the jury aforeſaid, 'That the ſaid ſeveral matters mentioned in the ſaid bill of exceptions, and ſo as aforeſaid produced and proved on the part of the ſaid John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, were not, upon the whole of the caſe, ſufficient to bar the ſaid Dryden Leach of his action aforeſaid againſt them;' and, with that opinion, left the ſame to the jury. There is alſo error in this, that by the record aforeſaid it appears, that the verdict aforeſaid was given upon the ſaid iſſue firſt above joined, for the ſaid Dryden Leach, againſt them the ſaid John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore: whereas, by the law of the land, the verdict on that iſſue ought to have been given for the ſaid John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, againſt the ſaid Dryden Leach. There is alſo error in this, that it appears by the record aforeſaid, that judgment in form aforeſaid was given for the ſaid Dryden Leach, againſt them the ſaid John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore: whereas, by the law of the land, the judgment aforeſaid ought to have been given for them the ſaid John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, againſt the ſaid Dryden Leach. And the ſaid John Money, James Watſon, and Robert Blackmore, pray that the judgment aforeſaid, for the errors aforeſaid, and others in the record and proceedings aforeſaid, may be reverſed, annulled, and altogether had for nothing; and that they may be reſtored to all which they have loſt by occaſion of the judgment aforeſaid, &c.

And hereupon, the ſaid Dryden Leach, in his proper perſon, voluntarily comes here into court, and prays leave to rejoin to the errors aforeſaid, before our lord the king, until on the morrow of the Holy Trinity, whereſoever, &c. and he hath it, &c. The ſame day is given to the ſaid J. M. J. W. and R. B. At which day come the parties aforeſaid in their proper perſons: and the ſaid Dryden Leach ſays, 'that there is not, either in the record and proceedings aforeſaid, or in the matters recited and contained in the ſaid bill of exceptions, or in giving the verdict aforeſaid, or in the judgment aforeſaid, any error;' and prays that the court here may proceed to the examination as well of the record and proceedings, as of the matters aforeſaid above aſſigned for error; and that the judgment aforeſaid may be affirmed in all things.

This caſe was firſt argued on Tueſday the 18th of June laſt, by Mr. Solicitor General De Grey for the plaintiffs in error; and by Mr. Dunning for the defendant in error.

Mr. De Grey divided his argument into three points.

1*ſt*, The defendants had a right to plead the general iſſue, and to give the ſpecial matter in evidence, under 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. Or, in other words, lord Halifax, the ſecretary of ſtate, was a juſtice of peace, within the intention of that act.

2*dly*, The evidence was ſufficient to intitle the defendants to a verdict. Which will take in both the validity of the warrant itſelf, and the manner of executing it.

3*dly*, They were alſo intitled to a verdict within the meaning of 24 Geo. 2. c. 44. the plaintiff not having obſerved the terms required by it.

Firſt point—Before the ſtatute of 7 Jac. c. 5. a matter of ſpecial juſtification could not be given in evidence by a juſtice of peace, upon the general iſſue pleaded by him.

The queſtion is—Who were meant, in that act of parliament, by juſtices of the peace.

Some perſons were, from ancient times, ſo, by office; ſome are ſo by ſpecial commiſſion; ſome, by corporation-charters; ſome, by tenure; ſome, by preſcription.

In the time of Edward the third, other perſons were authorized to act within particular diſtricts.

But the great officers of ſtate had the juriſdiction, as incident to their offices. So had, in ſome degree, coroners and other inferior officers.

The ſecretaries of ſtate muſt have had it as incident to an office, ſo anciently as to be coæval with the crown itſelf.

A ſtatute in Edward the firſt's reign ſays, * 'Deſouth le Petit Seale, ne iſſera deſormes nul briefe que touche lè common ley.' And lord Coke, in his comment upon it, in his 2 Inſt. 556. calls it the Signettum, the king's ſignet, which at the making of that ſtatute the king had; and ſays—'This ſeale is ever in the cuſtody of the principal ſecretary: and there be four clerks of the ſignet attending on him.'

This ſeal is as ancient as the crown; and the officer that keeps it, as ancient as the ſeal itſelf: and he is an officer well known, and recognized by many acts of parliament; and the king's warrants are counterſigned by him.

In caſes of treaſon, and of felony, the courts of law recognize his authority: and there is equal reaſon for it, in caſes of miſdemeanour; which equally affect government, and diſturb the public peace.

A ſeditious libel is an offence againſt government and the public peace; and effectually undermines government.

A ſecretary of ſtate is a centinel for the public peace: it is his duty to prevent the violation of it, and to bring the offenders to juſtice; and it is neceſſary that he ſhould be inveſted with this power, in order to enable him to execute this his duty.

The caſe of Rex v. Kendal and Roe, 1 Salk. 347†. has ſettled this point, as to treaſon: for it was there holden, 'that ſecretaries of ſtate might commit for ſuſpicion of treaſon, as conſervators of the peace did at common law; and that it was incident to the office, as it is to the office of juſtices of peace, who do it ratione officij.' And the commitment to a meſſenger was there holden good.

In the caſe of the Queen v. Derby B. R. 1709. 10 Ann. ‡ for publiſhing a ſcandalous and ſeditious libel called The Obſervator---the two points abovementioned were admitted by Mr. Lechmere, who was counſel for the defendant. He agreed, the power of a ſecretary of ſtate to commit for treaſon or felony; and that a meſſenger was a proper officer. And in that caſe, the court held the warrant good and legal.

In the caſe of Rex v. Earbury, M. 7 G. 2. 1733, who was arreſted and committed by warrant from a ſecretary of ſtate; and his papers ſeized, which he applied to have reſtored; lord Hardwicke held, that they could not be reſtored, in a ſummary way, on motion. The warrant there was, 'to ſearch for the papers, and to bring the author before the ſecretary of ſtate.'

The ſtatute of 1 E. 3. enacts, 'for the better keeping, and maintenance of the peace, good men and lawful ſhall in every county be aſſigned to keep the peace.' So, 4 E. 3. c. 2.

The 18 E. 3. ſtat. 2. c. 2. is the firſt ſtatute that gives the judicature of hearing and determining: 34 E. 3. c. 5. enlarges their powers. The 2 H. 5. c. 4. ‖ calls them by the expreſs name of 'Juſtices of the peace.' Their commiſſion impowers them to keep the peace; and alſo contains a diſtinct clauſe 'to hear and determine.'

Therefore, the old conſervators of the peace ſtill remain. They have alſo power to hear and determine as juſtices. They are wardens of the peace too, by their commiſſion, as well as by common law: and they may likewiſe by the common law, without any ſpecial commiſſion or warrant, uſe force to ſuppreſs rebels. For which laſt aſſertion, he cited Kelyng 76.

† V. 5 Mod. 78. S. C. and State Trials, Vol. 4. p. 854. and Comberb. 343. Holt 144. Skinner 596. and 12. Mod. 82.

‡ Forteſcue's Rep. 140.

‖ V. Stat. 1. c. 4 § 2. and Stat. 2. c. 1.

The ſtatute of 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. (about pleading the general iſſue), means to protect all that act as conſervators, or wardens, or juſtices of the peace, as well as thoſe that act under ſpecial commiſſions.

The act of 2 Ph. and M. c. 18. (relating to corporation-juſtices) calls them 'Commiſſioners for the conſervation of the peace.' Juſtice of peace is not a ſtrict technical name: they may be called Cuſtodes pacis. In 2 Rol. Abr. 95. Title, Juſtices de Peace, it is ſaid, 'That an indictment taken before them, naming them Cuſtodes pacis, and not Juſtices of the peace (as the ſtatute names them) is a good indictment: for it is all one.' It is not material how the appointment is made. The ſtatutes mean to include all conſervators of the peace: they may all now plead the general iſſue, and give the ſpecial matter in evidence. The act of 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. does not indeed extend to any juſtices ſitting in ſeſſions: it only extends to them in their ſingle juriſdiction.

The ſtatute of 11 H. 6. c. 6. 'that ſuits and proceſſes before juſtices of the peace ſhall not be diſcontinued by new commiſſioners,' is no exception to this rule: neither is 2 H. 5. ſtat. 1. c. 4. § 2. 'that juſtices of the peace of the quorum ſhall be reſiant in their ſhire; (except lords named in the commiſſion, &c. &c.')

Acts of parliament ſhall be taken with latitude, and extended to caſes within the ſame reaſon, and calling for the ſame remedy. Plowd. 366. lord Zouch's caſe. Co. Litt. 24. b. 10 Co. 101. b. Beaufage's caſe. Plowd. 147. Iſton v. Studd. Plowd. 36. Platt v. The ſheriffs of London. Bro. Parliament 20. Wentworth's office of executors 67. Sir T. Jones 62. Plummer v. Whitchcot.

The rule about 'ſeveral particulars of an inferior nature being enumerated, excluding thoſe that are of a higher nature and not enumerated,' will not hold here. This act is not done as a higher officer; but only as a juſtice of peace. The biſhop of Norwich being named, extended to all biſhops: ſo the warden of the Fleet being named, extends to all gaolers. In Moore 845. Phelps v. Winchcombe, it was reſolved, 'that a deputy conſtable may, by the equity of the ſtatute of 7 J. 1. c. 5. plead the general iſſue.'

Perſons acting for preſervation of the public peace ought to be protected: and theſe old conſervators of it are more reaſonably intitled to protection, than other perſons are.

Second point---If the ſpecial matter may be given in evidence, then the queſtion will be, 'Whether this matter given in evidence would, if it had been pleaded, amount to a juſtification.'

It is objected, 'that the warrant is not legal; and that it was ill executed.'

1*ſt,* As to the warrant itſelf---No ſuch action has ever been brought upon theſe warrants, by perſons apprehended by virtue of them: or, at leaſt, there is none upon record.

It is ſaid, 'that this warrant is too extenſive in the deſcription of the perſon: and that it has been abuſed.'

Anſwer---The power is not illegal: and the abuſe of it is no objection to the warrant itſelf. Such warrants are agreeable to long practice and uſage.

Whatever the preſent determination may be, in point of law, it will be in the breaſt of the legiſlature to ſet it right.

In the Bewdley caſe, reported 1 Peere Williams 207. (Regina v. Ballivos, &c. of Bewdley) a conſtruction of an act of parliament contrary to the words of it was allowed, founded upon only ſeven years practice. In Comberb. 342. The India Company v. Skinner---where the warrant was granted before any default; Holt ſaid, 'that the practice having been, in caſe of taxes, to grant a conditional warrant to diſtrain, Communis error facit jus.'

The power of juſtices of peace 'to commit before indictment,' ſtands ſupported only by practice and uſage. In 6 Mod. 178. Regina v. Tracy, Holt Ch. J. ſays, 'Formerly, none could be taken up for a miſdemeanor, till indictment found: but now the practice all over England is otherwiſe.' And per Hale, 'That practice is become a law.' So likewiſe has uſage and practice eſtabliſhed Aceciams, Quo minus, new trials, &c.

The greateſt judges have bailed perſons taken up upon theſe warrants; and they have not been objected to, by either courts, or counſel of the greateſt eminence: whereas, if they were not legal, the perſons apprehended upon them ought to have been diſcharged. For which he cited, 1 Hale's Hiſt. P. C. 578. The court will not make orders upon illegal warrants: conſequently, they ſaw no objection to them. Even the greateſt friends to the Revolution have not objected to theſe warrants. From whence it muſt be inferred, that no objection lies againſt them.

On 6 July, 1641, in the caſe of Sir John Elliott, &c. the houſe of commons reſolved, that it was a breach of privilege: but they did not vote it illegal.

Lord Hardwicke, in Earbury's caſe, only ſaid, 'He would not then determine it.'

In treaſon, it will ſcarce be objected to; nor in felony.

In Miſs Blandy's caſe, her bureau was broken open: and her papers ſeized; and given in evidence.

Indecent prints or books may be ſeized by a magiſtrate: and they often have been ſo.

Evidence taken from felons or other criminals may be produced againſt them; though a criminal ſhall not be compelled to produce ſuch evidence againſt himſelf.

It is ſaid, 'that this warrant is illegal, becauſe it is general, to take up the author, printer, or publiſher.' But it is legal to iſſue and execute a warrant againſt a perſon unknown, but only deſcribed. Indeed the magiſtrate iſſues it, and the officer muſt execute it, at their peril. And though the warrant includes ſeizing the papers, yet that part of it has not been executed: and the bare inſertion of it ſhall not affect the officer who executed the other part of the warrant.

The facts are theſe---A warrant was directed to four meſſengers: Carrington, one of them, is informed, 'that Leach was the printer: and that the reputed author was frequently at Leach's houſe.' The other three act on this information. And this information was not groundleſs: for they found a ſheet of another number, wet and juſt printed. They take him up, and carry him to lord Halifax's office; who was not then at leiſure to examine him: but when he did examine him (four days after), he diſcharged him. Here was probable cauſe for taking him up.

A juſtice of peace having juriſdiction, may grant a proper warrant on probable cauſe: and miniſterial officers (conſtables, &c.) are not to be affected by the illegality of the warrant, in other parts of it. This warrant was executed honeſtly, and upon a probable cauſe.

Third point---The plaintiff's action is ſufficiently barred by 24 G. 2. c. 44. for want of obſerving the terms required by it. They neither proved notice, as the third ſection requires; nor made the demand required by the ſixth ſection.

The defendants have acted in obedience to the warrant of a magiſtrate who is a juſtice of peace within the meaning of this act; and by his order, and in his aid.

The only doubt is, 'Whether the action is brought for any thing done in obedience to the warrant; or not.'

The defendants have obeyed it, to the beſt of their power.

However, as they have acted under colour of the warrant, meaning to obey it, they are not anſwerable, although they may have erred in the execution of it. They are protected by this act, if they have acted bona fide; even though the warrant and the execution be illegal. They are not to judge of arduous points of law: the ſtatute means to protect them from it.

2*dly,* The previous ſtep to bringing this action was not taken; viz. the demanding a peruſal and copy of the warrant, and ſhewing a refuſal of it.

If there was a fault, or negligence, or miſtake in this proceeding, the fault was in the magiſtrate: there was none in the officer who executed it. And the requiſite ſteps have not been taken, in order to maintain the ſuit.

Therefore the plaintiff is barred of this action.

Mr. Dunning, contra---for Mr. Leach, the plaintiff below.

The firſt queſtion is, 'Whether this be a caſe within 24 G. 2. c. 44.' Which queſtion will involve the queſtion, 'Whether it be within the acts of 7 J. 1. c. 5. or 21 J. 1. c. 12.'

All theſe ſtatutes, being in pari materia, muſt receive the ſame conſtruction: and they are all unapplicable to the preſent caſe.

He then made three ſub-diviſions of his firſt queſtion: viz.

1*ſt,* Whether lord Halifax, being ſecretary of ſtate, is a conſervator or juſtice of peace, within the true intent and meaning of the act of 24 G. 2. c. 44.

2*dly,* Whether the defendants are conſtables, headboroughs, or officers, &c. within the intent and meaning of that act.

3*dly,* Whether this action is brought and properly purſued, within the true intent and meaning of it; and for a matter done in obedience to the warrant.

First point---Lord Halifax is not a juſtice of peace within 24 G. 2. He is not ſo by commiſſion: he is not ſo, as incident to his offices, either of ſecretary of ſtate, or of privy counſellor.

1ſt.

But it has been ſaid, 'He is a conſervator of the peace; and therefore within the meaning of the act.'

I deny the principle, and alſo the concluſion. I admit the caſe of Rex v. Kendal and Roe; though the reaſons of it do not appear: but I ſubmit to the authority of it, 'That a ſecretary of ſtate has a power to commit for high treaſon.'

Serjeant Hawkins's reaſons do not ſupport his aſſertion: and I deny that a ſecretary of ſtate is a conſervator of the peace. He has only a power of committing for high treaſon, as conſervators of the peace had in other caſes: and Kendal and Roe's caſe carries it no farther. The court never meant to reſolve any thing further.

All the crown-writers are ſilent on this ſubject of a ſecretary of ſtate's having this juriſdiction. None of them even hint that a ſecretary of ſtate is a conſervator of the peace. Staundford, Fitz-Herbert, Lambard, &c. ſay no ſuch thing.

* Lambard gives the liſt of thoſe officers who are conſervators of the peace: but there is no mention therein, of ſecretaries of ſtate. Serjeant † Hawkins copies the ſame liſt, without adding ſecretaries of ſtate.

* V. Lib. 1. c. 3.

† Lib. 2. c. 8. § 2.

There is no proof or pretence that the conſervatorſhip of the peace is incident to their office: nor is there any uſage, to ſupport ſuch a notion. Their claim of a power to grant ſuch warrants as the preſent one, is not pretended to be older than the Revolution.

If they were juſtices of the peace, or conſervators of the peace, they would be bound to execute the powers given to juſtices, or reſiding in conſtables; and they would be ſubject to the control of this court.

The offices are different in creation, conſtitution, and execution.

The very language of the warrant ſhews that the ſecretary of ſtate did not conſider himſelf as a juſtice, conſervator, or conſtable.

This ſtatute is not to be extended beyond the letter of it: it is not within the maxims or reaſons of extenſion of acts of parliament.

It is neceſſary to conſider the former ſtatutes of 7 J. 1. c. 5. and 21 J. 1. c. 12. (Both of which he rehearſed and obſerved upon).

In theſe, there is no mention of ſecretaries of ſtate: nor is there any reaſon to add others not there enumerated; the rather, as the enumeration begins with perſons inferior to ſecretaries of ſtate. Neither is there any ground to imagine that the legiſlature intended to include ſecretaries of ſtate within their proviſion. The preamble ſhews rather the contrary. The line drawn between thoſe enumerated and thoſe omitted, ſhews the ſame thing. The perſons intended to be protected, are perſons bound to act, and acting for the public good, without reward; not great officers with great ſalaries, who are not lawyers and are not bound to act.

The perſons introduced by the ſecond act (church-wardens, ſwornmen, overſeers, &c.) are perſons within the miſchief of the former: yet even they were not virtually included in the former, and are therefore particularly named in the latter.

This latter explanatory act omits, nevertheleſs, to name ſecretaries of ſtate. But conſtables are within the letter: and it extends to no others. And he referred to 4 Inſt. 175, and the two marginal notes there; one on 7 J. c. 5. and the other, on 21 J. c. 12.

From all which premiſſes he argued, that theſe acts of Jac. 1. are not to be extended beyond the letter: and if they were, yet there is no reaſon to extend them to ſecretaries of ſtate, as not being within the ſame inconvenience.

No more reaſon is there to extend that of 24 G. 2. c. 44. If the legiſlature had ſo intended, they would not have confined it to juſtices of the peace, a ſpecies of magiſtrates well known and underſtood in our law.

So much for the noble lord.

2dly. As to the meſſengers---They do not fall within the words or meaning of the act of 7 J. 1. c. 5. which is confined to officers, who are perſons known in our law, and bound to execute the warrant of a juſtice of peace; an office of burthen, not of profit; and incapable to diſtinguiſh the preciſe limits of a juriſdiction.

There is no reſpect in the caſe of the king's meſſengers in ordinary; who are perſons unknown in our law, and mere volunteers in executing warrants of juſtices.

The words, 'other officers, &c.' mean borſholders, &c. officers of the ſame ſort as conſtables and tithingmen; not king's meſſengers. Theſe perſons cannot be conſidered as aiding and aſſiſting the conſtables. The warrant and the fact are quite the reverſe: the conſtables are directed to aſſiſt them. They do not act under the command of a juſtice of peace, or in his aſſiſtance.

This warrant is not under the hand and ſeal of a juſtice of peace. Therefore the act does not protect the defendants.

3dly. Nor is the act done in obedience to this warrant. The warrant was 'to apprehend the author, printer, or publiſher:' but they have executed it upon a perſon who was not the author, printer, or publiſher. Conſequently, as they have not acted under it, they can't be protected by it.

It is ſaid, 'that a deſcription is equivalent to naming the perſons; and 'that here is a ſufficient deſcription.'

But the deſcription of an offence is no deſcription of the perſon offending: and this is only a deſcription of the offence.

The obedience to the warrant is the condition of the protection which the act gives to the officer. Therefore, the condition failing, the protection does not take place.

Here is no probable cauſe, nor any reaſon for juſtifying the officer under a probable cauſe. It is not like the caſes of apprehending traitors or felons. Here is only information from one of their own body, 'that the author 'of the paper had been ſeen going into Leach's houſe; and that Leach 'was the printer of the compoſition in general;' not of this particular paper.

But though neither this hearſay-information was in itſelf true; nor would the conſequence follow, if it had been true; yet they thereupon arreſt and impriſon an innocent man. Therefore theſe men themſelves are to anſwer for doing this: not the perſon who iſſued the warrant. The warrant did not command nor authorize them to do what they have done. It is neceſſary for them to ſhew an acting in obedience to the warrant; otherwiſe they are not within the protection of the act. In proof of which, he cited two caſes; one by the name of * Lawſon v. Clark; and the other a Norwich caſe, where a bailiff had executed the warrant out of the proper juriſdiction.

* Or Dawſon. qu.

Upon theſe authorities, upon the reaſon of the thing, and upon the words of the act, the officer is not intitled to the protection of the act; nor needs the juſtice be made a party, but where the officer acts in obedience to the warrant: acting under colour of it only, is not ſufficient.

Beſides, the party apprehended was not carried before lord Halifax, or dealt with according to law. Surely, this was the act of the officer; not of the perſon who ſigned the warrant. And no reaſon is given, ſtated, pretended, or even exiſted, why this matter was ſo tranſacted. Therefore there was no probable cauſe or reaſon whereupon to ground a juſtification of this their conduct.

So that, even allowing the ſecretary of ſtate to be a juſtice of peace, and the officers to be conſtables; yet the action lies againſt the plaintiffs in error, who have acted in this unjuſtifiable manner.

It appears therefore, that even if they had a defence upon the merits, they have not properly pleaded it. However, in fact they had no defence upon the merits: the plaintiff Leach was neither author, printer, nor publiſher of the paper; nor at all within the deſcription of the warrant.

But the warrant itſelf is illegal. It is againſt the author, printer, and publiſher of the paper, generally, without naming or deſcribing them; and not founded on any charge upon oath: it is alſo, 'to ſeize his papers;' that is, all his papers.

No juſtice of peace has power to iſſue ſuch a warrant. Therefore lord Halifax could not do it as a juſtice of peace. Nor is there any pretence of uſage to ſupport ſuch a claim of doing it as ſecretary of ſtate, further back than the Revolution.

It lies upon them, to prove their claim, and to ſhew their authority.

The practice of a particular magiſtrate cannot control the law. Communis error is not, in this caſe, ſufficient to make law. It is the duty, and it is therefore, doubtleſs, the inclination of the court, to ſtop the miſchief, as ſoon as it is complained of to them.

If 'author, printer, and publiſher,' without naming any particular perſon, be ſufficient in ſuch a warrant as this is; it would be equally ſo, to iſſue a warrant generally, 'to take up the robber or murderer of ſuch a one.' This is no deſcription of the perſon; but only of the offence: it is making the officer to be judge of the matter, in the place of the perſon who iſſues the warrant. Such a power would be extremely miſchievous, and might be productive of great oppreſſion.

To ranſack private ſtudies in order to ſearch for evidence, and even without a previous charge on oath, is contrary to natural juſtice, as well as to the liberty of the ſubject: and it is as uſeleſs as it is cruel, in the caſe of libels; becauſe it is the publication only that makes the crime of a libel.

To ſearch a man's private papers ad libitum, and even without accuſation, is an infringement of the natural rights of mankind. And this is a warrant, to 'ſeize all a man's papers,' without any particular relation even to the crime they would ſuppoſe him chargeable with.

No caſe of this ſort has ever undergone judicial diſcuſſion and determination. And as the court does not interpoſe in caſes not objected to, no arguments can be drawn from ſuch as paſſed ſub ſilentio, or were never objected to.

All the writers upon the crown-law ſay, 'that there muſt be an accu'ſation; that the perſon to be apprehended muſt be named; and that the 'officer is not to be left to arreſt whom he thinks fit.' For which, he vouched Hale's Hiſt. P. C. 1ſt part, p. 580 and 586. and Hawkins's P. C. Book 2. c. 13. § 10. p. 81 and 82.

Here, it is left to the officer, to take up any perſon whom he himſelf ſuſpects.

Lord chief juſtice Scroggs was impeached for iſſuing ſuch warrants as this is.

Therefore he prayed judgment for the defendant in error.

Mr. Solicitor General De Grey, in reply, on behalf of the plaintiffs in error.

A ſecretary of ſtate is an officer by preſcription; and his office muſt be as ancient as the office of the perſon to whom he is ſecretary: for he is and always has been an officer neceſſary to the crown; and the conſtitution always required the ſupport of this office. And as this power to commit for treaſon depends upon preſcriptive right and the nature of his office; ſo likewiſe it does, in all caſes of preſerving the public peace.

In the caſe of Kendal and Roe, the power, in treaſon, was acknowledged. In Darby's caſe, it was recognized, in felony In Earbury's caſe, (where the warrant was general, as this is,) he was continued on his recognizance. A ſecretary of ſtate has theſe powers, upon the foundation of preſcription; not on our law-books: and he has, equally, the power in him; whether he does or does not exert it in low and common inſtances. I ſuppoſe he is as compellable to act, as a conſervator of the peace formerly was, before the acts of parliament which give power to juſtices of peace.

Charter-juſtices can ſcarce be called commiſſion-juſtices: and yet theſe ſtatutes extend to them.

A 'juſtice of the peace' means a conſervator, a warden of the peace. Therefore there was no need to name ſecretaries of ſtate, in the acts of parliament: they were included, without naming them particularly.

The marginal note in lord Coke is no authority. However, theſe officers are named in the text, 'and certain others his majeſty's officers.'

This action is brought for what was done in obedience to the warrant; which the officer was obliged to execute, in the beſt manner he could.

If there is any fault, it is in the magiſtrate: he ſhould have deſcribed the offender with greater certainty. If the executing officer acts to the beſt of his ability; he is juſtified, and acts in obedience to his warrant.

Here the officers did ſo: they were reaſonably ſatisfied, 'that Leach was the printer.' And on ſearch, this probable cauſe was encreaſed to a higher degree: for, they found another freſh ſheet of the ſame work, juſt printed off, and wet. They detained him on occaſion of his being to be carried before lord Halifax, to be examined. The officers have nothing to do with his examination: that was the affair of lord Halifax; and if he diſcharged the perſons apprehended and brought before him, without examination, it was the better for them.

In Vaughan 111. Stiles v. Sir Richard Coxe and others,—it was determined, that the defendants ſhould have the benefit of the act; becauſe they acted by colour of the warrant.

As to the warrant itſelf—it is objected, 'that there is no charge upon 'oath.' But there was no occaſion, he ſaid, for it: and to that purpoſe, he cited the Queen v. Darby [v. Forteſcue 141.] Rex v. Earbury, Mich. 7 G. 2. and 1 Hale H. P. C. 582. where it is laid down, that ''tis convenient, though not always neceſſary, to take an information upon 'oath of the perſon that deſires the warrant.'

It is objected, 'that this warrant is not authorized by any length of uſage.'

But the uſage, as here ſtated, is ſufficient: and it muſt be taken to be coeval with the office. The bill of exceptions indeed only takes it up from the Revolution; aſſerting that it has been ſo ever ſince that time: but the facts go up to the Reſtoration; and none of a different form were produced, prior to the Revolution.

As to ſeizing papers—it is difficult indeed to draw the exact line. But it is certainly neceſſary, in ſome degree: and no inſtance is produced, of ſuch warrants having ever been abuſed as inſtruments of oppreſſion.

He concluded, upon the whole, that the plaintiff had no right to bring his action.

Lord Mansfield—I ſuppoſe, this is intended to be argued again. However, I will ſay ſomething, at preſent, upon it.

A bill of exceptions ſuppoſes the evidence true; and queſtions the competency or propriety of it.

'Whether there was a probable cauſe or ground of ſuſpicion,' was a matter for the jury to determine: that is not now before the court. So— 'Whether the defendants detained the plaintiff an unreaſonable time.'

But if it had been found to have been a reaſonable time; yet it would be no juſtification to the defendants; becauſe it is ſtated, 'that this man 'was neither author, printer, or publiſher:' and if he was not, then they have taken up a man who was not the ſubject of the warrant.

The

Queſtion. The three material queſtions are—1ſt. ‘ Whether a ſecretary ‘ of ſtate acting as a conſervator of the peace by the common ‘ law, is to be conſtrued within the ſtatutes of James the firſt, and of the ‘ late king.’

The protection of the officers, if they have acted in obedience to the warrant, is conſequential, in caſe a ſecretary of ſtate is within theſe ſtatutes.

2d Queſtion. As to the arreſt being made in obedience to the warrant, or only under colour of it and without authority from it—this queſtion depends upon the conſtruction of the warrant; whether it muſt not be conſtrued to mean ‘ ſuch perſons as are under a violent ſuſpicion of ‘ being guilty of the charge;’ (for they cannot be concluſively conſidered as guilty, till after trial and conviction.) The warrant itſelf imports only ſuſpicion; for, it ſays,—‘ to be brought before me, and examined, and ‘ dealt with according to law:’ and this ſuſpicion muſt eventually depend upon future trial. Therefore the warrant does not ſeem to me, to mean concluſive guilt; but only violent ſuſpicion. If the perſon apprehended ſhould be tried and acquitted, it would ſhew ‘ that he was not guilty;’ yet there might be ſufficient cauſe of ſuſpicion.

Mr. Dunning ſays, very rightly, that ‘ to bring a perſon within 24 G. 2. ‘ the act muſt be done in obedience to the warrant.’

3d. Queſtion. The laſt point is, ‘ whether this general warrant be ‘ good.’—

One part of it may be laid out of the caſe: for, as to what relates to the ſeizing his papers, that part of it was never executed; and therefore it is out of the caſe.

It is not material to determine, ‘ whether the warrant be good or bad;’ except in the event of the caſe being within 7 J. 1. but not within 24. G. 2.

At preſent—as to the validity of the warrant, upon the ſingle objection of the incertainty of the perſon, being neither named nor deſcribed—the common law, in many caſes, gives authority to arreſt without warrant; more eſpecially, where taken in the very act: and there are many caſes where particular acts of parliament have given authority to apprehend, under general warrants; as in the caſe of writs of aſſiſtance, or warrants to take up looſe, idle, and diſorderly people. But here, it is not contended, that the common law gave the officer authority to apprehend; nor that there is any act of parliament which warrants this caſe.

Therefore it muſt ſtand upon principles of common law.

It is not fit, that the receiving or judging of the information ſhould be left to the diſcretion of the officer. The magiſtrate ought to judge; and ſhould give certain directions to the officer. This is ſo, upon reaſon and convenience.

Then as to authorities---Hale and all others hold ſuch an uncertain warrant void: and there is no caſe or book to the contrary.

It is ſaid, ‘ that the uſage has been ſo; and that many ſuch have been ‘ iſſued, ſince the Revolution, down to this time.’

But a uſage, to grow into law, ought to be a general uſage, communiter uſitata et approbata; and which, after a long continuance, it would be miſchievous to overturn.

This is only the uſage of a particular office, and contrary to the uſage of all other juſtices and conſervators of the peace.

There is the leſs reaſon for regarding this uſage; becauſe the form of the warrant probably took its riſe from a poſitive ſtatute; and the former precedents were inadvertently followed, after that law was expired.

Mr. Juſtice Wilmot declared, that he had no doubt, nor ever had, upon theſe warrants: he thought them illegal and void.

Neither had the two other judges, Mr. Juſtice Yates, and Mr. Juſtice Aſton, any doubt (upon this firſt argument) of the illegality of them: for no degree of antiquity can give ſanction to a uſage bad in itſelf. And they eſteemed this uſage to be ſo. They were clear and unanimous in opinion, that this warrant was illegal and bad.

Lord Mansfield---Let it ſtand over for further argument.

The caſe ſtanding in the paper, on Friday the 8th of November, 1765, for farther argument---

Mr. Yorke, attorney-general, was now to have argued on behalf of the plaintiffs in error; and begun to enter into his argument: but when he came to mention the two caſes cited by Mr. Dunning, both of which were determined before lord Mansfield, upon 24 G. 2. c. 44 one of them at Norwich, ſummer aſſizes, 1761; (where damages were given); the other * of them, on a warrant under the vagrant act of 17 G. 2. (where his lordſhip held, ‘ that the defendant ought ‘ to ſhew that the officer had acted in obedience to the warrant;’ and he did ſo;) he ſeemed to intimate that this objection ‘ of their not having done ſo, in the preſent caſe,’ was too great a difficulty for him to encounter; and therefore reſted the matter where it was, without proceeding any further in his argument.

† Dawſon or Lawſon, v. Clarke. V. ante.

Lord Mansfield remembered both theſe caſes; and ſaid, He ſtill continued of the ſame opinion.

Where the juſtice cannot be liable, the officer is not within the protection of the act. The caſe in Middleſex concludes exactly to the preſent caſe. For, here the warrant is to take up the author, printer, or publiſher; but they took up a perſon who was neither author, printer, nor publiſher: ſo, that caſe was a warrant ‘ to take up a diſorderly woman;’ and the defendant took up a woman who was not ſo.

And he held the ſame opinion now, he ſaid, as he did before, in the caſe at Norwich.

This makes an end of the caſe: for, this is a previous queſtion; and the foundation of the defence fails.

The conſequence is, that the judgment muſt be affirmed.

The other judges aſſenting, the rule of the court was, ‘ that the judg‘ment be affirmed.’

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

[Thus this caſe went off, without any judicial deciſion on any of the chief points which were raiſed in it. The only point profeſſed to be regularly adjudged was, that the warrant in queſtion had not been purſued. Whether a ſecretary of ſtate is a conſervator of the peace ex officio, and as ſuch within the equity of the ſtatutes in favour of juſtices of the peace; whether he has power to commit for any offence under high treaſon; whether a ſingle privy counſellor has a right to commit in any caſe; whether a warrant for the ſeizure of papers could not be juſtified in the caſe of a ſeditious libel; and whether a general warrant, neither naming the offender, nor otherwiſe deſcribing him, except by relation to the offence committed, could be maintained at common law; all theſe important queſtions were left unadjudged. However, enough was ſaid by the court on the laſt of them to evince, that all the four judges thought general warrants to ſeize the perſon univerſally illegal, except where the granting of them was ſpecially authorized by act of parliament; and from the attorney-general's readineſs in yielding another point to avoid a deciſion of that concerning the legality of general warrants, it may be conjectured, that he deſpaired of being able to ſupport them. How ſuch warrants and the ſeizure of papers in the caſe of ſeditious libels were both finally condemned by a declaratory reſolution of the houſe of commons, will be explained in a note at the end of the caſe on the ſeizure of papers, which is the next in this collection.]

No. IV. The Caſe of Seizure of Papers, being an Action of Treſpaſs by John Entick, Clerk, againſt Nathan Carrington and three others Meſſengers in ordinary to the King, Court of Common-Pleas, Michaelmas Term, 6 Geo. III. 1765.

[This caſe is given with the above-mentioned title; becauſe the chief point adjudged was, that a warrant to ſearch for and ſeize the papers of the accuſed, in the caſe of a ſeditious libel, is contrary to law. But this was not the only queſtion in the caſe. All the other intereſting ſubjects, which were diſcuſſed in the immediately preceding caſe, except the queſtion of general warrants, were alſo argued in the following one; and moſt of them ſeem to have received a judicial opinion from the court.

The ſtate of the caſe, with the arguments of the counſel, is taken from Mr. Serjeant Wilſon's Reports, 2 Wilſ. 275. But inſtead of his ſhort note of the judgment of the court, the editor has the pleaſing ſatisfaction to preſent to the reader the judgment itſelf at length, as delivered by the lord chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas from written notes. It was not without ſome difficulty, that the copy of this judgment was obtained by the editor. He has reaſon to believe, that the original, moſt excellent and moſt valuable as its contents are, was not deemed worthy of preſervation by its author, but was actually committed to the flames. Fortunately, the editor remembered to have formerly ſeen a copy of the judgment in the hands of a friend; aud upon application to him, it was immediately obtained, with liberty to the editor to make uſe of it at his diſcretion. Before, however, he preſumed to conſult his own wiſhes in the uſe, the editor took care to convince himſelf, both that the copy was authentick, and that the introduction of it into this collection would not give offence. Indeed, as to the authenticity of the judgment, except in ſome trifling inaccuracies, the probable effect of careleſs tranſcribing, a firſt reading left the editor's mind without a doubt on the ſubject. But it was a reſpectful delicacy due to the noble lord, by whom the judgment was delivered, not to publiſh it, without firſt endeavouring to know, whether ſuch a ſtep was likely to be diſpleaſing to his lordſhip; and though from the want of any authority from him, the editor expoſes himſelf to ſome riſque of diſapprobation, yet his precautions to guard againſt it, with the diſintereſtedneſs of his motives, will, he is confident, if ever it ſhould become neceſſary to explain the circumſtances to his lordſhip, be received as a very adequate apology for the liberty thus hazarded.]

Treſpaſs for breaking and entring plaintiff's houſe, &c.

IN treſpaſs; the plaintiff declares that the defendants on the 11th day of November in the year of our lord 1762, at Weſtminſter in Middleſex, with force and arms broke and entred the dwelling-houſe of the plaintiff in the pariſh of St. Dunſtan Stepney, and continued there four hours without his conſent and againſt his will, and all that time diſturbed him in the peaceable poſſeſſion thereof, and broke open the doors to the rooms, the locks, iron bars, &c. thereto affixed, and broke open the boxes, cheſts, drawers, &c. of the plaintiff in his houſe, and broke the locks thereto affixed, and ſearched and examined all the rooms, &c. in his dwelling-houſe, and all the boxes, &c. ſo broke open, and read over, pried into and examined all the private papers, books, &c. of the plaintiff there found, whereby the ſecret affairs, &c. of the plaintiff became wrongfully diſcovered and made public; and took and carried away 100 printed charts, 100 printed pamphlets, &c. &c. of the plaintiff there found, and other 100 charts, &c. &c. took and carried away, to the damage of the plaintiff 2000*l.*

Special juſtification under a warrant of the ſecretary of ſtate.

The defendants plead 1ſt, not guilty to the whole declaration, whereupon iſſue is joined. 2dly, as to the breaking and entring the dwelling-houſe, and continuing four hours, and all that time diſturbing him in the poſſeſſion thereof, and breaking open the doors to the rooms, and breaking open the boxes, cheſts, drawers, &c. of the plaintiff in his houſe, and the ſearching and examining all the rooms, &c. in his dwelling-houſe, and all the boxes, &c. ſo broke open, and reading over, prying into, and examining the private papers, books, &c. of the plaintiff there found, and taking and carrying away the goods and chattels in the declaration firſt mentioned there found, and alſo as to taking and carrying away the goods and chattels in the declaration laſt mentioned, the defendants ſay, the plaintiff ought not to have his action againſt them, becauſe they ſay, that before the ſuppoſed treſpaſs, on the 6th of November 1762, and before, until, and all the time of the ſuppoſed treſpaſs, the earl of Halifax was, and yet is one of the lords of the king's privy council, and one of his principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and that the earl before the treſpaſs on the 6th of November 1762, made his warrant under his hand and ſeal directed to the defendants, by which the earl did in the king's name authorize and require the defendants, taking a conſtable to their aſſiſtance, to make ſtrict and diligent ſearch for the plaintiff, mentioned in the ſaid warrant to be the author, or one concerned in the writing of ſeveral weekly very ſeditious papers, intitled, "The Monitor or Britiſh Freeholder, number 357, 358, 360, 373, 376, 378 and 380, London, printed for J. Wilſon and J. Fell in Pater Noſter Row," containing groſs and ſcandalous reflections and invectives upon his majeſty's government, and upon both houſes of parliament, and him the plaintiff having found, to ſeize and apprehend and bring together with his books and papers in ſafe cuſtody before the earl of Halifax to be examined concerning the premiſſes, and further dealt with according to law; in the due execution whereof all mayors, ſheriffs, juſtices of the peace, conſtables, and all other his majeſty's officers civil and military, and loving ſubjects, whom it might concern, were to be aiding and aſſiſting to them the defendants, as there ſhould be occaſion. And the defendants further ſay, that afterwards and before the treſpaſs on the ſame day and year, the warrant was delivered to them to be executed, and thereupon they on the ſame day and year in the declaration, in the day time about 11 o'clock, being the ſaid time when, &c. by virtue and for the execution of the ſaid warrant entred the plaintiff's dwelling-houſe, the outer door thereof being then open, to ſearch for and ſeize the plaintiff and his books and papers in order to bring him and them before the earl of Halifax, according to the warrant; and the defendants did then and there find the plaintiff, and ſeiſed and apprehended him, and did ſearch for his books and papers in his houſe, and did neceſſarily ſearch and examine the rooms therein, and alſo his boxes, cheſts, &c. there, in order to find and ſeize his books and papers, and to bring them along with the plaintiff before the ſaid earl, according to the warrant; and upon the ſaid ſearch did then in the ſaid houſe find and ſeize the goods and chattels of the plaintiff in the declaration, and on the ſame day did carry the ſaid books and papers to a houſe at Weſtminſter, where the ſaid earl then and long before tranſacted the buſineſs of his office, and delivered the ſame to Lovel Stanhope, eſq; who then was and yet is an aſſiſtant to the earl in his office of ſecretary of ſtate, to be examined, and who was then authorized to receive the ſame from them for that purpoſe, as it was lawful for them to do; and the plaintiff afterwards (to wit) on the 17th of November in the ſaid year was diſcharged out of their cuſtody; and in ſearching for the books and papers of the plaintiff the defendants did neceſſarily read over, pry into, and examine the ſaid private papers, books, &c. of the plaintiff in the declaration mentioned then found in his houſe; and becauſe at the ſaid time when, &c. the ſaid doors in the ſaid houſe leading to the rooms therein, and the ſaid boxes, cheſts, &c. were ſhut and faſtened ſo that the defendants could not ſearch and examine the ſaid rooms, boxes, cheſts, &c. they, for the neceſſary ſearching and examining the ſame, did then neceſſarily break and force open the ſaid doors, boxes, cheſts, &c. as it was lawful for them to do; and on the ſaid occaſion the defendants neceſſarily ſtayed in the houſe of the plaintiff for the ſaid four hours, and unavoidably during that time diſturbed him in the poſſeſſion thereof, they the defendants doing as little damage to the plaintiff as they poſſibly could, which are the ſame breaking and entring the houſe of the plaintiff, &c. (and ſo repeat the treſpaſs covered by this plea) whereof the plaintiff above complains; and this, &c. wherefore they pray judgment, &c.

Replication de injuria ſua propria.

The plaintiff replies to the plea of juſtification above, that (as to the treſpaſs thereby covered) he by any thing alledged by the defendants therein ought not to be barred from having his action againſt them, becauſe he ſays, that the defendants at the pariſh of Stepney, of their own wrong, and without the cauſe by them in that plea alledged, broke and entered the houſe of the plaintiff, &c. &c. in manner and form as the plaintiff hath complained above; and this he prays may be inquired of by the country; and the defendants do ſo likewiſe.—There is another plea of juſtification like the firſt, with this difference only; that in the laſt plea it is alledged, the plaintiff and his papers, &c. were carried before lord Halifax, but in the firſt, it is before Lovel Stanhope, his aſſiſtant or law clerk; and the like replication of de injura ſua propria abſq; tali cauſa, whereupon a third iſſue is joined.

This cauſe was tried at Weſtminſter-hall before the lord chief juſtice, when the jury found a ſpecial verdict to the following purport.

Special verdict.

The jurors upon their oath ſay, as to the iſſue firſt joined (upon the plea not guilty to the whole treſpaſs in the declaration) that as to the coming with force and arms, and alſo the treſpaſs in declaration, except the breaking and entering the dwelling-houſe of the plaintiff, and continuing therein for the ſpace of four hours, and all that time diſturbing him in the poſſeſſion thereof, and ſearching ſeveral rooms therein, and in one bureau, one writing deſk, and ſeveral drawers of the plaintiff in his houſe, and reading over and examining ſeveral of his papers there, and ſeizing, taking and carrying away ſome of his books and papers there found, in the declaration complained of, the ſaid defendants are not guilty. As to breaking and entring the dwelling-houſe, &c. (above excepted) the jurors on their oath ſay, that at the time of making the following information, and before and until and at the time of granting the warrant hereafter mentioned, and from thence hitherto, the earl of Halifax was, and ſtill is one of the lords of the king's privy council, and one of his principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and that before the time in the declaration, viz. on the 11th of October 1762, at St. James's Weſtminſter, one Jonathan Scott of London, bookſeller and publiſher, came before Edward Weſton, eſq; an aſſiſtant to the ſaid earl, and a juſtice of peace for the city and liberty of Weſtminſter, and there made and gave information in writing to and before the ſaid Edward Weſton againſt the ſaid John Entick and others, the tenor of which information now produced and given in evidence to the jurors followeth in theſe words and figures, to wit, 'The voluntary information of J. Scott. In the year 1755, I propoſed ſetting up a paper, and mentioned it to Dr. Shebbeare, and in a few days one Arthur Beardmore an attorney at law ſent for me, hearing of my intention, and deſired I would mention it to Dr. Shebbeare, that he Beardmore and ſome others of his friends had an intention of ſetting up a paper in the city. Shebbeare met Beardmore, and myſelf and Entick (the plaintiff) at the Horn tavern, and agreed upon the ſetting up the paper by the name of the Monitor, and that Dr. Shebbeare and Mr. Entick ſhould have 200*l.* a-year each. Dr. Shebbeare put into Beardmore's and Entick's hands ſome papers, but before the papers appeared Beardmore ſent them back to me (Scott). Shebbeare inſiſted on having the proportion of his ſalary paid him; he had 50*l.* which I (Scott) fetched from Vere and Aſgill's by their note, which Beardmore gave him; Dr. Shebbeare upon this was quite left out, and the monies have been continued to Beardmore and Entick ever ſince, by ſubſcription, as I ſuppoſed, raiſed I know not by whom: it has been continued in theſe hands ever ſince. Shebbeare, Beardmore and Entick all told me that the late Alderman Beckford countenanced the paper: they agreed with me that the profits of the paper, paying all charges belonging to it, ſhould be allowed me. In the paper of the 22 May, called Sejanus, I apprehend the character of Sejanus meant lord Bute: the original manuſcript was in the hand-writing of David Meredith, Mr. Beardmore's clerk. I before received the manuſcript for ſeveral years till very lately from the ſaid hands, and do believe that they continue ſtill to write it. Jona. Scott, S. James's 11*th October* 1762.'

Scott's information before a juſtice of peace.

The above information was given voluntarily before me, and ſigned in my preſence by Jona. Scott. J. Weſton.

And the jurors further ſay, that on the 6th of November 1762, the ſaid information was ſhewn to the earl of H. and thereupon the earl did then make and iſſue his warrant directed to the defendants, then and ſtill being the king's meſſengers, and duly ſworn to that office, for apprehending the plaintiff, &c. the tenor of which warrant produced in evidence to the jurors, follows in theſe words and figures: 'George Montagu Dunk, earl of Halifax, viſcount Sunbury, and baron Halifax, one of the lords of his majeſty's honourable privy council, lieutenant general of his majeſty's forces, lord lieutenant general and general governor of the kingdom of Ireland, and principal ſecretary of ſtate, &c: theſe are in his majeſty's name to authorize and require you, taking a conſtable to your aſſiſtance, to make ſtrict and diligent ſearch for John Entick, the author, or one concerned in writing of ſeveral weekly very ſeditious papers, intitled the Monitor, or Britiſh Freeholder, No. 357, 358, 360, 373, 376, 378, 379, and 380, London, printed for J. Wilſon and J. Fell in Pater Noſter Row, which contain groſs and ſcandalous reflections and invectives upon his majeſty's government, and upon both houſes of parliament; and him, having found, you are to ſeize and apprehend, and to bring, together with his books and papers, in ſafe cuſtody before me to be examined concerning the premiſſes, and further dealt with according to law; in the due execution whereof all mayors, ſheriffs, juſtices of the peace, conſtables, and other his majeſty's officers civil and military, and loving ſubjects whom it may concern, are to be aiding and aſſiſting to you as there ſhall be occaſion; and for ſo doing this ſhall be your warrant. Given at St. James's the 6th day of November 1762, in the third year of his majeſty's reign, Dunk Halifax. To Nathan Carrington, James Watſon, Thomas Ardran and Robert Blackmore, four of his majeſty's meſſengers in ordinary.' And the jurors further ſay, the earl cauſed this warrant to be delivered to the defendants to be executed. And that the defendants afterwards on the 11th of November 1762, at 11 o'clock in the day time, by virtue and for execution of the warrant, but without any conſtable taken by them to their aſſiſtance, entered the houſe of the plaintiff, the outer door thereof being open, and the plaintiff being therein, to ſearch for and ſeize the plaintiff and his books and papers, in order to bring him and them before the earl, according to the warrant; and the defendants did then find the plaintiff there, and did ſeize and apprehend him, and did there ſearch for his books and papers in ſeveral rooms and in the houſe, and in one bureau, one writing deſk, and ſeveral drawers of the plaintiff there in order to find and ſeize the ſame, and bring them along with the plaintiff before the earl according to the warrant, and did then find and ſeize there ſome of the books and papers of the plaintiff, and peruſed and read over ſeveral other of his papers which they found in the houſe, and choſe to read, and that they neceſſarily continued there in the execution of the warrant four hours, and diſturbed the plaintiff in his houſe, and then took him and his ſaid books and papers from thence, and forthwith gave notice at the office of the ſaid ſecretary of ſtate in Weſtminſter unto Lovel Stanhope, eſq; then before, and ſtill being an aſſiſtant to the earl in the examinations of perſons, books and papers ſeized by virtue of warrants iſſued by ſecretaries of ſtate, and alſo then and ſtill being a juſtice of peace for the city and liberty of Weſtminſter and county of Middleſex, of their having ſeized the plaintiff, his books and papers, and of their having them ready to be examined, and they then and there at the inſtance of the ſaid Lovel Stanhope delivered the ſaid books and papers to him. And the jurors further ſay, that, on the 13th of April in the firſt year of the king, his majeſty, by his letters patent under the great ſeal, gave and granted to the ſaid Lovel Stanhope the office of law-clerk to the ſecretaries of ſtate. And the king did thereby ordain, conſtitute and appoint the law-clerk to attend the offices of his ſecretaries of ſtate, in order to take the depoſitions of all ſuch perſons whom it may be neceſſary to examine upon affairs which might concern the public, &c. (and then the verdict ſets out the letters patent to the law-clerk in hæc verba) as by the letters patent produced in evidence to the jurors appears. And the jurors further ſay, that Lovel Stanhope, by virtue of the ſaid letters patent long before the time when, &c. on the 13th of April in the firſt year of the king was, and ever ſince hath been and ſtill is law-clerk to the king's ſecretaries of ſtate, and hath executed that office all the time. And the jurors further ſay, that at different times from the time of the Revolution to this preſent time, the like warrants with that iſſued againſt the plaintiff, have been frequently granted by the ſecretaries of ſtate, and executed by the meſſengers in ordinary for the time being, and that each of the defendants did reſpectively take at the time of being appointed meſſengers, the uſual oath, that he would be a true ſervant to the king, &c. in the place of a meſſenger in ordinary, &c. And the jurors further ſay, that no demand was ever made or left at the uſual place of abode of the defendants, or any of them, by the plaintiff, or his attorney or agent in writing of the peruſal and copy of the ſaid warrant, ſo iſſued againſt the plaintiff as aforeſaid, neither did the plaintiff commence or bring his ſaid action againſt the defendants, or any of them, within ſix calendar months next after the ſeveral acts aforeſaid, and each of them were and was done and committed by them as aforeſaid; but whether, upon the whole matter as aforeſaid by the jurors found, the ſaid defendants are guilty of the treſpaſs herein before particularly ſpecified in breaking and entering the houſe of the plaintiff in the declaration mentioned, and continuing there for four hours, and all that time diſturbing the plaintiff in the poſſeſſion thereof, and ſearching ſeveral rooms therein, and one bureau, one writing deſk, and ſeveral drawers of the plaintiff in his houſe, and reading over and examining ſeveral of his papers there, and ſeizing, taking and carrying away ſome of his books and papers there found; or the ſaid plaintiff ought to maintain his ſaid action againſt them; the jurors are altogether ignorant, and pray the advice of the court thereupon. And if upon the whole matter aforeſaid by the jurors found, it ſhall ſeem to the court that the defendants are guilty of the ſaid treſpaſs, and that the plaintiff ought to maintain his action againſt them, the jurors ſay upon their ſaid oath, that the defendants are guilty of the ſaid treſpaſs in manner and form as the plaintiff hath thereof complained againſt them; and they aſſeſs the damages of the plaintiff by occaſion thereof, beſides his coſts and charges by him about his ſuit in this behalf laid out to 300*l.* and for thoſe coſts and charges, to 40*s.* But if upon the whole matter by the jurors found, it ſhall ſeem to the court that the ſaid defendants are not guilty of the ſaid treſpaſs; or that the plaintiff ought not maintain his action againſt them; then the jurors do ſay upon their oath that the defendants are not guilty of the ſaid treſpaſs in manner and form as the plaintiff hath thereof complained againſt them.

The ſecretary of ſtate's warrant to ſeize plaintiff and his books and papers, delivered to the defendants to be executed, who on 11th of Nov. 1762, did execute the ſame without a conſtable, and carried the books, &c. to Lovel Stanhope, the law clerk, who is appointed to that office by the king's letters patent, and is a juſtice of peace.

That the like warrants have iſſued ſince the Revolution.

That no demand was made by plaintiff of a copy of the warrant, nor did plaintiff bring his action within ſix months after the facts done by defendants.

Special verdict concludes in the common form.

Damages 300l.

And as to the laſt iſſue on the ſecond ſpecial juſtification, the jury found for the plaintiff, that the defendants in their own wrong broke and entred, and did the treſpaſs, as the plaintiff in his replication has alledged.

The laſt iſſue found for plaintiff.

This ſpecial verdict was twice ſolemnly argued at the bar; in Eaſter Term laſt by ſerjeant Leigh for the plaintiff, and Burland, one of the king's ſerjeants, for the defendants; and in this preſent term by ſerjeant Glynn for the plaintiff, and Nares, one of the king's ſerjeants, for the defendants.

Counſel for the plaintiff. At the trial of this cauſe the defendants relied upon two defences; 1ſt, That a ſecretary of ſtate as a juſtice or conſervator of the peace, and theſe meſſengers acting under his warrant, are within the ſtatute of the 24th of Geo. II. c. 44. which enacts, (among other things) that 'no action ſhall be brought againſt any conſtable or other officer, or any perſon acting by his order and in his aid, for any thing done in obedience to the warrant of a juſtice, until demand hath been made or left at the uſual place of his abode by the party, or by his attorney in writing ſigned by the party, demanding the ſame, of the peruſal and copy of ſuch warrant, and the ſame hath been refuſed or neglected for ſix days after ſuch demand,' and that no demand was ever made by the plaintiff of a peruſal or copy of the warrant in this caſe, according to that ſtatute, and therefore he ſhall not have this action againſt the defendants, who are merely miniſterial officers acting under the ſecretary of ſtate, who is a juſtice and conſervator of the peace. 2dly, That the warrant under which the defendants acted, is a legal warrant, and that they well can juſtify what they have done by virtue thereof, for that at many different times from the time of the Revolution till this time, the like warrants with that iſſued againſt the plaintiff in this caſe have been granted by ſecretaries of ſtate, and executed by the meſſengers in ordinary for the time being.

Eaſter term, 5 Geo. 3.

1. It is moſt clear and manifeſt upon this verdict, that the earl of Halifax acted as ſecretary of ſtate when he granted the warrant, and not merely as a juſtice of the peace, and therefore cannot be within the ſtatute 24 Geo. II. c. 44. neither would he be within the ſtatute if he was a conſervator of the peace, ſuch perſon not being once named therein; and there is no book in the law whatever, that ranks a ſecretary of ſtate quaſi ſecretary, among the conſervators of the peace. Lambert, Coke, Hawkins, lord Hale, &c. &c. none of them take

As to the firſt.

take any notice of a ſecretary of ſtate being a conſervator of the peace, and until of late days he was no more indeed than a mere clerk. A conſervator of the peace had no more power than a conſtable has now, who is a conſervator of the peace at common law. At the time of making this ſtatute, a juſtice of peace, conſtable, headborough and other officers of the peace, borſholders and tithingmen, as well as ſecretary of ſtate, conſervator of the peace, and meſſenger in ordinary, were all very well known; and if it had been the intent of the ſtatute, that a ſecretary of ſtate, conſervator of the peace, and meſſenger in ordinary, ſhould have been within the ſtatute, it would have mentioned all or ſome of them; and it not having done ſo, they cannot be within it. A meſſenger certainly cannot be within it, who is nothing more than a mere porter, and lord Halifax's footmen might as well be ſaid to be officers within the ſtatute as theſe defendants. Beſides, the verdict finds that theſe defendants executed the warrant without taking a conſtable to their aſſiſtance. This diſobedience will not only take them out of the protection of the ſtatute, (if they had been within it), but will alſo diſable them to juſtify what they have done, by any plea whatever. The office of theſe defendants is a place of conſiderable profit, and as unlike that of a conſtable or tithingman as can be, which is an office of burthen and expence, and which he is bound to execute in perſon, and cannot ſubſtitute another in his room, though he may call perſons to aſſiſt him. 1 Hale's P. C. 581. This warrant is more like a warrant to ſearch for ſtolen goods and to 4 Inſt. 176. ſeize them, than any other kind of warrant, which ought to be directed to conſtables and other publick officers which the law takes notice of. 2 Hale's P. C. 149, 150. How much more neceſſary in the preſent caſe was it to take a conſtable to the defendants aſſiſtance. The defendants have alſo diſobeyed the warrant in another matter: being commanded to bring the plaintiff, and his books and papers before lord Halifax, they carried him and them before Lovel Stanhope, the law-clerk; and though he is a juſtice of the peace, that avails nothing; for no ſingle juſtice of peace ever claimed a right to iſſue ſuch a warrant as this, nor did he act therein as a juſtice of peace, but as the law-clerk to lord Halifax. The information was made before juſtice Weſton. The ſecretary of ſtate in this caſe never ſaw the accuſer nor accuſed. It ſeems to have been below his dignity. The names of the officers introduced here are not to be found in the law-books, from the firſt Year-book to the preſent time.

As to the ſecond. 2. A power to iſſue ſuch a warrant as this is contrary to the genius of the law of England; and even if they had found what they ſearched for, they could not have juſtified under it. But they did not find what they ſearched for, nor does it appear that the plaintiff was the author of any of the ſuppoſed ſeditious papers mentioned in the warrant; ſo that it now appears that this enormous treſpaſs and violent proceeding has been done upon meer ſurmiſe. But the verdict ſays, ſuch warrants have been granted by ſecretaries of ſtate ever ſince the Revolution. If they have, it is high time to put an end to them; for if they are held to be legal, the liberty of this country is at an end. It is the publiſhing of a libel which is the crime, and not the having it locked up in a private drawer in a man's ſtudy. But if having it in one's cuſtody was the crime, no power can lawfully break into a man's houſe and ſtudy to ſearch for evidence againſt him. This would be worſe than the Spaniſh inquiſition; for ranſacking a man's ſecret drawers and boxes, to come at evidence againſt him, is like racking his body to come at his ſecret thoughts. The warrant is to ſeize all the plaintiff's books and papers without exception, and carry them before lord Halifax. What? Has a ſecretary of ſtate a right to ſee all a man's private letters of correſpondence, family concerns, trade and buſineſs? This would be monſtrous indeed! And if it were lawful, no man could endure to live in this country. In the caſe of a ſearch-warrant for ſtolen goods, it is never granted, but upon the ſtrongeſt evidence that a felony has been committed, and that the goods are ſecreted in ſuch a houſe; and it is to ſeize ſuch goods as were ſtolen, not all the goods in the houſe; but if ſtolen goods are not found there, all who entred with the warrant are treſpaſſers. However frequently theſe warrants have been granted ſince the Revolution, that will not make them lawful; for if they were unreaſonable or unlawful when firſt granted, no uſage or continuance can make them good. Even cuſtoms, which have been uſed time out of mind, have been often adjudged void, as being unreaſonable, contrary to common right, or purely againſt law, if upon conſidering their nature and quality they ſhall be found injurious to a multitude, and prejudicial to the commonwealth, and to have their commencement (for the moſt part) through the oppreſſion and extortion of lords and great men. Davis 32. b. Theſe warrants are not by cuſtom; they go no farther back than eighty years; and moſt amazing it is they have never before this time been oppoſed or controverted, conſidering the great men that have preſided in the King's Bench ſince that time. But it was reſerved for the honour of this court, which has ever been the protector of the liberty and property of the ſubject, to demoliſh this monſter of oppreſſion, and to tear into rags this remnant of Star-Chamber tyranny.

Counſel for the defendants. I am not at all alarmed, if this power is eſtabliſhed to be in the ſecretaries of ſtate. It has been uſed in the beſt of times, often ſince the Revolution. I ſhall argue, firſt, That the ſecretary of ſtate has power to grant theſe warrants; and if I cannot maintain this, I muſt, ſecondly, ſhew that by the ſtatute 24 Geo. II. c. 24. this action does not lie againſt the defendants the meſſengers. 1. A ſecretary of ſtate has the ſame power to commit for treaſon as a juſtice of peace. Kendall and Roe, Skin. 596. 1 Salk. 346. S. C. 1 lord Raym. 65. 5 Mod. 78. S. C. ſir William Wyndham was committed by James Stanhope, ſecretary of ſtate, to the Tower for high treaſon the 7th of October 1715. See the caſe 1 Stra. 2. And ſerjeant Hawkins ſays, it is certain that the privy council, or any one or two of them, or a ſecretary of ſtate, may lawfully commit perſons for treaſon, and for other offences againſt the ſtate, as in all ages they have done. 2 Hawk. P. C. 117. ſect. 4. 1 Leon. 70, 71. Carth, 291. 2 Leon. 175. If it is clear that a ſecretary of ſtate may commit for treaſon and other offences againſt the ſtate, he certainly may commit for a ſeditious libel againſt the government; for there can hardly be a greater offence againſt the ſtate, except actual treaſon. A ſecretary of ſtate is within the habeas corpus act. But a power to commit without a power to iſſue his warrant to ſeize the offender and the libel would be nothing; ſo it muſt be concluded that he has the ſame power upon information to iſſue a warrant to ſearch for and ſeize a ſeditious libel, and its author and publiſher, as a juſtice of peace has for granting a warrant to ſearch for ſtolen goods, upon an information that a theft has been committed, and that the goods are concealed in ſuch a place; in which caſe the conſtables and officers aſſiſting him in the ſearch, may break open doors, boxes, &c. to come at ſuch ſtolen goods. Suppoſing the practice of granting warrants to ſearch for libels againſt the ſtate be admitted to be an evil in particular caſes, yet to let ſuch libellers eſcape, who endeavour to raiſe rebellion, is a greater evil, and may be compared to the reaſoning of Mr. Juſtice Foſter in the caſe of preſſing, 159, where he ſays, 'that war is a great evil, but it is choſen to avoid a greater. 'The practice of preſſing is one of the miſchiefs war brings with it; 'but it is a maxim in law and good policy too, that all private miſchiefs 'muſt be born with patience, for preventing a national calamity, &c.'

2. Suppoſing there is a defect of juriſdiction in the ſecretary of ſtate, yet the defendants are within the Stat. 24 Geo. II. c. 44. and though not within the words, yet they are within the reaſon of it. That it is not unuſual in acts of parliament to comprehend by conſtruction a generality, where expreſs mention is made only of a particular. The ſtatute of Circumſpecte agatis concerning the biſhop of Norwich extends to all biſhops. Fitz. Prohibition 3. and 2 Inſt. on this ſtatute. 25 Ed. III. c. enables the incumbent to plead in quare impedit, to the king's ſuit. This alſo extends to the ſuits of all perſons. 38 E. III. 31. The act 1 Ric. II. ordains that the warden of the Fleet ſhall not permit priſoners in execution to go out of priſon by bail or baſton, yet it is adjudged that this act extends to all gaolers. Plowd. Com. caſe of Platt 35. b. The ſtat. de donis conditionalibus extends to all other limitations in tail not there particularly mentioned, and the like conſtruction has been put upon ſeveral other ſtatutes. Tho. Jones 62. The ſtat. 7 Jac. I. c. 5. the word conſtable therein extends to a deputy conſtable. Moor 845. Theſe meſſengers in ordinary have always been conſidered as officers of the ſecretary of ſtate, and a commitment may be to their cuſtody, as in ſir W. Wyndham's caſe. A juſtice of peace may make a conſtable pro hac vice to execute a warrant, who would be within the ſtat. 24 Geo. II. So if theſe defendants are not conſtables, yet as officers they have power to execute a warrant of a juſtice of peace. A conſtable may, but cannot be compelled to execute a warrant out of his juriſdiction. Officers acting under colour of office, though doing an illegal act, are within this ſtatute. Vaugh. 113. So that no demand having ever been made of the warrant, nor any action commenced within ſix months, the plaintiff has no right of action. It was ſaid, that a conſervator of the peace had no more power than a conſtable has now. I anſwer, they had power to bind over at common law, but a conſtable has not. Dalton, cap. 1.

Counſel for the plaintiff, in reply. It is ſaid, this has been done in the beſt of times ever ſince the Revolution. The concluſion from thence is, that it is the more inexcuſable, becauſe done in the beſt of times, in an æra when the common law (which had been trampled under the foot of arbitrary power) was revived. We do not deny but the ſecretary of ſtate hath power to commit for treaſon and other offences againſt the ſtate; but that is not the preſent caſe, which is breaking into the houſe of a ſubject, breaking into his drawers and boxes, ranſacking all the rooms in his houſe, and prying into all his private affairs. But it is ſaid, if the ſecretary of ſtate has power to commit, he has power to ſearch, &c. as in the caſe of ſtolen goods. This is a falſe conſequence, and it might as well be ſaid he has a power to torture. As to ſtolen goods, if the officers find none, have they a right to take away a man's goods which were not ſtolen? Preſſing is ſaid to be a dangerous power, and yet it has been allowed for the benefit of the ſtate. But that is only the argument and opinion of a ſingle judge, from ancient hiſtory and records, in times when the lower part of the ſubjects were little better than ſlaves to their lords and great men, and has not been allowed to be lawful without an act of parliament ſince the time of the Revolution. The ſtat. 24 Geo. II. has been compared to ancient ſtatutes, naming particular perſons and diſtricts, which have been conſtrued to extend to many others not named therein; and ſo the defendants, though no ſuch officers are mentioned, by like reaſon, are within the ſtatute of 24 Geo. II. But the law knows no ſuch officers as meſſengers in ordinary to the king. It is ſaid the habeas corpus act extends to commitments by ſecretaries of ſtate, though they are not mentioned therein. True, but that ſtatute was made to protect the innocent againſt illegal and arbitrary power. It is ſaid, the ſecretary of ſtate is a juſtice of peace, and the meſſengers are his officers. Why then did the warrant direct them to take a conſtable to their aſſiſtance, if they were themſelves the proper officers? It ſeems to admit they were not the proper officers. If a man be made an officer for a ſpecial purpoſe to arreſt another, he muſt ſhew his authority; and if he refuſes, it is not murder to kill him. But a conſtable or other known officer in the law need not ſhew his warrant.

Lord chief juſtice. I ſhall not give any opinion at preſent, becauſe this caſe, which is of the utmoſt conſequence to the public, is to be argued again. I ſhall only juſt mention a matter which has ſlipt the ſagacity of the counſel on both ſides, that it may be taken notice of upon the next argument. Suppoſe a warrant which is againſt law be granted, ſuch as no juſtice of peace, or other magiſtrate high or low whomſoever, has power to iſſue, whether that magiſtrate or juſtice who grants ſuch warrant, or the officer who executes it, are within the ſtat. 24 Geo. II. c. 44. To put one caſe (among an hundred that might happen): ſuppoſe a juſtice of peace iſſues a warrant to ſearch a houſe for ſtolen goods, and directs it to four of his ſervants, who ſearch and find no ſtolen goods, but ſeize all the books and papers of the owners of the houſe, whether in ſuch a caſe would the juſtice of peace, his officers or ſervants, be within the ſtat. 24 Geo. II.? I deſire that every point of this caſe may be argued to the bottom, for I ſhall think myſelf bound, when I come to give judgment, to give my opinion upon every point in the caſe.

Mich. 6 Geo. 3. Counſel for the plaintiff on the ſecond argument. If the ſecretary of ſtate, or a privy councellor, juſtice of peace, or other magiſtrate whatever, have no legal power to grant the warrant in the preſent caſe, it will follow, that the magiſtrate uſurping ſuch an illegal power, can never be conſtrued to be within the meaning or reaſon of the ſtatute of 24 Geo. II. c. 44. which was made to protect juſtices of the peace, &c. where they made blunders, or erred in judgment in caſes within their juriſdiction, and not to give them arbitrary power to iſſue warrants totally illegal from beginning to end, and in caſes wherein they had no juriſdiction at all. If any ſuch power in a ſecretary of ſtate, or a privy councellor, had ever exiſted, it would appear from our law-books. All the ancient books are ſilent on this head. Lambert never once mentions a ſecretary of ſtate. Neither he nor a privy councellor, were ever conſidered as magiſtrates. In all the arguments touching the Star-Chamber, and petition of right, nothing of this power was ever dreamt of. State-commitments anciently were either per mandatum regis in perſon, or by warrant of ſeveral of the privy councellors in the plural number. The king has this power in a particular mode, viz. by the advice of his privy council, who are to be anſwerable to the people if wrong is done. He has no other way but in council to ſignify his mandate. In the caſe of the ſeven biſhops, this matter was inſiſted upon at the bar, when the court preſumed the commitment of them was by the advice of the privy council; but that a ſingle privy councellor had this power, was not contended for by the crown-lawers then. This court will require it to be ſhewn that there have been ancient commitments of this ſort. Neither the ſecretary of ſtate, or a privy councellor, ever claimed a right to adminiſter an oath, but they employ a perſon as a law-clerk, who is a juſtice of peace, to adminiſter oaths, and take recognizances. Sir Barth. Shower, in Kendall and Roe's caſe, inſiſted they never had ſuch power. It would be a ſoleciſm in our law to ſay, there is a perſon who has power to commit, and has not power to examine on oath, and bail the party. Therefore whoever has power to commit, has power to bail. It was a queſtion formerly, whether a conſtable as an ancient conſervator of the peace ſhould take a recognizance or bond. In the time of queen Elizabeth there was a caſe wherein ſome of the judges were of one opinion and ſome of another. A ſecretary of ſtate was ſo inconſiderable formerly, that he is not mentioned in the ſtatute of ſcandalum magnatum. His office was thought of no great importance. He takes no oath of office as ſecretary of ſtate, gives no kind of ſecurity for the exerciſe of ſuch judicial power as he now uſurps. If this was an ancient power, it muſt have been annexed to his office anciently; it cannot be now given to him by the king. The king cannot make two chief juſtices of the Common-Pleas; nor could the king put the great ſeal in commiſſion before an act of parliament was made for that purpoſe. There was only one ſecretary of ſtate formerly: there are now two appointed by the king. If they have this power of magiſtracy, it ſhould ſeem to require ſome law to be made to give that power to two ſecretaries of ſtate which was formerly in one only. As to commitments per mandatum regis, ſee Staunf. Pl. Coron. 72. 4 Inſt. c. 5. court of Star-Chamber. Admitting they have power to commit in high treaſon, it will not follow they have power to commit for a miſdemeanor. It is of neceſſity that they can commit in high treaſon, which requires immediate interpoſition for the benefit of the public. In the caſe of commitment by Walſingham ſecretary of ſtate, 1 Leon. 71. it was returned on the habeas corpus at laſt, that the party was committed ex ſententia & mandato totius concilii privati dominæ reginæ. Becauſe he found he had not that power of himſelf, he had recourſe to the whole privy council's power, ſo that this caſe is rather for the plaintiff. Commitment by the high commiſſion court of York was declared by parliament illegal from the beginning; ſo in the caſe of ſhip-money the parliament declared it illegal.

Counſel for the defendants on the ſecond argument. The moſt able judges and advocates, ever ſince the Revolution, ſeem to have agreed, that the ſecretaries of ſtate have this power to commit for a miſdemeanor. Secretaries of ſtate have been looked upon in a very high light for two hundred years paſt. 27 H. VIII. c. 11. Their rank and place is ſettled by 31 H. VIII. c. 10. 4 Inſt. 362. c. 77. of precedency. 4 Inſt. 56. Selden's Titles of Honour, c. officers of ſtate. So that a ſecretary of ſtate is ſomething more than a mere clerk, as was ſaid. Minſhew verb. Secretary. He is è ſecretioribus conſiliis domini regis. Serjeant Pengelly moved, that ſir William Wyndham might be bailed. If he could not be committed by the ſecretary of ſtate for ſomething leſs than treaſon, why did he move to have him bailed? This ſeems a conceſſion that he might be committed in that caſe for ſomething leſs than treaſon. Lord Holt ſeems to agree that a commitment by a ſecretary of ſtate is good. Skin. 598. 1 Lord Raym. 65. There is no caſe in the books that ſays in what caſes a ſecretary of ſtate can or can not commit; by what power is it that he can commit in the caſe of treaſon, and in no other caſe? The reſolution of the houſe of commons touching the petition of right, Selden laſt volume, Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. 8. fol. 95, 96. Secretary Coke told the lords, it was his duty to commit by the king's command. Yoxley's caſe, Carth. 291. he was committed by the ſecretary of ſtate on the ſtatute of Elizabeth for refuſing to anſwer whether he was a Romiſh prieſt. The Queen and Derby, Forteſcue's Reports, 140. the commitment was by a ſecretary of ſtate, Mich. 10 Annæ, for a libel, and held good. (N. Bathurſt J. ſaid he had ſeen the habeas corpus and the return, and that this was a commitment by a ſecretary of ſtate). The King and Earbury, Mich. 7 Geo. II. 2 Bernard. 346. was a motion to diſcharge a recognizance entred into for writing a paper called The Royal Oak. Lord Hardwicke ſaid it was ſettled in Kendall and Roe's caſe, that a ſecretary of ſtate might apprehend perſons ſuſpected of treaſonable practices; and there are a great number of precedents in the Crown-Office of commitments by ſecretaries of ſtate for libels againſt the government.

After time taken to conſider, lord CAMDEN, lord chief juſtice, delivered the judgment of the court for the plaintiff, in the following words.

This record hath ſet up two defences to the action, on both of which the defendants have relied.

The firſt ariſes from the facts diſcloſed in the ſpecial verdict; whereby the defendants put their caſe upon the ſtatute of 24 Geo. II. inſiſting, that they have nothing to do with the legality of the warrants, but that they ought to have been acquitted as officers within the meaning of that act.

The ſecond defence ſtands upon the legality of the warrants; for, this being a juſtification at common law, the officer is anſwerable, if the magiſtrate has no juriſdiction.

Theſe two defences have drawn ſeveral points into queſtion, upon which the public, as well as the parties, have a right to our opinion.

Under the firſt, it is incumbent upon the officers to ſhew, that they are officers within the meaning of the act of parliament, and likewiſe that they have acted in obedience to the warrant.

The queſtion, whether officers or not, involves another; whether the ſecretary of ſtate, whoſe miniſters they are, can be deemed a juſtice of the peace, or taken within the equity of the deſcription; for officers and juſtices are here co-relative terms: therefore either both muſt be comprized, or both excluded.

This queſtion leads me to an inquiry into the authority of that miniſter, as he ſtands deſcribed upon the record in two capacities, viz. ſecretary of ſtate and privy councellor. And ſince no ſtatute has conferred any ſuch juriſdiction as this before us, it muſt be given, if it does really exiſt, by the common law; and upon this ground he has been treated as a conſervator of the peace.

The matter thus opened, the queſtions that naturally ariſe upon the ſpecial verdict, are;

Firſt, whether in either of theſe characters, or upon any other foundation, he is a conſervator of the peace.

Secondly, admitting him to be ſo, whether he is within the equity of the 24th Geo. II.

Theſe points being diſpoſed of, the next in order is, whether the defendants have acted in obedience to the warrant.

In the laſt place, the great queſtion upon the juſtification will be, whether the warrant to ſeize and carry away the plaintiff's papers is lawful.

FIRST QUESTION.

The power of this miniſter, in the way wherein it has been uſually exerciſed, is pretty ſingular.

If he is conſidered in the light of a privy councellor, although every member of that board is equally intitled to it with himſelf, yet he is the only one of that body who exerts it. His power is ſo extenſive in place, that it ſpreads throughout the whole realm; yet in the object it is ſo confined, that except in libels and ſome few ſtate crimes, as they are called, the ſecretary of ſtate does not pretend to the authority of a conſtable.

To conſider him as a conſervator. He never binds to the peace, or good behaviour, which ſeems to have been the principal duty of a conſervator; at leaſt he never does it in thoſe caſes, where the law requires thoſe ſureties. But he commits in certain other caſes, where it is very doubtful, whether the conſervator had any juriſdiction whatever.

His warrants are chiefly exerted againſt libellers, whom he binds in the firſt inſtance to their good behaviour, which no other conſervator ever attempted, from the beſt intelligence that we can learn from our books.

And though he doth all theſe things, yet it ſeems agreed, that he hath no power whatſoever to adminiſter an oath or take bail.

This juriſdiction, as extraordinary as I have deſcribed it, is ſo dark and obſcure in its origin, that the counſel have not been able to form any certain opinion from whence it ſprang.

Sometimes they annex it to the office of ſecretary of ſtate, ſometimes to the quality of privy councellor; and in the laſt argument it has been derived from the king's royal prerogative to commit by his own perſonal command.

Whatever may have been the true ſource of this authority, it muſt be admitted, that at this day he is in the full legal exerciſe of it; becauſe there has been not only a clear practice of it, at leaſt ſince the Revolution, confirmed by a variety of precedents; but the authority has been recognized and confirmed by two caſes in the very point ſince that period: and therefore we have not a power to unſettle or contradict it now, even though we are perſuaded that the commencement of it was erroneous.

And yet, though the inquiry I am now upon cannot be attended with any conſequence to the public, it is nevertheleſs indiſpenſable; for I ſhall trace the power to its origin, in order to determine, whether the perſon is within the equity of the 24th Geo. II.

Before I argue upon that point, or even ſtate the queſtion, whether the ſecretary of ſtate be within that act, we muſt know what he is. This is no very agreeable taſk, ſince it may poſſibly tend to create, in ſome minds, a doubt upon a practice that has been quietly ſubmitted to, and which is of no moment to the liberty of the ſubject; for ſo long as the proceedings under theſe warrants are properly regulated by law, the public is very little concerned in the choice of that perſon by whom they are iſſued.

To proceed then upon the firſt queſtion, and to conſider this perſon in the capacity of a ſecretary of ſtate.

This officer is in truth the king's private ſecretary. He is keeper of the ſignet and ſeal uſed for the king's private letters, and backs the ſign manual, in tranſmitting grants to the privy ſeal. This ſeal is taken
2 Inſt. 556. notice of in the Articuli ſuper Chartas, cap. 6. and my lord Coke in his comment upon that chapter, p. 556. deſcribes the ſecretary as I have mentioned. He ſays he has four clerks, that ſit at his board; and that the law in ſome caſes takes notice of the ſignet; for a ne exeat regno may be by commandment under the privy ſeal, or under the ſignet; and in this caſe the ſubject ought to take notice of it; for it is but a ſignification of the king's commandment. If at the time my lord Coke wrote his third Inſtitute he had been acquainted with the authority that is now aſcribed to the ſecretary, he would certainly have mentioned it in this place. It was too important a branch of the office to be omitted; and his ſilence therefore is a ſtrong argument, to a man's belief at leaſt, that no ſuch power exiſted at that time. He has likewiſe taken notice of this officer in the Prince's caſe in the eighth Report. He is mentioned in the ſtatute of the 27th H. VIII. chap. 11. and in the ſtatute of the ſame king touching precedency; and it is obſervable, that he is called in theſe two ſtatutes by the ſingle name of ſecretary, without the addition, which modern times has given him, of the dignity of a ſtate-officer.

I do not know, nor do I believe, that he was anciently a member of the privy council; but if he was, he was not even in the times of James and Charles the firſt, according to my lord Clarendon, an officer of ſuch magnitude as he grew up to after the Reſtoration, being only employed, by this account, to make up diſpatches at the concluſion of councils, and not to govern or preſide in thoſe councils.

It is not difficult to account for the growth of this miniſter's importance. He became naturally ſignificant from the time that all the courts in Europe began to admit reſident ambaſſadors; for upon the eſtabliſhment of this new policy, that whole foreign correſpondence paſſed through the ſecretary's hands, who by this means grew to be an inſtructed and confidential miniſter.

This being the true deſcription of his employment, I ſee no part of it that requires the authority of a magiſtrate. The cuſtody of a ſignet can imply no ſuch thing; nay, the contrary would rather be inferred from this circumſtance; becauſe if his power to commit was inherent in his office, his warrants would naturally be ſtamped with that ſeal; and in this light the privy ſeal, one ſhould think, would have had the preference, as being higheſt in dignity and of more conſideration in law. Beſides all this, it is not in my opinion conſonant to the wiſdom or analogy of our law, to give a power to commit, without a power to examine upon oath, which to this day the ſecretary of ſtate doth not 5 Mod. 78. preſume to exerciſe. Mr. Juſtice Rokeby, in the caſe of Kendall and Rowe, ſays, that the one is incident to the other; and I am ſtrongly of that opinion: for how can he commit, who is not able to examine upon oath? What magiſtrate can be found, in our law, ſo defectively conſtituted? The only inſtance of this kind, that can be produced, is the practice of the houſe of commons. But this inſtance is no precedent for other caſes. The rights of that aſſembly are original and ſelf created; they are paramount to our juriſdiction, and above the reach of injunction, prohibition, or error. So that I ſtill ſay, notwithſtanding that particular caſe, there is no magiſtrate in our law ſo framed, unleſs the ſecretary of ſtate be an exception. Now Mr. Juſtice Rokeby and myſelf, though we agree in the principle, form our concluſions in a very different manner. He from the aſſumed power of committing, which ought firſt to have been proved, infers the incidental powers of adminiſtering an oath. I on the contrary, from the admitted incapacity to do the latter, am ſtrongly inclined to deny the former.

Again, if the ſecretary of ſtate is a common law magiſtrate, one ſhould naturally expect to find ſome account of this in our books, whereas his very name is unknown; and there cannot be a ſtronger argument againſt his authority in that light, than the unſucceſsful attempts that have been made at the bar to transform him into a conſervator. Theſe attempts have given us the trouble of looking into thoſe books that have preſerved the memory of theſe magiſtrates, who have been long ſince deceaſed and forgotten. Fitzherbert, Crompton, Lombard, Dalton, Pulton, and Bacon, have all been ſearched to ſee, if any ſuch perſon could be found amongſt the old conſervators. It is not material to repeat the whole number, and to range them in their ſeveral claſſes; but it will be ſufficient to enumerate the principal ones; becauſe they may be referred to in ſome other part of the argument.

The king is mentioned as the firſt. Then come the chancellor, the treaſurer, the high ſteward, the maſter of the rolls, the chief juſtice and the juſtices of the King's Bench, all the judges in their ſeveral courts, ſheriffs, coroners, conſtables; and ſome are ſaid to be conſervators by tenure, ſome by preſcription, and others by commiſſion. But no ſecretary of ſtate is to be found in the catalogue; and I do affirm, that no treatiſe, caſe, record, or ſtatute, has ever called him a conſervator, from the beginning of time down to the caſe of the king againſt Kendall and Rowe.

The firſt time, he appears in our books to be a granter of our warrants, is in 1 Leonard 70 and 71. 29 and 30 Elizabeth, where the return to a habeas corpus was a commitment by ſir Francis Walſingham, principal ſecretary, and one of the privy council. The court takes this diſtinction. Where a perſon is committed by one of the privy council, in ſuch caſe the cauſe of the commitment ſhoud be ſet down in the return; but on the contrary, where the party is committed by the whole council, there no cauſe need be alledged. The court upon this ordered the return to be amended, and then the return is a commitment by the whole council.

There is a like caſe in the 2 Leonard p. 175. a little prior in point of time, where the commitment is by ſir Francis Walſingham, one of the principal ſecretaries, &c. Becauſe the warden of the Fleet did not return for what cauſe Helliard was committed, the court gives him day to mend his return, or otherwiſe the priſoner ſhould be delivered. Nobody who reads this caſe can doubt, but that the &c. muſt be ſupplied by the addition of privy councellor, as in the other caſe.

Theſe authorities ſhew, that the judges of thoſe days knew of no ſuch committing magiſtrate as a ſecretary of ſtate. They pay no regard to that office, but treat the commitment as the act of the privy councellor only; and to ſhew farther that the privy councellor as ſuch was the only acting magiſtrate in ſtate matters, all the twelve judges two years afterwards were obliged to remonſtrate againſt the irregularities of their commitments, but take no notice of any ſuch authorities practiſed by the ſecretaries of ſtate.

In the third year of king Charles the firſt, when the houſe of commons ſtarted that famous diſpute, upon the right claimed by the king and the privy council to commit without ſhewing cauſe, it is natural to expect, that the ſecretary's warrant ſhould have been handled, or at leaſt named among the ſtate commitments. But there is not throughout that long and learned diſcuſſion one word ſaid about him, or his name ſo much as mentioned; and the petition of right, as well as all the proceedings that produced it, is equally ſilent upon the ſubject.

Again, when in the ſixteenth year in the ſame king's reign the habeas corpus was granted by act of parliament upon all 16 Cha. 1. c. 10. ſ. 8. the ſtate commitments, and where the omiſſion of one mode of committing would have been fatal to the ſubject, and fruſtrated all the remedy of that act, and where they have enumerated not only every method of committing that had been exerciſed, but every other that might probably exiſt in after times; yet the commitment by a ſecretary of ſtate is not found amongſt the number. If then he had power of his own to commit, this famous act of parliament was waſte paper, and the ſubject ſtill at the mercy of the crown, without the benefit of the habeas corpus; a ſuppoſition altogether incredible: for who can believe, that this parliament, ſo jealous, ſo learned, ſo induſtrious, ſo enthuſiaſtic of the liberty of the ſubject, when they were making a law to relieve priſoners againſt the power of the crown, ſhould bind the king, and leave his ſecretary of ſtate at large?

Whoever attends to all theſe obſervations will ſee clearly, that the ſecretary of ſtate in thoſe days never exerciſed the power of committing in his own right; I ſay, in his own right, becauſe that he did in fact commit, and that frequently even at the time when the matter of the habeas corpus was agitated in the third of king Charles the firſt, will appear from a paſſage in the Ephemeris Parliamentaria, page 162. This paſſage, when it comes to be attended to, will throw great light upon the preſent enquiry. It is ſufficient of itſelf to convince me, from what ſource this practice firſt aroſe. It was from a delegation of the king's royal prerogative to commit by his own power, and from the king devolved in point of execution upon the ſecretary of ſtate. The paſſage I allude to is a ſpeech of ſecretary Cook.

Whilſt the parliament were diſputing the king's authority to commit, either by himſelf or by his council, without ſhewing the cauſe, the king, who was deſirous to pacify thoſe diſcontents, and yet unwilling to part with his prerogative, ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons to aſſure them, that if they would drop the buſineſs, he would promiſe them, upon his royal word, not to uſe this prerogative contrary to law. Secretary Cook delivers this meſſage, and then the book proceeds in theſe words. After ſpeaking of himſelf and the nature of his place, he ſays, ‘Give ‘me leave freely to tell you, that I know by experience, that by the ‘place I hold under his majeſty, if I will diſcharge the duty of my place ‘and the oath I have taken to his majeſty, I muſt commit, and neither ‘expreſs the cauſe to the gaoler, nor to the judges, nor to any coun‘cellor in England, but to the king himſelf. Yet do not think, I go ‘without ground of reaſon, or take this power committed to me to be ‘unlimited. Yea rather to me it is charge, burthen, and danger; for ‘if I by this power commit the pooreſt porter, if I do not upon a juſt ‘cauſe, if it may appear, the burthen will fall upon me heavier than the ‘law can inflict; for I ſhall loſe my credit with his majeſty and my ‘place: and I beſeech you conſider, whether thoſe that have been in the ‘ſame place, have not committed freely, and not any doubt made of it, ‘or any complaint made by the ſubject.’

To underſtand the meaning of this ſpeech, I muſt briefly remind you of the nature of that famous ſtruggle for the liberty of the ſubject between the crown and the parliament, which was then in agitation.

The points in controverſy were theſe: whether a ſubject committing by the king's perſonal command, or by warrant of the privy council, ought to expreſs the cauſe in the warrant, and whether the ſubject in that caſe was bailable.

The matter in diſpute was confined to thoſe two commitments. The crown claimed no ſuch right for any other warrant; nor did the commons demand redreſs againſt any other. The ſtatute of Weſtminſter the firſt, which was admitted on all ſides to be the only foundation upon which the pretenſions of the crown were built, ſpeaks of no other arreſts in the text, but the king's arreſt only; and the comment of law had never added any other arreſt by conſtruction, but that only of the privy council. No other commitment whatever was deemed by any man to be within the equity of that act. The caſe, cited upon that occaſion, ſpeaks of no other commitments but theſe. Nay the houſe of lords, who paſſed a reſolution in the heat of this buſineſs in favour of the king's authority, reſolves only, that the king or his council could commit, but meddle with no other commitment. Secretary Cook tells them in this public manner, that he made a daily practice of committing without ſhewing the cauſe; yet the houſe takes no notice of any ſecretary's warrant as ſuch, nor is the ſecretary's name mentioned in the courſe of all thoſe proceedings. What then were thoſe commitments mentioned by the ſecretary? They were certainly ſuch only, as were per ſpeciale mandatum domini regis. They could be no other. They were the commitments then under debate. They, and they only, were referred to by the king's meſſage, and were conſequently the ſubject matter of the ſecretary's apology; for no other warrant claimed that extraordinary privilege of concealing the cauſe.

This obſervation explains him, when he calls it a power committed to him; which I conſtrue, not as annexed to his office, but ſpecially delegated. This accounts too for his notion, that the law could not touch him; but that if he abuſed his truſt, he ſhould loſe his credit with the king and his place, which he deſcribes as a heavier puniſhment than the law could inflict upon him. Upon this ground it will be eaſy to explain the notable ſingularities of this miniſter's proceeding, which are not to be reconciled to any idea of a common-law magiſtrate. Such are his meddling only with a few ſtate-offences, his reach over the whole kingdom, his committing without the power of adminiſtering an oath, his employment of none but the meſſenger of the king's chamber, and his command to mayors, juſtices, ſheriffs, &c. to aſſiſt him; all which particularities are congruous enough to the idea of the king's perſonal warrant, but utterly inconſiſtent with all the principles of magiſtracy in a ſubject.

If on the other hand it can be underſtood, that he could and did commit without ſhewing the cauſe in his own right and by virtue of his office, then was his warrant admitted to be legal by the whole houſe, and without cenſure or animadverſion. It was neither condemned by the petition of right, nor ſubject to the habeas corpus act of 16 of Charles the firſt.

16 Cha. 1. c. 10.

The truth of the caſe was no more than this. The council-board were too numerous to be acquainted with every ſecret tranſaction that required immediate confinement; and the delay by ſummoning was inconvenient in caſes that required diſpatch. The ſecretary of ſtate, as moſt entruſted, was the fitteſt hand to iſſue ſudden warrants; and therefore we find him ſo employed by queen Elizabeth under the quality of a privy councellor. But when the attempt failed, the judges declaring, that he muſt ſhew the cauſe, and that they would remand none of his priſoners in any caſe but that of high treaſon, thoſe warrants ceaſed, and then a new method was taken by making him the inſtrument of the king's ſpeciale mandatum; for that is the form in which all warrants and returns were drawn, that were produced upon that famous argument.

Having thus ſhewn, not only negatively that this power of committing was not annexed to the ſecretary's office, but affirmatively likewiſe that he was notifier or counterſigner of the king's perſonal warrant acting in alio jure down to the times of the 16 of Charles the firſt, and conſequently to the Reſtoration, for there was no ſecretary in that interval, I have but little to add upon this head, but obſerving what paſſed between that time and the caſe of Kendall and Rowe.

13 & 14 Ch. 2. c. 33.

The licenſing act, that took place in the 13th and 14th of Charles the ſecond, gave him his firſt right to iſſue a warrant in his own name; not indeed to commit perſons, but a warrant to ſearch for papers. Whether upon this new power he grafted any authority to commit perſons in his own right, as it ſhould ſeem he did by the precedent produced the other day, is not very material. But it is remarkable, that during that interval he adhered in ſome caſes to the old form, by ſpecifying the expreſs command of the king in this warrant.

With reſpect to the caſes that have paſſed ſince the Revolution, ſuch as the king againſt Kendall and Rowe, the queen againſt Darby, and the king and Earbery, I ſhall take no other notice of them in this place, than to ſay, they afford no light in the preſent inquiry by ſhewing the ground of the officer's authority, though they are ſtrong caſes to confirm it.

But before I can fairly conclude, that the ſecretary of ſtate's power was derived from the king's perſonal prerogative and from no other origin, I muſt examine, what has paſſed relative to the power of a ſeparate privy councellor in this reſpect. This is the more neceſſary to be done, becauſe my lord chief juſtice Holt has built all his authority upon this ground; and the ſubſequent caſes, inſtead of ſtriking out any new light upon the ſubject, do all lean upon and ſupport themſelves by my lord chief juſtice Holt's opinion in the caſe of Kendall and Rowe.

I will therefore fairly ſtate all that I have been able to diſcover touching the matter; and then, after I have declared my own opinion, ſhall leave others to judge for themſelves.

In the firſt place it is proper to obſerve, that a privy councellor cannot derive his authority from the ſtatute of Weſtminſter the firſt; which recites an arreſt by the command of the king to be one of thoſe caſes that were irrepleviſeable by the common law. The principal commentator upon theſe words is Staundford, who ſays, 'as to the commandment of the king, this is to be underſtood of the commandment of his own mouth, or of his council, 'which is incorporate to him, and ſpeaks with the mouth of the king 'himſelf; for otherwiſe, if you will take theſe words of commandment 'generally, you may ſay that every capias in a perſonal action is the 'command of the king.' Lambard in his chapter of bailment, where he cites this act of parliament, gives it the ſame conſtruction, by allowing a commitment by the council to be within the equity of theſe words, 'commandment of 'the king.' Thus far, and no further, did the crown lawyers in the third of king Charles the firſt endeavour to extend the text of the law; and it is plain from the caſes before cited, that the judges in queen Elizabeth's time were of the ſame opinion, that the argument could not be extended in favour of the ſingle councellor; becauſe they held, that he is bound to ſhew the cauſe upon his warrant, as diſtinguiſhed from the other warrants, where they admit the cauſe need not be ſhewn.

Staundf. Pl. c. fo. 72. b.

Lamb. Eirenarch. & b. 3. c. 2. p. 335.

If he is not then entitled by this ſtatute, is he impowered by the common law? They, who contend he is, would do well to ſhew ſome authority in proof of their opinion. It is clear, he is not numbered among the conſervators. It is as clear, that he is not mentioned by any book as one of the ordinary magiſtrates of juſtice with any ſuch general authority.

The firſt place, in which any thing of this kind is to be found, is in the year-book of Henry the ſixth, where the ſheriff returns a detainer under the warrant of duos de concilio pro rebus regem tangentibus. This proof has an unlucky defect in it; becauſe the reading is doubtful, the word dnos as it is written ſtanding as well for dominos, as for duos; ſo that till the reading is ſettled, which is beyond my ſkill, the authority muſt be ſuſpended.

The next time you meet with a privy councellor in the light of a magiſtrate is in the firſt of Edward the ſixth, chap. 12. where one of the privy council is empowered to take the accuſation in ſome new treaſons therein mentioned; and he is for this purpoſe joined with the juſtice of aſſize and juſtice of the peace. The like power is given to him by the fifth and ſixth of the ſame king, c. 11. in a like caſe; and I find in Kelyng, p. 19, that when the judges met to reſolve certain points before the trial of the regicides, they reſolved, that a confeſſion upon examination before a privy councellor, though he be not a juſtice of the peace, is a confeſſion within the meaning of the ſtatute of the fifth and ſixth of Edward the ſixth. That act of parliament in the twelfth ſection had provided, that no perſon ſhould be attainted of treaſon, but upon the teſtimony of two lawful accuſers, unleſs the ſaid party arraigned ſhould willingly without violence confeſs the ſame.

1 E. 6. c. 12. ſ. 19.

5 & 6 E. 6. c. 11. ſ. 10.

It ſeems to me, that the ground upon which the judges proceeded in this reſolution, was the expreſs power given to the privy council in the clauſe next but one before that juſt mentioned, where the act enables them to take the accuſation in the new treaſons there mentioned.

Whether they reaſoned in that way, or whether they conceived that the power there given was a proof of ſome like power which they enjoyed to take accuſation in the caſe of treaſons at the common law, the book has not explained; ſo that hitherto this authority in the caſe of high treaſon ſtands upon a very poor foundation, being in truth no more than a conjecture of law without authority to ſupport it.

The next authorities are the caſes already recited in Leonard, which to the preſent point prove nothing more than this; that the judges do admit a power in a privy councellor to commit, without ſpecifying in what caſes. They demand the cauſe, and a better return; whereupon ſir Francis Walſingham, inſtead of relying upon his power as privy councellor, returns a new warrant ſigned by the whole board.

Two years after this came forth that famous reſolution of all the judges, which is reported in 1 Anderſon 297. 34th of Elizabeth. There is no occaſion to obſerve, how arbitrary the prerogative grew, and how faſt it increaſed towards the end of this queen's reign. It ſeems to me, as if the privilege claimed by the king's perſonal warrant, and from him derived to the council-board, by conſtruction, had ſome-how or other been adopted by every individual of that board; for in fact theſe warrants became ſo frequent and oppreſſive, that the courts of juſtice were obliged at laſt to interpoſe.

However they might be overborne by the terror of the king's ſpecial command either in or out of council, they had courage enough to reſiſt the novel encroachments of the ſeparate members; and therefore they did in the courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas ſet at large many perſons ſo committed: upon which occaſion a queſtion being put to the judges, to ſpecify in what caſes the priſoner was to be remanded, they anſwer the queſtion with a remonſtrance of their own againſt the illegal warrants granted by the privy councellors. The preamble relates entirely to theſe commitments, wherein they deſire, that ſome good order may be taken, that her highneſs's ſubjects may not be committed or detained in priſon by commandment of any nobleman, againſt the laws of the realm.

The queſtion is this: in what caſes priſoners ſent to cuſtody by her majeſty, her council, or any one or more of her council, are to be detained in priſon, and not to be delivered by her majeſty's courts or judges.

The anſwer is, 'We think, that if any perſon be committed by her 'majeſty's command from her perſon, or by order from the council-'board, or if any one or two of her council commit one for high treaſon, 'ſuch perſons ſo in the caſe before committed may not be delivered by 'any of her courts without due trial by the law and judgment of ac-'quittal had. Nevertheleſs the judges may award the queen's writs to 'bring the bodies of ſuch perſons before them; and if upon return there-'of the cauſes of their commitment be certified to the judges, as it ought 'to be, then the judges in the caſes before ought not to deliver him, but 'to remand the priſoner to the place from whence he came; which cannot 'conveniently be done, unleſs notice of the cauſes in generality, or elſe 'ſpecially, be given to the keeper or goaler that ſhall have the cuſtody of 'ſuch priſoner.'

There is a ſtudied obſcurity in this opinion, which ſhews, how cautious the judges were obliged to be in thoſe dangerous times; for whether they meant to acknowledge a general power in the king or his council to commit, as diſtinguiſhed from a ſpecial power in one or more of his council to commit, only in the caſe of high treaſon; or whether this caſe of high treaſon is to be referred to all the commitments as the only unbailable caſe; or again, whether in the ſuperior commitment by the royal perſon or his council, they would deliver the priſoner though no cauſe was ſpecified; or if one of the council committed for offences below high treaſon where they declare they would not remand, yet whether they would abſolutely diſcharge or only upon bail; is altogether either ambiguous or uncertain.

It is evident to me, that the judges did not intend to be underſtood touching theſe matters; and the only propoſitions, that are clearly laid down in this reſolution, are theſe.

Firſt, that they would never remand upon the councellor's commitment but in high treaſon.

Secondly, that the cauſe ought to be ſhewed in all caſes.

This reſolution grew to be much agitated afterwards in the third of Charles the firſt, and had the honour, like other dark oracles, to be cited on both ſides.

Thus much it was neceſſary to obſerve upon this famous opinion; becauſe it was upon this opinion, that lord chief juſtice Holt principally relied. At this time it is apparent, that all the privy councellors exerciſed this right in common. Whatever it was, the complaint ſhews, it was a general practice, and a privilege enjoyed by all the members of that board; from whence it is natural to ſuppoſe, that if the power was well founded, the ſame practice would have continued to this time in the ſame way, ſeeing how tenacious all men are of thoſe things that are called rights and privileges. Inſtead of this it doth not appear, that the council from that æra have ever aſſerted their rights; and now at laſt, when the ſecretary of ſtate has revived the claim, for the common benefit, as it ſhould ſeem, of the whole body, no other perſon has followed this example, or knows to this moment that he is entitled to ſuch right. Any body who conſiders what the conſequence muſt have been from theſe determinations of the judges, might venture to affirm, that the privy councellor's warrant from this period ceaſed and grew out of uſe; for as the cauſe in this caſe was neceſſary to be ſpecified, and the priſoner was never to be remanded but in the caſe of high treaſon, that warrant became at once unſerviceable, and the crown was forced to reſort to the royal mandate or the board-warrant, which, notwithſtanding the caſe in Anderſon, was ſtill inſiſted to be unbailable and good without a cauſe.

Hence it happened, that in the great debate in the third of king Charles the firſt, no privy councellor's warrants do once occur; but inſtead thereof you find the ſecretary of ſtate dealing forth the king's royal mandate, and the privy councellor's authority at reſt.

The only reaſon, why I touch upon theſe proceedings, is for the ſake of obſerving, that no notice is taken in thoſe arguments of the privy councellor's right to commit; and yet the power of the king himſelf, and of his council, by the ſtatute of Weſtminſter the firſt, is largely diſcuſſed, and ſo fully handled, that if the warrant of one privy councellor had then been in uſe, it muſt have been brought forth in the argument; for if it could have ſerved no other purpoſe, it would have been material, in order to mark the diſtinction between that and the warrant of the whole board.

16 Ch. 1. c. 10.

From theſe obſervations I conclude, that theſe warrants were then deceaſed and gone, and would probably have never made their appearance again even in deſcription, if the bill in the 16th of Charles the firſt, had not recalled them to memory, not as things either then in uſe or admitted to be legal, but as one of the modes of commitment which might be again revived, becauſe it had been formerly practiſed. Therefore when this form of warrant appears, as it does in the catalogue of other forms, both legal and illegal, no argument can be raiſed from a pretended recognition of this particular warrant; ſince it was neceſſary to name every mode, that ever had been uſed by the king, the council, or the ſtar-chamber, in order to make the remedy by habeas corpus univerſal.

Journ. Com.

But if there can be a doubt, whether this act of parliament is to be deemed a recognition of this authority, there is a paſſage in the journal of the houſe of commons, that proves the contrary in direct terms.

Whilſt this bill was paſſing, the houſe makes an amendment, which appears by the queſtion put to be this, whether the houſe ſhould aſſent to the putting the word liberties out of the bill.

But as the paſſage in the bill is not mentioned in the journals, it muſt be collected by inferences. By the phraſe left out of the bill, I preſume it was permitted to ſtand in the preamble. Now when you look into the preamble, the word liberties is there to be found in that part of the preamble which recites this uſurpation of the privy council upon the liberties, as well as the properties of the ſubject; whereas the enacting clauſe condemns only the juriſdiction of that board, ſo far as it aſſumed a juriſdiction over the property of the ſubject; from whence I collect that the word liberties ſtood in that clauſe; and the paſſage that follows in the journal does ſtrongly confirm it.

The words are theſe: 'Reſolved upon the queſtion, that this houſe does aſſent to the putting the word liberties out of the bill concerning the Star-Chamber and council pleadings; becauſe the houſe has a bill to be drawn to provide for the liberty of the ſubject in a large manner. Mr. ſerjeant Wild and Mr. Whitelock are appointed to draw a bill to that purpoſe upon the ſeveral points that have been here this day debated.

'Reſolved upon the queſtion, that the body of the lords of the council, nor any one of them in particular as a privy councellor, has any power to impriſon any free-born ſubject, except in ſuch caſes as they are warranted by the ſtatutes of the realm.'

It is pretty plain from this paſſage, that the debate turned upon the meaning of the ſtatute of Weſtminſter the firſt, and the reſolution of the judges in Anderſon, about which it is not fit to give any opinion; my deſign by citing this paſſage being only to ſhew, that this act of parliament does not even prove the actual practice of ſuch warrants at that time, much leſs does recognize their legality.

What follows is ſtill more remarkable touching this buſineſs, upon a doubt ſtarted in the trial of the ſeven biſhops. They were committed by a warrant ſigned by no leſs than thirteen privy councellors; but the warrant did not appear to be ſigned by them in council. The objection taken was, that the warrant was void, being ſigned only by the privy councellors ſeparately, and not in a body. If any man in Weſtminſter-Hall at that time had underſtood, that one or more privy councellors had a right to commit for a miſdemeanor, that would have been a flat anſwer to the objection; but they are ſo far from inſiſting upon this, that all the king's councellors, as well as the court, do admit the warrant would have been void, if it could be taken to be executed by them out of council.

The ſolicitor-general upon that occaſion cites the 16th of Charles the firſt, which ſtatute is produced and read, and yet no argument is taken from thence to prove the authority of the ſeparate lords, though the act is before them. Mr. Pollexfen in the courſe of the debate ſays, 'We do all pretty well agree, for aught I can perceive, in two things. We do not deny, but that the council-board has power to commit. They on the other ſide do not affirm, that the lords of the council can commit out of the council.

'Attorney-General. Yes, they may as juſtices of the peace.

'Pollexfen. This is not pretended to be ſo here.

'Lord Chief Juſtice. No, no, that is not the caſe.'

The court at laſt got rid of the objection, by preſuming the warrant to have been executed in council.

There cannot be a ſtronger authority than this I have now cited for the preſent purpoſe. The whole body of the law, if I may uſe the phraſe, were as ignorant at that time of a privy councellor's right to commit in the caſe of a libel, as the whole body of privy councellors are at this day.

The counſel on both ſides in that cauſe were the ableſt of their time, and few times have produced abler. They had been concerned in all the ſtate-caſes during the whole reign of king Charles the ſecond, on one ſide or the other; and to ſuppoſe that all theſe perſons could be utterly ignorant of this extraordinary power, if it had been either legal or even practiſed, is a ſuppoſition not to be maintained.

This is the whole that I have been able to find, touching the power of one or more privy councellors to commit; and to ſum up the whole of this buſineſs in a word it ſtands thus.

The two caſes in Leonard do preſuppoſe ſome power in a privy councellor to commit, without ſaying what; and the caſe in Anderſon does plainly recognize ſuch a power in high treaſon: but with reſpect to his juriſdiction in other offences, I do not find it was either claimed or exerciſed.

In conſequence of all this reaſoning, I am forced to deny the opinion of my lord chief juſtice Holt to be law, if it ſhall be taken to extend beyond the caſe of high treaſon. But there is no neceſſity to underſtand the book in a more general ſenſe; nor is it fair indeed to give the words a more large conſtruction: for as the concluſion ought always to be grounded on the premiſſes, and the premiſſes are confined to the caſe of high treaſon only, the opinion ſhould naturally conform to the caſes cited, more eſpecially as the caſe there before the court was a caſe of high treaſon, and they were under no neceſſity to lay down the doctrine larger than the caſe required.——Now whereas it has been argued, that if you admit a power of committing in high treaſon, the power of committing in leſſer offences follows à fortiori; I beg leave to deny that conſequence, for I take the rule with reſpect to all ſpecial authorities to be directly the reverſe. They are always ſtrictly confined to the letter; and when I ſee therefore, that a ſpecial power in any ſingle caſe only has been permitted to a perſon, who in no other inſtance is known or recorded by the common law as a magiſtrate, I have no right to enlarge his authority one ſtep beyond that caſe. Conſider how ſtrange it would ſound, if I ſhould declare at once, that every privy councellor without exception is inveſted with a power to commit in all offences without exception from high treaſon down to treſpaſs, when it is clear that he is not a conſervator. It might be ſaid of me, 'he ſhould have explained himſelf a little more clearly, and told us where he had found the deſcription of ſo ſingular a magiſtrate, who being no conſervator was yet in the nature of a conſervator.'

I have now finiſhed all I have to ſay upon this head; and am ſatisfied, that the ſecretary of ſtate hath aſſumed this power as a transfer, I know not how, of the royal authority to himſelf; and that the common law of England knows no ſuch magiſtrate. At the ſame time I declare, wherein my brothers do all agree with me, that we are bound to adhere to the determination of the queen againſt Derby, and the king againſt Earbury; and I have no right to overturn thoſe deciſions, even though it ſhould be admitted, that the practice, which has ſubſiſted ſince the Revolution, had been erroneous in its commencement.

The ſecretary of ſtate having now been conſidered in the two lights of ſecretary and privy councellor, and likewiſe as the ſubſtitute of the royal mandate; in the two firſt he is clearly no conſervator; in the laſt, if he can be ſuppoſed to have borrowed the right of conſervatorſhip from the ſovereign himſelf, yet no one will argue or pretend, that ſo great a perſon, one ſo high in authority, can be deemed a juſtice of the peace within the equity of the 24th of Geo. II.

However, I will for a time admit the ſecretary of ſtate to be a conſervator, in order to examine, whether in that character he can be within the equity of this act.

SECOND QUESTION.

Upon this queſtion, I ſhall take into conſideration the 7th of James I. c. 5. becauſe, though it is not material upon this record to determine, whether the ſpecial evidence can be admitted under the general iſſue of not guilty, the defendant having in this inſtance juſtified; yet as that act is made in eâdem materiâ, and for the benefit of the ſame perſons, the rule of conſtruction obſerved in that will in great meaſure be an authority for this.

The 24th of Geo. II. is entitled, 'An act for the rendering juſtices of the peace more ſafe in the execution of their offices, and for indemnifying conſtables and others acting in obedience to their warrants.' The preamble runs thus: 'Whereas juſtices of the peace are diſcouraged in the execution of their offices, by vexatious actions brought againſt them, for or by reaſon of ſmall and involuntary errors in their proceedings; and whereas it is neceſſary, that they ſhould be, as far as is conſiſtent with juſtice and the ſafety and liberty of the ſubjects over whom their authority extends, rendered ſafe in the execution of the ſaid office and truſt; and whereas it is alſo neceſſary, that the ſubject ſhould be protected from all wilful and oppreſſive abuſe of the ſeveral laws committed to the care and execution of the ſaid juſtices of peace.' Then comes the enacting part.

The only granter of the warrant in the enacting part, as well as the preamble, is the juſtice of the peace. The officers, as they are deſcribed, are conſtables, headboroughs, and other officers or perſons acting by their order, or in their aid. If any perſon acting in obedience to ſuch warrant, and producing the ſaid warrant upon demand, is afterwards proſecuted for ſuch act, the ſtatute ſays, he ſhall be acquitted, upon the production of ſuch warrant. The counſel for the defendants ſay, the ſecretary and the meſſengers are both within the equity of this act. The firſt is a juſtice of the peace, becauſe he is a conſervator. If ſo the latter is his officer, which I will admit. The propoſition then is, that conſervators are within the equity of this act. They are clearly not within the letter; for juſtice and conſervator are not convertible terms; and though it ſhould be admitted, that a juſtice of the peace is ſtill a conſervator, yet a conſervator is not a juſtice.

The defendants have argued upon two rules of conſtruction, which in truth are but one.

Firſt, where in a general act a particular is put as an example, all other perſons of like deſcription ſhall be comprized.

Secondly, where the words of a ſtatute enact a thing, it enacts all other things in like degree.
